

C 17747 Fol.
Mayerne. Louis T.

606

5

TO THE RIGHT NOBLE, AND MOST WORTHY OF
ALL HONORS, AND
ALL TITLES,

ROBERT Earle of Salis-burie, Lord High Treasurer of England; &c.

THOMAS Earle of Suffolke, Lord Chamberlaine to his Maestie.

Y most Honoured Lords, I might iustly feare, that my continuall desire to acknowledge my dutie vnto your LL. by some acceptable kind of seruice, would be held importunitie, if your Noble dispositions, and mine owne experience in particular of your Honours gratefull acceptance of the meanest seruice that is well meant, had not freed me from that feare, and enabled my weake faculties to adde this vnto the rest of my oblations, which I consecrate vnto your LL. vp-on the Altar of my deuotion. I must confesse that your fa-uorable reception of my French and Netherland Histories hath added courage to my will, to passe the Pyrennee Moun-taines, and to take a suruey of this Historie of Spaine: the which I held (in my weake judgement) for many respects, as worthie the knowledge of our Nation, as any other. It is a generall Historie of all the Continent of Spaine, wherein the seuerall Histories of those seuerall Kingdomes, as they were in former times distinctly diuided and gouerned by

The Epistle Dedicatorie.

diuers Princes, are vnited; being collected out of all the best authors that haue written of that subiect. These considerations I say, were the inspiring meanes to moue me to vnder- take the traduction of this Historie of Spaine, and haue gi- uen me resolution, and constancie to finish it, and to send it forth to the view of the world. The worke I hope will giue good content, it being a faithful relation of so many variable and strange accidents as haue happened in those Countries, during the manie alterations and changes of that State, and the long and cruell wars betwixt the Moores & Spaniards. If I, in my plaine maner of translation, haue not giuen it that grace which a more eloquent penne might haue done, I most humbly craue pardon, and intreat that my desire to benefit others, may giue satisfaction for my disability and defects. I haue presumed to shroud the fruites of my poore endeours, vnder your LL. countenance and protection; desiring to leaue a testimonie to all posteritie how much I am

Your LL. deuoted in all duetie and service,

EDVVARD GRIMESTON.

To the Reader.

Gentlemen, in the last edition of the Historie of France, I did willingly omit all matters acted by the Spaniards, wherein the French were not principally interessed, hauing then a resolution to make the Histories of those countries distinct and priuat. And for that I would not leaue you long in suspence, I promised within the yeare to publish this Historie of Spaine: wherein (notwithstanding my publique seruice, and many other difficulties) I haue forced my selfe to keepe my word, and to giue you satisfaction, though it be with some preiudice to my health. I will not vse many complements in the behalfe of the Author, his worke shall plead for himselfe: This Historie was written by a Frenchman, who is yet liuing, a man of grauitie and iudgement: It is no translation, but a collection out of the best writers that haue treated of that subiect. his chiefe Authors were Stephen Garebay, Ierome Surites, Mariana, Ambrose Morales, Iohn Vasee a Fleming, with many other Spanish, Italian & Latin writers: out of all which he hath compyled this worke, and as it were vnited and tyed together the discourse of all these realmes with a continued style, by reason of the warre, accords, marriages, and other treaties and alliances which they haue had common among them: yet hath he so distinguished them, as seeing them all, you may easily read any one seuerally by it selfe, by the direction of notes and inscriptions set in the margent at euerie section or breach, whereby you may choose what belongs to Nauarre, Portugall, Castille, or to any other of those realmes, and read the Historie apart from the beginning to the end.

The antiquitie of this Spanish Nation (whereof he hath breiefely made mention in the beginning of the first Booke) he confesseth to be obscure and vncertaine, and the writers thereof ignorant or negligent, so as it may be his discourse agreeth not with some authors which treat of the same men of whom he maketh mention, as of Hercules, Cacus, Gerion, Denis, and such like; but he pleads thus much for himselfe, that he could not contemne nor reiect the Spanish authors which haue so written of them, the which are to be receiued as obserued and produced by them. This Historie comes but to the winning of the Terceres, which was in the yeare 1583: he hath finished the rest vnto these times, I my selfe haue seene it in his studie at Paris, but he hath not yet put it to the Presse, so as I haue bene constrained, in the continuance thereof, to helpe my selfe out of the best that haue written of these later times, wherein I haue been assisted by some worthy gentlemen in the relation of some great actions, and haue continued the Historie, rie, vnto my Lord Admirals returne out of Spaine. You must not hold it strange, if you find a great part of Philip the seconds raigne barren of any great actions done in Spaine: his chiefe designs were against foreine States, imploying his bravest men abroad, either against France, England, or the vnitied Prouinces, at the Indies, or at Sea; all which actions are either related here, or in their distinct Histories.

I must aduertise the Reader, that, from the yeare 1530, I haue not directly followed my Author, for I haue both inserted diuers things out of other Authors, whereof he makes no mention, and haue related some more at large then he hath done, for your better satisfaction, as I haue found them written in other approued Authors. My last suit must be for my selfe and the Printer, yet will I not vse any great circumstances to captiuate your fauors in mine owne behalfe: my stile (I confesse) is plaine and harsh; it were folly (nay madnesse) in me to seeke to conceale it, being so well knowne vnto you: yet let me intreat so much fauor at your hands, that as I haue spent my spirits to giue you content, so you will spare your spleenes, and censure fauorably, vntill you come to the like tryall: then shall you find, that either by your owne mistaking, or by the errors of the Presse you shall haue iust cause to sue for the like grace; which is to supply all escapes and errors with your iudicious reading. And so I rest

Yours,

E. G.

A

B A GENERALL HISTORIE OF SPAINE:

Collected out of diuers Authors, as well
antient as moderne.

The Contents of the first Booke.

C

- 1 A discourse of the antient and first beginning of the Spaniards.
- 2 Their religion and language.
- 3 The antient and (may be) fabulous kings and captaines of vagabond troupes in Spaine, vnto Gerion, and so to Hercules the Great.
- 4 Many petie kings, or Italian pirats, spoyling Spaine.
- 5 Discourse of the absurdities of these antiquities.
- 6 Greekes spoyling Spaine.
- 7 Affricanes entring and wasting Spaine.
- 8 Confusion and medley of the people which vsurped the countrey of Spaine.
- 9 Phenicians and Gaditines, their offspring.
- 10 A Chorographicall description of the firme land of Spaine.
- 11 Islands about Spaine.
- 12 Distinction of the governments of Spaine, according to the Romans and Carthaginians, and others after them vnto the Arabians.
- 13 Distinction of the kingdomes of Spaine, which are now of fame.
- 14 The fertillitie of Spaine, both antient and moderne.
- 15 The manners of the antient Spaniards, and of those which now hold it: their armes and discipline.

E

He beginning and antiquitie of nations farre fetcht, is alwaies fabulous: for most of them that haue vndertaken to write histories, either generall, or particular of some one nation, haue thought it expedient (for their reputations) to offer a perfect worke vnto the world; and not to passe any season without some memorie of them of whom they write: imagining that the studious Reader would hold it an argument of their sloth or negligence, to leaue any thing in blank. And therefore when as they wanted the testimonie of graue authors, they haue countenanced their owne imaginations; or haue imitated the fabulous inuentions of others, imploying their time, toyle, and eloquence in vaine things: wherein they may happyly satisfie some curious heads, but not such as desire to leame. For as a lye cannot be so disgui-sed, but either the conference of ages doth discouer it; or a spirit knowing the force and effect of things created, doth reject it; or the religious condemne it, as it is fit; when it shal once ap-peare that the author of any historie hath supposed things doubtfull and vncertaine, for true, thereby to enlarge his volumes. He that is studious, and loth to loose his time, growes discontented,

F

B

tentent,

Truth the subiect of a History

tenred, and reads it with distast. Wherefore men of best judgement, hold, that the subject of a historie is truth, in serious matters, and worthy to be imparted to posteritie; giuing libertie to them that write, to season the examples with praise or blame: obseruing the rewards & punishments which haue followed, without respect of persons, or yielding to any passion, either of loue or hatred, but stirred vp by the merits of vertue, or the horror of vice; to the end that such as read their writings, may be encouraged by the worthy acts of some, to liue virtuously, and diuerted by the dishonour and vnsfortunat successe of others, from all bad affections: and the rather, for that they do therein find imitable steps of vertue. And for that the memorie of many things is buried in obliuion, or miscaried, they haue not been so strict, as to forbid them that find themselves ingaged in the desars and obscuritie of the antiquitie of nations, to obserue some steps, and go by probable conjectures, to a way passable. This is allowed them, so as they doe it by constraint, and with judgement; remembling, that a good huntsman can judge of a wolues footing from a dogs, which are something like.

Spaine unknown before the Carthaginians.

The historie of Spaine, which we resolute to write, is herein defectiue, as in a manner all others be: for before the coming of the Carthaginians into that country, and the wars of the Romans, it cannot be directly said, by what people Spaine was held, nor at what time, nor by what policie it was gouerned, but by ill grounded conjectures. For of the acts of the first men which were dispersed vpon the face of the earth after the deluge, we haue no author but Moy- ses, who is careful to describe the estate and succession of the Hebrews, in that chiefly which concerns the establishing of the Church of God. Of other nations he speaks but by occasion, and as God would doe good vnto this nation by them, or punish it for their ingratitude. Wee must not then seeke for any mention of Spaine or Spaniards in him. The Grecians had so little care of other nations, & haue so much respected their own, as they haue scarce vouchsafed to speake of them, but with contempt; and to amplifie their own glorie, they haue sometimes fed the Latines with fables: who haue adorned and enriched their Rome and Italie, and haue had care to proclaim their gests, making vse (in regard of antiquitie) of Grecian fables, or of conjectures; as the moderne haue in like manner done. What can we then do in matters which are so doubtfull, but onely touch these conjectures as farre as they shall seeme receivable; passing that slightly ouer, which the Historians haue written of our first Spaine, to the end we busie not our selues in a vaine labour more than is fit.

The Grecians
authors of fables.

Tubal,

Wherefore, according to Iosephus report, and vpon their consciences which haue supposed vnto vs a Berosus, we say after many others, that Tubal, one of the sonnes of Iaphet, otherwise called Iubal, or Iobel, is father to the Spaniards, although it be verie likely, that he neuer set foot in Spaine, being then a country without a name: but that from Armenia or the neighbour places, taking his way towards the North, he stayed in a region since called Iberia, situated vpon Mont Caucasus, which covers it from the North, betwixt the Caspian and Euxine seas: a country then inhabited by them which we call Georgians, whereas afterwards the Chaldees, or Alibes were, a name approaching to Iubales, as some would wrest it, changing some letters, as it happens in the corruption of tongues. These people were Smithes, handling yron, whereof the country abounds, and applying it by their art to many good uses. The descendants of Iubal in these places, were afterwards called Iberians, and the country Iberia, by some man of qualitie which caried that name, and whose memory they would preferue, as it is likely. From thence the most receivable authors doe maintaine, that the Iberians Spaniards parted some ages after Tubal, or Iubal, and that the people being so multiplied, as the country could not well feed them, nor containe them, a part of them were constrained either by force, or by casting of lots, to abandon the place, and seeke some new abode: the which hath beene ordinarie among all nations, and in all ages, but especially in the first age, when it was necessarie the world should be peopled and inhabited: and it is credible, that nature was at that time wonderfull fruitfull, God prouiding for the propagation of mankind. The common opinion is, that these Iberians hauing wandered much, being arriued vpon the frontiers of the region whereof we treat, staid in the vallies of those mountains, which were since called Pyrenee, and that they did liue long there, finding them fit to entertaine them in their first inclination and breeding: for that country abounds in yron mynes as much as any in Europe; and therefore they found means wherewith to imploy themselves, and to feed, for that these mountains were full of all things wherof these new come men, and ill provided, had need, that is to Pyrene mountains full of iron mynes.

A is to say, chestnuts, hazelnuts, pears, plummets, cherries, and all other wild fruites, with great store of acornes, especially towards the West parts.

2 That there was either good religion, knowledge, gouernment, or any thing else, but great simplicitie, ignorance, and pouertie, we can hardly beleue: and wee perswade our selues, that ciuilitie, industrie, experience and knowledge of valour and profit of things, was taught them by necessitie, the mistresse of Artes, and by strangers which came into their country from Phenicia, Egypt, Greece, Carthage, Gaule, and elsewhere; to whom they were for a long time a prey, and in the end they learned armes, and many other malicious practises, whereof they had the root in their hearts, but grossly planted. As for religion, wee shall find by this discourse, that it was most barbarous and infamous among them. And who doubts, but the successeurs of Tubal did suddenly forget the true God, and his pleasing seruice, seeing this corruption did so soone enter among the sonnes of Sem, and namely those of the family of Heber, of whom the Eternall did frame his chosen people and his church. I wil not busie my self to contradict them which beleue, that their first language was that of the Biscanes in those times; discoursing, that seeing it hath so long maintained it selfe in that proprietie, and that it cannot be discerned that this tongue hath taken any tearms from other auncients, nor from other nations which inhabit about their country, with whom notwithstanding they conuerse and traffique, wee must beleue that there is something verie remarkable in this language, and thereby conclude, that it was one of the first tongues which did confound the builders of Babel, and by consequence the whole world, God being pleased to haue preferred in Spaine this note of the first inhabitants thereof. Admit it be so, and that the Bascongade, which the Biscanes at that time did vse, a part of Nauarre, and they of Alaua, are the first, or of greatest antiquitie vpon the frontiers of Spaine.

The first Spaniards were grosse, without arts or religion.

Biscane tongue
verie auncient, & held the first the Spaniards used.

3 Lets vs be so lesse difficult to beleue the opinion of a certaine Spanish doctor, who maintaines, That one of the nephewes of Sem, or else of Cham, called Sepharad, came along the coast of Affricke to the strait, and hauing crost it with great troupes, he did people the bankes of the Ocean and the Mediterranean seas, whereas the riuer of Guadalquiber doth ingulph, grounded vpon that the Hebrews call the Spaniards Sepharadin, & that they may apply the beginning of many names of towns, riuers, illands, and mountains of the country, to the Hebrew, Caldee, and Syriake tongues; as Gaddir, Sepyla, Betis, Calpe, Auila, and the like. All this is not strange, although there were no danger to deriue these names from the Phenicians, who used the Syrian tongue, and had great affinitie with the Hebrew which was used among the Iewes, a nation also of Syria: and to beleue that they were brought into Spaine by the Tyrians and others which invaded those quarters, when they came to spoyle the treasures thereof. That Spaine hath alwayes from the beginning beene peopled in two seuerall parts, vpon the East and Pyrene mountains by the Iberians of Asia, and Caucasians descending from Tubal; and towards the South at the strait, by Sepharad and his troupes, which came out of Syria and Affricke: and that of either side, as the people multiplied, they advanced farther into the country: we may vndoubtedly beleue, that those of the Pyrene mountaines passing the vallies by little & little on the West side, did people such a part of the country as they gaue their name to the first nauigable riuer, and to the whole region, celebrating the memory of their natie country, and of this Iberus, of whom they were named, whatsoeuer he were.

Conjectures vpon that Sepharad did hold
Spaine.

Iberians gaue
the name vnto
Spaine.

4 Among the most auncient captains or kings of this vagabond nation, they make mention of one Idubeda, of whom the mountaine of Iubalda, or Idubeda, might be named, whereof we will speake hereafter. Then they produce Brigus king or gouernor of these troupes, who began a ciuile gouernment, and built (as they say) many castles in Spaine, which carried the marks of his name, all in a manner ending in Briga, as Nemetobriga, Mitobriga, and such like, by reason whereof he carried painted in his standard a castle (although the skill to blaze Armes was not then well knowne): and the authors of the Spanish antiquities say, That of him the assemblies of people were called Brigies, and afterwards Brigues, and Brigades: the which did so multiplie vnder his gouernment and conduct, as they were forced to send whole armies out of the country, to seeke new habitations; wherof some of these Brigues coming into Thrace, and then into Asia, they brought the name of Brigie thither, the which since by corruption hath beene turned into Phrigia: and that Castille, now called Viegia, was in old time tearmed Briga, and that the new Spanish tongue hath since turned it into Biegia, Idubeda.

Brigue.

B ij

cal

Consider that the Celtes were mingled with the Iberians from the beginning.

To rob was practised by the ancients.
Tagus.

Betus.

Gerion.

Strange prince tyrannize Spain

Osiris

A just cause of warre to deliver the oppressed.

Curetes.

Gadir and Tar-
teje.

Nora the first habitation in Sardinia.

calling it Castille la Biegie, in stead of Brigia. For my part I beleue, that this word Briga, was brought into Spaine by the Celtes, which did hold a great part of that country, for that it is of the language of the old Gauls, by the which was signified people, town, or assembly. Moreover, there were many townes in France, which had their names deriued from it; as the lake Brigantin vpon the Alpes, which is that of Constance at this present; and Brigantium, which is Briançon in Dauphine; the Latobriges neere vnto the Suisses, and others, whereas the Celtes did in old time inhabit. And if there were a king so named, it is verie likely he was a Gaule, capitaine of some troupe of Celtes, in whose time there were great alterations of people, and by consequence ambitious thefts, the best exercise the noble men then gaue themselves vnto. This is what may be spoken of this Briga.

After whom Tagus was famous, from whom it may bee the riuer Tayo tooke her auntient name. Hce following the steps of his predeceffour, sent many superfluous and vnnecessarie troupes out of Spaine, to seeke new habitations, whereof some past into Asia.

Betus came after, who was also called Turditanus, hce gaue that name to the country which is betwene the holy Promontorie, now called Cape S. Vincent, and the riuer of Guadalquivir, the which was also called Betis: and in succession of time did communicat that name to a great part of the neighbour country, whereof they did afterwards name one of the chiefe provinces of Spaine. In regard of him that country vpon the strait towards the West and South, began to be famous, and knowne to strangers, especially to the Egyptians, and other Africanes, nations which were then mightie and warlike, and withall cunning and politique, good mariners, and abounding in ships, to whom the entrie into this part of Spaine did offer it selfe, and was more commodious than any other. And therefore the names of other inhabitants within the country, did for a long time after remaine obscured and vknowne. They doe attribute some lawes and policie vnto this Betus, and the bringing in of some learning into Spaine, but what it was, is vknowne.

To confirme that which is said, That in the raigne of Betus strangers began to tast the riches and commodities of Spaine: Authors report, that presently after his death, a capitaine, mightie in shipping and men, came out of Affricke, landed in Turditane, and seised thereon. Hce was a Libian, and was called Gerion, and by some Deabus, furnished by the Greekes Chrysee, as one would say, of gold, or gilt; by reason of the treasures he gathered by violence and tyrannic. For knowing that Spaine was full of mynes of all sorts of mettrals, he became curious to search for them, forcing the people to worke with such rigour, as if they had beene brute beasts; many fainting vnder their burthens, ended their miserable liues: so as the brute of his crueltie (an inseparable companion to couetousnesse) infected in a manner the whole earth, in places most remote, and was abhorred of all those that had any feeling of humanitie.

Osiris Denis then raigned in Egypt, who mooued with pitie, and of a generous spirit, came into Spaine with a great armie of Egyptians, Syrians, Arabians, and other neighbour nations, to ruine this detestable tyrant; whom he vanquished in battell, and slew: which is the first that was giuen in Spaine, that any mention is made of since the deluge. And for that he came neither to conquer, nor to enrich himselfe, being mooued with a zeale of justice, hauing settled the affaires of the country, he deliuered the seigniorie of the Turditaniens to three of his children, who had beene punished for his wickednesse, admonishing them not to follow the wretched auarice of their father, least their ends were like vnto his. Some Arabians Scenites of his troupe, would needs remaine in Spaine, to towhom he assigned the country about Cape Saint Vincent.

Neere vnto it (and where as the riuer Anas disgorgeth it selfe) dwelt the Curetes, descended from Curis, nephew (they say) to Champ among the Tercenian, or Tartessian forests, which did run along the shore vnto the island of Gadir, then called Tarteje (in our time Calis: ) in which island Gerion was interred, the first of any dead bodie that was put in the ground in Spaine; for before the custome was to cast dead carcases into the sea, or into riuers, or to hang them vpon trees, or else they left them in the fields.

Osiris left in this island a sister of his, called Erythre, who (it may be by one of these young Gerions) had a sonne called Nora, who (as some say) did build Nora, the first mansion in the island of Sardinia.

These

A These three young princes, who were called Lominians, were so like in face and manners, and did agree so well together, as the Poets haue fained, that they were but one king which had three bodies. They gouerned their subjects with more modestie than their father. Imagine that the feare of punishment kept them in awe, yet could they not so subdue their courages, but they sought all vnworthie meanes to reuenge their fathers death. Wherefore the seas being now open to the Turditanes, & commerce brought in from the West to the East, they had secret practises with Tiphon, whom they knew to be ambitious, and procured him to kill king Osiris his brother, and to seise vpon the kingdome of Egypt.

Osiris left many children, among the which was Hercules the Great, whom they surname Hercules Oron, the Egyptian Apollo, Mars, & Oron; by him the Gerions Lominians receiued a worthie reward for their ingratitude. For hauing gathered together a great armie of diuers nations, he past into Spaine, whereas these three brethren were readie to make head against him: yet Hercules grieuing that so much innocent blood should be spilt for the offence of three men, he offered to fight alone with them all three in single combats: which being accepted by the Gerions, they lost their liues. They say, that this passage of Hercules, was at the same time when as Iacob and his family went into Egypt, or a little before. By this victorie Hercules was receiued and honoured of the Turditanes, and other Spaniards: who after that he had settled their affairs, and planted two pillars vpon the straits, the one in Europe, and the other in Affricke; and two others in the island, since called Gadir: which some hold were towers, and not pillars, for a marke and testimonie of his conquests and toyles, he tooke his course towards Italie, leauing the gouernment of Spaine to one of his captaines called Hispal, which some will haue to bee his sonne. They say also, that he left in those islands, which are now called Majorca and Minorca, a Gouernour called Balee, of whom they since tooke the name of Baleares: although that most men beleue they were so named, for that the inhabitants were expert in slings.

Hispal remaining Gouernour of this part of Spaine, which is at the straits and thereabouts neere vnto the two seas (for as we haue said, those that liued within the country, had not felt much of these forraigne inuasions) he began a towne called by him Hispalis, since named Sevilla, and at this day Seuille.

Hispal succeeded him, a wife and an achiue man, and a louer of vertue, as they write of him: and we must beleue that he was some great personage (if there were euer any such in being) seeing the whole region whereof we treat hath retained his name, and preferred it in such sort as it hath not beene changed since. Others notwithstanding acknowledging in no sort this Hispal to be the author of the name which hath remained to Spaine, affirme, and it may bee not rashly, That it came of the people of Iberia in Asia, the which in old time was called Pana, of the name of one Pan, who gouerned there vnder his father Liber: and therefore this of Europe was indifferently called Iberia and Pana: but those that came after, corrupting the word, did adde some letters, and called it sometimes Spana, and sometimes Spania, as in truth the Latines did name it in the beginning, terming it Spania, and not Hispania. The Spaniards comming afterwards to imbrace the Roman tongue, added an E, and called it Espania, as they haue beene accustomed to do to all Latine words which begin with S; as Escola, Escala, Escudo, Escriber, and the like. These Iberians did also call themselves Abasgi, whereof it may bee came Valco, Basco, and Bascongado. Such as beleue that Hispal raigned in Spaine, say, That he was the first which tooke the royall diademe, and that he caused towers to bee built in the island of Tarlesse, and in Galicia, which they call Phares, or Beacons, for the helpe of saylers: yet others hold with more reason, that that in Galicia, which is yet standing, was the worke of Oëtanus Cæsar.

Hercules hauing done many great exploits in Italie, he left Atlas Kitin there to gouerne, carrying back his brother Hesperus, he returned into Spain, where he found Hispal deceased: wherefore he himselfe did gouerne it in person for many yeares, and dyed there, as they say. His bodie was buried in the island of Tarlesse, where at that time the kings court was, in a sumptuous and stately tombe.

After him raigned Hesperus, brother to Atlas Kitin, of whose name they say that Spaine and also Italie were called Hesperies; that is, Italie Hesperia the great, and Spaine the later Hesperia, for that he raigned sometime both in the one and the other. But Atlas enuious of his brothers greatnesse, came with an armie and dispossessed him of the kingdome, forcing him to

B iij

The desire of reuenge a brutall
vice in man.

Great equitie of Hercules the Egyptian.

Hispal sonne to Hercules.

Hispalis or *Se-
uille*.

Hispal.

Spain why so called.

Hesperus, of whom Italie and Spain are named.

Atlas.

to flie into Italie, from whence Hercules had brought him: where hee was well entertained, and reigned. The which Atlas vnderstanding, hee suffered him not long quiet, but returned into Italie with a good number of Spaniards, and chased him away; meaning to hold Italie as his royall seat, and Spaine as an accessarie, to draw gold, siluer, and all other commodities from thence.

Oris, Sigro fl. Atlas parting from Spaine, he left the gouernement to Oris his sonne, who was called Sic Oris, Sic seruing as a fore-name. Of him they say the riuier Sicoris, now called Sigro, was named: the which passeth by Lerida, and falls into Ebro. But no man can tell vpon what occasion he was so called, nor how hee extended his limits thither, being so farre from the straits, and isle of Gadir.

Annus. Annus succeeded Oris, whom they also called Sicanus, and of his name the riuier of Guadiana tooke the auncient denomination. Wee must conjecture, that his predecessour Oris did establish some estate and principallitie, or made some fort and retreat about the riuier of Sigro, whereof this that succeeded him had the first gouernement: seeing they place along the bankes thereof, the people which are called Sicanians, so named of this Sicanus, who it seemes were his souldiours, and the troupes which he commaunded. Some of those bands hauing past into Italie, to helpe their country-men, which had beene led thither by Atlas Kitin, and hauing inhabited the country of the Latines (which is the territorie of Rome) they were there encountred by the naturall Italians. Passing on, they carried the name of Sicanians, into the isle then called Trinacria, and since Sicile: into the which, they say, that Sicanus past in person, hauing in Italie fought with the Ligurians, Oenotrians, Leſtrigons, and others: and that he was there encountred by the Cyclopes, cruell and barbarous men, who would not suffer the Sicanians to come and dwell in their isle: but they were forced to yeeld.

Sicile, why called Sicanus. Sicleus the sonne of Sicanus reigned in Spaine, after his father, and passed in like manner into Italie and Sicile, where he changed the former name, calling it Sicile, the which it holds. The occasion of his passage, was the controuersie betwixt Dardanus and Iafus, his cousins, sonnes to Electra the daughter of Atlas, for the rule of Italie; the which he reconciled. But Dardanus hauing afterwards slaine Iafus his brother treacherously, Sicleus pursued the reuenge so vehemently, as Dardanus was forced to abandon the country, and to go into Samo-thracia, and then into Asia, to seeke a new habitation. This mans raigne concures with the time that God sent plagues vpon the Egyptians, by Moyſes and Aaron.

Sicleus being dead, his sonne Lufus held the scepter of Spaine; of whose name some will haue Lusitania (a part therof) to be called. He past also into Italie, and at his returne brought many Italians into Spaine. Where, after him, Plus, or Siculus, his sonne, reigned: whom they called Neptune, for that he entertained many ships and gallies at sea. He past, as his predecessours had done, into Italy and Sicile, to succour the Spaniards which were feared in those regions, against whom the Cyclopes and others of the country renewed the wars. After him many stranger thrust into Spaine, vpon diuers occasions, but for one only cause, which was, for spoyle, being easie to take, by reason of the simplicitie of the Spanish people.

Hee that shall consider duely hereof, will not thinke it to agree with that which we haue said before, as in truth it doth not: For if these kings (of whom we haue made mention since Atlas) which haue reigned, according to Historians and Cronicles, for two hundred and fiftie yeares, haue not onely had the meanes to defend Spaine from strangers, but to lead forth many armies, and to subdue the people of Italie and Sicile; to make themselves vmpiers of kings quarels, to build townes there, and to commaund the seas: and that from Spaine to Italie, and from Italie to Spaine, the passage and commerce was ordinarie: How could it be, that so soone after the death of Sicleus, the Spaniards should grow so simple and vnwarlike, as if they had neuer seene armes? And that it was in the power of the first pyrat that came from Affricke, Phenicia, or Greece, to seise vpon it, and insult ouer them, without any resistance? Had they learned nothing? had they gotten no courage in so many warres which they had seene in Italie? What was become of those captaiues which these late kings had so happily employed? had they all cursed their country, or found some Lethe floud, to make them forget it, and to stay in Italie? Or if they were dead, did they leaue no discipline, nor any impression of vertue in their youth? It is not likely, and therefore

H

I

K

L

M

A fore we must put all these discourses among idle tales, or find some meanes to vnfold this difficultie. Euery one hath free libertie to discourse: For my part I beleue, that these men which they say had reigned in Spaine since Atlas, haue beene Italians, acknowledging the Soueraignetie of Italie, and gouerning Spaine as a subdued Prouince: or else respecting onely their profit, they made voyages like vnto pyrats, shearing them to the bloud, and then carrying their spoyles into Italie, employing the lewdest people in the country to oppresse the rest; and in the meane time, through the fauour of some fort, which they did maintaine to assure their landing and their shipping, they caused themselves to be called Kings. Then seeing that the Spaniards (which had joynd with them to doe ill) did multiplie too fast, or grew more cunning than was fit for their purpose, they found meanes to embarke them, and to send them into Italie vpon some vaine hopes, whereas being once arriued, there was no more any meanes to returne into Spaine. Such in my opinion were the armies which those kings led out of Spaine into Italie, that is, troupes of theues, of whom they would be assured, that they should not conspire against them, nor take their practise from them, after they had instructed them in their trade. By these subtilie practises they did spoile Spaine both of men and treasure, holding the grosse and rude multitude in ignorance, and selling an opinion in them, that they were good men, and louers of justice; yea religious, for that they dealt in the pacifying of controuersies, which happened among the people, and sometimes they payed vowes, or made some superstitious dedication of a Temple or Chappell. I say moreover, That those which we haue before named were not alone, which made this worke in Spaine; but in their times, and whilst they were busie in one part, other nations did the like in some other quarter of the country. So as it is no maruell, seeing the Spaniards had yet no meanes to see a lawfull and settled Estate among them, and that those which did gouerne them, had alwayes this affected end, to entertaine them in their simplicitie; an assured marke of Tyrants. So as the race of these men sayling, this poore nation was presently made subiect to the first that did inuade them, the children prouing as vnable as their fathers.

6 They report, That about that time some Greekes of the Island of Zante, in old time called Zacynte, arriued vpon that coast whereas since the towne of Valencia was built, and there made a little fort, or store-houſe, for their traffique, the which they called Zacynthium; the which did since encrease in people and building, and became a good towne, from whence Sagunte had her beginning, renowned for the loyaltie of the citizens to the people of Rome, and for the occasion which ſhee gaue of the long and bloudie warres betwixt the Romanes and the Carthaginians, which they called the second Punicke warre. These Zacynthians trafficking with them of Iberia, which dwelt within the country, and were neighbours to the mountaines, did receiue from them gold and siluer, little esteemed by these simple men, for that these mettals grew in their country, giuing them in exchange trifles of small value: so, as growing rich in a short time, they published among the other Grecians, and among the nations of Asia, the fame, happinesse, and abundance of treasure in Spaine, inciting many thereby to goe and discouer the country, and to attempt something. And for that (as we haue said before) religion hath alwaies beene a lure for cunning and malicious men to assure the simple, to whom they intend some mischief, these Zacynthians caused a goodly Temple to bee built to Diana, in the place which is now called Denia, according vnto some, but falsely, prouiding by that meanes and maske of religion, for their Zacynthium, which they had built vpon that coast, that by the reuerence of this Temple they might be assured from all violence.

7 In the meane time an Affrican called Teſta seized vpon Gadir, and of all the maine land thereabouts, calling himselfe king of Spaine. It may be that of his name they were called Testans, which did inhabit along the bankes of the Mediterranean sea, whereas Murcia and Carthagena are at this present.

F After him he left the gouernment to his sonne Romus, to whom they attribute the building of the towne of Valencia (yet Titus Linius doth not make it so auncient) the which was first called Rome, of his name, since by the Latines, holding this name to be Greeke, they turned it in their language to Valencia, which was all one; for Rome in Greeke, and Valencia in old Latine, is power and force.

In

False Denis.

Lebrissa, and the beginning.Phenicians
spoyle Spaine.Palatuu, Palençe.

Cacus Licinius.

Gunpowder an auncient inuen-tion.

Erythree.

Gadir called Erythree.

Gargoris.

Hercules the Grecian.

In this kings time there came a pyrat into Spaine, well followed by men of his owne fort, who spoyled the whole countrey adjoyning vnto the sea, and then hee returned with his spoyle, leauing an opinion of him, that hee was the father Liber Denis, or Bacchus: for the custome of those obscure times was, That great pyrats and heads of vagabond people (whereof the world did then abound) did take vpon them the names of great personages and famous men, who had gone before them, and whom foolish superstition had deified; giuing the people where they came to vnderstand, That they were gods, which came to visit them, to deliuer them from tyrants, and to doe them good; so as they were often decciued. By such fained deuices these Harpies found lesse resistance in their enterprises. It may be this Denis was the sonne of Semele, and nephew or grand child to Cadmus king of Thebes in Beoce, but not that great Denis, Conqueror of the Indies, who was much more auncient. They say, that he built the towne of Lebrissa (the which he called Nebrissa) vpon one of the chanelles of the riuer Betis; the which in those dayes fell into the sea with two gulfes. Nebros in Greeke is a Hynds calfe, with the skins whereof they did attire those that did celebrate the Bacchanalia. It was at the same time when as the Phoenicians began to encroch much vpon the Spaniards, and to come with whole armies into their countrey, and to make their prey, as the Grecians, Egyptians, and others of Affricke did.

To Remus they make Palatuu his sonne to succeed him; who as they say was founder of the towne of Palenza: but there did rise a petie king or capitaine against him, out of the mountaines, neere vnto the riuer Ebro, called Cacus Licinius, who in the end became master thereof, and Palatuu was forced (being yet young) to flye out of the countrey, and to sue for succours in vaine, begging his bread in a manner for many yeares, of forraigne princes and potentates. This Cacus was industrious, and the author of many subtil inuentions; to purge and forge yron, and to fashion it to diuers instruments fit for the warre: for hee taught how to make breast-plates and other furniture for the defence of the bodie: and some beleue, that he had the art to make that infernall powder, which they vse for artillerie. For these inuentions, wherein he was very expert, he was celebrated by the Poets, as the sonne of Vulcan, the god of Forges. Palatuu after that he had long sued in vaine to princes and townes, whereas hee expected some succours, to recouer his estate, hee resolu'd in the end to returne into Spaine, and to obserue, if the inconstancie of humane things had not prepared him some meanes to recouer his dignitie, and to chase away his enemy: whereas he arriued so happily, as the Spaniards, whether moued with pitie of his calamitie, or wearie of the others commaund, they receiued Palatuu, and gaue him men and meanes to recouer his kingdome. So Cacus being dispossessed of that which he had held, fled into Italie, where they say that Hercules the Grecian slew him (whereof we will make mention) although that the author thereof doe not agree well vpon this point. There Cacus bred discord betwixt all the people and townes of Italie by his leud practises.

Palatuu being dead, the Tyrians of Phoenicia, who had now learned the way to Spaine, came with their king Erythree, and good store of ships, who giuing them to vnderstand, That he had bene commaunded by the Oracle to come and build a Temple to Hercules Libique, in the Island of Tarteffe, that is, Calis; they were not onely receiued, but Erythree was also chosen king of that part of Spaine; who built a stately Temple in the Island to Hercules, changing the name thereof, and causing it to be called Erythree, or else renewed that name, which it might haue had from the sister of Oris aboue mentioned, or of the Erythreans of the East, who followed Hercules Orus, which had dwelt there. To this Temple, which some hold was built vpon the maine land, where at this present Medina Sydonia stands, was due the tenths of all the thefts and spoyle of the West, by a perpetuall decree, the which was long obserued.

Of this king Erythree there is nothing more spoken: to whom they giue for successeur Gargoris, a Spaniard: he taught the people the vse of honey, and was therefore called Miele. The chiefe force of this kings estate and others his predecessors, were the Curetes, a brutish and sauage people, dwelling in the Forrests of Tarteffe, which contained a great part of the Ocean shore, from the holy Promontorie, or Cape S. Vincent, vnto the Island of Erythree.

In his time Hercules the Grecian, sonne to Alcmena, passed into Spaine, to whom the Greek Poets, and others that haue followed them, did attribute such prowesse, but falsely: for this

A this Hercules was but an insolent man, yet well beloued of the Grecian princes, by reason of his boldnesse and his strength of bodie fit to rob and steale, whereunto the nobilitie of that age was commonly addicted. The wealth of Spaine, which was so much spoken of in Greece and Asia, made him affect this voyage, after the first Trojan warre, against Laomedon. Hauing then gathered together all the pyrats and theues he could, as well in Europe as in Asia, hee set sayle, and coasting along Italie, he landed in the place of Tuscan, which since hath bene called Port Hercules. From thence he arriued in Sardinia, where he found some few inhabitants, where he left one Sardus, with some of the idle multitude that was in his armie. Of this Sardus, Sardinia tooke the name. Before he passed on, he made a great sacrifice vnto the gods,

B in a little Island, betwixt Corsica and Sardinia, the which for that cause doth still retaine the name of Isle Hercules. Then he directed his course towards the Islands of Baleares, then called Gymnasies, whereas the inhabitants made some weake resistance with their slings: in the least of which Islands he dedicated a Temple to Ianus, whereas since the towne of Ciuitella was built. Then continuing his voyage, he toucht the Islands of Pituyfes, and gaue the name of Ebusa to the greater. In the end he arriued vpon the maine of Spaine, whereas Dianæ Temple was built, the which he enriched with gifts, and did reuerence with sacrifices, for his prosperous voyage; and for that Diana was held to be the goddesse which had care of trauelers. Then sayling along the coast, hee came through the strait into the Ocean, and to the Island of Erythree, where he landed his armie vpon the firme land, and stayed there some few

C dayes to refresh his men; he in the meane time honouring his Temple (whose name he carried, and did challenge his acts) busied himselfe in making of playes and sacrifices. Hearing then that the Curetes and other Spaniards had put themselves in armes to fight with him, he went to meet them, gaue them battaile, and did easily defeat them, repulsing them into their Forrests, out of the which they durst not sally like enemies. This combat is supposed by the Poets for that of the Titanes against their gods, faining, that the Herculeans were gods, and the Curetes and Spaniards the Titanes.

After this victorie, the whole countrey was at Hercules deuotion: who imitating the auncient Hercules of Lybia, planted pillars in the straits; the one in Europe, the other in Affricke; enlarged the towne which was in the Island of Erythree, and left many Tyrians and Sydonians, which had followed him, there: and it may be it then tooke the name of Gadir, or Gades, which in the Phenician tongue signifieth a Terme, or Limit: and rearming himselfe a god, would haue all diuine honours done vnto him. And some hold, That it was he which made a law, to pay the tenth of the enemies spoyle, and to offer them to Hercules Temple: at the least he did exact it being in Spaine, that he might haue part of other mens spoyle, and know the greatest theues. This done, he marched towards the Pyrene mountains, spoyling the coast vpon the Mediterranean sea, and drawing after him a great traine of all nations, which came at the bruit and fame of this great theefe, and the treasures of Spaine: He passed into Gaule, and from thence into Italie, polluting all good families where he passed, as hee had bene accustomed to doe all his life time. The cause of his suddaine departure, was the news

E he heard of the great preparation which the Grecian princes made, to warre against the Trojans, for the rape of Helen, whither he was inuited by his friend Telamon of Salamine. Thus was Spaine in a short time beaten, and deliuered from a great scourge. Of this Hercules the Poets haue fained all that is written, of the conquests, prowesse, and trauels of many other Hercules, more auncient and better men than he: he was a Grecian, but not of Greece it selfe, but of that part of Italie which they call the great Greece, and of Tarentum, conceiued in adulterie by Alcmena, the wife of Amphitrion, a priuat man, and an vnknowne father, bred vp at Thebes in Beoce, and nourished in theft, fornication, and execrable murders: a companion and counsellor to Iason, in the voyage of Colchis, at the spoyle of the treasures of Eete, and the rape of his daughter Medea: the author and executioner of the ruine and death of Laomedon king of Troy; whose daughter Hesione, a noble and innocent virgine, he did prostitute to his companion Telamon, bold and hardie in all bad actions: so as hee purchased the name and reputation of a valiant capitaine, and was readily followed into Spaine by men of his owne fort, whereof there were store, and finding nothing left to steale in Asia.

As he carried away many bad persons when he went into Spaine, so he left others of diuers nations behind him, who built cities and townes, or finding some of their countrey men alreadie

Theues countenanced by princes in old time.Baleares called Gymnasies.Hercules defeats
the Curetes.Hercules Taren-tia a bastard.

Calpe.
BarceloneAusonia.
Lerida.

alreadie seated, planted themselves among them. Calpe, which was called Heraclea was then built. In this passage also, Barcino, so named of fishermens Cabbins, made of oyziers, which were first there, was enriched with a Temple, which this Hercules caused to be built to Jupiter. Turia so neere vnto Montcaio, was the Tyrians worke; Ausonia the Italians, it is now called Vic: Ilerda, now Lerida, the Illyrians, and others of other nations, whereof Hercules army was composed. To Dianæ Temple (which the Zacynthians had begun before his comming) there were (by him, or by the Zacynthians of his companie) great beames of Iuniper set; the which were spared by Hannibal when as he ruined those places, and continued vnto the time of the Roman Emperors. There remained many other marks of this passage long after in Spaine.

Crueltie of a grandfather.

As for Gargoris, who was king, he recovered his authoritie with great difficultie, and kept it with more paine; yet he reigned some yeares, and left the realme to his grand child, which his daughter had by stealth: wherewith Gargoris was so much offended, as he caused this child to be left in the fields, to be deuoured of wild beasts; the which, by the will of God, did not only leaue him vntoucht, but did also nourish him with their vrine: whereof the old man being aduertised, he commaunded him to be laid in the high wayes, that oxen, horses, hogs, and such like going and comming, might tread him vnder their feet: yea, he caused him to be presented to famished mastiues, which had bin kept hungry of purpose: but he was still preferred by the fauor of heauen; and the brute beasts (more kind than his grandfather) turned from the infant, and did not hurt him. In the end, this cruell man not content to put the poore child to an ordinarie death, he caused him to be carried far into the Ocean sea; yet could not his desire succeed: for the infant was cast by the waues vpon the sands, whereas a hynd hauing newly calued, was so farre in loue with it, as she forgat her own fruit, and nourished the child, vntill he grew great, and got his liuing in the woods and rocks, feeding vpon wild fruits; who in the end grew strong, and so actiue, as he ran as swiftly as any stagge. He was often scene, and pursued by the huntmen of the countrey, who could not conceiue what it was; yet they layd so many ambushes, as in the end they tooke him, and presented him vnto Gargoris their king: who hauing carefully considered and viewed the countenance of this sauage prisoner, he was of opinion, that it was his grand child: whereof he was the better assured by certaine marks which he had made vpon his bodie, and caused him to be attended on as his Estate required; then dying, he left him heire of his realme of Spaine: where he shewed himselfe wife, vertuous, and a louer of the good of men, notwithstanding that he had bin bred vp among wild beasts in his youth. For they say he made politicke lawes, and taught them to tyll the land; accustomed the barbarous people to a more ciuile life, and sought the meanes to better the fruits of the earth by manuring, remembring his hard and rough breeding in his younger yeares. Hee is called by some Albius, by others Habidus, or Habis. He appointed exercises for the Spaniards, and diuided the people into seuen townes or cantons.

Albius, Habidus, or Habis.The Celtes passe
into Spaine.

Celtiberia.

8 After him there is no mention of any kings in Spaine for many ages: which giues some occasion to conjecture, that they erected many Commonweales; or that this region lay open to the inuasion of many strangers, which came from diuers parts; namely, after the destruction of Troy, which happened in the time of this Habidus; in whose life time certaine Celtes coming out of Gaule, came into Iberia, where they had long and sharpe warre against the inhabitants of the country, with whom they would share their lands; & in the end forced the Iberians to receiue them, and to contract alliances with them, giuing them their daughters in marriage: and so communicating both ayre, country, and names with them, they made of two nations one, which was called Celtiberian, and the countrey of Celtiberia; which is, all that lyes betwixt the Pyrenee mountaines and the riuer of Ebro. Other Celtes and Gaules had passed farther into Spaine, it may be, before the Iberians came there, and had run beyond the riuer of Ebro, vnto the West Ocean, where they had held a part of Portugal and Betica; in which prouinces they did also carry the names of Celtes, Celtiques, Galates, and Gallicians, and there did build townes. Ephorus (for that the Celtes did hold all that North part of Spaine, and part of Portugal) extended Gaule vnto the Island of Gades. Habis reigned yet, when Elna, a towne in the countie of Rossillon, was first founded; the which some haue ignorantly written, was named by Helene, mother to Constantine the Great, or built by her grand child Constantine.

Many Grecians in those times came into Spaine, among the which (as they say) was Tenecer the sonne of Telamon, who (hauing beene chased away by his father, and after his death excluded

A cluded from the succession) landed whereas new Carthage now stands, and so passed on into Galicia. They attribute vnto him the foundation of the towne of Salamanca; a name which commeth neere vnto that of Salamina, where Tenecer was borne: yet some affirme, That in auncient time it was called Elmantica, and more properly. Diomedes also came into Spaine with certain Ætolians, and they hold, that the towne of Tude vpon Myrio was his worke, for Tude, that this name hath some affinitie with Tydeus, the father of Diomedes. Astur, who was coachman to king Memnon (no small office in those dayes) being come with the Grecians into this Region, gaue the name vnto the Asturians, and to the towne and riuer of Astorga. Some Asturias maintaine, That Lisbon, Olyssippo or Vlyssippo, hath beene built by Vlisses, and in it a Temple to the goddesse Pallas. Of Mnestheus of Athens (to whom there were diuine honours conferred after his death) was named the port of Mnesthee, neere vnto Gades. Finally, infinit Grecians, which could not or would not returne into their country, after the destruction of Troy, came into Spaine, and erected many pettie Estates: and among them there were many other nations, who had some strength at sea, and were expert in nauigation, but at diuers seasons, and very vncertaine, as the Thracians, whereof the towne of Veta, or rather that of Almerie, giue some testimonie: for in old time it was called Abdera, as another which was in Thrace. The Rhodians did build the towne of Roses, now desart, at the foot of the Pyrenee mountains, whereas the Confull Cato first landed, when hee came to make warre in Spaine. These men taught the Spaniards the vse of hand-mylles, and to coyne money. The Phocians of Asia did

B to the goddesse Pallas. Of Mnestheus of Athens (to whom there were diuine honours conferred after his death) was named the port of Mnesthee, neere vnto Gades. Finally, infinit Grecians, which could not or would not returne into their country, after the destruction of Troy, came into Spaine, and erected many pettie Estates: and among them there were many other nations, who had some strength at sea, and were expert in nauigation, but at diuers seasons, and very vncertaine, as the Thracians, whereof the towne of Veta, or rather that of Almerie, giue some testimonie: for in old time it was called Abdera, as another which was in Thrace. The Rhodians did build the towne of Roses, now desart, at the foot of the Pyrenee mountains, whereas the Confull Cato first landed, when hee came to make warre in Spaine. These men taught the Spaniards the vse of hand-mylles, and to coyne money. The Phocians of Asia did

C build Marseille, and founded the towne of Empurias, which in like manner is now ruined. It was in auncient time inhabited by three kinds of people, of diuers manners and languages, diuided by wals, and liuing in continuall jealousie one of another, which were naturall Spaniards. These Phocians, and afterwards Romans, which were added by Julius Cesar, who hauing reduced Spaine vnder his obedience, and chased away Pompeyes children, and their faction, made one bodie of these three nations, and a towne well vnited. The Milesians and the Carystians came also to inhabit there; and the Lesbians issued from the Massagetes, to whom they attribute the foundation of Concauo, Castulo, at this present Castlona, in old time a great towne, and the limit of two governments of Spaine: vnder the Romane Empire it was called Parnasia, which maketh some thinke, that they of Phocide in Europe were the founders, for that Parnassus hill is in their country. Then came the Phrygians, which were extra (as some say) of Spaine and the Egyptians, vnder the leading of a captaine called Tarracon, of whom the towne of Tarracone tooke the name. Hauing taken great spoyle along the Mediterranean shore, he went and payed the tenths of his thefts to Hercules temple at Calis, according to the auncient order. He had a nobleman of the country, whose name was Teron, that opposed himselfe, but he could not hinder him from spoyle of the countrey: For in truth the Spaniards, vntill the warres betwixt the Romanes and the Carthaginians, had no commendation to be good warriors, in regard of other nations. When as the Egyptian was gone, Teron demanded of the Gaditanes the offerings which this theefe had made vnto their Temple, as taken away by violence and iniustice: whereunto the Gaditanes opposed themselves, and did so well defend the rites of their god, as they slew Teron, and defeated his men in a battaile at sea.

E Some Cipriots came also to dwell in Spaine, and moreover they beleene, that the towne of Biana, in old time Alba, and of Madrid, first called Mantua, be the worke of the first Latines and Italians.

The reason why so many nations came into Spaine, was the abundance of mynes, and the ignorance of the Spaniards, which made them lesse couetous, and by consequence lesse giuen to armes, and therefore they were a pray to all these theeuish nations: whom (as all things haue their changes and reuolutions) they haue in this last age not only imitated, but exceeded them farre in crueltie, couetousnesse, and insolencie, to simple rude nations discovered by them, as will appeare by the discourse of the Historie.

F About 880 yeares before the Natiuitie of Iesus Christ was that memorable fire in the Pyrenee mountaines (I speake it according vnto the Spanish Authors) the which discovered more plainly the treasures of Spaine: For the heardsmen hauing set fire of the woods (whereof the mountaines were full) and it continuing many dayes, the veins of the earth were so moued with this violent heat, as the siluer melting ran downe by streames: whereof pyrats and strangers which did traffique there, being aduertised, they came running to this booty.

The

The Phenicians among others, vnder a kind of traffique, and with the exchange of certaine trifles of small value, laded their ships about once, being conducted (as some write) by Sichee, husband to Elifa Dido; yea, in so great abundance, as they made the anchors of their ships of siluer; so as Sichee grew so rich, as his brother in law Pigmalion through enuie and couetousnesse slew him: who afterward bent his course for Spaine; but running vp and down the seas, he died: wherefore his companie wanting a head, came to Gades, to their brethren and countrymen, which were planted in this Island; who entertained them courteously, and the towne was better peopled by them: so as in the end it became a mightie Commonweale, inhabited first without all doubt by this nation of Tyr.

Tyrans did first people Cadiz.

Tyr was at that time, and long after, one of the most famous cities in the world, and and most abounding in people and wealth; which the townes that haue taken their beginning from her, in diuers parts of the earth, doe witness. And although it had in a manner no territories, and that it was often taken and spoyled by the kings and potentates of Asia, and by Alexander the Great, yet did they easily recouer their first happinesse, by reason of the industrie of the inhabitants, and the commoditie of the sea; the which they did frequent with more experience and knowledge than any other nation of that age. It was the mother citie of that mightie Commonweale of Carthage, which for so long a time did contend for Emperie with Rome; the first foundation whereof was layed by one Carchedon a Tyrian: it was afterwards enlarged by Dido, sister to Pigmalion, about 135 yeares before the foundation of Rome, and did encrease daily both in people and wealth. The citizens whereof some 562 yeares before the Natiuitie of Christ, bent their course for Spaine, to spoyle as others had done, by reason of them of Gades: who hauing gotten a great territorie in Spaine, which made them to bee feared and honoured of their neighbours, yet not contenting themselves with their owne, they sought to take from others: yea, being right merchants, and seeking to make their profit of all things, they tooke away men from the neighbour townes and villages, and caried them to sell as slaues in strange countries: a traffique which had bene alwayes vsed by the Phenicians of Syria, their progenitors, to the prejudice of the people of Palestina and Iudea, who bordered vpon them. These inhumane fashions did in the end stirre vp the other people of Spaine against the Gaditanes, whereof followed much warre of small fame, by reason of the weakenesse of the Commonweales and Potentates which did manage them, if wee will compare them with others of those times.

Tyrans great sea men.

Tyrans made profit of all things.

Arganthon.

Onely there is an honourable mention made of a noble man commanding vpon the coast of the Ocean, neere vnto this Island of Gades, called Arganthon, happie in wealth and long prosperitie of his affaires; for they say he liued 155 yeares, and reigned 80, and withall loued iustice: whose time is conferred with that of Ancus Martius, reigning in Rome about 150 yeares after the foundation thereof. The Gaditanes were kept somewhat in awe by him and others; yet not so subdued, but they tooke armes vpon all occasions; so as the people round about conspired against them: who finding not themselves strong ynough to oppose against so many enemies, they resolved to call the Carthaginians to their aid; who in the end became masters of Spaine, vntill the Romanes stayed the course of their victories and conquests: the which shall be related in the following Bookes with more delight, for that we are better assured than of these things.

Carthaginians
called into Spaine
by the Gaditanes.

Hitherto we haue discoursed of the beginning and antiquitie of those nations which came first to inhabit Spaine, following the obscure steps of those that haue left any thing in writing, or read or conjectured, hauing scarce obserued any order of times, being without any sure grounds: for euen the places, whereas euery one of the Gouernors, Captains, or Kings, whereof we haue made mention, did reigne, is not very certaine. Yet it is most apparent, that the Isle of Gades hath been the most famous place of all Spaine, and that the superstition of idolatrous people hath preferred it from the inuasions and spoyles of strangers, by reason of the famous Temple of Hercules, which was built there: and that the maine land which is about this Island, and the strait which is neere vnto it, haue bene sooner and more particularly knowne than other places within the heart of Spaine, by reason of the commodious landing for Armies, and the abound of merchants strangers, which came thither by sea. And it is credible, that within the country there were many petty kings, heads of people, without fame, and it may be without any good and lawfull policie; and it is not impertinent, that some townes,

Religion whereto
they were bound, is naturally reuerenced.

A townes, famous in after ages, and euen in our times, whose beginning is not known, haue had their first foundations from these vnkowne people.

Wee haue willingly omitted many discourses written by others, for that wee haue held them fabulous, or at the least very doubtfull: as the coming of Noe into Spaine, and the voyage and conquest thereof by Nabuchodonozor, and such like, which we may read in counterfeit Berosus, or in Iosephus, being deceived by the memorials of the Chaldeans, who put this last Nabuchodonozor about all the Hercules that euer were, to whose acts (the which in truth were great, as we may gather by the holy Scriptures) wee doe not any way derogate, by calling in question his coming into Spaine, for that Asia, Ægypt, and Africk, which were neere, might furnish him wherewith to erect his trophies.

The great drought (whereof some haue left remembrance) seemeth as incredible vnto vs; the which continued six and twentie yeares, and burnt all the trees and plants in Spaine, except some Oliue and Pomegranet trees, as they say; as if these trees could not be hurt by the extreame heat, as well as the rest: it dried vp all the riuers, except Ebro and Guadalquivir, which became small vnprofitable riuers; so as the people were forced to goe out in great troupes, to seeke for other dwellings. These things, for that they haue not bene written by any auncient and good Authors, who would not haue passed ouer so memorable an accident with silence, and for the absurdities which follow, they are with reason rejected.

A prodigious
drought.

C And for as much as in that which we are hereafter to treat of, we shall find Spaine more manured, better peopled with men, townes, and burroughes, limited and distinguished by more apparent bounds, and hauing some better forme of gouernment and policie than it hath hitherto had, we haue thought it expedient (for the Readers ease) before we enter into the subject, to make a particular and briefe description thereof, making some mention of the fertilitie of the soyle, qualitie of the ayre, and nature and manners of the Spaniards, both auncient and moderne.

D To Spaine in general, and in regard of other countries, had from the beginning natural limits, as they are at this day; vnlesse they will say, that the continuall beating of the waues of the sea hath made some breaches, or hath diuided it from Africke, to the which some beleue it was joyned in the beginning, or that the forme hath bene changed by some other accident. There may well be some diminution: for in Islands, the which (for that they are little) are better comprehended and measured by the fences, we find without all question, that some at this present are much lesse than they were in former ages, and others that haue bene famous, are now perished, and are no more, hauing bene vndermined by the waues, and swallowed vp in the sea. But whatsoeuer hath happened since that Spaine had any fame vnto this day, it doth not appeare that there hath bene any great portion cut away, or that it is much altered or changed.

Description of
Spaine.

E This Region hath bene very fitly compared by the Auncients to an Oxes hyde spread abroad: for beginning by the necke somewhat narrow (which is the passage of the Pyrence mountaines, by the which it is joyned vnto Fraunce) it extendeth it selfe to the right and to the left, going towards the West: so as making in a manner a square forme, the Promontories or heads which thrust into the sea, on the one side vpon the coast of Biscaye, and at Finis terræ, and on the other at Cap de Gates, and at the strait of Gibraltar, represent the legs; then the point of Cap S. Vincent, stretcht forth behind towards the West, makes the tayle.

Spaine like to an Oxes hyde.

F That which is taken for the East part of Spaine, runs along the Pyrence mountaines, beginning neere vnto the towne of Bayonne, vpon the limits of Fraunce, where was heretofore the Promontorie Easo, and runs vnto Cap de Cruix, whereas Pennus Temple was in old time; that is, from the Ocean to the Mediterranean sea; being 80 leagues, or thereabouts, taking the way by Fraunce: for these mountaines haue no strait course, but bend much towards Spaine, and hold a great part of that country: so as he that would goe from the Ocean to the Mediterranean sea within the country of Spaine, on that side of the mountaines, should find it much more than 80 leagues. Although that this coast of Spaine be called the East, yet all this passage of the Pyrence mountaines turnes much towards the North, and is subject to that wind which the Italians call Greco, and by our mariners Northeast.

The East part of Spaine.

C

From

The South coast
of Spaine.

From Cap de Crux, or Venus Temple, along the Mediterranean sea, and passing by the strait G into the Atlantick Ocean, vnto the holy Promontorie, or Cap S. Vincent, is the South part of Spaine; the which notwithstanding turning towards the East, is for the most part subiect to the wind which the Italians call Siroco, and we Southeast, and contains about 275 leagues; that is, 202 leagues to Gibaltar, and 73 leagues from thence to Cap S. Vincent, the which are distinctly measured after this manner.

|  |            |                                      |            |
|--|------------|--------------------------------------|------------|
| From Cap Crux to Barcelona                 | 30 Leagues | From Carthagea to Vera               | 18 Leagues |
| From thence to Tarracone                   | 16 L.      | From Vera to Almerie                 | 13 L.      |
| From Tarracone to Valence, by the mouth of |            | From Almerie to Malaga               | 20 L.      |
| the riuer of Ebro and Tortosa              | 30 L.      | From Malaga to Gibaltar              | 23 L. H    |
| From Valence to Denia                      | 17 L.      | From Gibaltar by the strait to Calis | 20 L.      |
| From Denia to Alicant                      | 18 L.      | From Calis to the mouth of Guadiana  | 26 L.      |
| From thence to Carthagea                   | 17 L.      | From thence to Cap S. Vincent        | 27 L.      |

All which together are 275 Leagues.

West part of Spaine.

The West part of Spaine is directly towards the Equinoctiall, and contains 126 leagues, or thereabouts, along the Ocean sea, from Cap S. Vincent, vnto that which the Ancients called Nereum, and we Finis terræ; whereof the distances are these.

|   |            |
|---|------------|
| From Cap S. Vincent to the mouth of Tagus or Tayo             | 38 Leagues |
| From thence to the riuer of Munda                             | 25 L.      |
| From Munda to Duero, a riuer, and where it falls into the sea | 25 L. I    |
| From thence to Pontenedra                                     | 19 L.      |
| From Pontenedra to Cap Finis terræ                            | 18 L.      |

All which together make 125 Leagues, whereof there are about 100 of the jurisdiction of Portugall.

The North part
of Spaine.

From Cap Finis terræ vnto the Promontorie Easô, neere vnto which is Bayonne, a frontier towne of Fraunce against Spaine, is the North part thereof, running some fewen score Leagues along the Ocean, sometimes called Britannicum. For

|  |            |
|--|------------|
| From Cap Finis terræ vnto Ninerio, or S. Marthe, they number | 40 Leagues |
| From thence to Hianco or Cap. Stationes                      | 30 L.      |
| From thence to S. Ander                                      | 30 L. K    |
| From S. Ander to the last bounds of the Pyrenees             | 40 L.      |

All which makes 140 Leagues.

The circuit of all
Spaine.

All the circuit then of Spaine shall be of 620 Leagues, counting foure Italian myles to a League, that is, 80 Leagues by land, and 540 by sea, sailing round about it, where it is washed with the two seas, which makes it almost an Island.

Provinces of Spaine vnder
the jurisdiction
thereof.

We are not ignorant, that in old times was comprehended vnder the jurisdiction of Spaine, on the one side the Prouince of Gaule Narbonoise, which is now called Languedocke, and on the other side a portion of Mauritania in Africa, beyond the strait, as well in the times of the Romane Emperours, as of the Gothes; but for that it was an accessorie onely for a time, and vpon extraordinarie occasions, and that it is most certaine that these people are by nature excluded out of the limits of Spaine, and haue alwaies had diuers humors and manners to the Spaniards, wee will containe our selues within the compasse which wee haue described and measured, in the whole course of this Historie; and if we be forced to goe out of it, wee will hold our selues there as strangers. Having turned round about Spaine, let vs see what mountaines and riuers are famous in the whole country, the better to distinguish euery nation, both auncient and moderne.

Pyrenee, why
so called.

The Pyrenees, which haue taken their name either of the great fire, whereof mention hath bin made (for Pyr in Greeke, is fire) or from the ordinarie lightening which falls vpon the tops of the hills, or else (if we will receive fables) of the nymph Pyrene, daughter to Bebrix, whom Hercules did get with child as he passed that way, extend their greatest masse from Venus Temple, or Cap Crux, vnto Bayonne, that is to say, from the one vnto the other sea, stretching farre into Spaine, where they doe hold a great part of the countrey, which lyes betwixt them and the riuer of Ebro, casting moreover many branches along and crosse this Region, from whence doe fall many riuers and small streames, the which some haue numbered to be 150; meri-

A meriting the names of riuers. The front of these mountaines, which stretch vnto the Ocean neere vnto Bayonne, bending in that part, runs along the Cantabrians, Asturians, & Galicia, vnto the last Western limits, extending it selfe far into the country, and making almost halfe Spaine crooked and hilly, whereas the riuer of Duero doth passe, and further. These hills were heretofore called Cantabres and Vindius, and since they took diuers names, which were given them by the people which dwell thereabouts, and in the vallies thereof. At this present they be the mountains of Biscay, Nauarre, Sentillana, the mountains of Oca, Asturia, and Galicia. Out of them doth flow the riuer Ebro, in old time Iberus, neere vnto a place which they call the riuer Ebro.

The spring of

B ancient country of the Autrigones, Vardules, Valcons, Ilrgetes, Ederanes, and Illecaones, the which are in our time the Nauarrois, Arragonois, and Cattelaunians, and hauing run about 120 leagues through the country, it falls into the Mediterranean sea, beneath Tortose. Duero doth also take her beginning in these mountains, a great riuer, and the auncient limit betwixt Portugall and Tarraconese, two of the principall Prouinces of Spaine, neere vnto a Bourg called Aquilar, not farre from Soria, bending in the beginning towards the South, but afterwards she takes her course to the West Ocean, into the which it dischargeth it selfe neere vnto the towne of Porto Galego, hauing run about 120 leagues by the Arcuaces, and betwixt the vallies of the Galliques and Lusitanians, which in our time are those of Castille the old, Leon and Portugall, towards the North. Into it falls the riuer Auia, vpon the banks whereof they say

The course of Ebro.

The spring of the riuer Duero.

C that no tree that is pricking will grow; although that all the country thereabouts is full of Pomgranets, Oranges, Cytrons, and such like, the which it hath common with another riuer in Galicia, called Aleste.

Auia.

From the same Pyrenees, as from a common stemme, parts the mountain, called in old time Idubeda or Iubalda, the which thrusts forth into two other branches, the which diuides Spain from the East vnto the West, and passing by diuers people, gets also diuers names: for in the beginning they call it Sierra, or mountaine of Acienca, by reason of the auncient towne of Auca, the ruines whereof are yet to be seene, about the towne of Bourgos: then it is called Sumo Sierra, Puerto de Tablada, of Palomera, of Abilo, Pico, of Tornauacas, & in the end enters into Portugall, making a great front neere vnto the Ocean, the which they call the mount

Mountaine of Idubeda.

D of Strella, vpon the top of which is an admirable lake: for they doe often find in it pieces of ships which haue suffered shipwracke vpon that coast, notwithstanding that the mountaine is very high, and a good way from the sea: and they say moreover, that when the sea is troubled with tempests, they doe heare the waues beat, and all that lake and mountaine make a noyse, with the horrible sound of the winds and tempest, as if they were in full sea.

The mountaine of Strella in Portugall, and the wonders
thereof.

This course of the mountains running betwixt the riuers Duero and Tayo, doth now cause a distinction of the people of the Prouinces of Spain; for which reason they are called, on this side, or beyond the mountains. The other branch of this mount Idubeda runs towards the South, neere vnto the towne of Sigüenza and Cuenca, keeping in the riuer Ebro, that it bend not towards the West, the which in our time hath also gotten diuers names, that is, Solorio, Sierra

Distinction of Spaine within the country.

E Molina, Sierra d'Alcarras & Sigura, in old times, Mons Argentum; and sometimes rising high, and sometimes falling and opening in some places, it is in a manner plain neere vnto Valence: then it riseth againe, and passeth to Carthagea, and to Cap de Palos, in former times called Scombraria, the auncient limit of two governments of Spaine, at what time this mountain was called Orospeda or Ortopeda. Passing on by the sea shore riseth the mountaine, in old time called Illipula, and now Sierra Vermeia, Sierra de Rondas, and other hills of the kingdome of Granada, which extend vnto the strait whereas they make Mont Calpe, called at this time Gibaltar; the which should properly be called Gibal Tarifa, a name gotten by the descent of a captain Moore, called Tarif, who landed in this place with the first armie of Moores that came out of Africke into Spaine, when as the Gothes kingdome went to ruine. Other mountaines diuiding themselves from this, and going far from the sea, run about Cordoue and Seuille, the which in old time were called Mariani Montes, and Castulonensis Salus, now Sierra Morena.

Orospeda. Mo. called Illipula. M.

Calpe. M. which is Gibaltar.

Mariani. M.

F Out of these above named mountaines, which keepe in the riuer Ebro, bending from the North to the South, there flowe three great flouds or riuers, Tagus, Anas, and Betis, according to the ancients, but now called Tayo, Guadiana, and Guadalquivir, besides many others of lesse fame, which these doe receiue and carrie into the Ocean.

Tayo, Tagus, Guadiana, Anas,
Guadalquivir, or Betis.

The course of
Tagus.

Tayo hath his spring at a place which is now called Sierra Molina, neere vnto the towne of Cuenca and Toralba, the which passing almost through two parts of Spaine, runneth by Toledo, the country of Estrema Dura and Portugal, towards the West Ocean, where it enters by a large and spacious channell beneath the royall citie of Lisbon. This riuer was famous among the Auncients, by reason of the little graines, and as it were scrapings of pure gold, which they did often find in the grauell and sand, which the torrent and streames of water had brought from the mountaines.

The beginning
and course of Guadiana.

Guadiana cometh out of the country which in old time they called Campus Laminitanus, and now Campo de Montiel, a place which is otherwise drie and wanting water. This riuer directeth her course in the beginning towards the West, neere vnto the towne which was called Pax or Pezaugusta, but now Badaios: turning there to the South, it dischargeth it selfe into the Atlantick sea, bounding in at this day the kingdome of Portugal on the South side, as in old time it diuided the prouince of Betica from Lusitania. Towards the Spring they call it Rodiera, and from thence (which is admirable) hauing run some leagues in the country, it hides it selfe vnder the ground, neere vnto a place called Argamassilla, and runneth so hidden aboue eight great leagues: then it comes forth againe into certaine moores, continuing her course in that manner, neere vnto the auncient townes of Cecilia, Gemela, Emerita, and Pezaugusta, towards the sea; by reason whereof the Spaniards breed admiration in strangers, bragging, that they haue a bridge in their country, vpon the which aboue ten thousand cattell feed daily.

A singularitie of Guadiana.

Guadalquivir,
the name, spring
and course.

As for Guadalquivir, so named by the Moores, which is as much to say, as a great floud, and in old time Betis, her beginning is vpon Mont Argent, called now Sierra d'Alcarras, and runneth towards the West into the Atlantick sea, beneath Seuille, by a large channell; although in old time it had two: whereof the one passed along the wals of Nebrissa, which at that time was Lebrissa; the which is at this day aboue two leagues off, for that the channell is filled vp: vpon the which Asta did also stand, which in those times was also called Zeres de la Frontera.

Cayo.
Two
The ladders of Hanniball.

There are other mountaines in Spaine of lesse fame, as Mont Cayo, neere to Tarrassone in Arragon, in old time Caunus; M. Iui or Mons Iouis, neere to Barcelone; the ladders of Hanniball, called in that time the coast of Garaph, and others. Moreouer, there are many riuers besides those which we haue described, giuing the names or bounds to Prouinces: as the riuer of Rusino, whereof the towne and country was named; of the ruines whereof Perpignan was built: Astorga, which seemeth to giue the name vnto the Asturians: the riuer of Calybs, which passeth according vnto some, neere vnto Tarrassone, and in his name carrieth the marks of the beginning of the Spaniards, the water whereof is excellent to steepe yron: Sicoris, or Sigro, which passeth at Lerida; about the which were the Sicanians, which passed into Sicilie, Cinpa or Senga, and the greater and lesse Arragon; flouds whereof the kingdome of Arragon is named, with others which are obserued by the curious. But it shall be easie for vs, among these great mountaines and riuers which we haue described, to find out euery people and prouince, and the particular places of Spaine, as well according to the distinctions of the Auncient, as their limits and diuisions, since the euerfion of the Romane Empire.

Turdulans.

Beginning then with the Westerne point, we say, That from Cape S. Vincent vnto the Island of Gades or Calis, did dwell the auncient Turditanes, vpon the sea, and within the land, holding both banks of the riuer Anas, and the country which lieth betwixt it and Betis, beyond the which they did occupie some leagues of the country towards the South. This Region was in the beginning full of woods and forrests, which they called Tercenians and Tartessians, but being cut downe, it hath bene alwaies very fertile and abounding in all things. The towne of Hisspalis, called after Sepila, and since Seuille, was of this nation, being also called Romulensis Colonia, situated vpon the banks of Betis, a great and navigable riuer, and lower towards the sea, Nebrissa, and Asta Colonia, and within the country Italica, whereas the Emperours Traian, Adrian, and Theodosius were borne, with the Poet Silius, and Carmon retaining still the name, Pax Iulia and Beia, at this present Portugall.

Turdulans.
Cordoue.

Neere vnto them towards the East were the Turdules, whose country is also bathed by Betis, and vpon this riuer is the towne of Cordoue, called Colonia Patricia, built by the

Consull

A Consull M. Claud. Marcellus, about the yeare of the foundation of Rome 602. Which country of the Turdules did extend to the Turditanes and the Bastules, from the Ile of Gades, vpon the Ocean, vnto the Mediterranean sea, neere vnto the Promontorie Charidemum, or Cap de Gates. The places which the Turdules did hold lying vpon the Ocean shoare, towards the strait, were the port of Mnesthec, the Temple of Iuno built by Hercules, and the citie of Belon, on which side there are at this day S. Marie, Trafalgar, and Tarriffe: and within the country the mountaine Ilipula, and Ilipula Magna, at this present Ilpa; Illiberis, or Liberia, which some thinke was Granado in those times; and Astigi, one of the iudiciall seats of Spaine, which may be Eccia at this day, although there were another of that name vpon the sea shoare. Among this nation it may well be the Melessians were, and their towne Oringe, taken by L. Scipio, which they say was Aryona.

After were the Bastules, within the straits, and along the Mediterranean sea, who were surnamed Poeni, continuing vnto the Promontorie of Charidemum, or Cap de Gates, and to Balaria, now Bara, or Vera, next vnto the Turdules, of which nation Calpe was, otherwise called Heraclee, the which at this day they name Gibraltar, neere vnto the which in old time was the towne of Carteia, called also Tartesse, the which was a common name in old time for the riuer Betis, the Island of Gades, and all the neighbour country. It is likely, that this towne of Carteia was situated whereas Algezire now standeth. Titus Livius setteth it without the strait, vpon the Ocean. Then Malaga, a port which retayneth his name; and Abdera, which is Almerie, vpon the Mediterranean sea, belonging vnto the Bastules; and it may be Munda, whereas Pompeyes eldest sonne was defeated, if it be that Ronde which is at this day, as some will haue it. The countries inhabited by these three nations, are at this day comprehended in Granado, Andaluzia, and a part of Portugall, and made the Betique Prouince one of the chiefe members of the kingdome of Spaine.

Next vnto them, and continuing along the coast of the Mediterranean sea, were the Bastitanes and Contestanes, whereas in our time lyeth Murcia and Valence, seperated by the mountaine Orospea. The towne of Basa was in old time the chiefe mansion of the Bastitanes, otherwise called Bastitanes, to whom Acci did belong, now called Guadix, and vnto Beiar and Origuela, in old time called Bigerra and Orcelis. But Murcia, then called Menlaria, Sætabis, which is Xatiua, and towards the Promontorie Scombaria, now called Cap de Palos, new Carthage, Alone, which at this day is Alicante, Illici, it may be Elches in our time, and the citie of Valence, were belonging vnto the Contestanes, among the which it may be Illiturge was, lying farre from the sea, or else among the aboue named Bastitanes.

Then followed the Editanes and Ilercaones, from Valence vnto the mouth of the riuer Ebro. The townes and places renowned among the Editanes, or, as others tearme them, Seditanes, were Dianium vpon the sea, and Sagunt higher, destroyed by Hanniball, whereas now Moruedro standeth, Cæsar Augusta, farre off from the sea, is Saragossa, in old time Salduba.

Among the Ilercaones were Dertosa, in these times Tortosa, and old Carthage, ruined by the two Scipios brethren.

Ioyning vnto them, and still coasting along the sea shoare, and on this side the riuer of Ebro, were the Acetanians, Laetanians, Castellanes, and Indigetes, all which are comprehended at this day in Catelogne, vpon the sea. To these Acetanians (who were also called Cofetanians) belonged Terraco; of the which, the greatest part of Spaine was named; a towne peopled by the two brethren Scipios, to oppose it against new Carthage.

F Barcelone growne great of a small beginning, by the ruines of Rubicata, a Colonie of the Africanus, situated vpon the riuer Rubricatus, at this present Lobregat, was of the Laetanians or Laetanians.

The Castellans (who, according vnto some, haue left their name to our Catelogne) were Castellans, whereas it may be the Duchie of Cardone now is.

C iij

Vpon

Indigetes.

Vpon the declining of the Pyrennee mountaines, were the Indigetes, or Endigetes, whereas the towne of Empurias or Emporium now is, and Rhoda, or Rosas, now ruined, and in old time the Temple of Venus, whereas now Coelibre stands, a name taken from Illiberis, which was at the foot of the Pyrennees, as some suppose.

Ruscino Rusillon.

For a frontier to Spaine on that side, we will place Ruscino, which is the Countie of Rosillon, although it were in old time of the Prouince of Gaule, but it hath of long time beene annexed vnto Spaine: there was Elna, which hath not changed her name, and Ruscino, both riuer and towne, of whose ruines Parnpignan was built. Neere vnto it is a small riuer, called Illeris, and since Tetrum, that is to say, slithie, for that the water thereof is blacke, by reason that it passeth among the mynes of metall, whereof those moun-taines are full. In this countrey there was also a towne called Illiberis, as that of Grenade, whereas the first Councell of Spaine was held: but at this day there remaineth no marke of it.

Celtiques.

Comming now to the holy Promontorie, or Cape S. Vincent, from whence wee are parted, we will describe the people dwelling along the Westerne and Northerne Ocean, vnto the other end of the Pyrennees, neere vnto Bayonne; whereof the first were called Cel-tiques, who came without all doubt from Gaule, after that the Celtes and Iberians were mingled together, comprehended partly vnder the Lusitanians, who held a great Continent of the countrey, as well by the sea side, as within the land, and gaue the name vnto one of the chiefe members of Spaine, containing the Vergons, of whom wee will make mention hereafter.

Lusitanians.

These Celtiques and Lusitanians comprehended a great part of our Portugall, of Estrema Dura, and Castille the new, and entred as farre as Andelouzia into the Celtiques countrey. The auncient townes which they had, and the places most renowned, were Vlyssippo or Olyssippo, now Lisbonne, at the mouth of Tayo, the mouthes of the riuers of Monda and Duero, and within the countrey Scalabis, or Turris Iulia, now Trugil-lo, Talabriga, Talauera now, Eburna, Norba Cæsarea, at this time Alcantara, Augusta Emerita, now Merida. These two last were betwixt Tayo and Guadiana, and Norba Cæsarea was ruined by Pompey's faction, for that they had beene two faithfull vnto Cæsar: of the ruines whereof, and the remainders of which people, Emerita was afterwards built, in Augustus his time. There were also Euandria, Cecilia Gemellina, now called S. Marie of Guadalupe: Aronda among the Celtique Betiques, called also Munda, not that whereas Pompey's eldest sonne was defeated. Beside these townes, there were vpon the marches of the Lusitanians, Illipa, which it may be is Niebla at this day; Ostraca, Carmel, Ituca, and others, whereof there remaine no markes.

Callaiques or Gallegos.

Beyond the riuer of Duero were the people called Callaiques or Galliques, now Gallegos, so named of the Gaules, Galates, or Celtes, holding a great countrey, which was barren and hillie, for the most part, but where it joyneth vpon the Lusitanians; which is that which is contained betwixt the riuers of Duero and Minio, belonging at this present to the realme of Portugall; the which hath taken this name since the coming of the Moores, of the towne of Porto, right against the which, they or the Gaules pyrats built a fort, which was called Gal: it may be it is that which is called the tower of Gaya, the which is in this countrey, whereas Duero falleth into the sea. These people of Callaiques were diuided into two; those which were called Brecaires, by reason of the towne of Brecar Augusta, which was among them (the which is now Braga, Metropolitane of Portugal,) and the Callaiques Lucenses, by reason of the towne called Lucus Augusti, now Lugo. Of the Brecaires was the riuer Lemia, called Lethes, for that the Celtes inhabiting about the riuer of Guadiana, comming with other of their neighbours into this coun-tre, after some tumults, and the losse of their capitaine, being vagabonds, and without counsell, they wandered vp and downe without conduct, and without any care to returne from whence they came, as if they had forgotten their first abode. The Brecaires and their towne Brekar tooke their name from certaine souldiours of Affricke, which were leuiued about the riuer of Bragada, in the Prouince of Carthage, and then mingled with the Celtes, or Gaules, were called Callaiques, or Galliques Brecaires.

Among

Portugall
whence it was so named.

Brecaires.

A Among the Lucenses were the Artabres, about the Promontorie Nereum, which is now Finis terræ: there were the altars of the Sunne, and Flauium Brigantium, it may be Compostella at this day, or Betauzos, or rather Corunna, and Trileucum, a Promontorie, and Iria Flauia, at this day S. Marie of Finis terræ, or Padron, and Aque Calidæ, now Orense.

Asturia joyned to these Callaiques, at that time diuided into many iurisdiccions: there was Lancia the chiefe towne, taken by Augustus captaines, Legio Germanica, or Gemina, at this time Leon, a royall towne: Bregetium, called since (according vnto some) Ouedo, an assured refuge for Christians, when as the Moores did ouerrun Spaine: Asturica Augusta, at this day Astorga: Forum Egurrorum, Medina of Riosecco, and towards the sea Flauionauia,

B neere vnto the which began the Cantabrians, which are now the Biscanes, those of Guipus-coa, and part of Nauarre. Their sea townes were Flauio brigā, now Bilbao, Easo, S. Sebastian, neere Fonterabie, the furthest limit of Spaine, where as in old time was the Promontorie O-larro, or Oeoso. Among them was the towne of Segisama, taken by Octavianus Cæsar. They did comprehend the Antrigones, Caristes, Bardules, and Vascons, the which extended themselues farre from the sea into the countrey, on this side the riuer of Ebro, and coasted the Py-rennee mountaines. The neere vnto Asturia were properly called Cantabrians, to whom Vel-lica did belong, about the place where as now Victoria stands, the chiefe towne of the Prouince of Alaua, Iuliobriga, at this day Logroño. The riuer of Ebro did run through the middest of the Autrigons. Alba was among the Vardules, since called Viana: and to the Vascons belonged Pompelon Martua, which is now called Pampelone Iacca, which according to Ptolome hath held the old name: Calagorina, now called Calahorra, or Calahorra: Balconton, of the name of Basco, or Vasco: Sueffa, which may be Sanguessa, and others.

C Hitherto we haue briefly described the people and prouinces of Spaine, which ioyned vp-on the seas, and obserued the chiefe places thereof, applying them as neere as might bee to thesetimes: Let vs now enter into the countrey, beginning with the confines of the Callai-ques, Asturians, and Cantabrians, towards the North, and coming to the South.

The Vacces did ioyned vnto the Gallicians Brecaires of the West, to whom the Murboges, Areuaces, those which were called Belli and Titthi, confining with the Celtiberians, the Pelendones, and Berones were neighbours, approaching neere vnto the riuer of Ebro, which was to the East of them, and that of Duero vpon the South. All this compasse is comprehended in our time within Castille the old, and the realme of Leon.

The townes of Viminacium, Auia, or Liuia, which is now Villalon, Segisama Iulia, at this present called Tordeillas, which they call otherwise Turris Sillana; Palantia, which hath preferred the name of Palencia; Pincia, which is Vailledolit, Septimance, or Simanca; Sen-tica, or Sarabris, at this day Zamora, and Cauca, whereas Lucullus committed great cruel-tie, and Intercatia. These townes I say were among the Vacces: But Branum, or Auca, of whose ruines the towne of Burgos hath beene built, belonged to the Murboges.

E Among the Areuaces, whose country is washt with the riuer Duero, running through the middest thereof, were the townes of Clunia Colonia, Segortia Laeta, at this present Sepul-ueda, Ocilis, Segobia, which keeps his name, Termantia, and the old Numancé, whereas at this day Soria stands.

Vnder the said nation were the Vergones or Vectons, confining vpon the Lusitanians, and making a part of that prouince: which countrey is now comprehended betwixt the frontier of Portugall, towards Cite Roderigo, the kingdome of Leon, Castille the new, and Toledo. To these people Elmantica did belong, now called Salamanca, a famous Vniuersitie. On the East side were the Carpetanians, there stood Toledo, which retains the name, called also Serezola, Eburna, Hippo, Complutum, now called Alcala Enares, Mantua, now Madril:
and it may be among them were the Olcades, and their townes Althea.

F Towards the South were the Oretanes, confining on the East with the Celtiberians, and on the West with the Beturians, neighbours to the Lusitanians, which are those of Estrema Dura. The countrey of the Oretanes makes at this day a part of the realme of Toledo; it comprehends the fields of Calatraua, the passage called the fields of Alcoer, and part of the mountaines Marianes, at this present Sierra Morena, vnto Iden, and to the frontiers of Granado. Oretan of the Germanes, which some thinke to bee Calatraua, Castulo, then a great and mightie towne, and now a small burrough, called Caslona, vpon the riuer Guadiana,

Artabres.

Asturians.

Cantabrians.

Vardules.

Vacces.

Arenaces.

Vergones and Vectons.

Carpetanians.

Oretanes.

ana, where Himila the wife of Hannibal was borne, issued from the race of Milicm, who built it: Mentifa, which is Iaen, according vnto some, and Aftapa, a famous retreat of desperat theeuers; Nobilia, Cusibis and Illusia, were of the Oretanes.

Celtiberians. Among the Celtiberians were Ergauica, Alce, Turiasso, (that is Tarassone) Bilbilis, at this present Calataiub (whereas the Poet Martiall was borne) Saguntia, now Siguenza, Contrebia and Valeria, which is Concha.

Lobetanes. Betwixt the Celtiberians and the riuer Ebro, were the Lobetanes, and on this side Ebro, vnder the Vascons and mount Eduius, dwelt the Ilergetes, and towards the Pyrence mountaines, and at the foot of them, the Suesfetan, Lacetanes, Authetanes, or Aufetanes, and Cerretanes, being all contained partly in Nauarre and Arragon, and part in Caralogne at this present. Suesfa the chiefe towne of the Suesfetan, may be Sanguessa in Nauarre: and Iacca at that time was of the auntient Lacetanes. The towne of Ilerda, which is Lerida, gaue the name to the Ilergetes: to them there also belonged Oica, Huesca at this day, and Bergidum, which is Vrgel, and Anitorgis, or Athanasia.

As for the towne of Iliturgis, it is obscurely limited by the auntients. Some of the later will haue it among the Ilergetes, others place it in the Oretanes countrey, and others in the Betique prouinces, places farre distant one from another.

The Authetanes, or Aufetanes, did possesse Geroñda, in our time Giron: and among the Cerretanes, were Aufonia the auntient, and Iulia Libica, which some hold to be Linca.

This is all which I haue thought fit to gather of the people inhabiting the firme land of Spaine, the which were found there, and augmented by the Carthaginians and Romanes, when as they contended for the possession thereof, whereof some markes appeared at that time, and that they had immutable limits, the which doe now assure vs of their habitations.

Islands about Spaine. There is mention made by some authors, of many islands about Spaine, whereof some are no more, others are yet famous. The Cassiterides, fertile in tinne, were placed by the Cosmographers neere vnto Cap Finis terræ: but there is no more any mention of them; whereby it seemes they haue been swallowed vp in the sea, vnlesse they will say, they be those of the Axores, which are too far from Spaine.

Cassiterides, last islands. The islands of the gods in the West Ocean, may be those of Bayone, neere vnto Ponteuedra in Gallicia.

Islands of the gods. The island of Gades was in old time called Tartesse Erythrea, or according vnto some Erythie, Cotynusia, Aphrodisia, Gadira, Gadir, and Gaddir (although that Gaddir in the opinion of some, is a common name to the island, and to other places of Betique Spaine, neere vnto it, as well as Tartesse) and now they haue named it Gadiz or Galis. It hath beene the most famous of all others about Spaine, and is yet renowned and rich, but much more in auntient times. For although that in the Romanes time they had scarce any territorie, yet was it one of the greatest, the richest, and best peopled townes in Europe. It appears by the description of Censures at one time, That there were fise hundred heads of families, of the order of Knights, among the inhabitants thereof. One Balbus a Gaditane enlarged the towne almost halfe bigger than it was, and called his new worke Neapolis.

In this island there was a founaine flowing and ebbing daily with the sea. Ioyning vnto it there were two other small islands, whereof the one was called Didima. They write, That in old time the island of Gadis was much greater than it is now. It hath in length from the South to the North, sometwen or twelue miles, and is seperated from the maine land by a narrow channell, and distant from the strait of Gibaltar some threescore miles, or fiftie leagues.

Islands Balceares, Maiorca, Minorca. In the Iberique, or Mediterranean sea, are the two islands Balceares, called in these times Majorca, and Minorca; for that the one is bigger than the other. Their first name was Gymnases, for that the inhabitants thereof went all naked: Gymnos in Greece, is naked in our language. But for that the men of this island were good Archers, they were called Balceares, vnlesse wee will beleue that this name was giuen them by one Balee, whom Hercules gaue them for their Gouernour, as some write. In those dayes great Commonweales drew good souldiours from thence, who did commonly vse slings, and

A and did euer carie three; with the one he did bind his head, with another he did girt himselfe, and the third he held in his hand: and with these armes they wrought great effects, and did much amaze their enemies; for they were practised in it from their youth by their mothers, who set their breakfast bread vpon the top of a post, the which they must beat down with their slings, or else they fasted. These islanders were long before they would vse either gold or siluer, remembering the great calamities which Spaine had suffered, by reason of these mettals: wherefore they held themselves to be well assured in forbidding the vse of it. They did sometimes capitulate with the Carthaginians, who often employed their souldiours in their warres, that they should giue them wiues and wine for their pay, and no siluer.

B These are two fertile islands, hauing this benefit moreouer, that they doe not breed any hurtfull beast, although the warre which they had with the conies be no fable; but they were brought from other places, and of one bucke conie and a doe, they did multiplie in such great numbers, as with the working of their holes and burroes vnder ground, they vnrooted trees, and vndermined the foundations of houses, so as the inhabitants sent embassadours to Rome, to demand helpe and succour of the Senat against these beasts (a certaine argument of their simplicitie) but afterwards they learned to take them. The greatest of these islands is about fiftene leagues long, and verie narrow. The lesser yeelds nothing to the other in bountie and fruitfulness. About them are the little islands of Cabrera and Dragonera. Neerer vnto the maine land, and more Westerly, are the two Pityufes, whereof the greater was called Ebusus, which hath about twentie miles circuit of hard acceffe, hauing a port vpon the South side: It is now called Yuica, the which they say hath no serpents, and, if they bee brought from any other place, they die. But the other, Ophiusa in old time, and now Fromentaria, is so full of them, as the island hath remained desart and not inhabited. In Yuica they make excellent salt. These islands are right against the shore betwixt Barcelone and Valence.

C The islands of Sardinia and Corfica were in old time giuen by the Popes in fee to the kings of Arragon, who haue contended by armes for the right thereof, against the Genetois and Pisans, for many yeares, till that in the end the Arragonois got the quiet possession of Sardinia; of which conquest we shall speake often; wherefore wee will describe it briefly, without making any particular mention of that of Corfica, which the Geneuois hold.

D The isle of Sardinia lies in the Mediterranean sea, hauing that of Corfica neere vnto it vpon the North. It runs out in length from North to South, neere threescore leagues, accounting foure miles to a league. It is held to be about an hundred and fiftie leagues in circuit: It is fise and thirtie leagues from Africke, the neere place vnto it is Tunes or Bizerte. Betwixt it and Corfica are but foure leagues, and in some places but three: in the which there are many smal islands, which they cal Buinares. This island was in old time called Ico, Ichnusa, and Sandaliotis, for that it hath the forme of a sole, or of a mans foot. The first inhabitants were Tuscanes, and then Grecians, led by Iolans and Sardus, companions to Hercules. After which there arriued some Troianes, and then Athenians. After them the Carthaginians seised vpon this island, who were dispossessed by the Romanes, which was the cause of the third warre betwixt them.

E Hauing beene long vnder that commonweale, and consequently vnder the Romane empire, the Saracens got footing there, against whom the Geneuois and Pisans, then mightie commonweales, did arme, by the Popes persuation; conquered it, and planted themselves there. But for that it was a subject of their warre and quarels, and withall the Popes bearing a spleene against the Pisans, it was giuen in fee to the kings of Arragon. It was heretofore a spleene against the Romanes, it was so fertile, and would be so still, if the people were industrious; much better for tillage than Corfica, especially that part which lies towards Africke, which is a plaine, and lyes lower than the other towards Corfica, which is hilly. In it there grow vines and all sorts of fruites, as in Corfica, except oyle, by reason of the negligence of the Sardinians: for nature bringing forth in the woods and mountaines, infinit store of wild oliues, shewes it is their owne fault if this plant be not made good. The island abounds in cattell of all sorts, as it appears by the great quantitie of hides and cheefe which they transport into Italie and other places. There are great store of wild goats, called by the countrey men Mufines, or Mufes, which haue their haire like staggas, and their heads like rammes, but their homes bending backwards: they are verie light and nimble, and liue in the mountains, where-

Malacquin expart in slings.

Gold and siluer forbidden by the auntient Maiora quins.

*Cabrera and Dragonera.
Pityufes.*

Description of Sardinia.

Fertile of Sardinia.

of the Sardinians (who are better huntmen than the Corsicans) take three or foure thousand at a time, the which they flea to sell their skinnies, whereof the Cordeuan leather is made, leaving the carkasses in the fields, notwithstanding that the flesh be reasonable good to eat; wherewith it may be the ayre is impaired, the which doth naturally infect that countrey, by reason of certaine South winde which blow in Summer. The horses of Sardinia are hot, strong headed, and hard to be broken, but they last long; and there are many wild. Among their tame cattell there are certaine small bullockes, which amble naturally, which the countrey men vse like Asles and Mules, to goe from one place to another. Heretofore there haue beene mynes of sulphur or brimstone, alume, silver, and salt; and it is but the negligence of the people, that they are not found at this day, and with good profit. Neither doth it want bathes which are good for many infirmities, especially betwixt Montreal and Saint Iohn. In Sardinia (as some maintaine) there are no volues, nor any venomous nor hurtfull beasts, the which they haue common with many other islands: yet they haue verie great foxes, fierce and cruell, which easily kill a sheepe or a goat. There growes the hearbe Sardonique, which causeth death, with such a contraction of the sinewes, as they seeme to smile when they are dead.

This island hath in former times beene better inhabited than it is at this day, and they haue beene more warlike than now they are. When as the Geneuois and Pisans did hold it, they distinguisht it into two prouinces, that of Cap Caillery which looks towards Africke, the which was the Pisans part, and the greater; and Cap of Lugodori, joyning vpon Corfica, which the Geneuois held for them. Then the Sardinians had their rulers and Gouernours, whom they call Iudges, diuided into foure iurisdiccions or prouinces; one at Caillery, another at Arborea, since called Oristagny; one at Turruta, or Torre, and the fourth at Galluri. This kind of gouernement was entertained vntill the conquest of the island by the Arragonis, and the Spaniards rule. At this day there is a Viceroy resident at Caillery, with absolute authoritie, who of necessitie must bee a Spaniard, and is assisted by a Councell, or royall audience, consisting of a President, and a certaine number of Counsellours. The two prouinces aboue mentioned, into the which the island is diuided, haue either of them a Gouernour, who is a Spaniard, or of the island indifferently, which doe gouerne and haue authoritie in the absence of the Viceroy, but hee beeing present, it ceaseth.

The townes and chiefe places of this island, bee Caillery, commonly called Calger, a towne seated vpon the side of a hill towards Africke, hauing a goodly port, haunted by merchants and saylers from all parts: it is well built, and enriched with diuers towers, and a stately temple, built by the Pisans, and an Archbishops seat. This citie hath by priuiledge a iurisdiction apart, besides the Viceroyes authoritie, and is gouerned by the citizens themselves. Next is Oristagny, in old time called Arborea, the which is also a bishopricke, and was sometimes a marquissate with a particular lord: but one of them rebelling, the kings of Arragon haue vnited it vnto their demaines. There is a port also towards the West. Arghero, or Alguero, followes on the same West part, the which hath no port, but onely a road. Rossa vpon the Sea, the tower in old time was called Libisson, a Colonie of the Romanes, and afterwards called Torre, or Turruta, the which is now ruined. Saffari, ten or twelue miles from the sea, where there is an auncient conduit of water, the which continues about twelue miles, vnto Saint Gaminis temple. Then castle Arragonois towards Corfica.

There are many other burroughes and castles in the island, of small fame. The ruines of old buildings which are to bee seene in many parts of the island, shew that in auncient time there were many cities and great buildings. In places not inhabited there, yet are many towers to bee seene of a round forme, built of a verie hard stone, hauing the doores and entries narrow, and the stayres in the maine walls. Those buildings are called by the inhabitants Noracs, a marke of great antiquitie, some thinking that Norac sonne to Erit three did first inhabit this island, by whom the buildings were so called. The islands which are about Corfica and Sardinia, are few, and of no fame. Asinara and Tolaro, are towards Cap Logudori, the one of the East side, the other of the West, the rest are rather shelves than islands.

The

The aire in Sardinia corrupted by nature and by accident.

Mynes.

Bathes.

Indges in foure iurisdiccions.

Chiefe townes in Sardinia.

A The Sardinians had in old time a proper language, but the often change of their lords, and the access of diuers nations, hath corrupted their speech: The most ciuile at this day speake Spanish Cattelan: the vulgar sort haue a language mixt of the Cattelans, Italians, Moors, and other strange and barbarous words. Among the ruder sort, there is not in a manner any religion, and not much in townes; for in all Christendome you shall not find Churchmen more ignorant than in Sardinia. Their religious exercises are to heare masse on Sundayes, and on some Saints daies, and then they feast and daunce euen in their Churches, men and women together, with immodest songs and jestures.

In townes their apparell is verie stately, especially of the women; but the countrey peoples is simple and grosse. The men are of a small stature, but strong and rough, and great huntmen with crossebowes: quiet and peaceable among themselves, and courteous to strangers.

Spaine, as wee haue described it by the prouinces and particular people, was diuided into three principall members, or three great prouinces; that is, Betica, Lusitania and Tarraconoise. Betica was so named of the riuier Betis, that is, Guadalquiber, which passeth through the midst of it. It did containe that which is inclosed by the riuier Anas, or Guadiana, on the one side, and by the Ocean sea, from the mouth thereof stretching towards the strait, and then running along the coast of the Mediterranean sea vnto Carthage, or the Promontorie Charidemum, called Cap de Gates: From whence going by land to Castulo, or Castlona the old, it was bounded in on that side by the mountaine Idubeda, which is at this day called Sierra of Alcarra, and others, as if they would draw a direct line from Muxacra, which is neere vnto Cap de Gates, vnto Almagra. This prouince was the best and most fertile of Spaine, and the first affected and vsurped by the Phenicians, Africans, and other strangers.

From the riuier Anas, or Guadiana, and his entrie into the sea, mourning to the place whereas Duero falls into it, was the West part of Lusitania, the second member of Spaine, the which did lye betwixt those two riuers, on the North and South sides, and within it had for the Easterne limits, the Carpetanes and Oretanes, going from Castulo, or Castlona, vpon Guadiana, vnto Septimania, at this present Simanca, in Castille. The riuier Tayo passeth through the midst of this region, where in some places there are store of all sorts of fruits.

All the rest of Spaine, from the mouth of Duero along the shore vnto Fonterabie, or Easo, and from the Promontorie Charidemum, or Cap de Gates, or else Bara, or Vera, or Muxacra on the Mediterranean sea, vnto Venus Temple, or Cap de Crux, and all the people which are betwixt the Pyrenees and the limits which wee haue giuen to the prouinces of Betica and Lusitania, made the third member of Spaine: yet if wee shall beleene Mela, the Calaiques, that is, the inhabitants of Gallicia, were comprehended among the Lusitanians; and that others haue made a fourth prouince of them during the emperours: accounting also the Carthagenoise for a fift, and adding the sixt in Africke: for as much as all that which the Romane Emperours did possesse beyond the strait in Mauritania, was subject to the justice of Spaine. But this tripartite diuision of Spaine, is the most auncient, and is not entertained by the Romanes, during their great exploits of armes, and conquests thereof; especially for the gouernement of justice among those nations, hauing wholly subdued them: for they erected Courts, which they called Conuents, appointing to euery prouince his iurisdiction. In Betica there were foure established, at Gades, Corduba, Astigi, and Seuille. In Lusitania three, at Emerita, Pax, or Pezaugusta, and at Scalabita, or Sjren. And in Tarraconoise feuen, at Carthage, Tarracone, Caesar Augusta, Clunia, Astorga, at Lugo, and at Bracar.

12 As for the diuision of Spaine into the hither and further, that happened in the beginning when as the Romans came to make war against the Carthaginians, who held it in a manner all, or at the least had reduced it vnder their obedience. The riuier of Ebro made this separation, and the Romans called that part of Spaine where they first entred, the hither part, and the other beyond Ebro, the further: for they came first by sea vpon the coast of Cartellogne, to Roses, or Empurias, or to Turracon, notwithstanding after they had enlarged their command on the other side Ebro, they did also extend the limits of Spain by little & little on that side, so as

The Sardinians language.

Their habit.

Diuision of Spaine according to the auncients.

The confines of Betique.

Lusitania and the confines.

Tarraconoise & the limits.

Gallicia the fourth member.

Carthage the fift. Mauritania the sixt member.

Another diuision of Spaine: in regard of the war.

Spaine reduced to one government.

Five seats of iustice establishd in Spaine by Constantine the Great.

Many kingdome erected in Spain
by the Arabians
and Christians.

Cattellogne and his limits.

Valence.

Murcia & Car-
thagena.

Andalusia.

Portugal.

Gallicia.

Asturie and Ourede.

Nauarre.

as in the end it was bounded by the Promontorie of Scombraria, or Cap de Palos, neere to Carthage, and the descent of the mountaine Idubeda, and so through Castille, by the townes of Cuenca and Seguenza, vnto the Cantabres, or Biscanes. And this distinction continued in two principall governments, for matters of warre and state, till Augustus Caesar; the Romanes sending sometimes Consuls, sometimes Proconsuls, or Pretors, euerie one to gouerne in his iurisdiction. Afterwards Augustus reduced Spaine into one prouince, the which was entertained by his successours in the empire, at the least vnto Constantine the Great, who changed the Courts of iustice into another forme, making fiue chiefe towns, and as many prouinces, that is, Tarracone, Carthagene, Seuille, Merida, and Bracara; the which was afterwards entertained by the Gothes, vpon the declining of the empire, who notwithstanding made it but one kingdome while they enjoyed it.

13 But after that the power of the Arabian Mahometists, who had subdued the empire of the Persians, and extinguished the name of other Potentates in the East, had extended it selfe vnto the farthest bounds of Africke, and into the prouinces of Europe, which lay neere vnto it; Spain which was not without vices and defects in the chief members thereof, being suddenly inuaded & ouerrun by this nation, being euer an enemy to peace and good gouernment, was dismembred, & diuided again into diuers principalities, the names whereof we retaine vnto this day; that is, Ouiedo and Leon, Nauarre, Arragon, Cattellogne, Valence, Murcia, Granada, Toledo, Castillia, Gallicia, and Portugal, which for the most part had distinct titles of kingdomes, some being held by the Moores, and others defended by the Gothes and them of the country. Of euerie of which kingdomes we meane to make mention in this historie, and to continue it, with the helpe of God, vntill that all Spaine was reduced vnder the command of one king, although it hold till the former diuisions, and their limits, as they were set downe in the time of the Arabians and Moores.

For Cattellogne, which comprehends the auncient Indigetes, Castellans, Leetanes, and Acetanes, runnes along the Mediterranean shore, from Cap de Crux, vnto Alfaques, to the mountaine of Moncia, and S. Peters fountaine, where there is a little brooke called Cinia, which makes the limits.

Having past this riuier, the Bourg of Vimero is the beginning of Valence, which holds on to Alicante, and in this realme in old time were comprehended the Ederanes, Ilercaones, and Contestanes.

Then they enter vpon the borders of Murcia and Carthagene, which extend as farre as Almerie, by the Contestanes, Bastitanes, and some part of the Bastules.

From Gibraltar to the mouth of Guadiana, are the banks of Andelouzia, which some say was so called, for that it is before Lusitania, as if they would say, Ante-Lusitania. Others deriue the name from the Vandales, which haue held it, and call it Vandalusia: There did the Turditanes, and a part of the Celtique people dwell.

After which they enter into Portugall, which runs on vnto the riuier Minio, where it falls into the sea, the auncient limits of the Lusitanians, and of the Gallique Brecaires. This realme according to the suruey which king Sebastian caused to be made in our time, contains 260 leagues in circuit, whereof there is an hundred and twentie towards the sea, and an hundred and fortie to the land.

Gallicia follows from Minio, Bagone, and Pontuedra, vnto Ribadeo; they were in old time the Lucenses.

Then they come to the Asturians of Ouiedo; from Castropol to Llamas, from Llamas to Castro Deordiales, are the banks of the Asturians of Sentillana. These people alone haue retained their auncient name. After which followes the coast of Biscaye, where is Portugallere and Bilbao, and stretcheth vnto Ondarroa. Then they come to Guipuscoa at Montrico, which ends at Pontarabie. These were auncient Cantabrians, and part Autrigones, Caristians, Vardules, and Vascons vpon the sea.

Nauarre lies for the most part vpon the sides and vallies of the Pyrenées, which enter into the country of Spaine by Ronsual, by the valley of Salefar, and the valley Roncal, vnto Hisana, which is the limit of Arragon, and passeth vnto Logroño, where it confines with Castillia the old. It was the country of the Vascons, Vardules, Caristians, and other their neighbours.

Atta-

A Arragon of a small beginning hath imbraced part of the Vascons and Illegeres, on this side Ebro, and on the other side a part of the Celtiberians country. And it was determined in the time of king Iaques the first, from the riuier Cinga at Farifa, and of S. Christine, to the top of the Pyrenées at Aluentosa.

Leon was in old time part of Asturia.

Castillia the old and new, comprehended all the middle countries of Spaine, betwixt the nations aboue named.

As for the passage of the Pyrenées, if these hills went in a direct line, the passage would bee short betwixt the two seas, for they say, that both the one and the other may be easily scene in a cleere day from the tops of some of them, yea from that of S. Adrian.

B Spaine is then both in generall and in particular, as we haue described it: and if we consider well the situation of this region, we may rightly say, that it is rampared and defended by nature against all the attempts and enterprises of strangers, as much as any country in the world, being compassed in with the dangerous gulfes of the two seas, and walled vp behind with the hard passages of the Pyrenée mountaines: being moreover of a temperat and wholesome ayre, and hauing a soyle fit to nourish all things. For there are neither violent winds, nor thicke foggie vapours, nor any insupportable heat of the Sunne: but the aire is sweet and calme, being continually refreishd with the North and Westerne winds which come from the sea.

C 14 Of the fertilitie of Spaine, and the great diuersitie of good things which it produceth, the auncients haue left vs ample and true testimonies, whereof the most autentique are, That the Romanes hauing made warre in the heart thereof, both against the Carthaginians and them of the country for about two hundred yeares, it did in a manner continually feed these great armies on either side, with that which it did bring forth, and did not onely supplie them with victuals, but also with treasure to entertaine their souldiours, and to satisfie the greedie desire and couetousnesse of their commaunders and capitaines; and moreover hath filled their treasuries full of spoiles both at Rome and Carthage, as shall appeare by the particularities in the progresse of the Historie.

It was Spaine which gaue courage to the Carthaginians to attempt those high enterprises which wee read of them, and did furnish them with meanes to entertaine so many mercinarie souldiours, wherewith for so many yeares they did trouble and annoy the Romane empire, and other nations, without cost or daunger to their owne citizens, who in all these wars did hunt after nothing but honour and profit, to the prejudice of Spaine, and with the bloud of other people.

Wee haue before made some mention how rich it was in mynes of gold, siluer, and all other kinds of mettall: let vs now say boldly, that nature had heapt vp mountaines of treasure there, and that the auncients did rightly say in tearmes besitting their Idolatrie, That Pluto dwelt vnder the couering of this earth: the which was the cause of infinit calamities to the Spaniards. For these greedie robbers came from all parts, being drawne thither with the desire of gaine: so as the best aduised were forced to forbid the vse of gold and siluer among them by an expresse law. Among others the Betrique prouince, which now hath the name of Andalusia, Granada, and thereabouts, was exceeding rich of mines of gold and siluer, and yet the soyle was verie fertile in fruits, the which seemes to be against naturall reason.

When as the Carthaginians came first into Spaine, vnder the conduct of Amilcar Barca, they found among the Turditanes, the verie mangers for their horses, and hoggeheads, made of pure siluer. Then they began to digge new mynes, and did cruellly toyle the people in those workes; and it is said, that out of one onely myne or pit called Bebelo, of his name that found it neere vnto the frontier of Aquitaine, Hannibal did draw about three thousand crownes profit euerie day. The Romanes discovered others neere vnto Carthage, where they had foure hundred daily at worke, and did receiue euerie day fiue and twentie thousand Drachmes, amounting in a manner to two thousand and fiue hundred French crownes. Yea the plough-men many times in their tillage, raised vp with their ploughshares crusts of gold: and many times vpon the sands the fisher-men did find great store of graines

Arragon.

Leon.

Castillia.

Spaine rampared by nature.

Spaine a temperat ayre.

Fertilitie of Spaine.

Riches of Spaine.

Babelo a rich myne.

Rich mynes neere vnto Carthage.

graines of this mettall, verie pure, which had bene brought from the mountaines with the floods: yea if they carried water into a drie ground, and watered the earth, the gold would presently shine: so as there were more found in Spaine gathering vp of gold, than in digging it out of their mynes and pits. There was as great aboundance of copper, yron, tinne, and all other sorts of mynes, and exceeding good.

Copper, yron, and tinne.

Their large and spacious plaines and mountaines did feed infinit troupes of all sorts of cattell: the forests were full of red deere, wild boares, and other wild beasts, and all sorts of foule. They say, that in South Spaine there was oftentimes such aboundance of conies, as they were a great ruine vnto their fruits, spoyling the roots vnder the ground, with their working, so as they were much annoyed with them, being ignorant by what meanes to take them, vntill they were taught to vse ferrets, the which were brought them out of Africke.

Conies spoyled
their fruits.

The sea fruitfull

If the land did so abound in all things, what shall wee thinke of the sea? The shore (saith Strabo) is full of oysters, and of all other shell-fish: yea in the Ocean, whereas all things exceed in greatnesse and multitude those which are in the other sea, by reason of the flowing and ebbing thereof. There are to be seene huge VWhales, Grampasses, and other such monsters of the sea, which spout out water, the which seemes a farre off, to bee great pillars or towers of cloudes. How much shall we say that the Congres and Mullers of that Ocean doe exceed ours? About Cartea the Pourcelaines are of ten pounds weight, but without the strait the smaller Mullers and Congres weigh commonly fourescore pounds, the Poulpe or many feet, threescore, the fish called the Cuttle, are two cubits long: the Thon comes thither in great aboundance, delighting in the acomes which fall into the sea, from a certaine kind of small oake which growes along the shore, yeelding such aboundance of this fruit, as being afterwards cast vp by the waues of the sea, the bankes both within and without the straits, are exceeding full, but especially the Ocean, wherewith this fish (which is verie common in that sea) is much delighted, and growes verie fat with it. Many other commendations are given by the auntients to Spaine, whereof they might well judge, that neuer went out of Italie, by the number of great shipping laden with merchandise and prouision of victuals, which came daily out of that countrey, to the ports of Ostia, Puzzol, and others of Italie, wherein Strabo, Plinie, Mela, and other authors, may satisfie the curious. So as it hath not bene impertinent, if the Poets haue placed the delightful Elisian fields in this part of the world.

Wee cannot with reason doubt of that which they haue written: for although that the mountaines of Galicia, Asturia, Biscaie, Nauarre, and Arragon, which containe a great countrey, seeme rather to bewray a defect than any great aboundance of fruits; and that in Castille, and part of Portugall, the drought is not fit to bring forth corne: yet considering Spaine in generall, and the whole circuit, wee shall find daily by experience, that it is rich and plentifull of all those things, wherewith it was in old times furnished. For if at that time they did feed whole armies, so doe they at this day great and well peopled cities and townes, better frequented and inhabited than in those times.

Spaine fertile as
this day.

As for rich mettals, we must confesse, that it yeelds now to antiquitie, and no wonder, for how could the earth supplie the greedie couetousnesse of men, who haue not ceased for many yeares, and with great toyle to digge into the bowels of the earth? Wee see at this day the pits and caues, out of the which the Romanes drew their siluer, neere vnto Carthagen, with great heapes of drosse like vnto mountaines. But yet this countrey is not so bare and wasted, but that they haue found in our age, at Guadalcanal, a myne as rich as any at the Indies, which our elders doe witnesse: and there is no doubt, but that gold, siluer, and copper, are to be found in other places.

Iron and Steele
abounds there.

Biscaye and Guepuscoa alone can furnish yron and Steele ynough for a world, and with workes which are made of this mettall, namely with Armes, beeing the verie storehouse of Spaine. Vitriol, Brimstone, Alum, Orpiment, minerall salt, and such other things, are found in Spaine, both for their owne vse and their neighbours. What wanteth it of the fertilitie and diuersitie of all sorts of good fruits in a good part of Portugall, Andalusia, and almost all alongst the Mediterranean sea? But who can condemne

euen

A euen the montaines of this region, of barrennesse, which beare so good wines, and so many sorts of fruits?

To conclude, Fraunce, England, and Flanders, are familiar witnesse of the fruitfulness and delights of Spaine: and if they will not serue, wee will appeale to Asia it selfe. Their raisins, oliues, figges, oranges, limons, dates, cytrons, pomegranets, sugar, saffron, and such things, are dispersed into all countries, and are better, and more sauorie than in any other place.

In what place of the world doe you find more sorts of good hearbs, or more pleasant gardens, than in the prouince of Valence? From thence wee haue the best filkes in the world, cotton of Murcia, scarlet, crimfon, and other precious colours, with sweeter and pleasant perfumes. Finally, all the fences of man are wonderfully pleased with that which comes from thence, and growes in that happie region.

B And as for the hilly countrey, which they hold to be barren, and the plaines to be drie, euerie one knowes what commoditie those places doe yeeld: and wee find it by experience in Spaine. There they feed infinit troupes of sheepe, whose wooll is admired throughout the world: and yeeld vs also infinit store of Spanish leather, necessarie for many vses, and verie profitable for their neighbours.

C They haue timber to serue them as well for the building of houses, as for shipping, whereof they haue great store. And who can denie, that in Nauarre, Asturia, and Galicia, there are goodly and fruitfull vallies? Can wee desire a countrey more abounding in all good things, than that which is betwixt the riuers of Duero and Minio, at this time belonging vnto the Realme of Portugall? the which being scarce a day and a halfe journey in length, and much lesse in breadth, hath an Archbishopsricke, which is that of Braga, Porto Gallego, a bishopsricke, and containes in it aboute one thousand and foure hundred parishes, fise hundred Colledges of Canons, and one hundred and thirtie Conuents: it hath six ports of the sea, aboute two hundred bridges of stone, and two thousand and fise hundred fountaines.

D But who doth not admire the Genets of Spaine, which I had almost forgotten, their beaurie, swiftnesse, and easinesse to breake, especially of those of Andalusia, which drinke of the water of Guadalquivir, whereby, according to the Spaniards opinion, they are made more nimble and swift? Of this race was the horse which Iulius Caesar esteemed so much, as when hee was dead, hee caused his image to be set vp in Venus Temple at Rome. Of them and of the Lusitanians their neighbours, the auntients would make vs beleue, that they were conceiued by the winds which the mares did receiue when they were desirous of the horse, blowing from the West, namely from the places where the horses feed; the which some thinke not impossible. Of all these things no man that hath any knowledge of the world can doubt.

The horses of Spaine,
Mariscels
using by the wind.

E And if any one would object, That Spaine cannot bee so fertile as wee make it, for that they are supplied with corne from Fraunce, England, Sicile, and Germanie: and that they carrie great store of linnen cloth, and other merchandise, out of Brittain, Normandie, Flanders, Holland, and elsewhere, without the which the Spaniards must of necessitie perish: Let him consider the great regions discovered by the Spaniards, within these hundred and twentie yeares: what great fleets Spaine hath continually entertained, rigged, and victualed, as well for the East as Westerne voiaiges; and what need they haue to furnish those countries with such things as they borrow, whereof without doubt they should haue sufficient for themselves; but not to furnish a new world: the which doth also wast their men daily to people these discovered countries: And withall let him adde the haughtie and couetous disposition of the Spanish nation, who doe willingly leaue their labour, to goe vnto the mynes, or to goe to the warres, and neuer follow any worke, but when they are forced by necessitie.

The nature of
the Spaniards.

F Having hitherto discoursed of the situation and fertilitie of Spaine, let vs speake something of the manners and kind of life, which the Spaniards haue from time to time obserued, that being entred into our discourse, wee may not bee interrupted therewith. When as the Carthaginians came into Spaine, and long after the Romanes had got some footing,

D ij

footing, there were few walled townes in the countrey, but many great burroughes and villages. The most ciuile were they of the Betique prouince, and the worst souldiours of them all, giuing themselves to trade of merchandise by sea, and somewhat to letters, and in a manner like vnto those that liue vpon the coast of the Mediterranean sea. But as for the rest, they were all rustick and barbarous, namely the Mountainers, and aboue all the Gallicians, Asturians, and Cantabrians, whose ordinarie trade was to rob and steale, contemning labour, vntill that the Romanes taught them to liue more ciuilly and peaceably, ruining their forts and retreats. They were traitors, spies, and readie vpon all occasions to steale. They carried targuets two foot long, & a dagger at their sides, clothed in a doublet of linnen cloth stified and quilted: and these were their armes. For there were no cuirasses nor head-peeeces among them, but on their heads they carried high hats made of sinewes, and on their legges boots of haire, and in their hands many darts: some of them carried jaelins whereof the heads were of copper. They wore long haire like women. Their exercises were fencing and running both on foot and horsebacke, and their combates by troupes: They loued libertie aboue all things, which made the Romanes to see many examples of crueltie, euen in the weakest sex: for there were many mothers among the Cantabrians, which slue their own children, many daughters who for the like cause murdered their parents: so deere libertie was vnto this nation; to maintaine the which, and fearing they might be forced in any thing, they did vsually carrie poyson about them: and if they were surprised and made slaues, they fought by some notable villanie to giue their masters occasion to kill them. It was often scene, that when they were tyed to the crosse to be executed, they did sing for joy of their approaching death: but some haue shewed this resolution vpon good and commendable occasions, as to conceal the secrets of their masters and friends, or after they had reuenged their death, or the wrong which had bene done them.

Their religion was infamous, for they sacrificed humane creatures vnto their gods, euen their prisoners, cutting off their right hands, to offer them vp: Their Priests and Diuines tooke their conjectures from the intrals both of men and beasts; but aboue all they tooke their diuination from their countenances, when as they received the deadly blow, and fell to the ground.

As for their manner of living, it was simple and rude: they dranke water, lay vpon the ground, and did eat the flesh of goats which they did sacrifice vnto Mars: they made cakes of dried acornes, the which they did eat warme. They did willingly banquet with their parents, and had tables and seats of stone, against the wall, where they did appoint the most honourable places according to their ages and dignities. They had no vse of siluer coined, but did exchange ware for ware. They had a beaulty and filthie manner of washing and perfuming themselves, with vrine which had stood long stinking, with the which both men and women did rub their bodies and faces, yea euen their teeth, imagining that it was a preferuatiue against many infirmities; the which is not disallowed by the Physitians. This filthie obseruation was common then in Spaine among them all.

They did seuerely punish malefactors, and especially parricides, whom they did stone without their confines. If any one were sicke, they carried him into the highwayes, and corners of the streets, after the manner of the Egyptians, to take counsell and helpe of such as had bene troubled with the like diseases. Vntill the time of the Romane emperours, they had vied boats made of beasts skins; afterwards they began to make them of wood, taking the bodies of great trees, and making them hollow like vnto troughes.

In this simplicitie and rudenesse did the auncient Spaniards of the mountaines liue, which were those of Galicia, Asturia, and Cantabria, and the inhabitants of the Pyrenes, whose countrey was full of wood and water, but otherwise verie barren, by reason whereof they enjoyed their libertie long, and were last of all subdued by the Romanes; so as in the time of the emperour Tiberius Nero, there was yet some contention. The Iberians, and Celtiberians were somewhat more ciuile, for that they had more commerce with strangers, and were neere vnto the Mediterranean sea, which was more frequented than the Ocean. In the war they carried round targuets, fortified with sinewes, short swords, darts, and slings; in their battails they did mingle some light horsemen with their footmen: they did accustome their

The qualities of the mountain Spaniards.

Armes of the auncient Spaniards.

Libertie deere to the Spaniards.

The Spaniards religion infamous.

The Spaniards living simple and rude.

Their manner of iustice.

Their manner of boats.

Pauertie assures the peoples libertie.

The discipline of the Celtiberians.

G

H

I

K

L

M

A horses to hills and vallies, and by that meanes kept them in breath, and made them swift, yea they did teach them to kneele when they made a certaine signe. They attired themselves of blacke wooll and short. They prepared yron to forge their armes and harnais, druiuing it out into plates, the which they buried in the ground for certaine dayes, vntill the rust had eaten away that which was vnprofitable, & then they made their swords and other cutting weapons. They did commonly carie two swords, and did fight more willingly on foot than on horsebacke: for when as they found themselves to haue any aduantage vpon the enemy, they left their horses, to ioynewith their footmen, pursuing them that fled with great agilitie, the which was naturall to all Spaniards. They were reasonably courteous to strangers; but they did punish them that had done them any wrong verie cruelly. They did liue of flesh and fruits, and did drinke water with honic, whereof their countrey did abound; and sometimes they had wine, which they bought from strangers comming from the neighbour coasts. Their neighbours with whom they had the greatest amitie and commerce, were the Vacces, and Arcuaces, at that time a part of Castillia the old: they agreed well with them in all sorts of traffique. Euerie yeare they made a diuision of their lands, and assigned them by portions and lots to certaine particular persons, who did till and sow for the rest, whilest that others were employed in the warres, or about some other affaires: then they diuided the fruits which they gathered. And if any one were conuicted, that he had embeslised any thing, he was punished with death. In time of peace they did banquet and daunce, leaping and frisking with great agilitie: and they went to the warre according to the measure of instruments, singing rusticke and militarie songs.

Such in a manner were the Lusitanians, with whom the Celtes were mingled, and feared in their countrey, leading their liues for the most part as theues, which they learned from them of Galicia and Asturia, their neighbours. Generally all the most barbarous Spaniards were nimble and actiue, so as they could easily escape from their enemies, or pursue them when they had the better; neither were their spirits lesse actiue than their bodies: great vndertakers: of few words: patient and hardie in trauell, enduring hunger, thirst, and other discommodities. Their women were nothing daintie, but did exercise themselves like vnto the men; and if they were deliuered of child, they lay not long, but fell soone to their worke: they wash their children as soone as they were borne in the neereft brooke, and then they wrapt them vp in their swathing clothes. But after that the Romans were entred, and somewhat settled in Spain, these people were forced by litle and litle to learne another discipline, and to frame themselves to a more ciuile kind of life, being gouerned by more politike lawes, they of Betica and the Turditanes exceeding the rest alwaies in mildnesse and humanitie: for these were presently changed to the Romans manners and discipline, forgetting their owne language, to imbrace the other. Many townes were also built and peopled in diuers parts of Spaine, and the Romans and Latines mixt with the Originaries of the countrey, who accustomed themselves so well to the Latine tongue, as it since continued in Spaine: for the Castillian tongue at this day is nothing in a manner but a corrupted Latine. And the Spaniards grew such, as many among them did make their fame equall with the most esteemed among the Romans: the two Senecas were Spaniards, with Silius, Martial, Lucan, Pomponius Mela, Portius Latro the Orator, Quintillian, Columella, and the good emperors Traian and Theodosius, were Spaniards.

The Romans by the experience which they had, and the more to augment their owne glorie, giue great titles of honor and commendation to this nation, whom they found somewhat instructed in armes, and some discipline, by the Carthaginians. They call it rich in souldiours, and a seminary of the enemies armies, which had fashioned that great captain Hannibal, and in all they speak highly of Spaine, & not without reason: for the great courage and resolution of them of Numantia, was memorable, a towne without walls, without towers, and without defences, seated only vpon a litle hill, and couered on the one side with a riuer, and defended by a few souldiours, who notwithstanding withstood the force of mightie Roman armies for the space of 14 yeres, & not only made head against them, but also repulst them off to their great losse. In the end being besieged by aboue 40000 men, or, as some say, 60000, being prest by famine, and forced to demaund a peace, finding no grace with their enemies, who had compassed them in with forts and trenches, being resolved vpon the last refuge, which was death, they made

D iij

Preparation for warre.

Manners of the Spaniards in general.

The women haile men.

The tractableness of the Spaniards of Andalusia.

The Spanish tongue a corrupted Latine.

Great personages Spaniards.

The magnanimie of the Numantians.

made so furious a fallie vpon the Romanes, as an infinit number of them were slaine vpon the place, which was a deere purchase vnto the enimie. This happened during the Celtiberique warre, which continued twentie yeares. This magnanimitie, courage, adresse and militarie discipline, were thus begun, and by little and little augmented in this nation by the Carthaginians and Romanes, in making warre against them: whom without doubt they might haue bin able to haue resisted, if they had knowne their owne force and wealth, and if they had sooner learned good lawes and policie, which maintaine people in amitie and concord. This was the first prouince which the Romanes did assaile vpon the firme land, and the last which they subdued. The strength of Pompeys armie when he encountered Cesar in Macedonia, were the Spanish bands, which were in his armie, if he could haue vsed them.

Faith and constancie in the end tooke place among this nation, whereof Hannibal had often made triall. But what example can we find more memorable, than the fidelitie of the Saguntines to the people of Rome, for the which they lost wiues, children, citie, and liues?

By little and little they also left that diuelish superstition of sacrificing of men, accustoming themselues to more mildnesse and humanitie, and practising daily better discipline vnder the Romans commaund; as if God would reforme them by their meanes, and prepare them to receiue the true and wholesome doctrine of Iesus Christ: the which this nation did embrace happily in the beginning, with great fruit and notable examples in the Church of God. But after that the barbarous nations were disperfed ouer all Europe, hauing troden vnder foot the Majestie of the Romane empire, and inuaded the chiefe prouinces thereof, chased away all learning, and good discipline, and infected the earth with heresies and superstitious ceremonies, the ignorance of God and of his seruice, entred into Spaine, which our age doth yet fee. Then was a time when as they kept publike schooles of Magicke arts and conjuring, to the which they had made subiect Philosophie, Astrologie, Phisicke, yea and Diuinitie it selfe.

But leauing these things which belong to other discourses, let vs say, That the Spaniards in those dayes were of diuers conuersations, as they were a mixture of diuers nations. They are apt to receiue discipline in all things, according to the disposition of princes and lords, whom they serue, they are faithfull and constant vnto them, desiring to be in perpetuall action, by reason of the agitation of their spirits, which is like vnto the agilitie of their bodies, who for the most part are leane and drie. They are sober and vigilant, but verie couetous, patient of heat, cold, hunger, thirst, and all other discommodities, especially if there be any hope of profit or honour, for the which they hazard themselues resolutely to all dangers: they desire to bee well apparelled, and esteeme armes and horses aboue all things: they are impudent braggers of their owne actions, vertue, and nobilitie: ciuile to conuerse withall, louing good townes, copious in their language, much giuen to women; for the most part vnlearned, shewing little art in that they do, disdaining labour, & a country life. The women are sober, louing their husbands or their friends deere, but wonderfull delicat, and curious of painting and perfumes, retaining therein nothing of the auncient Spaniards: they nor their children drinke nor any wine. The countrey language at this day, is for the most part Roman or Latine corrupted and mingled with some other words of such nations as haue held it in these last ages. The Biscane tongue is preserved in Biscaye, and part of Nauarre, and other their neighbours: but in Granada, Andalusia, Murcia, and Valence, especially among the rusticke multitude, the Moorish and the Arabian tongue is in great vse: and in all ages almost, the people of Spaine haue vsed diuers languages, and were different one from another. Making an end of this booke, we will relate in the following, by what meanes and titles euerie nation hath from time to time held it.

THE

Ignorance makes people subiect.

The true religion received with great affliction
by the Spaniards

Damnable arts
in Spaine.

Manners of the Spaniards in these times.

Language in vse among the Spaniards
at this day.

B THE SECOND BOOKE OF the Historie of Spaine.

The Contents.

- A 1 The reasons which moued the Carthaginians and Romanes to invade Spaine vpon the West and South parts, lying vpon the sea.
- C 2 The Island of Ebusus or Iuisa first conquered by the Carthaginians.
- 3 Spaine exposed to the spoyle in the first Punicke warre.
- 4 Sagunte taken by Hannibal, which was the occasion of the second Punicke warre, and of the settling of the Romanes Empire in Spaine.
- 5 Hannibals passage into Italie.
- 6 Cn. Scipio in Spaine, and his gouernment.
- 7 P. Scipio goes into Spaine: the war of the two brethren against Asdrubal Barcinien, and others.
- 8 Separation of the two armies, of P. and Cn. Scipios, whereof followed their defeat and death.
- 9 The Romanes Estate reuiued in Spaine by the vertue of Lucius Martius.
- 10 Discourse of the doubtfull euents of warre.
- D 11 C. Nero sent from Rome into Spaine, circumvented by Asdrubal.
- 12 P. Corn. Scipio comes into Spaine as Pro-consul, his manners and vertues.
- 13 The taking of new Carthage, the store-house for the Carthaginians in Spaine.
- 14 Scipio his acts after the taking of new Carthage: his iustice, religion, discipline, and gouernment: his temperance, liberalitie, and policie towards the Spaniards: care, preparation and prouision for the warre.
- 15 Reuolt of many Noblemen and Townes of Spaine.
- 16 Asdrubal defeated at Becula, a Towne and Riuer, with other things done by Scipio.
- 17 Asdrubal Barcinien passeth into Italie, and abandons Spaine. M. Sillanus exploits against the other Carthaginian captaines.
- E 18 The exploits of L. Scipio, brother to the Pro-consull.
- 19 Other acts done by the Pro-consull Scipio: the last attempts of the Carthaginians in Spaine, and the retreat of Asdrubal, sonne to Gilgo.
- 20 Practises with Masinissa Prince of Numidia. P. Scipio the Pro-consull passeth into Africke, to stirre up enemies against the Carthaginians in their owne country.
- 21 The taking and punishing of the townes of Illiturgis and Castulo, which had bene treacherous to the Romanes.
- 22 Diuers Playes, Shewes, and Sacrifices made at Carthage the new by P. Scipio, in honor of P. and Cn. Scipio his father and uncle.
- 23 Exploits of L. Martius, and the miserable end of the Asapeens.
- F 24 Reuolt of Indibilis and Mandonius captaines, and of the Roman souldiors wintering neere vnto the riuer of Sucro, and of their punishment.
- 25 Masiniissa wooen by the Romanes.
- 26 Departure of Mago Barcin out of Spaine: his fruitlesse enterprize against new Carthage: his crueltie against the Gaditanes: their reuolt vnto the Romanes: Mago his passage into Italie.
- 27 P. Cornelius Scipio his returne to Rome, hauing gotten an absolute victorie of the Carthaginians in Spaine.

Some

The Tyrians of the race of slaves

The Gaditanes
call the Carthaginians into Spaine.

Carthaginians
desire more to be great than soft.

Some ages before the first warre betwixt the Romanes and the Carthaginians, which grew by reason of the Isle of Sicile, the Gaditanes extracted from the citie of Tyr, couetous and malicious according to the nature of slaves, from whence it may be they were issued (for we read, that the bondmen of the Tyrians on a time slew all their masters, and made themselves Lords of the towne; the which they held vntill Alexander the Great, who did root out the race of them) began to torment the Spaniards their neighbours, chasing them out of their lands and possessions, making them slaves, and entreating them in the vilest manner they could; which was the cause of great warre and diuision in that quarter of Spaine: so as injuries on either part encreasing daily, the naturall borne disdain of these strangers, and enuying their greatnesse, made a generall league of many Communalities against them: whereupon they of Gades finding themselves too weake to make head against so great a multitude, they resolved to call in to their succour, and to the spoyle of Spaine, the Carthaginians of Africke, their brethren, coming from the same race and towne. The citie of Carthage was then a great Commonweale, the which had a great iurisdiction among the Africanes, and fought onely to enlarge their Empire; so as they were readie to run into Spaine, with this honest and religious pretext, to succour the oppressed: whereas they not onely freed the Gaditanes from all feare of the Spaniards, but did also subdue the people of Spaine, sedled themselves there, and gouerned it as their Prouince: from whence they drew afterwards so great treasure and other commodities, as they presumed to assaile the greatest Potentates in the world.

The name of Spaniards, before this warre, had beene great among other nations, onely in regard that they serued as a prey to all strangers: which were they only which held the lower country, and the coast of the Mediterranean sea, and part of the Ocean, South and West: among the which, some nations of Europe and Asia had built and peopled some townes. As for those which liued in the heart of the countrey, and in the mountains, their fame was more obscure, being for the most part rough and barbarous, hauing scarce any commerce with strangers, but to rob and steale, which was their best practise: and therefore vntill the coming of the Carthaginians, they had beene as it were free, and assured both from inuasion and trade, doing wrong rather than taking any: but afterwards they did all in generall leame to manage armes with discipline, they vnderooke parties, contracted alliances among themselves, and with other nations, growing by little and little more politicke, ciuile, and courteous. The Celtes were already mingled with the Iberians about the riuer of Ebro; and passing on, they obtained lands and habitations in Lusitania, and in a corner of Betica, which was neere vnto them: then passing the riuer of Duero, they planted themselves betwixt it and Minio; and consequently to the mountains, in the countrey, which from them tooke the name of Galicia, and doth still hold it; whereas they built the towne of Porto, vpon the confines of the Lusitanians, which is at this time a Bishopricke, retaining the name of Portugall, and so goes on to the Westerne sea.

The Celtes, Iberians, and other Spaniards farre from the sea, as they were almost like in manners, had (as is sayd) maintained their reputation free and vnited, vntill this descent of the Carthaginians: who hauing resolved to settle themselves in Spaine, seized first vpon the Island of Iuifa, and fortified it, Mase being Generall of this Armie. This was five hundred sixtie two yeares before the coming of Christ, and an hundred eightie nine yeares after the foundation of Rome. After which time, watching their opportunitie, eight and fortie yeares after, they sent a great fleet of shippes into Spaine, led by one Mabibal, vnder colour to relieue the Gaditanes, who had beene vanquished by Bautius Capis, then reigning ouer the Turditanians, their neighbours. The name of the protection and support of this puissant Commonweale of Carthage, purchased the Gaditanes a peace and free trade; the which drew so manie families from Carthage into the Island and Citie, as exceeding the rest, they got the absolute commaund thereof, Mabibal yet liuing.

The Carthaginians continued for a time without any care of the affaires of Spaine, beeing very much afflicted with drought and other discommodities, they hauing great warre

Mase the first Generall of the Carthaginian
armie in Spaine
562 yeares before Christ.

A warre in Sicile and Sardinia, but about the yeare 255 they vnderooke againe the conquest of Spaine, whither they sent Asdrubal and Amilcar, sonnes to Mago. Passing by Sardinia, Asdrubal was slaine there, leauing three children, Hannibal the eldest, Asdrubal, and Psappho. Amilcar was diuerted from Spaine by the warres of Sicile, where he was also slaine, and had three sonnes in like manner, Himilco, Hanno, and Gisgo. The yeare 272 after the foundation of Rome, they sent a small supplie of nine hundred souldiors into Spaine, whom they would haue land in the Islands of the Baleares; but they were repulled: and soon after Psappho, sonne to Asdrubal, had charge to keepe the Spaniards in awe (who were solicited by the Africane Moores their neighbours, to joyne with them against the Carthaginians) who by his wife-dome restrained them; and moreouer, got sufficient forces from them to force the Moores to sue for peace, and to giue ouer their enterprises against the citie of Carthage. In this warre the vertue of Sarac of Barce (a towne neere vnto Carthage) author of the Barcinian faction, was very famous. Psappho liued in great reputation, who after his death was by opinion receiued into the number of the gods; the which he had procured during his life. For he had caused certaine birds to be taught to speake, and made them leame to say, That Psappho was a great god. Which birds being let flye, they chattered out those words in the fields, to the great admiration of the people. After his decease the Prouince of Spaine was committed to Himilco and Hanno (the sonnes of Amilcar) his cousins, who tried by faire and plausible means to draw the inhabitants of the Baleares to liue in amitie with their Commonweale.

C Hanno being arriued at Gades, and desiring to discouer the country, and the coast of Spaine without the strait, he sayled vnto the holy Promontorie, or Cap S. Vincent: and hauing giuen aduice vnto the Senat of that which he had seene and vnderstood, he obtained leaue to continue his discouerie as well vpon the coast of Spaine, as Africke, in the Ocean sea: whereupon he prepared two fleets; the one for the coast of Europe, and to passe vnto the Gaules, and farther if he might; the charge whereof he gaue vnto his brother Himilco, and of the other he would be captaine and conductor himselfe, and sayle towards Africke: so in the beginning of the yeare 307 of the foundation of Rome they set sayle, either of them taking his course. Himilco parting from the port of Heraclee, which was in the strait, coasted the Mesenians and Selbitians, passed the Promontorie of Iuno, and the mouth of the riuer Cylibis, which runneth betwixt Barbarie and Huelua, neere vnto the which in old time was the Island of Erythrea, which is not to be seene at this day, vnlesse it be that of Gades it selfe: and then he discouered the Tartessian forrests, and did see the Turditanes coast, whereas the riuer Betis fell into the sea at that time by foure mouthes, afterwards reduced to two, but now there is but one. Passing on, there came into his sight Mont Cassius, rich in veines of Tynne, from whence it is likely it tooke his name: beyond the which, the riuer, which they now call Tinte, (whose water is excellent good to dye blacke) falls into the sea, neere vnto Palos of Moguer. This riuer was in old time called Iberus, as that which passeth and looeth it selfe at Tarracone. From thence Himilco passed neere vnto Proserpinas Temple, built vpon a point which runneth farre into the sea; vnto which place come the Marian hills: and a little more forward riseth Mont Zephirus, whose top is alwaies hidden in the clouds: about the which for a good distance the shoare is full of rockes vnto Mont Saturne, the which is among the Cenits, by the which the riuer Anas or Guadiana doth run; at the mouth whereof were two Islands, whereof the greatest was called Agone. Passing on by a long course towards the holy Promontorie, and hauing doubled it, this Carthaginian armie came to the port of Cenit, neere vnto the Islands which they now call Perfequeres. Not farre from thence dwelt the Dragans, a people of Lusitania, compassed in by the mountaines Cephis and Sempis, right against the Islands of Stremnie, the which stands farre into the sea: but neerer vnto these Dragans was another Island called Acala, about the which the waters were blew and wonderfull cleere, but very stinking, whereof there are at this day no markes. Aboue Alcala was the mountaine Cyprilian. Himilco hauing sayled along the coast, hee discouered the Island Pelagic, full of greene trees, the which he durst not touch, being consecrated to Saturne, hearing, that if any saylers would land there, the sea was troubled. The shoare which goes vnto the mouth of Tayo was inhabited by the Saries, a cruell and a barbarous people, whose Promontorie was for that cause called Barbarelique. There notwithstanding was planted the Greeke Colonie Olysspo, which is Lisbone at this day. These Nauigators came to the Promontorie Nerium, which which is Finis terræ, and to the neighbour Islands called also Stremnies, for that the inhabitants of the Island of Stremnie about mentioned, being forced to leaue it for the multitude of Serpents which were there, they retired into these Islands. There is no further mention made of Himilcos nauigation.

Hanno's voyage upon the coast of Africke.

As for Hanno, he made a longer voyage: his armie consisted of many vessels, carrying about thirtie thousand persons of both sexes: hee planted a Colonie vpon the sea coast of Africke (the which is now Azamor) the which he called Thimateria: he passed on beyond the foot of Mont Atlas, towards Numidia and Lybia: he discovered the fortunat Islands, which are the Canaries, and those of Cap Verd, which is the point of the Hesperides; the Island of Argin, in old time Cerne; and the Gorgones, so named by him; the mouths of the great riuier Niger, the which hath Crocodiles in it, and sea horses as well as Nil, vntill he came vnto the Island named at this day S. Thome, vnder the Equinoctiall. Some say, that hee doubled the point of Africke, or Cap bonne Esperance, and passed as farre as the Arabicke sea, and from thence returned to Carthage by Egypt, reporting, That he had seene men all couered with haire; which it may be were Apes, for there are very great and dangerous ones in some part of Africke; and other wonders. He returned to Carthage five yeares after his departure.

It was in the yeare 312 of the foundation of Rome, when these two capitaines vndertooke their voyages; Gifgo their brother gouerned Spaine in their absence: and thinking to returne to Carthage, to be partaker of the feasts and joy which were made in regard of their prosperous voyages, he perished with all his ships at sea.

Hannibal sent into Spaine.

Hannibal brother to Pappho, and cousin to these, surnamed the ancient, was sent into Spaine, and with him Mago his kinsman. Mago stayed at the Baleares, and he passed to Calis: and some hold, that he built a fort at the place which is called Lagos, the which was named Port Hannibal: there was also built in his time, at the mouth of the riuier of Betis, Lucifers Temple, dedicated to the goddesse Venus, whose starre was called Phosphoros, or Lucifer: it is S. Lucar of Barraneda at this present. During their time and gouernment there grew great warre betwixt the Spaniards of Betica and the Lusitanians, dwelling by the riuier Anas, the which was nourished by the Carthaginians and their capitaines Hannibal and Mago.

Warre in Sicile by the Carthaginians.

The Commonweale of Carthage had then great warres in the Island of Sicile, kindled about the yeare 346 of the foundation of Rome, by the Agrigentines, who did murder the Carthaginian garrisons, being busie at their sacrifices: wherefore by decree of the Senat there were leuies of men made in Spaine, and in the Islands of the Baleares. But the Agrigentines were defeated in battaile, and then besieged for the space of two yeares, who in the end were forced to yeeld to their mercie, who entreated them very roughly: whereupon they had recourse vnto Denis the old, by whose aduice they freed themselves of those that did oppresse them, and tooke from the Carthaginians the townes of Camerine and Gele. Denis although he dissembled, seeming to be a neuter, found himselfe so ingaged, as he was forced to take armes against the Carthaginians, by whom hee was vanquished, but with great losse of their men: the rest of the Carthaginian armie, where Himilco was, had the leading of tenne thousand Spaniards, was consumed by the plague: whereat Himilco was so grieved, as being returned to Carthage, refusing to see either children or friends, he slew himselfe in his house. After these ruins, by the industrie of Denis a peace was concluded betwixt the Carthaginians & the Sicilians, or rather a truce for 30 yeares. This was in the yere 356 of the foundation of Rome.

About that time some ships of Carthage, dispersed by tempest, or else of set purpose following Hannos discovery, or imitating his designs, came vnto a great Island, which we may thinke to be that of S. Dominique at this day: which made them of Carthage to affect these voyages with such vehemencie, as to diuert them, the Senat resolved to cause them to be slaine which were returned, and had brought the newes, fearing least their citie and countrey should be vnpeopled.

New warres in Sicile.

The truce being expired, the Carthaginians prepared againe to warre in Sicile; during the which truce, they had aduanced their authoritie and credit among the Spaniards, entreaining diuisions among them, and taking parties: so as they had means at one time to bring to the warres of Sicile 20000 foot and 1000 horse of that nation, making them by this means weak against their own designs: to which forces they added 300 Majorquins, which vsed slings, and 10000 Africanes, making Hanno chiefe of this armie, who should suddenly invade the Island, whilst

A whilst that Denis made warre in Italie. But Sumiat a Carthaginian enuying Hannos charge, aduertised Denis of this preparation; and as he continued in this trecherie, he was discovered by the taking of a ship in the strait by them of Carthage, in the which were found his letters and aduertisements to Denis, written in Greeke; whereupon he was taken and punished: and it was decreed at Carthage, That no Carthaginian should learne the Greeke tongue: but Denis his armie at sea was defeated, whereby the Carthaginians affaires prospered in Sicile.

Denis being dead, and his sonne of the same name succeeding him, vnder the gouernment of Dion his kinsman, the warre ended by a long truce betwixt the Carthaginians & Sicilians, and Hanno returned with great treasure which he had gotté of those spoiles. He was presently sent

Truce with the Sicilians.

B to Calis, and Bostar to Majorca, and to that part of Spaine which is opposit: Hanno tyrannizing ouer the people in his gouernment, prouoked them to rebell; so as to subdue & punish them, he called the Moores into Spaine, who afflicted them cruelly. The complaints being come vnto Carthage, Hanno was called home and discharged of his gouernment, who in disdain thereof attempted to poyson the whole Senat in a banquet which he prepared for his daughters marriage. This trecherie being discovered and dissembled, they presently made Sumptruarie law, limiting the number of persons, and the sorts of meats at such feasts. But hauing escaped punishment, yet fearing it, he sought notwithstanding to trie his force, with a multitude of slaues which he, his kinsmen, and friends had: wherewith the people being incensed, they besieged him, & tooke him in his house, and then deliuered him to the Iudges; by whose decree his eies were put out, his lims broken, his body torne with whips, and then hung vpon a crosse: his children and all his kinsfolkes were also put to death, that they should haue no desire of reuenge.

Hannos trecherie against the Senat of Carthage.

C A cruell example, but excusable in the Africans, for the foulness of the offence and the interest of their countrey. The Carthaginians affecting much the conquest of Spaine, pursued it without any disturbance, sending good Gouernors and wise captains: wherein they prospered daily in such sort, as they might terme themselves masters thereof, and so did enjoy it for about 350 yeares, all the people of Spaine being their subjects or allies; vntill that the Romanes began to make some practises, seeking to draw the people vnto them, and to be assured of them, when any occasion should be offered. So either of these Commonweales made way for their great designs, yet not entering into any ouert action: but the Island of Sicile assailed by the

The Carthaginians continue in the conquest of Spaine.

The Romanes seek to get footing in Spaine by emulation.

D Carthaginians, and especially the towne of Messina, did so engage them, as it could not be appeased but with the ruine of the one party. For the space of 115 yeares there was either open war, preparations for war, or a counterfeit peace betwixt the Romanes and the Carthaginians. They entred into this hostilitie 489 yeares after the foundation of Rome, and about 262 yeares before Christ. This first warre was decided in Sicile, and in the Mediterranean sea, during 24 yeares; in which time the people of Spaine did adhere sometimes to one partie, sometimes to another, as their affaires succeeded: the Carthaginians being in the end forced to demand a peace of the Romanes, the rest of their hatred and spleen continued yet in Spaine for a time: for those which had rebelled against the Carthaginians, sought to maintaine their liberties by the fauour of the Romanes, who encouraged and assisted them vnder hand: yet Amilcar, surnamed

Messina the cause of the first Punick warres.

E Barca, father to Hannibal, being appointed Gouernor and Lieutenant generall for the Carthaginians in Spaine, subjected vnder their obedience almost all the nations and townes which had beene distracted, and did shake the allies of the contrarie faction. He was an irreconcilable enemy to the Romanes, and would that his sonne Hannibal should succeed him in the like affection, and (as we say) should sucke it from his mothers breasts; binding him thereunto in his youth by othes and religious ceremonies. For as he prepared to passe into Spaine with the armie, offering the accustomed sacrifices vnto their gods, to haue a prosperous voiage, he caused his sonne Hannibal (being then scarce nine yeares old) to approach vnto the altar, and hauing commaunded him to lay his hand vpon the sacrifice, he made him sweare, That as soone as he should be able to beare armes, he should employ them to annoy the Romanes, and declare himselfe their enemy. Whilst that Amilcar relies too much on his good fortune, and pursues the rebels in Spaine inconsiderately, he was slaine, hauing done great exploits in nine yeares space. They attribute the restoring and enlarging of Barcelona vnto him, and according vnto some, the naming of it.

Spain nourisheth the hatred betwixt the Romanes and Carthaginians.

Private passion in Amilcar was the ruine of his countrey.

Amilcar slaine by the Spaniards.

Adruba his sonne in law succeeded him, a wife and a valiant man, vnder whom Hannibal learned his first precepts of warre. And as the troubles did not onely continue, but also encrease

The Carthaginians tyrannic advanced the Romans credit in Spaine.

A new accord betwixt the Ro-manes and Carthaginians.

The great resolution of a seruant loving his master.

Factions in the Senat at Carthage.

The ambitious
envie all men.

Hanniball made Governour of Spaine.

His disposition and vertues.

His vices.

increase in Spaine, new rebellions growing daily, by reason of the Carthaginians crueltie and tyrannie, the Romanes were sollicit by many to take them into their protection, whereunto they did willingly giue care. Whereupon these two Commonweales were vpon tearmes to enter into a more cruell warre than euer: to auoid the which, it was aduised by the Senate of Rome to send Quintus Lutatius into Spaine, to treat with the Carthaginians, and to settle some good course for the affaires of that countrey. So as betwixt Lutatius for the Romans, and Asdrubal for the Carthaginians, there was a peace renewed and confirmed betwixt those two Estates, and the friends and allies of either part in Spaine; appointing the riuer of Ebro for a limit and barre betwixt them, beyond the which they might not lead any armie. And for that the towne of Saguntum being then rich and populous, held them long in debate, either desiring to haue it on his faction, in the end (not able to agree) it was concluded, That it should remaine neuter, vfe her owne lawes, and be maintained in her libertie, and that neither partie should attempt any thing to the preiudice thereof.

The Estate of Spaine being thus ordered, the peace (which was not well assured betwixt the Romanes and Carthaginians) continued three and twentie yeres, or thereabouts, accounting from the day that it was concluded in Sicile. Asdrubal gouerned Spaine beyond Ebro eight yeres, and aduanced the affaires of his Commonweale more by mildnesse than by armes; whom they make the founder of new Carthage: but returning to a rigorous course, his crueltie incited a Gaule, who serued him, to murder him, reuenging the death of a Lord of Lusitania his master, whom Asdrubal had caused to be slain, whose head he caused to be carried through the countrey vpon a lance, after that he had hanged the bodie vpon a crosse. This seruant being taken, died in the extremitie of his torments, singing and laughing for joy that he had done the deed.

4 Before the death of Asdrubal it was propounded in the Senat of Carthage, If it were expedient to send Hannibal into Spaine, vnder the discipline of his brother in law, who demaunded him? Among the Senators there was one of great esteeme, called Hanno, being of a contrarie faction to the familie of the Barciniens, which also was great and rich, either hauing their partisans. These pleaded vehemently, letting the Senat vnderstand on the one side, that Hannibal was bred vp in armes, and by that meanes did imitate his fathers vertues: the others to hinder this resolution, feared least the hatred which Hannibal bare vnto the Romans, and whereof he made publicke profession, would ingage and draw their Commonweale into new troubles and calamities: For although the Carthaginians were exceeding ambitious, and in that regard enemies to all mankind, yet did they feare the magnanimitie and constancie of the Romanes, and their valour, which they had tried. Besides, the forepassed warres as well against them, as against others, yea, against their owne mercinarie souldiours, had wasted their treasure, vn furnisht them of ships, and consumed their best captaines; so as it behoued them to liue many yeres in peace, before they vnderooke any difficult warre. But their miserie, and that of Italie, would haue the Barciniens preuaile; and so Hannibal was sent into Spaine to his brother in law Asdrubal, vnder whom he liued some three yeres: after whose decease, he was demaunded for head and Generall by the men of warre, and by their fauour obtained of the Senat and people of Carthage the gouernment of Spaine, being then about two and twentie yeres old. There was not in any age a more remarkable man than this, as well for his great vertues as vices: for he was of a generous spirit for great attempts, and inuincible in all dangers: bloudie combates were his delights, neither did he want judgement nor counsell: in the warre few men had better practised the knowledge how to obey, and how to command, than he: he was neuer tyred with any toyle: he endured heat and cold indifferently: he gouerned his feeding as nature required: he hated rest, and slept onely when hee found himselfe idle, not vpon a soft and delicate bed, but most commonly vpon the ground, in a Corps de guard, among the souldiours: he was not curious in his habits, but delighted much in faire Armes and good horses; being alwayes the first in fight, and the last at a retreat. So many vertues had for companions in the same subiect, a brutish crueltie, damnable infidelitie, sacriledge, and contempt of all religion. When as he found himselfe possessed of these forces, he sought all meanes to breake the peace with the Romanes; propounding within himselfe, not onely to chafe them out of Spaine, but also to assaile them in Italie within their owne strength, and in the very seat of their Empire. He began to make warre against the Ol-cades,

A cades, a people beyond the riuer of Ebro, who were in good termes with the Carthaginians, but not their subjects, and tooke Althee their chiefe towne, and sackt it; the which did very much terrifie their neighbours. Then he quarrelled with the Vaccees, sometimes pretending a right, as being subiect to the iurisdiction of Carthage; sometimes doing them iniurie, or pretending that he had receiued some wrong from them, hee so prouoked them, as among many acts of hostilitie, after the taking of Hermandica and Arbocala, townes of the Vaccees, and a great defeat which he gaue vnto the Carpetanians and the rest of the Olcades and Vaccees, and in the end the conquest of all those Prouinces, he came vnto that which he had propounded vnto himselfe; which was, to besiege Sagunt. The complaints of his excesse came daily to Rome; yet the Senat being busied with the warres of Gaule, and against the Illyrians, were not much moued, vntill that the Saguntines seeing a siege comming before their towne, quickened the Romanes by their embassadours, letting them vnderstand, That if they made any account of Spaine, it was now high time to oppose themselues against the violence of Hannibal; who hauing broken their treaties and accords in a thousand sorts, might be at that instant about their walls with an hundred and fiftie thousand fighting men. This did moue the Senat of Rome not to neglect their allies, and to apprehend the dangers which did threaten themselues, if they suffered the Carthaginians their enemies to prosper. Wherefore they sent two embassadours to Carthage, which were, Publius Valerius Flaccus, and Quintus Bebius Tanophilus, with charge to passe to Hannibal, and to summon him to retire, and to leaue their allies in peace; otherwise to let both him and the citie of Carthage vnderstand, that they would not endure the wrongs and injuries which had beene done them. But Sagunt was besieged vnder colour of some controuersies and quarrels which they had with their neighbours. Hannibal being entred into their territorie, abandoned it to the spoyle of the souldiours, and then assailed the towne in three places. There was one part plainer and more accessible than the rest, where he intended to begin his batterie: but hauing made his approaches with great toyle and difficultie, the successe was not answerable to his designe: for there hee found a strong tower, and the wall rayfed higher; besides, the place where there was most danger was manned with their most valiant souldiours; who at the first repulsed their enemies with their arrowes: but in the end not contented to shoot from their towers and defences, they made sallies, and came to fight with them hand to hand: in which skirmishes there was no great aduantage on either side. Hannibal himselfe approaching too venturously neere the wals, was wounded with a iaueline in the thigh, and ouerthrowne; the which did much amaze them that were about him, so as they fled; and it did so trouble the rest, as they abandoned all their workes. Then had the Saguntines some leysure to breath, and the towne was for a time rather besieged than assaulted, whilest that Hannibal was vnder cure; yet they ceased not to make all sorts of engines to batter the towne: the which was done afterwards, and more violently than before, and in so many places, as the besieged were scarce able to make their defence: and there were three towers with their courtines betwixt them alreadie ruined, so as the towne was discovered, and seemed to lye open; which made both assaiylants and defendants to run thither: where they did fight with such obstinacie, in an open champaine, animated by two seuerall passions, the one hauing hope to vanquish, and the other no hope of merie in their enemies. In the end, the Carthaginians were forced to retire; and soone after the Romane embassadours arriued in the rode of Saguntum: but Hannibal would not heare them, but let them vnderstand, That a man busied with so many affaires as he was, could not spend his time in words, and that he saw no great safetie for them, if they landed among so many souldiours, of diuers barbarous nations: Whereupon they passed into Africke, and hauing deliuered their charge vnto the Senat of Carthage, and demaunded in vaine, That Hannibal (the author of the warre) should be deliuered vnto them, after many protestations, they returned with bare words: For after much contention among the factions in the Councell of Carthage (whereas Hannibal had manie kinsmen and friends) answer was made vnto the embassadours, That the warre had beene begun by the Saguntines, and that the Senat and people of Rome should not embrace their quarrell against the Carthaginians, with whom they had liued in peace and amitie for so many yeres.

E

Whilest

A friend doth not often flure
for his friends
harme, vntill himselfe be interessed.

Sagunt besieged.

Hannibal wounded.

Hope & despaire breed like effects
at this siege.

The simplicitie
of the Romans,

Whilest the Romans were thus busied to resolute and to send embassadours, Hannibal pursues his siege, and preffeth Sagunt by all means possible: He builds new engines, animates his souldiours, and promifeth them the spoile of a rich towne: the Saguntines rampar vp their breaches, and labour day and night: the batterie begins afresh, and they haue many assaults giuen, and with greater furie than before. In the end, being tyred with the multitude of assaillants, who had fresh supplies continually, they could not keepe the Carthaginians from entering by their breaches, their walls being newly repaired with earth, after their accustomed manner, and therefore easie to pierce: so as they seized vpon an high place within the precinct of the towne, whereas they planted many of their great crosse-bowes and artillerie after their manner, and casting a wall about it, they made as it were a citadell; against the which the Saguntines did presently make a trench, diuiding it from the rest of the towne, which was not yet taken. And as it happened diuers times, that the one getting the other, must needs retyre, the towne was reduced to a small compasse, and withall they had great want of victuals, and of all other necessities, by reason of the long siege, Hannibal was then forced to march into Oretania and Carpetania, where there was some likelihood of a tumult, for that those which he had sent to enroll souldiours, were retained by them of the countrey, by reason of the great rigour which they vsed. As his absence from the campe gaue some rest vnto the Saguntines, so his coming among those people caused peace, and reduced them to obedience. In the meane time Maharbal, sonne to Himilco, who had the charge to continue the siege, vsed such diligence, as there was no shew of Hannibals absence. To conclude, hee wrought so well, as at his returne he shewed him large breaches, sufficient to giue a generall assault, which were made on the side of the castle, the which the Carthaginians did win. The miserable Saguntines being thus prest, and out of all hope of succours, which could not come vnto them but from Rome, which was farre from them, Alco one of their citizens cast himselfe from the rampar, and went to Hannibal, without the priuie of the Senat, that he might moue him to some reasonable conditions: but Hannibal offered them their liues onely, and that they should depart the town with one robe onely, and to go and dwell where they should be appointed: whereupon Alco durst no more returne vnto Sagunt, beseeching him to giue him leaue to remaine within the campe: then there was a Spanishe souldiour named Alorco, who offered himselfe to carrie these conditions vnto the Saguntines, and to persuaide them to accept thereof. But he preuailed as little as the other: for being heard in their Senat, they were so farre from yeelding in that manner, as by a common consent they resolute to bring all their gold, siluer, and other goods into the market place, where they set it on fire, and consumed it: and there were some so desperat, as they cast themselues into the fire, to be consumed with their goods. In the meane time there was a great noise heard from a tower which fell suddainely, hauing bene long battered, the which gaue free entrie vnto the enemies: a band of souldiours then being entred by that breach, they made a signe vnto the campe: whereupon Hannibal being vigilant to embrace all occasions, marched thither with the whole bodie of the armie, and tooke the towne, hauing giuen charge to his souldiours, to kill all that had past the age of foureteene yeares: a cruell sentence, but he held it necessarie, seeing hee had to deale with such obstinat enemies, who being in fight, neuer yeelded but by death, and being shut vp within their towne, with their wiues and children, would rather burne themselues in their houses, than yeeld. And although that many things were spoyled and consumed by the fire, yet the bootie was great. Thus Sagunt fell into Hannibals hands, eight moneths after the beginning of the siege. And during this siege, his wife Himilce was deliuered of a sonne called Aspar, which doubled his joy. Then did the Romanes resolute to proclaim warre against Carthage, moued partly with the vnworthie calamitie of their friends and allies, and partly with the feare of their owne estate: the which happened 536 yeares after the foundation of Rome, Pub. Cornelius Scipio and Titus Sempronius Longus being created Consuls.

Hannibal was so farre from any remorse to haue drawne these two Commonweales into armes, as contrariwise, when hee had brought backe his armie to new Carthage, and diuided the spoyle among his souldiours, he began to make preparations to march into Italic, from whence he meant to chase the Romanes, and to driue them (if it were possible) out of the world. Hauing therefore disposed of the affaires of that Prouince, and well fortified and

manned

Friends a farre off are slow to succour.

Sagunt taken by assault.

The Romans
resolute to warre
against the Carthaginians.

Good fortune
transpires Hannibal to ouer-
great enterprises

A manned the townes, he left the gouernment generall thereof to Asdrubal his brother, and taking his way by the Mediterranean shore to Empurias, he entred into Gaule, and came vnto the Alpes without any opposition of the Gaules, although they were much prest thereunto by the Romanes; leading an armie which consisted of Numidians, Africanes, Spaniards, some Gaules, and other nations, the which he entertained and supplied often with the same manions, as well with the reuenues of the mynes of Spaine, as that which he tooke from the enemy, but most of all by his onely authoritie, and the reuerence of his name, so long as he continued the warres in Italic, which was 16 yeares.

6 Whilest that the Consul P. Scipio attended him at the entrie of Italic, at the foot of the mountaines, Cn. Scipio his brother (sent by him into Spaine) parted from the mouth of Rosne, with a good number of gallies and other vessels, well manned with souldiours, and coasting along the Gaulishe shore, he came to Empurias without any encounter: where hauing landed, he gouerned himselfe so discretely in all his enterprises, and with so great humanitie towards the Spaniards, as in a short time hee reduced to the deuotion of the Romanes those which had bene drawne away either by force or feare, assured himselfe of the old allies, and got new, not onely among the people which lay neere vnto the sea, but also of those which dwelt farre into the countrey, and euen of the mountainers, although they were very rude and barbarous; wherewith he encreased his armie, and had willingly from them, without any constraint, victuals, and all other necessities. Hanno appointed Gouernor of the countrey on this side Ebro, for the Carthaginians, went to field to make head against the Romanes, whilest that Asdrubal, Gouernour generall of the Prouince, made hast to joyne with him with a great armie. But Scipio went speedily to charge Hanno, and did easily defeat him, where he slew 6000 of his souldiours, tooke 2000, forced his campe, and not onely spoyled the baggage of his armie, but also that which Hannibal had appointed for Italic, wherewith Scipios souldiours were made rich. In the meane time Asdrubal arriues, hauing had no certaine intelligence of the defeat of Hanno: whereof being aduertised, he marched towards the sea, where he found many Romanes souldiours and mariners stragling after some spoyle; of whom he slew many, giuing them a worthie reward of their negligence; the which happened neere vnto Tarracone: yet hee made no long abode there, but presently repassed the riuier of Ebro. Scipio hauing rested his armie foure dayes, resolute to pursue him, but he would first assure himselfe of Tarracone, the which was not very well furnished. Asdrubal seeing him retire, aduanced againe, and did sollicite the Ilergetes to rebell, who notwithstanding had giuen hostages to the Romanes, making them to spoyle some of their allies countrey; whereupon Scipio went to field, and Asdrubal retyred. Scipio meaning to punish these Ilergetes, besieged Athanasia, their chiefe towne, and forced them to redeme themselues with mony, and to giue new hostages: then he went to the Ausetanians, allied to the Carthaginians, neere vnto the riuier of Ebro, whom he besieged, and defeated the Laceranes who came to succour them, whereof there remained 12000 vpon the place, and the rest were disperfed, returning disarmed to their houses. This siege continued 30 daies in the heart of winter, the snow being almost foure foot deepe, E wherewith their engines of batterie were in a manner couered, the which did preserue them from the fire which was cast by the enemy. In the end, Amusite their capitaine hauing abandoned them, and being retyred to Asdrubal, the towne yeelded to Scipio, redeeming it selfe from spoyle for 20 talents, amounting to 12000 French crownes: from whence Scipio led his armie backe to Tarracone.

The second yeare of the second Punicke warre, Asdrubal Generall of the Carthaginians resolute to charge the enemy wheresoeuer he should encounter him, either by sea or land, hauing armed our thirtie gallies which Hannibal had left him, and tenne others which he had; of all which, he gaue the charge to Himilcon, commaunding him to sayle along the coast in view of his land armie, with the which he parted from Carthage, keeping still neere the shoare: whereof Scipio being aduertised, he resolute also to fight with Asdrubal, if any opportunity were offered. Yet hauing intelligence, that he had bene reinforced with some fresh troupes, he resolute not to hazard a battaile by land, but to set vpon them at sea. Hauing to that end embarked the flower of his armie, hee parted from Tarracone with fise and thirtie ships of warre, and came within foure or fise leagues of the mouth of the riuier of Ebro: there he was aduertised by two galliots of Marseilles, that the enemies gallies were at anchor in the mouth

E ij

He marcheth to wards Italy.

Cn. Scipio sent into Spaine.

He winneth the Spaniards by mid-dlesse.

The Spaniards
inquisant.

The simplicity
of the Romans.

Whilest the Romans were thus busied to resolute and to send embassadours, Hannibal pursues his siege, and presseth Sagunt by all means possible: He builds new engines, animates his souldiours, and promisseth them the spoile of a rich towne: the Saguntines rampar vp their breaches, and labour day and night: the batterie begins afresh, and they haue many assaults giuen, and with greater furie than before. In the end, being tyred with the multitude of assaillants, who had fresh supplies continually, they could not keepe the Carthaginians from entering by their breaches, their walls being newly repaired with earth, after their accustomed manner, and therefore easie to pierce: so as they seized vpon an high place within the precinct of the towne, whereas they planted many of their great crosse-bowes and artilerie after their manner, and casting a wall about it, they made as it were a citadell; against the which the Saguntines did presently make a trench, diuiding it from the rest of the towne, which was not yet taken. And as it happened diuers times, that the one getting the other, must needs retyre, the towne was reduced to a small compasse, and withall they had great want of victuals, and of all other necessities, by reason of the long siege. Hannibal was then forced to march into Oretania and Carpetania; where there was some likelihood of a tumult, for that those which he had sent to enroll souldiours, were retained by them of the country, by reason of the great rigour which they vsed. As his absence from the campe gaue some rest vnto the Saguntines, so his coming among those people caused peace, and reduced them to obedience. In the meane time Maharbal, sonne to Himilco, who had the charge to continue the siege, vsed such diligence, as there was no shew of Hannibals absence. To conclude, hee wrought so well, as at his returne he shewed him large breaches, sufficient to giue a generall assault, which were made on the side of the castle, the which the Carthaginians did win. The miserable Saguntines being thus prest, and out of all hope of succours, which could not come vnto them but from Rome, which was farre from them, Alco one of their citizens cast himselfe from the rampar, and went to Hannibal, without the priuie of the Senat, that he might moue him to some reasonable conditions: but Hannibal offered them their liues onely, and that they should depart the town with one robe onely, and to go and dwell where they should be appointed: whereupon Alco durst no more returne vnto Sagunt, beseeching him to giue him leaue to remaine within the campe: then there was a Spanish souldior named Alorco, who offered himselfe to carrie these conditions vnto the Saguntines, and to persuaide them to accept thereof. But he preuailed as little as the other: for being heard in their Senat, they were so farre from yeelding in that manner, as by a common consent they resolved to bring all their gold, siluer, and other goods into the market place, where they set it on fire, and consumed it: and there were some so desperat, as they cast themselues into the fire, to be consumed with their goods. In the meane time there was a great noise heard from a tower which fell suddainly, hauing bene long battered, the which gaue free entrie vnto the enemies: a band of souldiours then being entred by that breach, they made a signe vnto the campe: whereupon Hannibal being vigilant to embrace all occasions, marched thither with the whole bodie of the armie, and tooke the towne, hauing giuen charge to his souldiours, to kill all that had past the age of foureteene yeares: a cruell sentence, but he held it necessarie, seeing hee had to deale with such obstinat enemies, who being in fight, neuer yeelded but by death, and being shut vp within their towne, with their wiues and children, would rather burne themselves in their houses, than yeeld. And although that many things were spoiled and consumed by the fire, yet the bootie was great. Thus Sagunt fell into Hannibals hands, eight moneths after the beginning of the siege. And during this siege, his wife Himilce was deliuered of a sonne called Aspar, which doubled his joy. Then did the Romans resolute to proclaim warre against Carthage, moued partly with the vnworthie calamitie of their friends and allies, and partly with the feare of their owne estate: the which happened 536 yeares after the foundation of Rome, Pub. Cornelius Scipio and Titus Sempronius Longus being created Consuls.

The Romans
resolute to warre
against the Carthaginians.

Good fortune transports Hannibal to great enterprises

Hannibal was so farre from any remorse to haue drawne these two Commonweales into armes, as contrariwise, when hee had brought backe his armie to new Carthage, and diuided the spoyle among his souldiours, he began to make preparations to march into Italie, from whence he meant to chase the Romans, and to driue them (if it were possible) out of the world. Hauing therefore disposed of the affaires of that Prouince, and well fortified and manned

A manned the townes, he left the gouernment generall thereof to Asdrubal his brother, and taking his way by the Mediterranean shore to Empurias, he entred into Gaule, and came vnto the Alpes without any opposition of the Gaules, although they were much prest thereunto by the Romans; leading an armie which consisted of Numidians, Africanes, Spaniards, some Gaules, and other nations, the which he entertained and supplied often with the same victuals, as well with the reuenues of the myries of Spaine, as that which he tooke from the enemy, but most of all by his onely authoritie, and the reuerence of his name, so long as he continued the warres in Italie, which was 16 yeares.

He marched into Italy.

6. Whilest that the Consul P. Scipio attended him at the entrie of Italie, at the foot of the mountaines, Cn. Scipio his brother (sent by him into Spaine) parted from the mouth of Rosne, with a good number of gallies and other vessels, well manned with souldiours, and coasting along the Gaulish shore, he came to Empurias without any encounter: where hauing landed, he gouerned himselfe so discretely in all his enterprises, and with so great humanitie towards the Spaniards, as in a short time hee reduced to the deuotion of the Romans those which had bene drawne away either by force or feare, assured himselfe of the old allies, and got new, not onely among the people which lay neere vnto the sea, but also of those which dwelt farre into the country, and euen of the mountainers, although they were very rude and barbarous; wherewith he increased his armie, and had willingly from them, without any constraint, victuals, and all other necessities. Hanno appointed Gouernor of the country on this side Ebro, for the Carthaginians, went to field to make head against the Romans, whilest that Asdrubal, Gouernour generall of the Prouince, made hast to joyne with him with a great armie. But Scipio went speedily to charge Hanno, and did easily defeat him, where he slew 6000 of his souldiours, tooke 2000, forced his campe, and not onely spoiled the baggage of his armie, but also that which Hannibal had appointed for Italie, wherewith Scipios souldiours were made rich. In the meane time Asdrubal arriues, hauing had no certaine intelligence of the defeat of Hanno: whereof being aduertised, he marched towards the sea, where he found many Romane souldiours and mariners stragling after some spoyle; of whom he slew many, giuing them a worthie reward of their negligence; the which happened neere vnto Tarracone: yet hee made no long abode there, but presently repassed the riuer of Ebro. Scipio hauing refitted his armie foure dayes, resolved to pursue him, but he would first assure himselfe of Tarracone, the which was not very well furnished. Asdrubal seeing him retire, aduanced againe, and did sollicite the Ilergetes to rebell, who notwithstanding had giuen hostages to the Romans, making them to spoyle some of their allies country; whereupon Scipio went to field, and Asdrubal retyred. Scipio meaning to punish these Ilergetes, besieged Athanasia, their chiefe towne, and forced them to redeeme themselves with money, and to giue new hostages: then he went to the Ausetanians, allied to the Carthaginians, neere vnto the riuer of Ebro, whom he besieged, and defeated the Laceranes who came to succour them, whereof there remained 12000 vpon the place, and the rest were disperfed, returning disarmed to their houses. This siege continued 30 daies in the heart of winter, the snow being almost foure foot deepe, wherewith their engines of batterie were in a manner couered, the which did preserve them from the fire which was cast by the enemy. In the end, Amusite their captaine hauing abandoned them, and being retyred to Asdrubal, the towne yeelded to Scipio, redeeming it selfe from spoyle for 20 talents, amounting to 12000 French crownes: from whence Scipio led his armie backe to Tarracone.

Cn. Scipio sent into Spaine.

He wins the Spaniards by mildness.

Hanno defeated
by Scipio.

The Spaniards
inconstant.

The second yeare of the second Punicke warre, Asdrubal Generall of the Carthaginians resolved to charge the enemy wherefoeuer he should encounter him, either by sea or land, hauing armed out thirtie gallies which Hannibal had left him, and tenne others which he had; of all which, he gaue the charge to Himilcon, commaunding him to sayle along the coast in view of his land armie, with the which he parted from Carthage, keeping still neere the shore: whereof Scipio being aduertised, he resolved also to fight with Asdrubal, if any opportunitie were offered. Yet hauing intelligence, that he had bene reinforced with some fresh troupes, he resolved not to hazard a battaile by land, but to set vpon them at sea. Hauing to that end embarked the flower of his armie, hee parted from Tarracone with fixe and thirtie ships of warre, and came within foure or fixe leagues of the mouth of the riuer of Ebro: there he was aduertised by two galliots of Marceilles, that the enemies gallies were at anchor in the mouth of the riuer, and their land armie camped neere vnto them: wherefore Scipio desiring to surprize them, commaunded his gallies to set forward, making great speed towards them. Spaine had then many watch-towers vpon the coast, set vpon high hills, for the saterie of passengers against pyrats. The Roman army was discovered by them, and an alarme giuen to the Carthaginians, being sooner discovered by the army at land, than by the gallies. Asdrubal dispatching many horsemen, gaue charge, That euery one should retire presently to his gally, and prepare to fight, for the enemy had bin discovered. Most of the fouldiors and mariners were at land, dispersed here and there in the tents and villages, making good cheere with their companions, fearing nothing lesse than the comming of the Romans that day, who were hidden by the high clyffes which run into the sea, for that they could neither heare the beating of their oares, nor any noise of their fleet. And as all was full of disorder and tumult among the Carthaginians, Asdrubal put his armie in battaile neere vnto his fleet, whilest the fleet embarked, who ran without order or discipline, as if they had bin chased from the land, and would haue saued themselves in the sea. The confusion was so great, that hindering one another, the fouldiors could not vse their armes, nor the mariners launch out, nor doe their duties, so as they were forced to cut their cables, and doing all things in hast, they were defeated more by their owne disorder than by the Romanes, who aduancing, tooke two gallies at their first joyning, and sunke foure: the rest of the Carthaginian fleet being dispersed, and not able to hold together, they ran aground willingly, so as the men saued themselves, and fled to their army which stood in battaile: who being spectators of this combat, saw their gallies pursued and taken, carrying all away that were not run on ground, or broken vpon the coast, so as the Romans drew 25 out with them to sea. This victorie did not only disarm the Carthaginians of their sea forces, but also made them forsake all that coast. Wherefore the Romans being landed at Onusta or Honosca, became masters thereof without any resistance, spoyling the countrey vnto the gates of new Carthage, whereas they burnt the suburbs. Returning from thence laden with spoyle to Longuntica (which at this present is Guardamar) they found great store of a kind of broome, wherewith they did vse to make cables for ships, the which Asdrubal had caused to be gathered together, whereof they tooke what they pleased, and fet fire on the rest. Then returning to their ships, they passed into the Island of Ebusus or Iuisa, and battered the fort that was in it, from the which they were repulsed. So as after they had spoiled and burnt the country, they embarked againe, and being ready to weigh anchor, embassadors came to them from the Islands of the Balears, to demaund peace and friendship with the Romans.

Scipio being returned into Spaine, he gaue audience to the embassadours of all the people that dwell about the riuer Ebro, and not onely to them, but to others of farther regions, desiring to enter into league with the Romans. They hold, that he receiued hostages at that time of about 120 Townes or Communalities. Scipio being fortified by this means, and thinking he should be able from that time to keepe the field against his enemy, he led his armie towards Castulo, & the mountaines which are now called Puerto Muladar, Asdrubal being retired into Lusitania, towards the limits of our Portugal, vpon the Ocean, so as there was no great shew of any warres that Summer. But the turbulent spirits of the Spaniards prouided worke for Scipio: for a nobleman of the Illegetes (the which is now a part of Catalogne) called Mardonius, when as the Romans retired towards the sea, had solicited many of the neighbor people to armes, and seeing the Romans otherwise busied, he went with his troups, and spoiled the country of their allies: against whom, Scipio sent 3000 men, with the helpe of some of his friends, who defeated these spoylers, slew many, tooke some, and made the rest glad to quit their armes. This made Asdrubal to leaue the sea coast, and to march vp into the countrey, to assure his confederats which dwell on this side Ebro, and to succour them if need were: he came and lodged in the countrey of the Illecaones, which are of the country of the Illegetes: but a tumult arising, drew the war elsewhere: for the chiefe men among the Celtiberians, which make now a part of new Castille, and of Arragon beyond Ebro, being entred into alliance with the Romanes, and had giuen them hostages, hauing taken armes at Scipios perswasion, were entred into the Carthaginians territorie, spoyling, burning, and putting all to the sword: they tooke three townes from them, and in two encounters slew 15000 men, and tooke 4000, carrying away many of their enemies ensignes. At the same time P. Scipio arrived in Spaine, in qualitie of Pro-consul; in whose absence Cn. Scipio his brother had vntill that time gouerned the warres: for

The Carthaginians defeated at sea by Cn. Scipio.

Mardonius and the Illegetes held the Carthaginian party.

The Celtiberians
take armes for the Romanes.

Pub. Scipio Pro-
consul in Spaine.

A for it was the Prouince which had fallen vnto him the yeare before, being Consul.

7 His gouernment then being continued, he arrived at Tarracone with 30 ships of warre, and many of burthen, carrying 8000 fouldiors, and great store of victuals and other prouision: where hauing landed his men, he went and joynd with his brother; and from that time the affaires were gouerned by two captaines well vnited, and agreeing in all things: who whilest that Hannibal was in action against the Celtiberians, resolved to goe directly to Sagunt; in which towne they knew, that all the hostages which Hannibal had drawne from the townes and people of Spaine, were kept with a small guard; which was the onely gage which the Carthaginians had to assure them of the Spaniards fidelitie, and the onely bond wherewith they tyed them: but one man brake it. He was a gentleman, who was then in garrison at Sagunt, a Spaniard by nation, called Acedux, who had alwaies before shewed himselfe very faithfull to the Carthaginians, but then (according to the manner of the Barbarians) he applied himselfe according to the time and euents. This man hauing a desire to follow the Romans partie, and imagining, that such as reuolt, are commonly esteemed but base and infamous creatures, if withall they doe not bring some notable commoditie to them that doe receiue them, he bethought himselfe of an occasion, whereby he might purchase the grace and fauour of the Romanes, by one of the greatest aduantages they might haue, if he could find meanes to deliuer all these hostages into their hands: but for that they were straitly guarded by men that were appointed by Bostares, Gouernour of the Prouince, there was great difficultie in the execution of this enterprife. He came therefore vnto the Gouernour, who lay in campe without the towne, to defend the landing vpon the sea shoare, being somewhat farre off, and letting him vnderstand the dangerous estate of the Carthaginians affaires, after so many defeats, and how little faith and constancie there was in the townes and confederat people of Spaine, seeing so great a power of the Romanes neere them, fortified by so many people which had taken their partie, and the goodly succours which the Pro-consul Scipio had brought out of Italie, he aduised him to make the Spaniards more bound vnto the Carthaginians by an honourable bountie, than they were by the gages which he had from them, in sending backe to euery Towne and Communitie their hostages. And to the end hee should assure himselfe he would be readie to put in practise all that he should hold fit for the good of the Carthaginians, he offered to conduct these hostages to their parents, and to goe from towne to towne, confirming and encouraging his countrey men to be loyall to the Carthaginians, and that thereby they should find they had so good an opinion of them, as without any necessitie they had freely sent home their hostages vnto them. To conclude, he could so well perswade this Gouernour, as (notwithstanding it seemed hard vnto him at the first) he consented, appointing a conuenient time to send the hostages to their houses, vnder conduct of this traitour: who in the meane time found meanes to slip vnto the Romanes campe, and hauing met with some Spaniards in the armie, he caused them to bring him vnto the Pro-consul as secretly as might be; to whom he imparted this businesse as he had designed it; and a fit conclusion was taken betwixt them for this enterprife. This merchant being returned againe to Sagunt, and hauing againe conferred with Bostares the Gouernour vpon this restitution at the time appointed, the hostages were in the night sent out of the towne with a good guard, as it seemed: but they went not farre, before they fell into an ambush which the Romanes had layed for them, where they were all taken, and led vnto the campe. The same counsell which this Spaniard had giuen to Bostares, was by him propounded to the Romanes, who made good vse thereof, and restored the hostages to their parents and friends, and by that meanes made a wonderfull breach in the Carthaginians Estate in Spaine: For the people and townes did soone find what an aduantage it was to change their master; for that in stead of the Carthaginians command, which was impetuous and proud, the Romanes were entred with bountie and mildnesse. So euery one commending the wisdome of this Acedux, sought some fit opportunitie to reuolt as he had done. And if Winter had not forced them to surcease, the effects had followed with out delay. Asdrubal finding himselfe too weake, was rettyred into places of strength, farre from the Romanes. The two Scipios hauing diuided their charges, Publius conducted the armie at sea, and Cneus that at land. Asdrubal durst not oppose himselfe neyther against the one nor the other, but hauing after many petitions and much solliciting obtained from

The resolution of the two Sci-pios of great consequence.

A notable trea-cherie of a Spaniard.

Treason of a Spaniard, leading to the stronger party.

The indiscretion and rashnesse of Bostares in yeelding the hostages
deliuered him
by his Generall.

the Carthaginians a supplie of foure thousand foot and fiue hundred horse: as soone as they G arrived, he went to field with his armie, approched neer vnto the enemye, began to repayre his shippes, and to make a fleet for the defence of the coast and Islands. Being busie about these things, the reuolt of the sea captaines, which had bene defeated the Summer before, troubled him much. These after the battaile hauing bene much blamed by Asdrubal, did neuer afterwards shew themselves neither faithfull to their Generall, nor well affected to the affaires of the Carthaginians: so as by practises there were some townes yeilded to the Romanes in the countrey of the Carpesians, where the Realme of Toledo is at this day;
and had taken one by force: so as all the warre was drawne by the Romanes into this coun-trei. Wherefore Asdrubal entring the countrey in hostile manner, affronted a captaine of H this nation called Galbus, who lay in campe neere vnto the towne which had bene taken.
Hauing sent some souldiours lightly armed to the enemies trenches, to draw them forth to skirmish, and some others against them that were gone to forrage, there was at one instant a great tumult in their campe, and slaughter and flying without it, so as manie saued themselves within their fort: yet in the end they were so well assured, as they not one-ly defended their rampiers, but also sallied forth, and presented themselves in battaile against the Carthaginians, going resolutely to the charge, leaping and skipping after their accustomed manner, the which struck terror into the enemye, who retired as hee could with credit. Asdrubal hauing recouered a hill flanked with a riuer, he brought his armie I thither, thinking it needfull to fortifie himselfe there. So these two armies giuing feare for feare, there were some skirmishes among the souldiours on either side, whereas to speake truth, the Numidian horseman was not equall to the Spaniard, nor the Moores darts able to pierce their aduersaries targuets, who were as nimble and aduise as they, and had more force and courage. The Spaniards seeing that by running about the Carthaginians campe they could not draw them forth to battaile, and that it was not easie to force, they went to besiege a towne called Asena, whereas Asdrubal comming into that Prouince, had made his store-houise for victuals and munition; they tooke it by force, and spoyled all the coun-trei about it: but after it there was neither order, obedience, nor conduct among them, as it happeneth often after a good successe. Asdrubal seeing their disorder and negligence, thought good to embrace this occasion: Wherefore hauing aduertised his souldiers thereof, he left his place of strength, and led his armie in good order against these Spaniards, who K were dispersed here and there in disorder, and without ensignes. Being discovered by them that were in sentinell, every one runs to armes, and so went to encounter the enemye disordered, without ensignes and without commaundement. Some began the fight, whilst that other arrived in troups, the greater part being not yet come out of their campe: yet they encountered them with such furie, as they stayed the first charge of the Carthaginians: but finding themselves few in number, faint, and not well vnited, against many in good order, they were soone broken, and forced to seeke their companions; and in the end they were so prest, being on a heape, and nor able to vse their arms, as they were for the most part slaine; some making way by force through their enemies, saued themselves in the mountains and Forrests neere adjoining. Their campe was in this amazement abandoned, and the whole Prouince was in one day reduced vnder the obedience of the Carthaginians.

Contempt of militarie discipline
followes a victo-rie.

Asdrubal takes advantage of his enemies negligence.

The Council of Carthage thinking to get Italy, neglect Spain.

During these actions, Asdrubal receiued commaundement from his superiours at Carthage, That hee should march with all speed with his armie into Italie: the which being knowne in Spaine, all the people in generall began to wauer, and to follow the Roman par-tie: whereof Asdrubal did aduertise the Senat, letting them vnderstand what prejudice this bruit did bring vnto the affaires of the Commonweale of Carthage; and that it was apparent, if he parted from thence, before he should passe the riuer of Ebro, all Spaine would fall into the Romanes power: for besides that he neither had men, nor a sufficient captaine to leauie in his place, to guard that Prouince, the Roman captaines were such, as they could hardly be resisted with equall numbers: wherefore he aduised them (if they had any care of M Spaine) to send a good Commaunder and a strong Armie in the place of that which he should lead away: and although that all things should succeed as they desired, yet should they euer find some alteration among the people of that countrey. Asdrubal his letters did somewhat moue the Senate, but for that they did more affect the affaires of Italie, they

A they did not alter any thing that had bene decreed touching his departure with his army, but they onely sent Himilcon with some bands, and did arme some ships, which they held sufficient to keepe the people of Spaine in awe, as well vpon the sea coasts, as within the countrey.
This captaine hauing past the sea with his forces, layed vp his ships in safetie, and fortified his campe, he tooke some of his best horsemen, and past through friends and enemies countries, vntill he came to Asdrubal, to whom he presented this decree of the Senat: and hauing conferred with him, and vnderstood the course that he was to hold in the warres of Spaine, he returned to his troups, hauing nothing that did assure him more from encounter vpon the way, than his diligence and speed: For before they could haue meanes to assemble their forces,
B they had news of his returne. Asdrubal seeing that he must needs go, he exacted great summes of money from all the townes and people that were vnder the Carthaginians iurisdiction, being well aduertised, that he must purchase the passage and fauour of the Gaules with readie money, as Hannibal his brother had done. This done, hee tooke his way towards the riuer of Ebro.

The Roman captaines being aduertised of all these things, and knowing of what consequence Asdrubal's passage into Italie was, whereas Hannibal alone did much trouble the Ro-mane state, they employed all their wits and meanes to stop him. Wherefore leauing all other affaires, they joyned all their forces in one body, and passing the riuer of Ebro, towards which Asdrubal approached, being doubtful whether they should fight, or by assailing some towne or countrey that was confederat to the Carthaginians, seeke onely to stay and diuert him. In the end they made a shew to besiege Ibera, a towne which was rich and mightie in those quarters: But Asdrubal to diuert them, and to succour his allies, marched with his armie towards another towne, which a little before was yeilded to the Romanes: wherefore they left the towne, and went directly towards Asdrubal. The armies were some dayes within a league and a halfe one of another, before they came to battell, making light sallies one vpon another. In the end, as if it had bene agreed vpon, they put their armies in battell. The Ro-manes diuided their troups into three; some of their footmen were placed before, and some behind their ensignes, and the horsemen vpon the wings on either side. Asdrubal set the Spanish footmen in the midst of the battell, the Carthaginians on the right hand, and the Africans on the left. To the Carthaginians he added the Numidian horsemen that were mercenaries, and the other Africans in the head of the battell; yet he put no Numidians on the left hand, but such as had bene accustomed to go with two horses together to the warre, and when they had wearied one, they leapt nimbly on the other, which was fresh, being armed, in the hottest of the fight: so active and nimble they were, and their horses so gentle and tractable. Being thus in battell, the Generals had equall hopes, for there was no great difference betwixt their forces, either in number, or qualitie of men of warre: but among the souldiours it was not so. The Romanes were perswaded, that the safetie of Rome and Italie, and their returne to their houses, depended vpon this battell; and therefore they were resolute to vanquish or die. But the Spaniards (whereof the most part of the other armie did consist) had not that resolution, desiring rather to be beaten in Spaine, than to be drawne into Italie, conquerours: Wherefore at the first charge their battalions in the midst were forced, and turned their backs, the fight was more furious on either hand, for the Romans were furiously charged on the one hand by the Carthaginians, and on the other by the Africans, and in a manner compassed in, when as their whole armie (being joyned together in one bodie) easily repulsed them. So fighting in two parts, the Romans had the aduantage every where, and were masters of the field. The slaughter was great, and had bene greater, if the Spaniards had not fled so fast in the beginning. The horsemen did not in a manner fight: for when as the Moors and Numidians did see their squadron in the midst wauer, they began to flie, leauing their wings naked, and leading the Elephants away with them. Asdrubal hauing continued F vntill the end of the fight, retired out of the prease with some few that followed him. The enemies campe, and all their baggage, was spoyled by the Romans. Through this victory, if there remained any people in Spaine which were not firme and constant to the Romans, they were now confirmed. On the other side, Asdrubal saw himselfe not onely out of hope to lead an armie into Italie, but also in some doubt where he should find a place of assurance in Spaine.
These newes being aduertised to Rome by the two Scipios, were verie pleasing; not so much for

Asdrubal prepares to goe into Italie.

The pollicie of the Roman and Carthaginian
captaines.

The order of the two armies.

Agilitie of the Numidian
horsemen.

A victory of great consequence for the Romans.

Asdrubals passage into Italy broken.

for the victorie which they had obtained, as for that Asdrubals passage was broken. This Summer was prosperous for the Romanes affaires, but they began to want victuall, and the seamen, both mariners and souldiours, were in a manner naked. Wherefore the capitaines gaue the Senat to vnderstand, That they must of necessitie provide for these wants, else they should not be able to entertaine neither the armie, nor the countrey. For the which the Senat gaue order, by the good husbandrie of the magistrats, and the willingnesse of priuat persons; so as there were some found which did vnderstand to furnish the armies in Spaine, of all things necessarie for three yeares.

Illiturgis besieged by the Carthaginians, relieved by the Romans.

Asdrubal accompanied by Mago, and Amilcar sonne to Bomilcar, Carthaginian capitaines, were come to besiege the towne of Illiturgis, which had revolted from them to the Romane party: about the which they had made three camps, through which the Scipios, two brethren, past by force, with great slaughter of their enemies, and put victualls into the towne, whereof they had great need: and hauing encouraged the inhabitants to carrie themselves valiantly in the defence of their walls, as they had seene them do which came to succour them, they resolved to make a furious sallie vpon the enemies fort, in Asdrubals quarter. Which Mago and Amilcar seeing, they ran thither with all their forces, so as that day the Carthaginians had 60000 men in battell without their campe, against 26000 Romans, or thereabouts; who notwithstanding had the victorie, without any doubt, hauing slaine more of their enemies than they were themselves, taken about 3000 prisoners, woon about 1000 good horses of seruice, caried away 59 ensignes, slaine siue Elephants in fight, made the enemies to raise their camps, and (which was their chiefe designe) freed the towne of Illiturgis from siege. The Carthaginians to recouer their honour, went to besiege Incibile, another place allied to the Romans, hauing filled their bands, and made new supplies in the country, who demanded nothing more than warre, so as there were any hope of spoyle: for at that time Spaine did abound in youth. There they did rather increase their shame: for being assailed by the Romans, they lost 13000 souldiours more, which were slaine vpon the place, 3000 prisoners, two and fortie ensignes, and nine Elephants. Then in a manner all Spaine did adhere vnto the Romans, to whom this Summer was verie successefull.

Spain fit to supplye armies.

Another victory by the Romans.

The yeare following, when as Q. Fabius, and M. Claudius Marcellus were Consuls, and the sif of the second Punicke warre, had diuers euents: for Asdrubal and Mago defeated great armies of Spaniards, which were allied to the Romanes, before they had left their garrisons, where they had wintered, to passe the riuer of Ebro: and in a manner all that part of Spaine was recovered by the Carthaginians: but the diligence of P. Scipio, who marched thither with his armie, kept them play, and assured the countrey. Hee came first and camped at a place called Haut-Chasteau, or High-Castle, famous by the death of that great Amilcar; the which was strong, and well furnished with come which they had brought thither a little before: but the countrey round about was full of enemies, and some of the Romans, which had taried scattered behind from the bodie of the armie, had bene charged by the enemies horse, who slew two thousand, and retired without any losse. This made P. Scipio retire into a countrey of more safetie: who fortified his campe, and entrenched it neere vnto the mount of Victorie, whither Cn. Scipio his brother came with all his forces. And in a manner at the same instant, Asdrubal, sonne to Gisgo the third, a Carthaginian capitaine, presented himselfe with a compleat armie, in view of the Romanes, and planted his campe right against them, hauing a riuer betwixt them. There P. Scipio hauing taken certaine men at armes with him, parted secretly to discover the enemy and the countrey: but being himselfe discovered by the enemy, hee was in daunger to be defeated, had hee not recovered a little hill neere adjoyning, whereby hee had meanes to defend himselfe, and to make head against them that did enuiron him, vntill that his brother Cn. Scipio came to vngage him. The towne of Castulo which was so great a friend, and so strictly allied vnto the Carthaginians, as Hannibal had taken a wife there, yeilded vnto the Romanes. The Carthaginians returned vnto the siege of Illiturgis, in the which there was some garrison of Romane souldiours, hoping to take it by famine. Cn. Scipio to releue both the garrison and the inhabitants allied to the Romanes, marched that way, past valiantly betwixt two armies, and put a legion of resolute souldiours into the towne, with great slaughter of the enemy.

A castle where great Amilcar was slaine.

Romans defeated.

Castulo yeilded to the Romanes.

Illiturgis releued againe by the Romans.

The next day was no lesse happy vnto him, in a braue fally which he made, where there were slaine

G

H

I

K

L

M

A slaine in these two encounters twelue thousand Carthaginians, and about ten thousand prisoners, with siue and thirtie ensignes, so as Illiturgis was againe freed from siege. The enemy being chased from thence, they went to besiege Bigerre, another towne allied to the Romanes; but they retired presently vpon the brute of Scipios approach, and marched towards Munda, where they were also pursued by the Romanes. There they had a sharpe encounter, which continued foure houres; but as the Romanes had the victorie, they founded a retreat, for that Cneus Scipio, Generall of the armie, had bene thrust into the thigh with a Numidian lance: which wound his souldiours that were fighting about him feared to haue been mortal; without which accident it is certaine the Carthaginians campe had been taken that day, and the victorie absolute. For the souldiours with their Elephants had been repulst vnto their palisadoes and rampars, vpon the which there were nine and thirtie slaine with darts: Yet they say, that in this fight the Romanes slew about twelue thousand of their enemies, and carried away seuen and fiftie ensignes. The Carthaginians being defeated, retired to Auringe, where they were pursued and prest by the Romanes, during this amazement; and were againe charged before they had leasure to assure themselves, and to recouer their spirits, Scipio causing himselfe to be carried through the battailons in a litter. Here he had an absolute victorie, but with much lesse slaughter by the halfe, for the enemies were reduced to a smaller number. But as those people were prompt by nature, to renew the warres, and presently to supplye their armies, the countrey being fertile of souldiours, their bands were presently filled by the diligence of Mago, brother to Asdrubal, being sent to make new leuies, so as they durst hazard another battell: the euent whereof was like vnto the former, most of the Carthaginian souldiours coming faintly to fight, as for a partie which had bene often beaten, and in few dayes. They lost in this conflict eight thousand men slaine vpon the place, and almost one thousand prisoners, with eight and fiftie ensignes, and great store of baggage, rings, chaines, and bracelets of gold: two great noblemen of Gaul were also slaine, the one called Marnicaptus, the other Cinifmarus: eight Elephants were taken, and three slaine. Thus the Romans affaires prospered in Spaine, who in the end were ashamed, that the rownes of Sagunt, for the which this war was begun, had continued siue yeares in their enemies power. Wherefore they approached neere vnto it, and by fauour of the battels which they had woon, did easily chase away the garrison that was within it: and hauing conquered the place, they called home all the old inhabitants, and restored them to the possession of their goods, raised the Turditans towne, which had bene the motiue of their desolation, and sold the inhabitants thereof for slaues, to them that would giue most.

Cn. Scipio lures.

The Carthaginians put to rout.

Another defeat of them.

Carthaginians againe defeated.

Saguntinians forced to their goods.

The Romans fire vpon enemies rather Carthaginians in Asdruba.

Gala father to Mafinissa.

The Romanes to haue the better meanes, not onely to repress the injuries of the Carthaginians, but also to assaile and annoy them, did stirre vp new enemies against them neere vnto their towne, and drew vnto their alliance Siphax, king of a part of Numidia, who was already somewhat discontented with them: so as they were forced to haue their recourse vnto Gala, another king of the same nation, and to incense him against Siphax. This Gala was father to Mafinissa, from whom the Romans did afterwards draw many good seruices: but at that time he shewed himselfe a bitter enemy to Siphax, and did often defeat him. In the meane time nothing was done worthie of memorie in Spaine; only the Celtiberians which were in pay with the Carthaginians, were drawne away by the Romanes, whom they entertained with the same conditions: and these were the first mercinarie souldiours which the Romanes vsed, to their great prejudice. Moreouer, the two Scipios sent about 300 Spanish gentlemen into Italy, to sollicit them of their nation, which were in Hannibals armie, to leaue his partie, and to joyne with the Romanes.

After this, there were two yeres spent before there was any memorable act done in Spaine, both parties encountering one another rather by counsell and practises, than by open hostilitie. The seuenth yeare of this warre, the Romane capitaines assembled their forces, and it was resolved in counsell, That they must not content themselves onely to haue stopped Asdrubals passage into Italy, but they must seeke some meanes to end all the warre in Spaine: presuming they had forces ynow to doe it, hauing this Winter drawne vnto them, and armed 30 thousand Celtiberians. The enemies had three camps, two whereof were commaunded by Asdrubal sonne to Gisgo, & by Mago, being both joyned together. They were distant from the Romanes some siue dayes journey: But that which Asdrubal, sonne to Amilcar, the auntient

Gouer-

F

Gouernour of Spaine, led, was neerer, being lodged neere vnto Anitorge. The Generall G of the Roman armie would first giue him a charge, hoping to defeat him easily. One onely difficultie troubled them, which was, how they should hinder the other two armies (after the defeat of this Asdrubal) from retiring into some place of aduantage among the mountaines and forests; and by that meanes should draw the warre in length. Having then a conceit to make warre against all Spaine at one instant, they resolved to diuide their forces betwixt them: so as P. Scipio with two third parts of the Roman armie, and the bands of their allies, should goe and affront Asdrubal sonne to Gisgo, and Mago; and that Cneus Scipio should lead the rest of the old legions and the allies against Asdrubal Barcin.

This being concluded, these two armies with their commanders parted at one instant: the Celtiberians marching before, came and encamped neere vnto Anitorge; in view of the enemy, being seperated the one from the other by a riuer. There did Cneus Scipio stay with his troupes, and P. Scipio marched on where he was to make warre. But when as Asdrubal saw them diuided, and one farre from the other, being a wise and politique captaine, considering that the finewes and strength of the Roman armie consisted of their allies, and in mercinarie souldiours, and knowing the treacherous and inconstant disposition of the barbarous, euen of the Spaniards in those times, by the experience he had had in that long warre, hee resolved to trie all means possible, to corrupt the Celtiberians, which were vnder the Romans pay, being 30000: the which he did happily effect, by the meanes of some of the same nation which were in his camp; who vsing the same language, and hauing means to haue secret conferences

The mercinarie Spaniards make no account to abandon the Romans as need.

The force of an armie ought to be of naturall subjects, and not of strangers.

The infidelity of the Celtiberians.

Two Roman armies do pay to the enemy.

Masini a fierce aduersarie to the Romans.

one with another, they concluded with the captaines of the Celtiberians, that for a good summe of money they should retire with their men, and returne to their houses. It seemed a matter of small moment to them: for they were not prest to turne their armes against the Romans, but onely to retire, and not to make warre: besides, most of the souldiours were glad to rest, and desired to see their kinsfolkes and friends, goods and possessions. Wherefore it was easie for the captaines who were corrupted, to perswade them to dislodge, being without feare to be staied, or forced by the Romans, who were but few in number. Let this be an example to all estates that make warre, neuer to fortifie themselves so with mercenaries and strangers, as they may prescribe them a law; but let their greatest strength be of their own nation. These Celtiberians then hauing taken vp their ensignes, and trust vp their baggage, departed suddenly: neither could any intreatie nor prayers preuaile to stay them, pretending, that they had warre at home, and that they must goe and defend their owne houses. Cneus Scipio seeing himselfe thus abandoned, and not able to prevent it neither by intreatie, force, nor any good counsell, finding himselfe too weake to hold the field against so great and mightie an armie, hauing also no meanes to joyne with his brother P. Scipio, he meant to trie if he might retire safely and with his honour, and flie all occasions to be forced to fight. But Asdrubal holding him vanquished, would giue him no rest, but followed him continually at the heeles. The like terrour, but a farre greater daunger, did at the same time presse P. Scipio, being freshly charged by a new and a valiant enemy: it was Masini a young prince, then allied to the Carthaginians; who afterwards was famous, and made mightie by the amitie of the Romanes. P. Scipio at his first arriuall found him in front, with goodly troupes of Numidian horsemen, comming continually day and night to his trenches, keeping his armie in perpetuall alarme, so as nor any one durst goe farre out, either for forrage or for wood, dislodging their sentinels oftentimes, and pursuing them euen within their gards, and to the ports and rampars of their campe, whereas the Romanes were shut vp as if they had bene besieged, and in want of all things, wherewith they were likely to be daily more and more oppressed, if a Spaniard called Indibilis should come and joyne with the Carthaginians, where he was expected with seuen thousand and five hundred Suesetanians. For so graue and wise a commander as P. Scipio was, he tooke a bad and rash resolution: for hauing left his campe to the gard of a few men, vnder the commaund of T. Fonteius his lieutenant, hee parted about midnight to goe and encounter Indibilis, and to fight with him: the which he did, and had easily defeated him, if the Moors and Numidian horsemen (who had watched *Scipio*s departure) had not come and charged the Romanes in flanke, the which caused a great terrour among them, and besides they were charged in the reeward with all the Carthaginian armie, which had followed them. Being thus enuironed of all sides, doubtfull where they should make head, or which

A which way they should force through the enemies, and escape that daunger, their Generall P. Scipio fighting and encouraging the souldiours, and going to all places where his presence was needfull, was thrust through the right flanke with a launce, so as he fell downe dead from his horse. Then the enemies which had charged that troupe, leaping for joy, and crying out seeing him on the ground, went running throughout the armie, leaping for joy, and crying out that the enemies Generall was slaine. This accident gaue the Carthaginians an assured victorie, the Romanes (being destitute of a head) thinking onely how they should flie and saue themselves. It was easie for them to make way through the Numidians, who were but lightly armed, but to saue themselves by flying against so many horsemen, and footmen who did run in a manner as swift as horses, there was no meanes: so as the slaughter of the Romanes was very great, both in the fight and in the flight, and hardly had any one escaped, if the darkenesse of the night had not fauoured them. The happinesse of so great and important a victorie of the Carthaginians, was no whit impaired by the negligence of their captaines, but making good vse thereof, presently after the conflict, hauing giuen some little rest vnto their souldiours, the armie dislodged, and marched with all speed to Asdrubal Barcin's campe: being assured, that all their forces vnited together, they should easily vanquish the other Roman armie which remained, and by that meanes end the warre in Spaine. Being arriued, the joy was great among the captaines and armies, rejoycing at this late obtained victorie, whereas so great and redoubted a captaine of the enemies had bene slaine, and all his armie defeated: C wherefore being full of hope, they assured themselves to doe as much vnto the others.

The victorious Carthaginians pursue the victorie.

Theirnesse in Scipio's armie without any apparent cause.

There was yet no newes of this lamentable defeat in *Cneus Scipio*s armie, but there was seene a sad mouefull silence, as if they had had some secret presage, as it happens often to such as doe diuine of an approaching mischiefe. The Generall of the armie, besides that he found himselfe weakened, and abandoned by his allies, hearing that *Asdrubal*s armie was so much reinforced, was much perplexed, and could not by any conjecture and reason of warre imagine other, than what had happened: For what reason were it to thinke, that Asdrubal and Mago could passe without fighting, if his brother had bene liuing? Why did he not hinder them? or at the least coast them and follow them, to come and joyne with his brother, if he could not keep the enemies armies from joyning? Being in this perplexitie, seeing no other meanes to assure himselfe, but by a retreat, hee parted secretly in the night, vnknewen to the enemy, causing his armie to make a long march: But the day hauing discovered his departure, the Numidian horsemen were presently sent after; who ouertooke the Roman armie toward the evening, and skirmishing, stayed them much, charging them sometimes behind, and sometimes vpon the flanks. Scipio gaue order, that in fighting the armie should still aduance, fearing the enemies battailons of foot, which marched with all speed after their horse. In the end night approached, and yet the Romanes had not much aduanced, being forced to make often stands against the Moors, who did continually annoy them. Wherefore Cneus Scipio retired with all his troupes to a little hill, a place of small aduantage for them that were alreadye wauering; yet the seat was somewhat higher than the fields about it: There he lodgeth, and puts his horsemen and all his baggage in the midst, and his footmen make a circle round about, and so did easily resist the attempts of the Moors. But when as the Generals with their complete armies were joyned together, hee saw there was no meanes to make it good by fighting, if he did not intrench himselfe after the accustomed manner: Wherefore he began to aduise by what meanes he might make his palisadoes, but he was come into a bare, barren, and drie soyle, where there was neither trees nor bushes, nor any ground fit to make flagges; neither could they digge into it, nor make it hard for the enemy to approach, for the ascent was easie on all sides: yet to make a kind of rampar, hee caused them to take their packe-saddles and dorsets, and to tye them together, wherewith the souldiours made as it were a wall of a conuenient height round about them, filling vp the places which wanted, with such baggage as they had.

F The Carthaginians being arriued, put themselves in order to assaile this little hill, but discovering a new kind of rampar, and not accustomed, they were somewhat amazed: but their commanders began to crie; How now souldiours, why stay you? why doe you not speedily pull vp and scatter this baggage which doth amaze you, and is not fit to stop women nor children? The enemy is ours, wee hold him fast, being hidden behind those cofers

The Roman army forced and defeated.

Cm. Scipio slain.

Anno 542 of Rome.

The courage of L. Martius rewinnes the Romans from despair.

L. Martius chosen General of the Roman army.

The Carthaginians proud of their great victory, were defeated by the Romans.

L. Martius restrains the fury of the Romans.

cofers and burthens. Thus contemptuously did the captaines speake, yet was it not so easie to make a breach, nor to passe over them: but in the end they forced them, and the souldiours found passage in diuers places, so as they made a great slaughter of the Romans; yet the greatest part of the vanquished saued themselves by flight, who finding woods and forests, a good number of them, after a long and tedious journey, came vnto P. Scipios campe, commaunded by T. Fonteius, the lieutenant. Cm. Scipio was also slaine in this assault at the hill, as some say, in the beginning of the fight: others notwithstanding affirme, That he thought to saue himselfe with some few men, in a tower, which was there adjoyning, the which being enuironed by the enemy, and the gates set on fire, they were all taken and slaine. Behold two great captaines, brethren, dead, and their armies defeated, in lesse than a moneth, leauing the Romans affaires in Spaine so troubled, and in such despaire, as they might well say, all was lost: But humane things are gouerned by a higher power, who doth not alwaies impart his decrees to our discourses.

9 There was a Roman knight called L. Martius, sonne to Septimius, a yong man, active, hardie, and of greater courage than could be expected in a man of his condition; who assured the remainders of the legions, and the faithfull allies of the Roman state, and reuiued Spaine from their sorrow and mourning, for the losse of two such great personages, and of so many good men, and from the calamitie and daunger they were then in: and in the end recovered the honour and fame of the Romanes, which was growne contemptible. Hee had with his generous disposition learned good discipline vnder Cm. Scipio. And hauing gathered many of them together which had fled from the defeat, and drawne a good number of souldiours out of the garrisons and vnited townes, he made a little armie, and came and joyned with T. Fonteius, P. Scipios lieutenant. This armie being on this side Ebro, in a campe well fortified, it was resolu'd to chuse a head that should command ouer all, and that they should take their voyces therein, as the bands should enter into gard one after another. L. Martius being but a knight, was so gracious, as all in generall gaue him their voyces, and he was chosen Captaine General of the Roman armie. After which time hee was verie carefull to fortifie himselfe in places of strength, and to provide store of victuals and munition; finding the souldiours readie to execute whatsoever hee commaunded. But it was not long before there came newes vnto the campe, That Asdrubal the sonne of Gisgo marched towards them, to make an end of the warre, and to free the countrey of those few Romanes which were yet remaining in Spaine. Then the souldiours remembering their old captaines, began to faint at their new captaines commands; so as the centeniers and other officers and bands, yea and L. Martius himselfe had much adoe to reuiue them, reproaching them, that they behaued themselves faintly like women, making fruitlesse lamentations, which was not the meanes to reuenge the deaths of their Generals, nor to recover their lost honour. The enemies were not far off, and it was time to preach to them; when as suddenly there was scene a strange alteration throughout all the Romane campe: Their mourning was conuerted into furie, euery man fell to his armes, and they cried out, that they should bring them to the enemy. They sallied forth of their gates, and with great courage receiue the Carthaginians, who came disordered, and in a manner contemning them whom they had already vanquished. This resolution of the Romanes amazed them, wondering at the number and order of these men, who had gathered them together, or what captains they had remaining after the death of the two Scipios. But in the end they were forced to flie, and were hotly pursued that day, vntill that Martius thinking the souldiours did abandon themselves too much, caused a retreat to be sounded, and himselfe standing before their ensignes, stayed their rashnesse, which might haue drawne them into some disorder, and so (desiring nothing but reuenge and bloud) hee brought them backe to the campe. The Carthaginians being thus roughly repulld from the Romane trenches, seeing they were no more pursued, they presumed it had bene feare, and therefore they retired softly, and without care. Being in their campe they vsed the like negligence in their gards and watches: for notwithstanding they did see the enemy nere them, yet they did esteeme them to be but the reliques of two armies which they had beate and defeated some few dayes before.

Martius being aduertised by good spies, what was done in the enemies campe, hee vnder-tooke rather a rash than hardy attempt, but the issue was fortunat. Knowing that he had the ar-

mic

A mie of Asdrubal Gisgo now in front, the which was followed by the two others, hee thought it lesse daunger to aduenture to fight with that alone, than to attend and bee beaten by all three together: If he vanquished, he should restore their affaires, which were almost ruined, and if he were beate, at the least he should haue the honour to bee the assailant. Hauing therefore assembled the captaines, centeniers, and chiefe souldiours, he deliuered vnto them the pitifull estate of their affaires, and how that for the honour and reputation of their countrey, for the loue they bare to the deceased Scipios, and for the interest of their owne liues, they were to carrie themselves valiantly and courageously against their cruell enemies which pursued them; whose negligence and contempt did inuite them to goe and assaile them, and did promise them a certaine and easie victorie, especially if they made hast before all their forces were vnited: the which afterwards they could not withstand, concluding, that there was no other meanes to make warre, than to issue forth the next night, and to goe and force the Carthaginians in their trenches. He found the souldiours well disposed at this motion, wherefore he commaunded them to prepare their armes, and to be readie to depart when he should command. The Carthaginian armie made two lodgings, about a league and a halfe one from the other: betwixt both was a great valley couered with trees. In this forest was an am-bush of Romane souldiours layed, with some horsemen, to stop the passage for such as would runne from one campe to the other: the rest of the Romane armie was led with great silence against the enemies, where finding neither gards nor sentinels, nor any thing else to stop their passage, they entred farre, as if they had bene within their owne campe: then suddenly the trumpets sounded, and making great cries they fell to the execution, killing all they met, without mercie, and setting fire of the enemies lodgings and tents; but aboue all they seised vpon the ports and issues; that not any one might escape. The amazement, fire, cries, and slaughter, did so trouble the Carthaginians, as they could not heare one another, nor giue any order for any thing. They found themselves among troupes of armed men: thinking to flie, they were slaine at the gates, if any leapt ouer the rampars, they fell into the ambushes, so as the enemies which were in the other lodging, could haue no intelligence of this surpris, but by death, which was presented vnto them at the Romanes coming, who with great celeritie (boying with furie, and implacable desire of reuenge) came thither, and D there found greater negligence than they had done in the first campe: For these were farther rettyred from the enemy, and vpon the breake of day many were gone forth for forrage and wood. There were armes at the ports, but no souldiours, some here, some there, some asleepe, and some walking in their gownes in the trenches. The Romans fell vpon these careless people, hauing no resistance made at the ports: they entred within the campe, and in the midst thereof began a bloudie fight; the enemies running from all parts at the first crye and tumult, striving vertuously to repulse the Romanes. Which conflict was likely to continue long: but when as the Carthaginians discovered their enemies targuets all polluted with bloud, they fainted, hauing thereby an assured argument of the defeat of their companions. This feare put them in rout, and to a miserable flight, euery one sauing himselfe where he found any way open to escape, and abandoning the campe. So in one night and the day following, there were two camps taken, vnder the conduct of L. Martius. The number of the dead, according vnto some, was seuen and thirtie thousand, and aboue eight hundred prisoners. The spoyle was verie rich; and among other things, there was found a great targuet of silver, weighing one hundred thirtie and eight pounds, on the which was grauen the picture of Asdrubal Baris, the which was afterwards set in the temple of the Capitoll, and it was called Martius targuet, remaining for a memorie of the victorie which hee had gotten against the Carthaginians, where it continued vntill the Capitoll was burnt.

This action restored the Romans power and authoritie in Spaine, and was the cause that sometime was spent without any enterprises of either side, either feare to hazard anything after so great losses.

10 These diuers and contrarie accidents teach vs how little wee should relye vpon the euents of war, and that it is not in the power of man to maintaine himselfe one day: wherefore if modestie be necessarie in humane things, yea in greatest prosperitie, and to beare a respect

The ouer great boldnesse of Martius, which proved his esult by the enemies negligence.

A great defeat of the Carthaginians.

A targuet of silver a monument of Martius victorie.

spect to the diuine power, presuming little vpon our owne judgments, wisedomes, happinesse, and fame; it is chiefly in the conduct of warre. There wanted no qualities in the two Scipios, to make them great and famous captaines; yet they tooke bad counsell, both together, and diuided and ruined themselves by their ouerweening, and by too much attempting at one instant. The Carthaginians by the victorie which they had gotten, had made the way open to ouerrun all Spaine at their pleasures: and moreover, considering the cruell warres which the Romanes their aduersaries endured with much difficultie in Italie; they had now time, and a wished opportunitie to ruine them quite, drawing all their forces into those parts: but being growne insolent and carelesse in this great prosperitie, they are suddenly staied by a souldiour of no fame, without qualitie, and almost vnknowne, whom the diuine providence would make an instrument to shew that it is he, and not the wisdome of man that doth raise or ruine estates. The griefe which they had conceiued at Rome, for the defeat of their armies, and the death of such excellent captaines as the two Scipios, was somewhat appeased by the successe of Martius enterprises: and consulting in the Senat touching that which hee had written, there was not any one but did allow his actions to be high and generous, and did much commend him: But as for the title which he gaue himselfe, of Propretor, or Lieutenant to the people of Rome, the gouernement being vacant, that seemed vnto them all arrogant and ambitious, yea a verie bad example, and of worse consequence. For that (said they) if they should suffer the souldiours to chuse captaines at their pleasure, it would blemish and ouerthrow the authoritie of the Senat, of the people, the lawes and magistrats. Some were of opinion, they should treat of that in Councell before all other things: but it was thought fitter to deferre it for a time, and to send backe those knights which had brought these letters to Rome, with a good answer. Wherefore they did write vnto L. Martius (without giuing him any other title) touching the prouision of victuals, apparell, and other things belonging vnto the armie.

These men being dispatched, it was first of all resolued by the Consuls and Tribunes, to propound vnto the people, to name some one to be sent into Spaine, to commaund the army whereof Cn. Scipio had had the charge. But this was deferred vpon some new accident, so as by way of prouision they sent C. Nero with twelue thousand foot, halfe chosen out of the Romanes legions, and halfe of their allies, three hundred Roman knights, and eight hundred of the confederat townes. With which forces he past into Spaine, and landed at Tarracone, whereas he presently went to field, hauing armed all the mariners, to make the greater shew. To him, as Propretor, and lieutenant generall for the people of Rome, T. Fonticius, and L. Martius, deliuered vp the legions, and all the forces which they had preferred, and happily employed after the defeat of the two Scipios. With this armie Nero went to seeke out the enemy, who was camped at a place called Pierres noires, or Blacke stones, in the country of the Oretanes, betwixt the townes of Illiturgis and Mentisa. Nero had seized vpon the straits, and so prest the enemy, as Asdrubal for feare of a worse accident, sent a herald vnto him, to offer and promise him, That if he would suffer him to goe out of those passages, hee would breake vp his campe, and send his souldiours out of Spaine. This was pleasing vnto Nero, wherefore a day was appointed to confere and capitulate betwixt the heads of the armies. At their first meeting there was propounded by the Romanes, That the Carthaginians should deliuer vp their citadels, and at a certaine day draw their garrisons out of the townes which they held, and that they should haue libertie to carrie away all that was theirs. All this being granted them, Asdrubal gaue order in the night (whilest that the Romanes were fed with a hope of peace) that they should begin to packe away their baggage secretly, and to draw away that which was most troublesome in the army, which way they could: yet he prouided, that few men should goe out of the campe, least the enemy should discouer his fraud. The day following they entred againe into conference, where as many frivolous things were propounded, to passe away the day: and at night the Carthaginians did as they had done before, spending many dayes after this manner, in disputes and difficulties, and still discharging that at night which hindered them most. After that they had drawne all their footmen and baggage into a place of safetie, there remained nothing but the horsemen and Elephants.

Asdrubal,

God onely doth raise and ruine states.

A commendable seruice in the ancient Romans.

*Anno Rome 543
C. Nero sent Propretor into Spaine.*

*Asdrubal a politique captaine, circumspect
Nero.*

Asdrubal, as his feare decreased, so did his faith diminish, hauing no care to keepe that which hee had promised: Yet they were to meet againe one morning, when as a thicke foggie mist had couered all the earth. Asdrubal making vse of this occasion, sent to intreat Nero to excuse him, if he camenot to the parley, for that it was a festiuall day with the Carthaginians; and therefore he could not with a good conscience treat of any businesse. This was well taken by Nero. In the meane time Asdrubal through the fauour of this mist, escaped with all his horses and Elephants. The third part of the day being spent, the Sunne dispersed this fog, and then the Romanes found that they were deceiued, and that the enemy was escaped: whereat Claudius being much grieved, began to follow him, but hee could not force him to fight, there were onely some light skirmishes made betwixt the forerunners of the Roman armie, and the Carthaginians reuerward.

All things standing in this estate, Spaine remained quiet: such as had forsooke the Romans after the aboue mentioned defeats, returned not; and such as had continued constant vntill that time, revolted not. At Rome the Senat and people were troubled to send a commaunder into Spaine, that were of such authoritie and vertue, as he might deserue to succeed the two brethren, the Scipios. Euerie one was carefull to whom he should giue his voice: and as there was much dissenting in such a choice, in the end it was decreed, that the election of him which should be sent Gouernour into Spaine, should be made in a generall assemblie of the people, by the voyces and suffrages of the companies: For the which a day was appointed by the Consuls. They supposed this charge would haue bene affected and sued for, like vnto other dignities; and that some would present themselves, and desire to be admitted: but no man appeared: for euerie one feared to go thither, where as two of the greatest souldiours that were among the Roman captaines, had bene defeated and slaine in lesse than thirtie daies, one after another.

The people being assembled at the appointed day, in great care and amazement, to see the magistrats and prime men of Rome gazing one on another, without a word speaking, euerie one apprehended the ruine of their commonweale: but P. Corn. Scipio, sonne to him that had bene slaine in Spaine, shewes himselfe in a place somewhat higher than the rest, and declares openly, That he demanded the gouernement. Euerie one then began to crie out for joy, and to shew him some signes of fauour, as presaging vnto him a happie and prosperous successe in that charge. The voyces being gathered, he was by a general consent chosen head and Gouernour of Spaine for the people of Rome. Scipio was not then foure and twentie yeares old: wherefore after this election made, the people repented them to haue been so inconsiderat, as to giue so great a charge to so young a man, euerie one calling to mind the late misfortune of that house, and euen with horrore of his name, who was so neere allyed to two such desolate families, who went to make warre in a place where both his father and vnckle had bene slaine, and euen among their sepulchres. But Scipio finding this suddaine alteration, spake vnto them, of his age, and of the charge hee vnderooke, with so great an assurance, as hee purchased a good opinion with the people, and filled them all with great hope.

If there were euer any one among the Romans indued with singular vertue, and that could put it in practise, and make good vse of it, from his youth, it was this Scipio, so as wee may rightly say, that he had both the apparence and effect of vertue. He was I say, both vertuous and an hypocrite both together, making vse especially of religion to win the peoples fauour, and the obedience of such as he commanded; an vsuall policie which hath bene practised by the great and wise men of this world in all ages, saying, that they must keepe the people in awe with the terrour of religion: the which were commendable, if they would adde vnto it, the title of True: and that in stead of making men religious, they would nor draw them to superstition. Scipio did neuer begin day, but by prayers vnto his gods, fasting often, that hee had visions in the night, and receiued diuine commandements; and finally, that he had secret conference with the gods, which in his time they did worship at Rome. Such was the peoples opinion of his vertue, as they held him to be somewhat more than an ordinarie man, and they told a fable of his birth, somewhat like vnto that of Alexander the great: which was, That he had been ingendred of some god, who in the forme of a great serpent came & lay with his mother, and that oftentimes such as entred into her chamber, had seen this apparition, but it vanished presently.

F ij

He

Asdrubal makes no conscience how to deceiue his enemies.

All affect honors but euerie man flies the danger.

Great confidence of P. Corn. Scipio son to P. Scipio slaine in Spaine.

People inconsiderate do often repent.

Scipio vertuous and hypocritical

The ancient used religion to keepe the people in awe.

A fable of Scipio's birth.

He maintained himself in this reputation with such art, as neuer any one complained that he had been deceived by his reuelations or myracles, finding means to breed an impression thereof in the hearts of men, without affirming or denying them directly. The people of Rome referred to the direction of a man thus qualified, and so young, one of the most important governments, and of the greatest charge in their whole estate. At the same time when as he laboured for the government of Spaine, Marcellus returned out of Sicile, where hee had taken Siracuse, by the treason of Meris, a Spanish capitaine, entertained by the Siracusans. There were appointed for Scipio (besides the forces that were in Spaine) 10000 foot, and 1000 horse; and there was giuen him for his lieutenant and assistant, M. Iunius Sillanus: who parting out of the mouth of Tiber with 30 galleasses, hauing five oares on a side, and coasting along the shore of Tuscanie and Gaule, they arrived at Empurias, at the foot of the Pyrene hills, a Grecian towne, founded by the Phocians, where Scipio landed with his armie, the which hee led along the shore to Tarracone, causing his fleet to follow close by the shore.

M. Iulius Sillanus lieutenant and counsellor to Scipio.

Being at Tarracone, he held a generall assemblie of all the confederat townes of Spaine, who sent their deputies and embassadours vpon the brute of his arriual. He laied his ships on ground, according to the auncient manner, and sent backe foure Marilian galliots, which had come to doe him honour. There hee heard the embassadours of the countrey, which wauered, and were amazed at the accidents past. And although he had a great presumption of himselfe, and of his vertue, yet did hee neuer let slip any proud speech, or that was ill taken by any: but carried such a maiestie in his words, as they were forced to beleue what he said.

Maliste iayned with modestie in P. Scipio.

Parting from Tarracone, he went to visit the confederat townes, and came vnto the place where as the old armie did winter; whereas he did commend the souldiours, that after two such great defeats, they had vertuously defended and preserved the prouince, not suffering the enemy to enjoy the fruits of his victorie, but hauing chased him out of the countrey on this side Ebro, had assured, and faithfully defended the friends and confederats of the people of Rome. Hee did greatly honour L. Martius, yet so, as he would haue the world know, that his owne glorie could not be eclipsed by another mans. Syllanus tooke the place of C. Nero: and lodgings were appointed for the new come souldiours to winter in. Scipio hauing thus disposed of all things, and visited all places where his presence was required, hee returned to Tarracone. His fame was no lesse among his enemies than friends, and euen now their hearts were seised with some feare, but could giue no reason for it: which was as a preface vnto them of that which should happen. The Carthaginian armies were retired into diuers places to winter. Asdrubal sonne to Gisgo, was lodged farr off, about Calis, neere the Ocean; Mago more into the land, about Castulo, in the straits and neere forests: and Asdrubal son to Amilcar, about Sagunt, somewhat neere vnto the riuer of Ebro.

Scipio honors L. Martius, yet without disparaging himselfe.

13 In the beginning of the Spring, P. Scipio hauing put his gallies to sea, and called the succours of his allies to Tarracone, he commanded that both the ships of war and of burthen, should bend their course towards the mouth of Ebro: thither the legions were appointed also to come from the places where they had wintered. Then he himselfe parting, with 5000 of the associates, from Tarracone, came vnto the armie. There he spake much in commendation of the old souldiours, which had bene in so many vnfortunate encounters, incouraging them to better hopes vnder his commaund, not forgetting his fained reuelations. Hee layed before their eyes the diuision of the Carthaginian captaines, who kept their forces dispersed: which was the cause of the defeat and ruine of his father and vncl. Finding the armie willing and resolute, he left M. Syllanus to gard that which lies on this side Ebro, with 3000 foot, and 300 horse, and he himselfe past on with the rest of the armie, the which consisted of 25000 foot and 2500 horse. Some were of opinion, that the enemies armies lying farr distant one from another, he should goe and fight with the neerest: But he thought otherwise; for he doubted, that whilst he should spend his time to draw the enemy to fight, and to seeke his vntantages, the others would make hast to come into those parts: so all three armies being vnted together, he should not be able to make head against them. Wherefore he resolved to go and suddenly to besiege new Carthage, a towne verie rich of it selfe, and abounding with all sorts of prouision, of victuals, armes, and treasure, which the enemies had laid vp there for the warre, and in the which the hostages of all the good townes and prouinces of Spaine were kept:

Scipio begins his charge with a great enterprise.

A kept: situated in a commodious place to passe into Africke, hauing an ample port, and capable of any great fleet, and the best of all that coast of Spaine. Yet hee did not acquaint any man liuing with this his resolution, but only C. Lelius, who commanded the armie at sea, hauing giuen him charge so to direct his course, as at one instant they should come before the towne with both armies. The seventh day of their departure from the riuer of Ebro, Carthage was besieged both by sea and land. The campe was plantd on the North side, and fortified with a palisadoe. The situation of Carthage was after this manner. In the middelt of that coast of Spaine, is a gulfe, which runnes five hundred paces into the land, and hath not much lesse in breadth. The mouth of this gulfe is covered with a little island, which defends it from all winds, except that which carries the name of Africke, of the place from whence it comes, which we may call Southeast, or Libecchio, according to the Italians. With in this gulfe there riseth a peece of ground, almost like an island, on the which the towne is built: Which peece of ground is enuironed with the sea on the East and South sides, hauing towards the West a marsh, which doth couer some part of the North, the which is not verie safe, being in some places deeper than in others, as the sea doth rise and fall. A little hill joynes the towne vnto the firme land, being some two hundred and fiftie paces. This part was left open by Scipio, without any fortification: whether hee did it to braue the enemy, or leaue this passage open to make continuall courses, and attempts vpon the towne, and then to haue his retreat easie. Hee also planted his gallies within the port, seeming as if hee would also besiege the towne by sea: giuing charge vnto the captaines to be watchfull, and to stand vpon their gards: For in the beginning of a siege, he that is shut vp doth most commonly make greatest fallies.

Silence required in great actions. C. Lelius General of the gallies.

The situation of new Carthage.

Hauing therefore provided for all things necessarie for a siege, he then resolved to impart his designe vnto his souldiours, and to shew them the reasons which had mooued him to begin warre by a siege: and to persuaide them, that it was easie to take it suddenly, whilst their forces were farr off. Hee shewed them, That new Carthage was of such consequence, as the taking thereof would conquer all Spaine for the Romanes: by reason of the hostages of the princes, potentates, townes, and commonweales of the countrey, which were kept there: the which being taken, the enemy, who had not any but mercinarie souldiours (which must alwayes haue money) would soone bee abandoned by their men: for that the money appointed for their pay, was within the towne, in the which the Carthaginians made their treasure, the magazine for their victuals, and for all sorts of munitions and engines: All which things, laid hee, the towne being taken, will come into our hands, and the enemy shall bee left naked of all meanes to make warre. Vpon the other side, shall be furnished of all things necessarie, but about all, wee shall get a good towne, and commodious port, to receiue all things whereof wee shall haue need, as well by sea as land: yea we shall haue an easie passage into Africke, if it be needfull to go thither.

He made so liuely an impression of the opportunitie, profit, and easinesse of the siege and enterprise, as they began to crie, that he should lead them to the assault, the which he did presently. Mago commanded within the towne, who seeing that they prepared to come vnto an assault, gaue order on his side to withstand their furie. He assured himselfe of the castle for his retreat, putting five hundred souldiours into it, and as many vpon a high ground within the towne, on the East side. He appointed two thousand souldiours to make a furious fallie vpon the enemy, and the rest of the multitude were put in conuenient places to succor where need should require. These Carthaginians opening their gates, issued out vpon the Romans, comming to the assault, and staied them, wher as the fight was long doubtfull: but the Romanes hauing still fresh supplies, the Carthaginians were in the end forced to turne their backs, in such feare and disorder, as, if they had bene eagerly pursued, they had entred pell mell with them into the towne, in the which the tumult and confusion was no lesse, than in the fight: for many of them left their gards for feare, as if the towne had bene taken. Scipio obseruing what was done, and watching all occasions from an eminent place, seeing the walles abandoned in some places, hee put all his armie in bataille, commanding them to march towards the towne with their ladders. He himselfe being covered with some souldiours that were well armed, goes among the troups, to encourage them, and to be an eye witnesse of the valor & cowardise of euery one. The wals were again furnished with souldiours by the diligence of Mago, wherefore the souldiours comming to the assault, were entertained with a shower of darts and arrowes which fell vpon them, more vpon their flanks than in afront: besides the wall towards the firme land, was very high. Notwithstanding the souldiours animated by their Generals presence, and with a desire to vanquish and spoile, planted their ladders of fall sides, and mounted courageously, striving who should get first to the top of the wal. But many of the ladders, being ouer-laden with the multitude, brake, and they fell into the ditch; besides most of them were too short. They gaue an assault in like manner towards the sea, but with more amazement than danger, and of euerie side there was more brute than effect: so as for this time the Romans were repulst, which gaue courage vnto the enemies, and hope they should be able to keepe the towne; perswading themselves, they were out of scale, and that their armies should haue time ynough to come and succour them. But Scipio, who was resolu'd to take this towne, did not suffer them to continue long in this error: for as soone as he had caused them which had giuen the first assault to retire, being wearie and wounded, he made other fresh souldiours to aduance against the towne, to renew the assault, taking the ladders from their companions. He had bene aduertised by fishermen of Tarracone, which were in his campe, and who had waded through the marishes on the West side of the towne, That there was no great store of water along the wall, when the tyde was spent, and that it was easie to goe to the foot of it: and withall had obserued, that on that side the wall was but low, ill rampared and fortified, and without gards, for that they assured themselves of this stil water. Wherefore vpon the ebbe, and a strong Northerly wind, which draue out the water, it was easie to wade through: he embraced this occasion, and sent some troupes thither, shewing them the easie access; saying, That the gods did inuite them, and assure their passage, causing the sea to retire, whereby they might take the towne, as it fell out: For finding no man to resist them, whilst that all were busie in other places, where as they feared most, they entred into the towne, and marched directly towards the port where as the combat was hottest, where they were sooner felt than heard; and the enemies were charged both in front and in flanke, before they knew that the towne was taken: so as the number increasing still, one helping another ouer the wall, euerie one sought to saue himselfe, and not any one made any more resistance. Wherefore the gate being broken, and an entrie made for the armie, they entred in battaile into the towne, with their commanders and ensignes, and seized vpon the chiefe places. Those which had past ouer the walls, made a great slaughter of the inhabitants. The Carthaginian souldiours retired themselves into two forts, the one was to that high peece of ground aboue mentioned, on the East part of the towne, garded by five hundred souldiours, and the other was the castle, which Mago had referu'd. The mount being assailed by a part of the Romane armie, was presently forced: Soone after Mago seeing there was no more hope, hauing made some resistance, yeelded the fort also, and all that was within it. Vntill that time the Romanes slew all they met about foureene yeares of age: but the castle being yeelded, they were commaunded to cease from killing: then they began to fall to the spoile, which was verie great, where they had ten thousand prisoners, all men of free condition. Those that were naturall citizens were set free, and the towne restored vnto them, and all that was found belonging vnto them. There were also found about two thousand artificers, whom Scipio adjudged to the publike of the people of Rome, giuing them hope of speedie libertie, if they carried themselves like good men, and did imploy themselves valiantly in the warres. With the rest of the youth which was able and strong, he furnished his gallies: and increased his armie at sea, with eight gallies taken from the enemy. Besides this multitude, there was found within the fort the Spanish hostages, whom hee treated as honourably as if they had bene allyed to the people of Rome. Thus this wise Generall by his mildnesse and humanitie woun the hearts of the people, with more honor, and much lesse paine and daunger, than if he would haue forced them by armes, the which notwithstanding he could well employ as need. The engines to batter and defend townes and forts, were infinite: there were threescore and foureene ensignes taken: the gold and siluer was carried to the Generall: there were two hundred threescore and sixteen cups of gold, euery one weighing a pound; and in siluer coined eightene thousand and three hundred pounds weight, with great store of siluer plate. All which things were deliuered by weight to C. Flaminius the treasurer. Besides, there was found 40000 bushels of wheat, and 37000 of barley. There were taken

New Carthage taken.

The number of the prisoners taken at Carthage

Scipio treats the Spanish hostages kindly.

A taken within the port an hundred and thirteene shippes of burthen, whereof many were still laden with armes, come, siluer, yron, cloth, stufte to make ropes, and other things for the vse of shippes: so as in regard of the spoyle, the towne of Carthage was esteemed of least value.

14 The heat and furie of the souldiours being past, and Scipio in quiet possession of the towne, without any contradiction, the same day leauing the towne in gard to Caius Lelius, with the souldiours of his gallies and mariners, he brought backe the Armie and Legions to their campe, very much tyred with so many exploits of warre which they had done in one day: for they had fought hand to hand in field, had giuen an assault, and taken the towne with day: for they had been still forced to fight with great extreame paine and danger, and that being taken, they had been still forced to fight with great disadvantage against them that held the castle: wherefore he suffered them to rest vntill the next day, when as he caused the whole armie both of sea and land to assemble, thanking first of all the gods, who not onely had deliuered into their hands the richest towne of all Spaine, but had gathered together in it as it were a spoyle of all that was precious in Spaine and Africa; so as their enemies were left naked of all things, and they were abundantly furnished with superfluitie. Then did he publicly acknowledge the valour of his souldiours, commending such as had done their duties, according to euery mans vertue and resolution, where-with they had repulst the enemies, who had sallied out so furiously against them; and notwithstanding the height of their wals, the dangers of vnknown passages in the moores, and the munition of their forts and citadels, they had past all, and surmounted all obstacles. Wherefore although he knew that all deserued much, yet it was expedient to haue an especial regard to those that had first mounted vp the wals, and therefore he commaunded they should shew themselves. There were two souldiours which pretended this honour to be due vnto them: it was a crowne of gold made with battlements, which the custome and auncient militarie order of the Romanes did giue vnto him that mounted first vp the enemies wals. One of these was Q. Trebellius, a Centenier of the first Legion; and the other, Sextus Digitius, a souldior of the sea armie; who (as it happeneth often) had put the whole armie into faction, either being supported by them of his ranke. C. Lelius maintained them of the fleet, but M. Sempronius Turditanus the Legionaries; which contention had almost bred a mutinie, but Scipio gaue them arbitrators, which were the two abouenamed, and P. Cornelius Caudinus for a third, who should examine the cause, and informe him. Notwithstanding, after they had taken from them these men of respect, who should be iudges in stead of supporters, the disorder grew greater: for although they seemed partiall, yet they did restrain the violent passions of both parties, rather than maintaine them: which C. Lelius perceiuing, leauing the assembly, he went and informed Scipio, that this businesse was handled without modestie, order, or reason, and that they were like to fall to armes: and although they proceeded not so farre, yet was it dishonest and a very bad example, that honour due to vertue should be sought in that manner by corruption and false witnesses: for on the one side the Legionaries, and on the other the mariners, offered to sweare what they would haue them, not knowing the truth, nor considering that in so doing they made themselves guiltie of perjurie, and did draw the punishment of that crime not onely vpon their owne heads, but vpon the whole armie, and on the Romane Ensignes and Eagles, violating and contemning in this manner the reuerence of an oath: Hee aduertised him of these things by the aduice of Cornelius and Sempronius, the two other arbitrators. Scipio gaue him thanks, and did much commend him for it: wherefore hauing called the souldiours together, he let them vnderstand, That he was duly informed, how that Q. Trebellius and Sext. Digitius were the first that mounted vp the wals of Carthage, and the one as soone as the other, and therefore in witness of their vertues he did honour either of them with a mural crowne. And thus he wisely pacified a great sedition among the souldiours, and did auoid a detestable profanation of all religion; the which was of great consequence among the Romanes, who were no lesse desirous, that the world should be as well conceited of their pietie and justice, as of their valour. He afterwards rewarded euery one according to his merits, and among others, Lelius Generall of the armie at sea, to whom he did as great honor as he would haue done vnto himselfe, giuing him a crowne of gold, and thirtie oxen: Hee caused all the hostages of Spaine to be brought before him, which were found in new Carthage, to whom he spake courteously, giuing them good hope,

Scipio doth first giue thanks to the gods for his victories.

He commends the souldiours valour.

A mural crowne.

Emulation for honour.

The reward of vertue must not be sought by vicious means.

Romanes religious.

Scipio doth cunningly pacifie a great tumult.

Scipio seeks to win the Spaniards hearts by his great bounty.

A Spanish Ladie having honor in recommendation.

Scipio honours the vertue of ladies prisoners.

Scipio overrules his owne desire, to honour himselfe and his country.

and letting them vnderstand, That they were fallen into the hands of a Nation, which desired more to win the hearts of men, and to tye them vnto them by their good deeds, than to constrain them by feare or force; and had rather haue other nations for their faithfull companions, than to subdue by an odious seruitude. He caused the names of the Townes and Communalities of Spaine to bee giuen him in a List, and enquired of the number of prisoners of either of them, to whom he sent messengers, willing them to come and receiue their owne. If at that time there were any embassadours of any of those places within his campe, hee presently caused theirs to be deliuered vnto him. C. Flaminius Treasurer generall had the charge of the rest, with commaundement to entreat them well. Whilest these things were in hand, a Spanish Ladie, who was very old, stept out of the troupe of hostages, and callt her selfe at Scipios feet: shee was wife to Mandonius, brother to Indibilis, Lord of the Ilorgetes: beseeching him to giue especiall charge vnto the gards, to entreat the women well and honestly: To whom Scipio answered, That they should not want any thing: But (sayth she) it is not the feare of any want that maketh me thus careful: for what doth not suffice them that are in our estate? I feare another thing; it is the youth of those that are about me, whom I see in danger to receive disgrace: as for me, my age doth free me from that misfortune. There were about her the daughters of Indibilis, and manie others of great houses, very faire, and in the flower of their ages, which honoured this Ladie as their mother. Then Scipio with a noble and vertuous courage answered thus: Truely, the discipline which I haue learned among the Romanes, and which I obserue, doth admonish me, that whatsoeuer is held worthie of respect in any part of the world, should not bee violated or corrupted by vs: but about all this, your vertue and modestie inciteth mee to be more careful to preserve you, seeing you shew that you haue not any way forgotten that which doth most honour and adorne women. He therefore gaue them in gard vnto one, whose modestie and continencie was well knowne vnto him, commanding him to keepe them with as much honest respect, as if they were the wiues and mothers of their owne allies. Then they brought vnto him a young virgine a prisoner, fit to be married, and so exceeding faire, as she drew vnto her the eyes of all that beheld her. Scipio enquired of whence, and what parents she was of? Among other things he vnderstood, That she was promised to a young Nobleman of the Celiberians, called Allucius: He caused her to be carefully kept; and sent vnto the virgines parents, and to her future husband, that they should come vnto him: who being arriued, he spake vnto this yong man (whom he knew to be exceedingly passioned with loue) vsing a more artificiall speech vnto him than hee did vnto the virgines parents.

I am (sayd hee) young, and so are you, wherefore my desire is, that wee conserue more freely together: Your Spouse being brought before mee by our souldiours, and vnderstanding that you loued her with great affection, I did easily beleene it, seeing her beantie: for if it were lawfull for me to seeke the pleasures which youth demaunds, and that my mind and thoughts were not wholly employed for the affaires of the Commonweale, I would willingly be excused, if I did abandon my selfe to the passions of loue, being so iust and lawfull, as of her that should bee my wife: wherefore I fauour yours as much as I may. Your Spouse hath bene kept here with mee with such honour and respect, as if shee had bene with her father and mother, and hath bene garded to make a pure and absolute present vnto you, worthie of my qualitie and yours. I demaund onely in recompence of this gift, that you will be a friend to the people of Rome, and if you thinke me thereby to be an honest and a good man, such as they of this countrey haue heretofore knowne my deceased father and vncle to haue bene, know that there are many such in the citie of Rome; and remember, that there is not any nation vpon the earth, whose hatred you and yours should more seeke to auoid, and to seeke their friendship, than ours.

This vnexpected fauor, the which could not be comprehended nor equalled by any recompence or thanks, held this Spaniard seized with joy and shame: who taking Scipio by the right hand, prayed all the gods to requite the great fauour he had done him, seeing he found himselfe insufficient to make any satisfaction as he desired. Then were the virgins parents called, who seeing their daughter already freed without any ranfome, entreated Scipio very earnestly to receiue the gold which they had brought to redeeme her, which was of a good quantitie, saying, they would hold it for a great grace, that he had preserved their daughter vndischd.

Scipio

A Scipio being much importuned by them, was content to please them: whereby hee caused these presents to be brought before him, and hauing called for Allucius, hee sayd vnto him: Besides that which you are to receiue of your father in law in dowrie with your wife, take this present from me, commanding him to carrie this gold away with him. Allucius hauing receiued these honours and presents from Scipio, he returned joyfull and content to his house, filling the whole countrey with his prayse and merits: and in truth it was an act as generous, liberall, chaste, and religious, as hath bene in the memorie of any age done by a Pagan in his youth and vigour, and who had commaundement and soueraigne power in that behalfe ouer the enemy; but it may be it was not without ambition, nor humane considerations.

B There was a bruit throughout all Spaine, That there was a young man come like vnto a god, who surmounted all things, as well by force of armes, as by his courtesie and bounty: wherefore Allucius hauing made a leuie of his friends and vassales, came within few dayes vnto Scipio, being accompanied with foureteene hundred horse, to doe him and the people of Rome seruice.

C Scipio after hee had stayed C. Lelius with him some dayes, to dispose of the hostages, the spoyle, and all other things with his aduice and counsell, he sent him to Rome with a galeasse, and Mago with him, who was late Gouverneur of new Carthage, and about fiftene Senators prisoners, to bee messengers and assured witnesses of his victorie. During his abode at Carthage, he exercised his souldiours in all exercises fit for the warres, as well by land as sea. The first day he caused the Legions to run armed foure myles together, which makes a league: the next day he made them to scoure their armes before their tents: the third day they fought in forme of battaile with poles and darts blunted: the fourth day they rested, and the fifth they ran againe with their armes. Thus he did employ his souldiours during his abode at Carthage. The mariners did exercise themselves in rowing vp and downe in their gallies, and made sea fights to trie the swiftnesse of their gallies. These things were done without the wals of the towne, to fashion their minds and bodies to all warlike exercises: but within Carthage there was nothing but preparation to armes, the Generall being careful to see all things himselfe in person. Sometimes he went aboard the gallies, sometimes he ran with the Legionaries, sometimes he went to visit the workmen in the Port and Arsenall, vying incredible care and diligence. Hauing thus provided for all things necessarie, repaired the breaches of the towne, and manned it with good souldiours, he went to Tarracone. In the end the deputies of many townes of Spaine came vnto him, where he had assigned an assembly for all the allies of the people of Rome, as well old as new, whither came many deputies on this side Ebro, and some beyond it.

The Captaines and Commanders of the Carthaginians did what they could to conceale the losse of Carthage; and when as they found it was generally knowne, they fought with good words to repaire their losse, saying, it was but a towne lost, surprised by a young man, who perswaded himselfe, that he had thereby woon all: but when he should see three great captaines and three victorious armies approach, he would abate his pride, and remember the miserable end of his house. This they bruited among the people, yet knew they that the losse of Carthage had much weakened their forces.

The 34 day after that Lelius was parted from Carthage, he arriued at Rome with his prisoners, to the great contentment of the people. The next day hee deliuered vnto the Senate what had bene done in Spaine; the towne of new Carthage (the chiefe of the whole countrey) taken in one day, and many townes which were reuolted, returned againe to the Romans, and many others receiued into a new league; the which was verified by the prisoners answers. The Romans aboute all things feared Asdrubals passage: for they had worke ynough to resist Hannibal alone. Lelius was sent backe into Spaine in the same vessell which had brought him.

The year following, when as Qu. Fab. Max. for the fifth time, and Qu. Fulv. Flacc. for the fourth time were Consuls of Rome. Scipio hauing spent all the Winter to win the hearts of this barbarous nation, some by presents, others in deliuering them their hostages and prisoners, Edeso a famous captaine among the Spaniards came vnto him: His wife and children were with the Romanes, the which was partly the cause of his reuolt: and withall, he found

all

Scipio adds liberallitie to his continuance.

Vertue giues to every one his due reward.

Military exercises done by Scipio.

The care and diligence of a good Generall.

The Carthaginians dissemble their losse.

Ann. Roma 544.

all the Spaniards to affect the Romanes, and to abandon the Carthaginians, as Indibilis G and Mandonius did, who were then the greatest noblemen in Spaine, and were diuided from Asdrubal campe, lodging with their troupes on the sides of certaine hills, from whence their passage was safe and easie vnto the Romanes. Asdrubal finding this disfaour in the Carthaginians affaires, resolved to hazard a battaile, before they were quite abandoned by their allies; and Scipio on the other side demanded nothing more: for besides the happy successe of his enterprises, which puffed him vp, he thought it more expedient to fight, thinking it more safe to charge Asdrubal alone, than to stay vntill the other two Commanders and armies were joyned with him. Notwithstanding all this, he had prouided for all euent, if he should be forced to fight with many: for seeing that all the coast of Spaine H was cleere from the Carthaginian gallies, and therefore hauing no vse of his, hee disarmed them at Tarracone, and put both the souldiors and mariners among his Legions, and thereby did much encrease his armie: for he had found wherewithall to arme them within Carthage, besides the armes which hee caused to be daily made. With this resolution he departed from Tarracone, after the returne of Caius Lelium, without whose aduice Scipio did not attempt any matter of consequence, and crossing a great cuntry, hee found all things quiet and fauourable for his armie: vpon the way he encountered Mandonius and Indibilis, who came to meet him with their troupes. Indibilis spake vnto Scipio for them all, not rashly or foolishly, after the manner of the Barbarians, but with great grauitie, modestie, and pertinent reasons, rather excusing than glorifying themselves, that they were come vnto him, leauing the Carthaginians partie; letting him vnderstand, That they did it not lightly, or vpon the first occasion: for they knew well, that the name of reuolt was execrable among old allies, and alwaies suspect vnto new, by the generall custome of all nations, the which (sayd he) I doe not disallow, so as the hatred which is borne vnto such men, be grounded vpon the cause, and not merely vpon the name of reuolt. Afterwards he made a discourse of that which they had done for the Carthaginians, and of the pride, couetousnesse, ingratitude, and wrongs which had bene done vnto them by their souldiors; protesting, that for these considerations they had long before resolved to adresse themselves vnto the Romanes, with whom they thought that iustice and respect had place, although their persons were in the Carthaginians armies. Moreouer he sayd, That they had recourse vnto the gods by prayers, who neuer suffer the violences and insolencies of men unpunished; and they entreated Scipio not to esteeme them lesse for their retreat vnto him, nor to value them more, but that he should hereafter vse them according to their merits, and according to the zeale and affection hee should find in them. Scipio answered, That he would doe so, and that he did not esteeme them rebels, which held not themselves tied to any alliances made with men, which make no account of any diuine or humane lawes; commanding, that their wiues and children should be presently deliuered vnto them: which was a pleasing and acceptable gift vnto these Spaniards. The next day Scipio hauing taken their oathes, and contracted with them, he sent them into their countries, to make new leuiues of men: afterwards, by the direction of these noblemen of Spaine, the Romane armie went to meet with the enemy.

Asdrubal was come to lodge his campe neere vnto Becula, a towne or riuier (for in this point the Authors are doubtfull, it may be it was both) beyond the riuier of Ebro, and had set gards and sentinels on horsebacke vpon the approaches; the which were at the first charged by the fore-runners, and by them of the Romane foreward; who made so small resistance, as they might easily iudge, how much the two parties did differ in courage. These horsemen made a speedie retreat towards their campe, being pursued by the Romanes, who carried their colours euen vnto the enemies trenches and rampiers; and hauing that day only quickened their courages a little, they planted their campe. In the night Asdrubal remoued his armie vnto the side of a hill, where there was a large plaine, hauing a riuier behind him, and on either side steepe craggie rocks. This place commanded another plaine, the which had also a steepe descent round about it, the which was hard to mount vnto. Asdrubal seeing the Romane armie in battaile in this lower plaine, he sent downe the Numidian horsemen, the souldiors of Maiorca, which were lightly armed, and the Africanes. Scipio went from ranke to ranke to encourage his men, telling them, That the enemy fled the fight, and

Asdrubal thinks to repaire their losses by a late saile.

Mandonius and Indibilis reuolt vnto the Romanes.

In reuolt the cause and not the name is to be regarded.

It is no rebellion to leave them which despoile God and nature.

Asdrubal comes towards the Romanes.

Scipio encourageth his armie to fight.

A and durst not come downe to battaile; but sought places of strength, as one that had no confidence in his vertue, nor armes: wherefore they should remember, that the walls of Carthage (which were much higher than those rampiers) could not hinder their entrie, and that there was no obstacle could repulse the vertue of the Romanes. To what end shall those high cliffes where they are lodged, serue? but to make them haue the greater fall when you shall chase them, and they flye to saue themselves; but I will stop that passage: and thus he encouraged his souldiors. Hee then sent two companies, the one to seize vpon the strait of the valley by the diours. Hee then sent two companies, the one to keepe the way, by the which they came from the which the riuier did run, and the other to keepe the way, by the which they came from the town by the vallies and passages of those hills into the open field. Then he led the most active and light souldiors, which had the day before broken the enemies gards, directly to them which were vpon the edge of the first plaine. When they began to mount, they found no other hinderance but the roughnesse of the way, but when they came to approach within the reach of their darts, they were presently entertained with a shower of arrowes, darts, and stones, whereof the souldiors and horse-boyes had abundance in that place. Although the place were hard to ascend, and the Romanes much galled with their darts, yet those which had bene accustomed to the assaults of townes, growing obstinate against all opposition, in the end got vp; then was the chance turned: for as soone as the Romanes could get any sure footing, and come to handie blowes with the enemy (where they were not so expert as in running and leaping) they were soone dislodged, and chased with great slaughter vpon their owne battaile, which stood in order vpon the hill. Then Scipio hauing commanded his victorious souldiors to pursue and to charge this battaillon in the middelt courageously, he diuided the rest of his troupes betwixt himselfe and Lelium, whom he commanded to compassse in that little hill on the right side, and to seeke some easie way to get vp vnto it, and he in the meane time went and charged the enemies vpon the flanke, who were much amazed and troubled, thinking to turne the head of their battaile against the Romanes, whose cries they heard on euery side, when as suddainely Lelium came vpon them: so, as being prest on all sides, they were soone disordered, they themselves opening their ranks, to giue passage to their companions which fled, hauing no meanes to retire in good order, in a place which was so strait and of such disadvantage. Here there was a great slaughter made, and it preuailed little to flye: for the gards which were set by Scipio vpon the passages, stayed them; yea, the multitude was partly stayed by the Captaines and Commanders, to saue the baggage, whilest the rest did fight: besides, their Elephants being terrified, were as hurtfull to them as to the Romanes. There died eight thousand of the Carthaginian armie. Asdrubal stayed not to the end of the battaile, but hauing sent some of the Elephants before with his souldiors, he retired almost in the beginning of the fight, following the riuier of Tayo, vntill hee got vnto the mountaines, where hee gathered them together that fled. Scipio seized vpon the enemies campe, and gaue all the spoyle vnto the souldiors, except the prisoners of free condition, whereof there were ten thousand foot and two thousand horse; among the which, as were Spaniards were set free without ranfon, and sent home to their houses: the such as were Africanes were deliuered to the Treasurer to be sold. The Spaniards which were in the Romane armie, as well those that were before yielded, as prisoners, running about Scipio's lodging, began to salute him with the title of King; but he let them vnderstand, that he was not pleased therewith: wherefore hauing enjoyned them to silence by a trumpet, he sayd vnto them: That he held himselfe sufficiently honoured to be called by his souldiors by that name which the Romanes in their tongue gaue vnto their Generall; which was, Imperator, as one would say, he that commands an Armie, which was a great title for him. As for the name of a King, it may be it was esteemed among other Nations, but the Romanes could not endure it: yet hee had a royall heart, and if they found such a disposition to be worthy of respect, they should be content to thinke so, and vse no more that word of King. The Barbarians did obserue an admirable greameffe of courage in Scipio, that being seated in so high a degree, yet hee contemned the title which all of their men doe so highly esteeme. After this, he bestowed presents vpon the noblemen of Spaine, and gaue three hundred horses to Indibilis, such as he would chuse of those which had bene taken.

As

He chargeth the enemies.

Asdrubal and the Carthaginians armie defeated by Scipio.

Scipio seeks to win the Spaniards by his bounty.

Scipio as a Roman deserts the title of a King.

As they were selling of the Africane prisoners, by the Generals command, there was a G goodly young stripling, whom the Treasurer (hearing that he was royally descended) sent to Scipio: being demanded by Scipio, What he was, and of whence, and why he followed armes being so young? he answered with teares, That he was a Numidian, and that his name was Mas-sinissa, who being left an Orphan, retired to Gala king of the Numidians, his grandfather by the mothers side, and there had bene bred up, and had followed his uncle Massinissa, who came lately into Spaine to succour the Carthaginians with some bands of horse: That before that time hee had neuer bene in any combat, for that his uncle restrained him, by reason of his tender age: but the day of the last charge he had stolne from him, and hauing found meanes to recouer horse and armes, he had thrust himselfe into the battaile with the rest, where he had bene ouerthrowne by the default of his horse, and was taken by the Romanes. Scipio commaunded, that this Numidian should be kept, vntill hee had finished that which concerned the publicke. Being afterwards retired to his tent, he sent for him againe, and asked him if he would returne to his vncl; who answered with great signes of joy, That he would be very glad. Then Scipio hauing giuen him a gold ring, a rich embroidered robe, a cassocke after the Spanish fashion, with a claipe of gold; and hauing mounted him vpon a good horse, with rich furniture, he sent him away, giuing him certaine knights to conduct him where hee pleased. These things being thus past, as they consulted among the Romanes touching the affaires of the warre, many were of opinion, That he should pursue Asdrubal; yet Scipio was content to place a garrison in the straits and passages of the mountaines, employing all the rest of the Summer to win the Spaniards by gifts and other fauours, receiuing many into the alliance and protection of the people of Rome.

17 In the meane time the two other captaines Mago and Asdrubal sonne to Gisgo came into base Spaine, to joynewith Asdrubal Barcinien, somewhat too late after his defeat, but very fitly to consult of their affaires. They saw the Spaniards were daily practised to reuolt, and that the Carthaginians should not be able to hold any one place in Spaine, if they did not speedily preuent it. Asdrubal of Gisgo relied much vpon the Spaniards which dwelt along the Ocean, and about Gadiz, whereas the Romanes had not yet bene: but the other two did foresee that the Romanes bountie would corrupt them as well as the rest, assuring themselves, that there was not any Communalitie, nor priuat man in Spaine, which began K not to wauer, and would neuer cease to reuolt, if they did not vse one meanes to preuent it:
 which was, That Asdrubal Barcinien should gather together all the Spaniards he could, and lead them into Italie, as it had bene formerly concluded: and by this means Spaine should be disarmed of her owne forces, and more easily kept in awe by feare; and as for their armies, they would supply them with other souldiours: and therefore they were of opinion, That Ma-go should leaue his troupes to Asdrubal Gisgo, and passe speedily into the Islands of Maiorca and Minorca, with store of treasure, to make good leuies of that nation: In the meane time Asdrubal of Gisgo should retire into the farthest bounds of the Lusitanians, to auoid all occasion of fighting with the enemy: That Massinissa with three thousand horse chosen out of all the bands, should spoyle the enemies country on this side the riuer of Ebro, and succour L their friends and faithfull allies. These things being concluded by the Carthaginian captains, were presently put in execution.

In the eleuenth yeare of the second Punicke warre, M. Marcellus and T. Quintius Crispinus being created Consuls at Rome, the gouernments of Spaine were confirmed for another yeare to P. Cor. Scipio and to M. Sillanus. The sea Armie in Spaine being eightie gallyes, as well of those which came out of Italie, as were taken at Carthage, were reduced vnto thirtie by a decree of the Senate, commaunding Scipio to send fiftie into Sardinia, as well for the defence of that Island, as of Italie, by reason of the great preparation which was made in A-fricke, whereas they said the Carthaginians did arme two hundred sayle, to come vpon the coast of Italie. This yeare Spaine was somewhat quiet, Asdrubal thinking onely of his voyage into Italie, and to prepare his armie, wherein he vsed exceeding great diligence, vntill he had passed the Pyrenes. Being entred into Gaule with great store of treasure, hee leuied souldiours of that nation, and assured his passage by the Alpes; the which did much trouble the Romanes: for they had then worke ynough to make head against Hannibal; but the wide-dome

Massinissa nephew to Scipio prisoner to the Romanes.

The Carthaginians resolve to carry all the Spanish souldiours out of Spaine, to preuent reuolts.

Asdrubal Barci-nien passeth into Italy.

A dome of C. Nero and M. Linius, the new Consuls for the yeare following, freed them of that care: who by an aduenturous, but a necessarie stratageme of warre, whilst they kept Ham-bal play in Apulia, defeated and slew Asdrubal, neere vnto Senegaille, with almost all the Spaniards, Gaules, and Ligurians, whereof his army consisted: a defeat which did recompence that of Canes, yet was it not without great effusion of bloud on the Romanes side, who lost about 8000 men. Yet this did assure their estate, which vntill that time had bene in great danger; and Hannibal vpon the newes of his brothers death, began to distrust his owne good successe and his countries.

Spaine during Asdrubals preparation, and a while after his passage into Italie, had some rest from warre, but they fell soone againe to armes. At that time Asdrubal, sonne to Gisgo, kept about the Island of Gades, and in the West marches, neere vnto the Ocean. The Romanes commaunded all along the Mediterranean sea, and held all that part of Spaine which lies towards the East. In the place of Asdrubal Barcinien they had sent Hanno from Carthage, with a new armie; who hauing passed the sea, joynewith Mago. These two had leuied among the Celtiberians (which is in the midst of Spaine) great troupes of souldiours, in a short space.
 Scipio sent M. Syllanus against this armie with 10000 foot and 500 horse; who making great marches, by difficult and strait passages, which are ordinarie in Spaine, he approached by the meanes of certaine Celtiberian guides (who had changed their partie) neere vnto the enemy, before they had any newes of him, being also aduertised by the same Celtiberians, when hee

C came within two leagues of them, that vpon the way hee should encounter two of their camps; that of Celtiberians, newly leuied, on the left hand, being some 9000 men; and the other of Carthaginians, on the right hand. As for these, they obserued good discipline, kept their gards, and had their sentinels placed in good order; but the others regarded it not, but were secure and carelesse, like new souldiours: who thinking themselves at home, apprehended nothing that was to be feared. Wherefore Syllanus marched first towards them, causing his troupes to goe on the left hand, as closely as they could, least the Carthaginians in the other lodging should discouer him. Then he sent forth some to discouer the enemies countenance, and marched speedily after them. He was now within lesse than halfe a league, before the enemy had any notice of his coming: for he went by broken wayes and deepe vallies full of trees, where he fed his armie: there they returned vnto him, whom he had sent forth to discouer, who confirmed that which the reuolted Spaniards had deliuered vnto him. Then the Romanes (leauing their baggage vpon the place) put themselves in battaile, and marched against the enemies, whom they found in great amazement, seeing the Romane armie so neere. Mago, who was in the other campe, posted thither vpon the first bruit, to put them in defence. There were some 4000 good souldiours among the Celtiberians, carrying targuets, and 200 horse, the which were set in the front, and the rest to second them were lightly armed; and in this manner they came to fight. They were scarce come without their ram-piers, when as the Romanes cast their darts at them, but the Spaniards stooped to auoid them: then rising suddainly againe, they cast theirs against the Romanes, who standing close, and covered with their targuets, defended themselves from any harme; but appoching neerer, they came to the sword. The place where they did fight was of great aduan-tage for the Celtiberians, by reason of the vneuenesse, whose custome was to skirmish with leapes and jumpes; contrarie to the Romanes, who fight close, and stand firme: and therefore this vneuen ground did not much trouble them, but that they were sometimes constrained to breake their ranks, by reason of the straits and lirtle groues, wherewith the country is full, fighting sometimes one to one, and two to two; the which did also hinder the enemies from flying, and exposed them to the slaughter. All those of the fore-ward which carried targuets, were in a manner slaine, and they continued killing and ouerthrowing those that were lightly armed, and the Carthaginians which were come to their succours, led by another Hanno, who was taken aliue: but Mago retired in the beginning of the battaile with about 3000 foot and all the horse, and the tenth day after came vnto Asdru-bals campe. The Celtiberian souldiours which remained, got home into their country through the woods and forrests. This victorie was very pleasing vnto Scipio, who did greatly extoll Syllanus his vertue, and was in hope to end the warre, if he did speedily set vpon Asdrubal, who remained in the remotest part of Spaine, in the Betique Prouince, which now

Asdrubal and his armie deſcend
 ed into Italie.

Hanno sent from Carthage into Spain with a new armie.

M. Syllanus sur-prized and de-feates the Carthaginians.

*Asdrubal breaks up his army, and leaves the field
to the Romans.*

is Andaloufie. He hauing intelligence, that Scipio marched towards him, dislodged from the place where hee encamped, and retired in great disorder towards the Island of Gades, then thinking, that whilst he had an armie in field, they would not cease to pursue him, he resolved to breake vp his campe, and to put his souldiours into garison, as well for their safetie, as the townes, and he himselfe went into the Island.

Scipio being aduertised, that the enemy had no armie in field, and seeing that he must make warre in diuers parts of the countrey, and besiege one towne after another, a matter of some difficultie, and of more toile than profit, he turned head again: yet for that he would not wholly abandon that part of Spain to the enemy, he left L. Scipio his brother with an army of 10000 foot and 1000 horse, to trie if he could take Auringe, the chiefe place of the country, situated in a fertile soyle, vpon the marches of the Mellefians, the inhabitants whereof were naturall Spaniards. There were certain mynes of siluer found, & it was Asdrubals retreat, from whence he made his courses into the countrey. L. Scipio being come neere the towne, before he did wholly besiege it, he sent some to parle with the inhabitants, to know their minds, and to persuade them rather to trie the Romans friendship than their armes. Preuailing nothing, he besieged it, and cast a trench about it, with a double pallisado, diuiding his armie into 3 troupes, the which should keepe the towne in continuall alarme. The first assault giuen by one of the three troupes was valiantly maintained, and their ladders, with the souldiours which mounted, throwne into the ditch, and the assailants were often in danger to be drawne vp with hooks of yron, which the besieged cast downe from the wals and towers, so as the Romans were forced to retire. L. Scipio finding that the small number which he had sent to the assault made the partie vnequall, hauing therefore caused the first to retire, he sent all the rest of his armie to giue a new assault: the which did so amaze the besieged, being tyred with the first assault, as the inhabitants abandoned the wals; and the garrison of Carthaginians thinking that the towne had bin yeilded, left their gards where they had bin set, and put themselves into one body. The inhabitants fearing, that if the enemy forced the towne, they should be all put indifferently to the sword, resolved to prevent this danger by yeelding: and hauing opened a gate, they went forth in troupes, carying only their targuets, to defend themselves from the Romans darts, and holding vp their right hands naked in sign of peace, they let the Romans vnderstand that they yeilded. It is doubtfull whether they did vnderstand their meaning, seeing them come a far off, or whether the Romans did doubt some fraud; but they charged these poore Spaniards, and cut them all in peeces, and by the same port entred the towne with their colours flying, killing all they met without exception, & in the meane time some of their troupes forced the other gates, and made way vnto their companions. The horsemen being entred, seized vp on the chiefe places, as they were commaunded, being followed by them which they called Triares, which are footmen, fighting alwaies in the rereward, to second where need required. The rest of the le-gionaries dispersed themselves throughout the towne, putting all to the sword. In the end the Carthaginians were taken prisoners, and some 300 of the inhabitants: the rest which remained after the furie were pardoned, and their houses and libertie yeilded them. There died at the taking of this towne 2000 of the enemies, and some 90 of the Romans. It was a pleasing exploit to them that did execute it, but especially to P. Scipio, who commended Lucius his brother with all the honorable tearmes he could, equalling the taking of Auringe to that of Carthage: and seeing winter approached, & that there was little reason to pursue Asdrubal, & lesse to undertake the siege of Calis, he retired with his campe on this side Ebro, & sent his souldiours to winter. He sent L. Scipio to Rome, with newes of that which had bin done, and with him he sent Hanno, one of the enemies captains, and many other great prisoners: this done, he retired to Tarracoe.

*The Romans
besiege Auringe.*

*Auringe taken
by L. Scipio.*

19 The Romans after this good successe were in hope to chase their enemies out of Spain: for hauing defeated one of their armies, taken one of their chiefe commanders, the rest of their forces being disbanded, and forced to liue within their forts and garisons, in the farthest parts of the countrey, Scipio thought there was now no cause of any present feare, but that he might dispose of his affaires at leysure: yet he was deceived: for Spaine by reason of their stirring spirits, and the opportunitie of places, was in that respect as fit as any Region in the world (after such defeats) to leuie new armies, and to reuiuie the warre. Asdrubal then, sonne to Gisgo (who did second the Barcins in wisdome and valour worthie of a great Commander) being assisted by Mago, sonne to Amilcar, did so deale with the Spaniards,

as

A as he leuied 50000 foot and 4500 horse of that nation, beyond the riuier of Ebro: he mustered them neere vnto the towne of Sylpia, and there did the two Carthaginian captains encampe, being resolved to accept of a battaile if it were offered. Scipio aduertised of this great vnexpected preparation, drew his Legions to field, although he held them not sufficient to oppose against so mightie an armie. As for the succours of Spanish allies, his meaning was to make some shew vnto the enemy: yet would he not fortifie himselfe with so great troupes, as he should haue cause to feare his ruine by their trecherie, as had happened vnto his father and vnckle: wherefore he sent Syllanus to Colca, who commaunded ouer 28 townes, to demand the succours of horse and foot, which he had promised to enroll during the Winter: and he himselfe going from Tarracoe, as he passed by the townes of his allies, tooke vp such souldiours as he thought good, and came to Castulo, whereas Syllanus met him with 3000 foot and 500 horse. From thence he marched beyond Becula, hauing in his armie, as well of citizens of Rome, as of allies, of foot and horse about 45000 fighting men. As they made their lodging, and did rampier it after the accustomed manner, behold Mago and Masinissa come with all their horsemen, and charge them that were busie at worke; whom they had put to rout, if Scipio had not caused certaine bands of horsemen to gard them, being in battaile behind a little hill, who aduanced against the first that were approached neere the rampiers, forcing them to retire in the beginning without any great difficultie. The fight was long, and somewhat doubtfull against them which came afterwards close and in good order, but when as the Romane bands which were dispersed here and there approached, and that the souldiours which laboured at the rampiers, left their worke and fell to armes (being so commaunded) the wearied refreshed with new supplies, and greater numbers coming still from the campe, then the Numidians and Carthaginians finding the charge hote, retired in the beginning in good order, but being ouerpressed by multitudes, they could no longer make head, but were put to rout, every man sauing himselfe as he could. This encounter did puffe vp the hearts of the one, and abate the courage of the others, yet there were daily skirmishes betwixt the horsemen and them that were lightly armed. In the end Asdrubal put his army into battaile, the which Scipio did also on his part: but either armie continued in that manner neere his fort, vntill the euening: whereupon first the Carthaginians and then the Romanes retired into their campes, and thus they continued for certaine dayes together, Asdrubal comming first to field, and making his retreat first, without any attempt one against another. The Romans held the middle part in their battaile, and the Carthaginians did the like in theirs, being mixt with Africans: vpon the wings in either armie were their allies, all Spaniards: before the Carthaginians battaile were their Elephants, which a farre off shewed like cattles, and it was giuen out, That the armies should fight in that manner, and that the Romanes and Carthaginians (betwixt whom the quarrell was, holding the middest of the battailes) should encounter with like armes and courage. Scipio hearing that this opinion was generally beleueed, changed the order of his battaile: wherefore at night hee caused warning to bee giuen secretly throughout the campe, That every one should be readie for the breake of day, that both men and horse should refresh themselves, the horsemen should be armed, and the horses saddled and bridled: And when as day began to appeare, he sent all his horsemen, and the footmen that were lightly armed, against the Corps de gard, which were vpon the approaches of the enemies campe, and then he marched himselfe with the whole armie, hauing against the expectation both of his own souldiours and of the enemy set the Romans vpon either wing, and the troupes of their allies in the midst. Asdrubal moued at the noyse which his horsemen made, goes out of his tent, and seeing the tumult which was before the trenches and palisadoes of his campe, the final assurance of his souldiours, the enemies colours glistering a far off, and all the fields couered with their troupes, he presently sends forth his horsemen against the Roman horse, and he himselfe hauing put his footmen in battell, goes out of his campe, without changing any thing of his former order. The horsemens encounter continued long, without any aduantage: for whe as any one was forced to giue back (the which was ordinarie on either side) they had a safe retreat to their squadrons of foot: but after that the bodies of both armies were neere one vnto another, Scipio giuing a signe, caused his horse to retire, & opening the ranks of foot, received them within the battell: then he placed them in two squadrons behind the points of it, to reinforce and support his foot; and when he saw it was time to charge, he commanded the battaillon in

Scipio trusts not his men, and sends his father had done.

*Mago and Mas-sinissa charge
the Romans.*

The two armies in battaile resist so long.

G ij

The Romanes
and the Carthaginians were in bataille.

the middest (which were all Spaniards) to march softly: he himselfe leading the right point, had giuen charge to Syllanus and Martius (who had charge on the other side) that as they should see him aduance, they should doe the like, and begin the battaile with the enemy, with the most resolute of their horse and foot, before the two squadrons in the middest should come to joyne. Wherefore stretching forth in this manner both the wings, either of them with three companies of foot and as many horse, and some forlorne hopes lightly armed, went with all speed to affront the enemy, whilst the others followed. Betwixt both wings there was a void place, for that the Spaniards marched more slowly; and they had already begun the charge on either side, when as the chiefe strength of the enemy (which consisted in the Carthaginians and old African souldiours) was yet a crosse-bow shot off, and durst not turne towards the wings to succour their companions, least they should leaue the battaile naked and open to the enemy, who came against them. The horsemen and Roman souldiours did wonderfully gale the enemies wings vpon the flanks, the companies of foot which made the point, prest them in front, and sought to cut off the wings from the rest of the battaile, and euen now the partie was not equall in any part: for besides that the points of the Carthaginians armie were furnished with horse-boyes and Spaniards newly leuied, who had to deale with Romanes and braue Latine souldiours, the day being far spent, Asdrubals armie grew weake, for that they had beene surpris'd by the alarme in the morning, and were forced to put themselves in battaile without feeding; the which Scipio had done of purpose, and to that end had delayed the fight for many houres, beginning it as late as he could. It was past noone before the foot companies which were in the wings began to charge, and much later before the battaillons in the middest did joyne, so as before that all their forces came to fight, the heat of the Sunne, the toyle being so long on foot, laden with armes, hunger, and thirst, had so tyred the Carthaginians and young Africans, as they were forced to support themselves vpon their targuets, they were so faint. Besides the Elephants (terrified with the furious combat which was vpon either wing) had run through their middle battaillon. Wherefore the Carthaginians tyred in bodie, and fainting in courage, began to recoyle, but without disorder, euen as if they had retired by their Generals commaund. But the victorious Romanes charging them with great resolution on all sides, when as they found them to shrink, notwithstanding all the persuasions of Asdrubal to keepe their ranks vnto the next hils, where they had a safe retreat (being not able to withstand the enemies force) they all turned their backs and fled, feare being of more force than shame. Being come vnto the foot of those hils, they would haue stayed their ensignes, and rallied themselves to make head against the Romanes, who had made a stand to put themselves in order to assaile them: but when they saw they were eagerly pursued, they fled into the fortification of their campe, with great amazement, being chased so neere by the Romanes, as they had almost entred pell-mell with them. There fell so great a shower after the heat of the Sunne, as they which pursued, were forced to stand still, and to retyre with great toyle vnto their campe: yea, there were some which did superstitiously beleue, That it was not good to proceed any farther that day. Although the night and the raine did inuite the Carthaginians (who were tyred and wounded) to take some rest; yet feare and danger made them to fortifie their campe with all expedition, which they presumed would be assailed by the enemy at the breake of day: and seeing they could not conquer by armes, they rayed their rampiers with stones, gathered out of the neere valleys. Hereupon they did see themselves abandoned by their allies: wherefore they thought it best to be gone, holding flight more safe for them than any force. The beginning of the Spaniards reuolt was by Atanes Lord of the Turditanes, who passed vnto the Romans campe vnto the Romanes by such as had them in gard. Asdrubal fearing this mischief would grow greater, trussed vp his baggage and dislodged. Scipio being aduertised in the morning, that the enemy was gone, sent his horsemen after them, and then marched after with the Legions and the rest of the armie with all speed: who if they had followed them the right way, they had soone overtaken them: but they trusted to their guides, who assured them of another way, which conducted them to the riuier of Betis, where they might cut off their passage. Asdrubal hearing that way was stopped, was once in mind to haue retired towards the Ocean: but deceiues Asdrubal.

Scipios policie

Feare is of more force than shame

Treacherie of the Spaniards to the Carthaginians,
their allies.

A but his souldiours (observing no kind of discipline) marched like men that fled, so as they got some ground of the Roman Legions; yet the horsemen and souldiours which were lightly armed, pursued them still, and did not abandon them; but charging them sometimes in the rere, and sometimes in the flanke, did stay them and force them to fight, vntill the Legions arrived: then was there no more any combat, but a slaughter, as of sheepe, vntill that their Generall (the author of their flight) saved himselfe with about seuen thousand men, most without armes; the rest were in a manner all slaine or taken. The Carthaginians which escaped with their captaine, entrenched themselves suddainly vpon a mount, and there defended themselves easily against the Romanes, who did strue to get vp; yet being in a naked and desart place, and vnto to endure a siege of few dayes; many disbanded and went to the Romanes campe: the which Asdrubal perceiving, he abandoned his souldiours, embarked himselfe, and passed into the Iles of Calis. Scipio aduertised of his flight, left Syllanus with tenne thousand foot and a thousand horse to besiege their campe, and he with the rest of the armie returned in 70 daies to Tarracone, where he should dispose of the affaires of the princes and noblemen of Spaine; and giue rewards according to euery ones merit.

An absolute defeat of the Carthaginians.

After his departure, Syllanus had secret conference with Masimissa, who hauing new designes in his head, passed into Africke with a small traine, that he might draw his people to his owne humor. The cause of his suddaine change did not then appeare, the which he did afterwards iustifie by a long and constant loyaltie, wherein hee did persist vntill his death. C Mago did also passe into the Island of Gades, Asdrubal hauing sent backe the vessels: so as the armie (being abandoned by the Commanders) was disperfed, some sauing themselves by flight in the neighbour townes, and some yeelding to the Romanes. In this manner were the Carthaginians chased out of Spaine, about the twelfth yeare of the second Punick warre, by the conduct and happinesse of Publius Scipio, five yeares after that he had had the charge of the armies and government of Spaine. Within few daies after Syllanus came to Scipio, being at Tarracone, bringing him newes, that the warre was ended. L. Scipio was sent from thence to Rome, with many prisoners of marke to carrie newes of the absolute victorie obtained of the Carthaginians in Spaine. But Scipio not content to haue effected so great matters in that countrey, had a greater designe, so great was his mind, and so desirous of glorie. D Wherefore knowing, that there was not any one man to make head against him in Spaine, he embraced all Africke, whither he passed to make factions, and to trouble the Carthaginians Estate: the which succeeded happily, but it may be with greater hazard than was fit for his ranke.

The Carthaginians chased out of Spaine.

Great dangers accompany great enterprizes.

Pub. Cornelius Scipio being returned out of Africke, where he had withdrawne from the alliance of the Carthaginians king Siphax their neighbour, and although hee did now see Spaine quiet in respect of the Africans; yet he knew, that some townes did containe themselves more for feare than for any loue, as those which had greatly incensed the Romanes during the precedent warres: the first and chiefe, either in greatnesse or offence, were Castulo and Illiturgis: Those of Castulo had shewed themselves friends during the prosperitie of the Romanes; but after the defeat and death of the two Scipios, they had reuolted to the Carthaginians. The Illiturgis had done worse: for besides their reuolt, they had deliuered such as had saved themselves there after these defeats, to the slaughter. These crimes were wisely dissembled by Scipio, when hee came first into the Prouince, and that matters were yet doubtfull: for if he should then haue punished them, he should haue respected iustice more than profit. All things being now assured and quiet, hee thought it a fit time to punish them. Wherefore hauing called Lu. Martius to Tarracone, he sent him to besiege Castulo, with the third part of his forces; and hee himselfe departing from Carthage, led the rest of his armie before Illiturgis, whither he came in five dayes march. The inhabitants doubting, that they would not leaue their trecheries unpunished, had fortified their towne, and furnished themselves with all things necessarie to endure a siege. Scipio let his souldiours vnderstand, That these Spaniards did rightly feare that which they had merited, exhorting them to goe against them with greater furie than against the Carthaginians themselves. For (sayd he) the quarrell which wee haue had against them of Carthage, was onely for glorie and desire of rule, but wee take armes against these men, to punish them for their wickednesse and cruell treason. The time is now come, when wee shall reuenge the murders done

Castulo and Illiturgis reuolted and rebellious townes.

Not expedient
at all times to be iust.

Scipio besiegeth Illiturgis.

vnto any companions, and the trecherie which they had prepared for you: if you had fallen into their hands after the defeat: and therefore let vs deale so, as neuer any Nation shall hereafter dare to wrong the souldiers or citizens of Rome in any disgrace whatsoever. Having animated his souldiers with these words, hee commaunded ladders should be brought, and distributed to the most assured companies: then diuiding his armie into two, he commaunded, That Leilius his Lieutenant should assaile the towne on the one side, and he would lead the rest into diuers places; the which was executed with great courage and resolution. The towne-men had no need of any captain to encourage them in their defence: for euery one knowing his danger, was both a spurre to himselfe and his companion, saying, That it was not the honour of a victorie which they fought of them, but their punishment: That they must make an account to die, but it was more honest and safe to hazard it fighting (whereas euery one giueth as well as taketh, and oftentimes the vanquished suffer, and the victor faileth) rather than to be led bound and manacled (after that wee shall haue scene our towne burnt to ashes) to end our liues with torment, and all ignominie, in the sight of our wiues and children, who shall be made slaues. Wherefore they came resolutely to the walls, not onely such as were able to carrie armes, but old men, women, and children, which made resistance about their forces; they brought stones, and gaue armes to those that did fight. It was not onely a question of libertie which giueth courage to valiant men, but they did apprehend the horror of punishments, and the vild and ignominious death which they should suffer: euery one tooke courage, seeing his companions valour: Wherefore if it was well assailed, it was better defended: so as this Romane armie, which had subdued all Spaine, being often repulsed by the inhabitants, did shamefully wauer. Which Scipio perceiuing, he feared least his men should faint after so many vaine attempts, and the enemies should grow more hardie, wherefore hee thought it needfull to hazard his owne person, and to bee partaker of the danger: whereupon he commaunded them to make ready their ladders againe, and reproching the souldiers of cowardise, he aduanced to mount himselfe (if he had found them slacke) and came neere vnto the wals, not without great danger: but the souldiers being very carefull of their Generall, began all to crie out, and carried ladders to all parts. Le-lius did also presse them on his side: so as then the valour of the defendants was forced to giue place, and they abandoned the rampiers. It happened, that during this tumult, the fort which was held impregnable was surpris'd: for certaine souldiers of Africke reuolted, which were in the Romane armie, seeing that they of the towne were busied to withstand an assault in the most dangerous places, and the Romanes as busie to get an entrie into the towne, they obserued the highest part of the towne, couered with a steepe rocke, which had neither rampier, gard, nor defence. These men being active and nimble, began to creepe vp this rocke, with the helpe of certaine pykes of yron, which they did strike into the stones, and made steps of them, the first helping vp their companions which followed;
 so as in the end they got vp to the top of the rocke, from whence they began to run with horrible cries towards the towne, which was already woon by the Romanes. Then shewed they the fruits of their choler and hatred: none were spared, but all put to the sword, men, and women, of all ages and sexes; yea, and poore infants: no man cared for spoyle, the fire deuoured what might be consumed, and the rest was ruined, for that the Romanes would not leave the marks of a towne, nor the memorie of any habitation of such enemies.

From thence Scipio led his armie to Castulo. This towne was not onely kept by Spaniards, which were come thither from diuers places, but also by the remainder of the Carthaginians, which were brought thither to garrison after the retreat of their armie. But before that Scipio arrived, they had newes of the taking of Illiturgis, which stricke a great terror among them, and made them almost to despair: and as euery mans guilt was not alike, so euery one sought to provide for his owne safetie. Wherefore they began to distrust one another, and in the end fell to an open diuision, the Spaniards separating themselves from the Carthaginians: Cordubelus commaunded the Spaniards, who spake openly, That they must yeeld vnto the Romans: Himilco was chiefe of the Carthaginians, whom Cordubelus deliuered vp with the towne vnto the Romans. By this voluntarie reddition, being also not so culpable as they of Illiturgis, the victorie was vsed with lesse rigor.

22. From

The remembrance of great crimes make men desparat.

Honor and libertie animate
 valiant men.

Scipio obstinate so vanquish or die.

Miturgis taken,
and the execution
on cruel,

And quite ruined.

*Cordubelmus yeeli deth vp Castulo,
and the Carthaginian Garrison.*

Lib. 2. The Generall Historie of the world. 1.

A 22. From thence Martius was sent against them of that nation, which plaid the rebels, to subject them to the Romane yoke; and Scipio returned to new Carthage, to performe the vowes which he had made vnto his gods, and to represent the games of fencing which he had prepared in honour of his defeated father and vncle. These fencers which were brought forth, were none of his slaves, nor such as had bene made free, which the master fencers were wont to present vnto the people, which sell their blood, and are hired for money: but all those that did fight, came willingly without any fee: for some were sent by the noblemen of the countrey, to shew the valour and dexteritie of the nation, others presented themselves vnto the combat, for the loue they bare vnto their Generall; others thrust forth with glorie, defied, or being challenged, accepted the combat willingly. Some there were, which not able to end their suites by pleading, resolved erie it by the sword, who were of no base condition, but gentlemen of noble families. Among others Corbis and Orsua, two cousin germes, who contended for the principalltie of the towne of Ibis, would end their controuersie by armes. Corbis was the elder. The father of Orsua had lately ruled in that towne, having succeeded to that seigniorie by the death of his brother. Scipio would haue reconciled them by justice, and knowledge of the cause; but they both answered, That it was not the custome among kinsfolkes, and that they would not haue any gods nor men to be their judges, but Mars. Corbis was the stronger, and Orsua the more courageous, by reason of his youth, both resolute to die, rather than to submit himselfe vnto his aduerser partie. With this resolution they shewed themselves to the whole armie. The eldest also had more experience in his weapon, and was more cunning, so as he did easily vanquish the foolish presumption of the younger. To these fights of fencers were added funerall plaies, according to the manner of the Pagans, with preparation fit for the countrey, and as at the warre.

C

23. When the day was come, the Romanes lost no time, Scipioes lieutenants being seriously

23 During these shewes, the Romanes loſt no time, Scipioes lieutenants being ſeriously employed about their affairs. Martius hauing paſt the riuer Betis (called Circe by them of the country) tooke two good and rich townes, without ſtriking ſtroke. There was another town called Aſtapa, the which had alwayes held the Carthaginians partie, and made profeſſion to hate the Romanes deadly, yea when there was not any neceſſitie of warre: and yet their town was neither ſtrong by nature, nor art, whereby they ſhould grow proud: but the nature of theſe men (who had no delight but in theeuery) had cauſed them to ſpoile the countries of the Romanes allies, and to ſtrip their victuals, ſouldiours, or merchants, if they found them ſcattered; yea they had layd an ambuſh for a great troupe of men paſſing through their country, and hauing ſurpriſed them in a ſtrait, had ſlaine them. When as the armie came before the town, the inhabitants prickt with the feeling of their faults, expected no mercie of their enemies, and ſeeking no meanes to hold againſt a ſiege, they tooke a cruell and deteſtable reſolution: for they brought into the miſſet of their market place all that was good and precious within the town, and laied it on a heape, vpon the which they ſet their wiues and children; then they planted great ſtore of ſagots and other wood round about it: this being done, they appointed ſiftie yong men well armed, for the gard thereof, enioying them, that whileſt the euent of the fight betwixt them and the Romanes was doubtfull, they ſhould remaine there, and be faithfull guardians of their goods, and of thoſe perſons whom they held deereſt: but if they ſaw it ſucceeded ill, and that the town was in daunger to bee loſt, they might then be aſſured, that all they which had fallied out vpon the enemies were ſlaine in the fight: wherefore they did conjure them by all the celeſtiall and infernall gods, to remember their liberties, which that day ſhould end by an honeſt death, or by an infamous ſeruitude: and therefore they ſhould not leaue any thing that belonged vnto them, wherewith the enemy in his furie might glut his crueltie: to which end they had both fire and ſwords in their hands; and that therefore ſuch things as were to periſh, ſhould be deſtroyed by the hands of their faithfull friends, rather than be expoſed to the ſceme and infolenzie of the enemy. This ſpoken, they added an execrable curſe vpon thoſe that ſhould ſuffer themſelues to be moued; with any pittie or tenderneſſe of heart, and forbore to execute that which they had decreed; then hauing opened the gate, they marched directly to the Romanes trenches, with more than a brutiſh furie. The Romanes had no conceit they ſhould fall ſo forth vpon them, wherefore they found the paſſages vnto the campe but ill garded. Some troupes of horſe and foot

1- Combats upon furious ambitions

Q. A suit decided by armes.

fes- Астава.

und Astapians despe- rati shoenes.

number A barbarous &
 rude: detestable reser- vation of the
 ene- Asians.

lightly armed, were suddenly sent out against them, where they came to fight with more furie than good order: Wherefore the horsemen which came first to charge the enemy (being repulsed) amazed the footmen, so as the Astapians had come vnto the Romanes campe, if the legions (hauing some little leasure) had not put themselves into battell. There the enemies like madde men, ran desperately vpon their weapons: but the old souldiours keeping their ground, and ouerthrowing the foremost, slayed them that followed: then seeking to beat them backe, finding them obstinately resolu'd to dye where they stood, they opened their battailon, compassing them in with the multitude, and slew them all. This was done like fouldiours, against incensed enemies, that were armed: but within the towne there was a barbarous slaughter, where as the citizens themselves murdered the weake vnarmed multitude of their wiues and little children, casting their bodies yet breathing into the fire, whose bloud did in a manner quench the flames. In the end being tyred with this pitifull slaughter of their owne, they leapt armed as they were into the midst of the fire. Thereupon the victorious Romanes entred, who beholding this cruell spectacle, stood amazed for a season: then seeing the gold and siluer shine through the fire (thrust on with greedinesse) they went in to gather it vp; but many of them were roasted in the fire, being kept in by the prease that followed them.

Thus ended the siege of Astapa, being consumed by fire, with all her treasure, whereas the Romans got no spoile. After this exploit Martius tooke in many other places of the country, which yielded to his mercie, and then returned with his victorious armie to new Carthage.

About this time there came certaine deputies secretly out of the island of Gades, who promised to yeeld vp the towne with the Gouvernour, into the Romans hands, and all the Carthaginians which were there in garrison. Mago was retired thither, after the dissolution of the campe, when as he was forced to flie, who hauing gathered together certaine ships, assembled some troups out of Spaine and Africke, neere vnto the strait. These citizens being heard, and hauing plighted their faith one vnto another, to obserue what had bene promised, they were sent backe. Scipio sent Martius thither by land with his ablest troups (and Lelius by sea) with seven gallies and a galleasse; to the end, that with a mutual consent they should mannage this enterprize both by sea and land.

24. Whilest they are busie to surprise Gades, Scipio fell verie sick, but it was made greater, according to the common custome of men: the which did much trouble the whole countrie, and euen those that were farthest off: and it seemed by the discord which grew of this false brute, that if it had bene true, it would haue bred a great alteration of the affaires in Spaine; for neither the allies, nor the Romanes armie, could containe themselves in their duties. Mandonius and Indibilis being sorie that the effect was not answerable to their conceptions, which was, to make themselves kings, as soone as the Carthaginians were expelled, mooued the Lacetanes of their countrey to armes, with many Celtiberians, foraging and spoiling the fields of the Suesitanes and Sederanes, who were allied to the Romanes. Besides, there grew a mutinie in the Romanes campe, neere vnto the riuer of Sucro, or Xucar, where as there lay eight thousand men in garrison, to keepe the people in awe on this side the riuer of Ebro. These troups had begun to grow disordered, before the vncertaine brute of Scipios death: which grew through idleness, the which doth commonly fall out, when as souldiours want employment. Then they grew licentious, and discontented, for that being accustomed to take spoiles, and to riot at their enemies charges, during the warres, they now saw themselves restrained, and gouerned according to the orders of the time, when as the warre ceased. And these were their reasons. If they make warre (said they) in any part of Spaine, why doe they keepe vs here, where there is no employment? If the warre be ended, why doe they not lead vs backe into Italie? Then they demanded their pay after an insolent manner, nor like vnto souldiours well disciplined. When the capitaines and officers of companies went the round in the night, those that were in the corps de gard vsed many opprobrious speeches against them. Some stealing forth in the night, spoiled the countrey of their friends and neighbours: yea they grew so insolent, as euen in the day time they would goe out of the campe, and abandon their ensignes without leaue. Finally, all was done after the appetite of fouldiours which were without order or discipline, and without any command of their heads

The Astapians do barbarously murder their owne wiues and children.

The Gaditanes offer to deliuer their town vnto the Romanes.

Scipio falls verie sick.

Mandonius makes Indibilis distrustful

Idleness makes souldiours insolent and mutinous.

They that are accustomed to live vpon spoile, cannot subiect themselves to discipline.

A heads and Tribunes; onely they were content there should be some forme of a Roman campe maintained, and did suffer the capitaines to sit in their accustomed places to doe iustice: they tooke the word from them, went to the gard in their turnes, and set their sentinels. And although they had in a manner suppressed the authoritie of their commanders, yet they made a shew to obey them, whom in truth they commanded. This they did, thinking that in the end their capitaines, being infected with their frenzie, would joyne with them. But when they saw that they reprehended them sharply, and that they sought to suppress their furies, they openly refused to be companions vnto them in their insolencies, they chafed them first from their seats, and in the end forced them to forsake the campe. Which done, they began to chuse the most seditious among them for their leaders and capitaines, creating with a general consent C. Abius Calenus, and C. Arrius Vmber, simple souldiours, to be their Tribunes: who not contented to take the markes of Tribunes, presumed to vsurpe the authoritie of the Soueraigne head, causing rods and axes to be carried before them, not remembering that those rods and axes wherewith they thought to terrifie other men, should fall vpon their owne shoulders: for the conceit they had of Scipios death, did blind their vnderstandings, imagining they would presently take armes throughout all Spaine, and that in these tumults they should haue meanes to spoyle the champion countrey, and to ransacke townes; and that any excessse in such a tumultuous time, would be held light. As they did expect from time to time fresh newes not onely of Scipios death, but also of his funerall, when as they saw that not any one did come, and that this bruit did vanish by little and little, they began to find their owne errors, demanding in a rage, Where they were that had abused them with that vnto the Colonels to pacifie the mutinies.

D rals fear and lodging, if they found any assembled together, they spake mildly vnto them, demanding the reason of their alteration, and blaming in some sort their actions. Their general excuse was, That they were not payed, and that they had bene carefull to punish them of Illiturgis for their wickednesse committed after the defeat of two armies, and of two great capitaines, but not rewarded their deserts, which after these misfortunes had maintained the honour of Rome, and preferred the countrey by their vertue and valour. The Tribunes or Colonels seemed to allow of their reasons; saying, That they would make report thereof vnto Scipio, and that they were exceeding glad there was no harme, but that might be easily cured: that (thanks be to God) Scipio and the commonweale of Rome, had meanes both to content and reward them.

E Scipio was better acquainted with warre than with ciuile seditions, so as he was somewhat troubled how he should carrie himselfe in this action, fearing that as the fouldiours had done in their excessse, so he in punishing them might exceed measure: he therefore resolu'd to proceed with mildnesse. There were collectors sent presently to the tributarie townes, to leuie money, giuing the fouldiours hope by that meanes, that within few dayes they should be mustered and paid: and then he made a proclamation, That all the fouldiours should come to new Carthage, to receiue their pay, either all together, or by companies apart. In the meane time the Spaniards which were rebelled, retired home to their houses, the which did wholly pacifie the sedition in the Romanes campe. Mandonius and Indibilis being aduertised, that Scipio was liuing, gaue over their enterprize, and were abandoned by all those that had followed them, finding not any one, neither Romanes nor stranger, that would bee a companion of their follies.

There grew a question among the seditious, Whether they should goe to Carthage or not, euerie one casting what was most safe and expedient for them: if they must needs goe, whether they should goe all together, or in companies one after another: in the end they resolu'd,

The Roman capitaines chased out of their camp by the mutinied fouldiours.

In a confusion of the state all excessse seems light.

The discretion of the Colonels to pacifie the mutinies.

The mutinous fouldiours refuse to submit themselues to Scipios mercie.

ued, that their best course was to submit themselves vnto Scipios mercie, saying, That he had G pardoned enemies, and that their offence was none of the greatest, for there had not beene any man slaine nor wounded: And for the safest, they should goe all together. Whilest they consulted what they should doe, they also resolved at Carthage, how they should intreat them: Some were of opinion to punish them all in generall, saying, That it was a meere rebbellion, and no sedition: others aduised to punish the authors onely, which might bee some five and thirtie in all. This aduice was followed, that the punishment should end whereas the offence began. And to the end they should not thinke this counsell was held to punish the seditious, as soone as euer they came forth, a proclamation was made, That euerie one should haue his horse and armes readie to march against Mandonius and Indibilis, and that H they should giue order to haue victuals readie for certaine dayes, and to make other preparations for the armie, which should march.

The feuen Tribunes which had beene sent to the mutined fouldiours, and who had pacified them with good words, were sent againe to meet them; to either of which was giuen a note, in the which were written five names of the authors of this disorder, with commandement, That being among them, either of them should seeke to draw them that were in his roll into his lodging, and there make them good cheere, and to drinke of the best vntill they were drunke, and then to put them into safe keeping, without any brute. These troupes approached to new Carthage, and vnderstood by all those they met, that the next day they should march against the Lucetanes, vnder the conduct of Syllanus and Lelius: the which did greatly reioyce them, not onely freeing their hearts from feare, but also perswading themselues, I that by that means their Generall should rather be in their power, than they in his. About Sunne set they entred into the towne, finding the other fouldiours preparing themselues to march. They were entertained with words fit for the businesse which was in hand; That their comming was pleasing vnto the Generall, the other armie being readie to march, with such like words. They lodged and refreshed themselues, and the heads of the mutines were drawne by a deuice into certaine houses, where they were taken and bound. A little before day the baggage of the armie which they made shew should dislodge, began to march, and at the breake of day the companies followed: but they stayed at the gates, whereas they set good gards, that no fouldiour might goe out of the towne. Then they called these fouldiours K newly come, to the assemblie, who came before the Generals Tribunall with great arrogan-cie, as if they would haue terrified him. Then the Generall went vp to his seat of iustice, and at the same time the companies which were in armes at the gates, were called backe, who compassed them in behind, they being vnarmed: then their hearts began to faint, and that which did most amaze them (as they confessed afterward) was the vigorous countenance of Scipio, whom they expected to finde leane and pale. Hauing continued there some space without any word speaking, vntill the chiefe offendours were brought vnto the place; they being come, he began to reprehend them sharply, for that contrarie to their duties and the naturall bond they had vnto their country, and against the oath made vnto their commaun-ders, they had shewed themselues rebels, disobedient, perjured, and enemies both in word L and deed: hauing followed men that were not well borne, nor esteemed for any vertue, but rascals, to whom they had giuen full power and command ouer them, such as Atrius Vm-ber, and Calenus Albius. I do not thinke that you haue all runne willingly into this furie, but that some were the motives and beginners, and the rest were infected by their acquaintance, as with the plague: when I consider that the brute of my death hath beene received, beleueed, and hoped for among my fouldiours; who haue so carried my selfe, as I need not feare that any one in Spaine (the Carthaginians being chased away) should hate my life, no not our enemies themselues. I beleue then, that our whole armie is not so ill affected, but if it were so, I would willingly dye here in your presence:
I beleue rather, that this mischief hath proceeded from the malice of some few. But I will forbear to speake of my selfe, and suppose you haue my name in detestation, and disdain my command: thinke M of your offences, and consider how great they are against your country, your parents and children, against the gods, witnesses of your oathes and promises, against your commaunders and captaines, against all order and martiall discipline, and against the manners of your ancestors. What offence had your country done you, that you should take armes against it, and betray it, in conferring your own-

The heads of the seditious are punished for the multitude.

Scipio makes a notable inuer-sive against the seditious fouldi-ours.

A counsels with Mandonius and Indibilis. what had the commonweale of Rome committed, whose maiestie you haue traden vnder foot, wresting the authoritie out of the Tribunes hands, who were created by the peoples voyces, to giue it vnto priuat men? and not content to haue them for Tribunes, you haue giuen them the markes of a Generall, to them I say, who neuer yet commaunded ouer a poore flaue. Albius and Atrius haue bene lodged in the Generals tent, by you Romanes, the trumpet hath sounded before them, they haue giuen you the word, they haue set in the Proconsull Scipios chayre, they haue had an officer to make place, when as they had the rods and axes caried before them. what more monstrous and detestable crimes can you imagine? the which in tructh cannot bee purged, but by the blood of such as haue committed them. But what frenzie made you presume, being but B eight thousand men (better without doubt than Albius and Atrius, to whom you haue subiected your selues) to be able to take the prouince of Spaine from the Romanes by force, I being dead or alie, the rest of the Romane forces being safe, with the which I haue in one day taken new Carthage by assault, defeated foure great captaines, and chased foure Carthaginian armies out of Spaine? Thinke you that the greatnesse and strength of the Romane commonweale consists in the life or death of any captaine
the greatnesse and strength of the Romane commonweale consists in the life or death of any captaine
the greatnesse and strength of the Romane commonweale consists in the life or death of any captaine
C whatsoeuer? what am I more than Flaminius, Paulus, Gracchus, Posthumus, Albinus, M.
Marcellus, T. Crispinus, C. Fuluius, the two of our house, and so many other brave and valiant captaines which haue died in this warre, and yet the people of Rome stand firme, and would still, although there should dye a thousand more, either by sword or sicknesse? much lesse can the Romane state brinke or decay by my death. After that my father and vnkle (who were your captaines) had beene slaine in these countries, you your selues did chuse L. Septimius Martius to bee your head against the pride and insolencie of the Carthaginians (I speake of him as if Spaine wanted other captaines.) M. Syllanus, is not he here also, with equall authoritie to my selfe? L. Scipio my brother, and C. Lelius, lieutenants, are not they here also? would not these men haue maintained ther, and defended the maiestie of the Romane Empire? What comparison can you make betwixt the ar-D mies, the commaunders, and the causes? And admit you had all advantages, should you therefore take armes against your country and fellow citizens, renounce the country which hath bred you, with your wiues and children, to adhere vnto the enemy, and to chuse your abode at Succron?
And what was the reason? for that your pay was a little protracted, by reason of your Generals sicknesse? O worthy cause to make you violate all diuine and humane lawes! O Romanes, you haue wonderfully erred, beleue me, you haue lost all reason and iudgement, and the infirmities of your minds hath bene worse than that which afflicted my bodie. My words seeme sharpe vnto you, but your actions haue bene farre more sharpe: which if you repent, I desire there should bee no more mention made of them, but remaine buried in forgetfulnesse, holding the repentance of such detestable acts, to bee a sufficient chastisement, for as much as concernes you all in generall. But as for Albius Calenus, Atrius Vmber, and others which haue bene the authors of this wicked sedition, they shall expiate their follies with their blood: the which should not be displeasing vnto you, but rather desired and applauded, seeing they sought to ruine you, and haue offended none more than you.

E In this manner Scipio spake vnto the seditious fouldiours, and presently execution was done of these five and thirtie men, with horreur and great feare to all the rest of the offendors: For the armed fouldiours which stood about the assembly, began to beat their targuets, the names of them that were condemned, were openly pronounced by the crier, the puni-ment of the chiefe offenders.
they were drawne naked, tied to posts, vnto the place, beaten and torne with rods, and then beheaded, all the assistants being so amazed with feare, as there was nota sigh heard among them. The bodies being carried away, and the place cleansed, after the accustomed manner, Scipio made the fouldiours to take a new oathe, and they were paid what was due vnto them, calling them by name one after another. This was the end of the mutinie and sedition made at Succron, veruiously and yet mildly chastised by Scipio, considering the qua-
F lity of the crime, which was of such consequence for great estates, as many haue not spared innocents themselues, to terrifie others.

At the same time Hanno had bin sent by Mago to the mouth of Betis (which is now Guadalquiber) with a small number of Africanes, who gathered together some 4000 men vpon those marches: but he was charged by L. Martius, and forced in his campe, and most of his fouldiours slain, some at the assault of his rampars, and the rest in the field, being pursued by the horsemen
as

Sedition is a mischief which doth much import estates.

The practise of the Gallians discouered and supprest.

A fight at the sea betwixt Leli-us and Adherbal

Mago brother to Haimibal and Generall of the Carthaginians,
hopes to recover
all Spaine.

Scipio prepares to goe against Mandonius and Indibilis.

Scipios speech to his soldiers.

as they fled, and he with a small number saued himselfe. Whilest this was doing about that riuer, Lelius arrived with his sea armie at Carteia, hauing past the strait, at the entrie whereof this towne is situated in the Ocean. The Romanes thought they should haue meanes to surprise the towne of Gadiz by intelligence, as they had contriued it with some of the inhabitants: but this busines was discouered before the execution; the complices were taken, and deliuered by Mago vnto the Prætor Adherbal, to be led to Carthage the great; who put the conspirators into a galeasse, and for that it was heauier and more slower than the gallies, he sent it a little before, & himselfe followed it with eight gallies. This galeasse was already entered into the strait; when as Lelius discouering it out of the port of Carteia, put forth also with a galeasse, being followed by his seuen gallies, and assuring himselfe that the enemies galeasse carried by the current within that strait (being hard to force) could not turne backe, he went to affront Adherbal and his gallies. The Carthaginian seeing himselfe surprised, was doubtful whether he should flee after his galeasse, or else make head. Whilest he stands in suspence, Lelius commeth vpon him, and it was not in his power to auoid the combat. They were in a strait, whereas nothing could be done after the manner of sea-fights, by the iudgement of captaines and mariners: for the sea going high in that place, they could not turne their gallies at their pleasures, the which were carried by the waues as well against their own as against the enemies, notwithstanding all their endeouours; so that oftentimes they might haue seene a gallie flying turne her spurre suddenly against that which pursued her, by the turning of a waue, and that which chased her, to flee away. The gallies being in this strife, it happened, that the Roman galeasse (whether by her weight, or the number of her oares) masting the waues better than the rest, forced two Carthaginian gallies, stemming the one, and disarming the other of all her oares of the one side, as she passed by her, and would in like manner haue endamaged the rest, if she had incountred them: but Adherbal with the helpe of his sailes and oares, recovered that coast of Affricke which was neereft. Lelius being victor, returned to Carteia, and informed of all that which had passed at Gadiz, how that their practise was discouered, and that the conspirators were sent to Carthage, he aduertised Marius, that it was labour lost to stay there, being more expedient to returne towards their Generall: which they did both within few daies after, and came to new Carthage. Mago hearing of their departure, and freed from feare, did not only resume new courage, but was also in hope to recover all Spaine by the rebellion of the Ilergetes; wherefore he sent presently to Carthage, to acquaint the Senate with the sedition which had lately happened in the Romanes campe, and the rebellion and reuolt of their allies, giuing them charge to make them greater than they were; perswading them, that it was now a fit time to recover the Seigniorie of all Spaine, which they had receiued from their ancestors, and therefore they should send forces to do it.

As for Mandonius and Indibilis, who were gone to the field, vpon the brute of Scipios death, thinking to make vse of the Roman soldiers which were mutined, when as they vnderstood the ruth of all things, they retired home to their houses without any alteration, attending what should be done vnto the seditious; presuming, that if Scipio pardoned his own soldiers, he might also vse the like clemencie towards them: but when as they vnderstood with what rigor he had punished them, they thought it was a pefrage for them to attend the like, for that they were guiltie of the same crime: wherefore they gathered their forces together, and caused their confederats to arme, meeting in the territorie of Sedera, where they had camped in the beginning of their reuolt, being some 20000 foot and 2500 horse. Scipio hauing easily pacified the discontentment of his soldiers, paying vnto euery man what was due vnto him, shewing them a good countenance, and vsing good words, to whom before his departure from Carthage, he made a speech in some bitter tearmes against the rebellion of these two noble men.

I goe not (said he) against these men to punish their ingratitude and wickednesse with the like affliction, as when I did chastise the offences of our fellow citizens, for what I did then was very sparingly, as if I should haue torne out part of mine owne bowels; wherefore I was content to correct the error or the offence of 8000, by the punishment of 35 men: but now that I march with you to raine the Ilergetes, to whom we are not tied neither by birth nor friendship, seeing that league which was betwixt vs had bin wickedly broken and violated by them, I know that all you of mine armie are eyther Romanes or Latins: besides, there are few of you which haue not bin brought out of Italie hither by my uncle

Cn. Scipio,

A Cn. Scipio, who first brought a Romanie armie into Spaine, or by Publius my father, or by me, and that you are all accustomed to the names and conduct of the Scipioes. wherefore I desire to carrie you backe, that you may be partakers of the triumph, which we haue well deserved. As for this warre whither wee go, let vs not call it a war, if we will remember what we haue done in this country: I do more esteem Mago, who hath saued himselfe in an island out of the world as a man may say with a few ships, than of the Ilergetes. He is a Carthaginian captaine and holds some forme of a garrison where he is, but these are theues, and captaines of theues, which are of no moment in a well gouerned warre, but onely to ouerrun and spoyle their neighbours fields, carrie away their cattell, and set fire of their farmes: whose force and valour consists in flying swiftly, and not in fighting well. If I goe first against them, doe not thinke it is for any danger, or difficultie, or for any feare I haue that the war will be long by their means, but onely to the end so wicked a rebellion should not remaine long unpunished, nor to leaue any enemy in armes, if it be possible, in a prouince conquered with so great happinesse and valour as we haue done.

Then he exhorted them to follow him vnder the conduct of the gods, not to the wars, but to punish wicked men: inioyning them to be readie for the next day. Being parted, he made ten lodgings with his campe, before he came to the riuer of Ebro, which hauing passed the fourth day following, they presented themselves in sight of the enemy. Betwixt both was a large vally, compassed in with mountaines: there Scipio made some troupes of cattell which had bene taken in the enemies countrey, to be put, to draw them forth to fight, causing them to be kept with some souldiours which were lightly armed. The Spaniards fall vpon this bootie, and the Romanes fouldiours goe to rescue it. Hereupon Lelius arrives, being appointed to second these footmen, with some bands of horse, who arrived fitly, for the combat was doubtful. The Spaniards were repulst by these succours with great slaughter, yet they fainte not for all this, but presented themselves the next day in order of battell, vpon the same place: and for that the vally was not able to containe all their forces, they brought forth some two third parts of their foot, and all their horse. The Romans held the straitnesse of the place to bee an aduantage for them, for that their souldiours did fight better close than in an open field, who kept their ranks, and did not run vp and downe like vnto the Spaniards: besides, they saw that they should haue to deale but with two third parts of the enemies armie. And Scipio refulsed of a stratagem: for seeing that he could not flanke his footmen with his horse, by reason of the straitnesse of the place, and that by the same reason, the enemies horse were also vnprofitable, he commaunded Lelius to lead all his horsemen about the hills, and to seeke some passage to charge the Spanish horsemen vpon the backe, and to draw them from their foot. And to the end the enemy should not discouer what Lelius intended, he presently went against the enemy with his footmen, placing foure companies onely in front, for that he could not do otherwise: so the battell began in two seuerall places, betwixt two battailons of foot, and two of horse, whereas one could not succour another, till in the end the Spanish foot being put to rout, their horsemen being prest before by the legions, and behind by the Roman horse, were all presently slaine, so as of all the horse and foot which fought in the vally, there escaped not any one. The other third part of the Spanish army, which came not to fight, but had only been spectators in a safe place, on the top of the hills, had all means to flee away; among whom there escaped Mandonius & Indibilis. The campe and all their baggage was taken, with 3000 prisoners: and of the Romans there were slaine about 1200, & about 3000 hurt. There is no doubt, but they had gotten this victorie with lesse blood, if the field had bene larger, and that the Spaniards might haue fled more easily. After this rout, Indibilis resolved to lay aside armes, and as the safest way, to submit himselfe to Scipios faith and clemencie, the which hee had tried: and therefore he sent Mandonius his brother vnto him, who did prostrate himselfe at his feet, confessing their fault, which seemed (said he) to be as a fatall disease in that season: hauing not onely run among the Ilergetes and Lacetanes, but also infected the campe and Romanie armie: finally, that both he and his brother were come thither, being readie either to yeeld vp their liues to Scipio (from whom they had receiued them) if it were his pleasure, or in taking them againe from him, to be for euer bound vnto him. It was an auncient custome with the Romanes, not to capitulate, nor to haue any peace with them with whom they had no alliance nor friendship, before they did yeeld into their hands whatsoever they held, were it holy or prophane, giuen hostages, deliuered vp their armes, and receiued garrisons into their townes. Scipio was content to receiue Mandonius present, and Indibilis being absent at that time,

H

A battell betwixt the Romans and naturall Spaniards.

The Spaniards
defeated.

Mandonius and Indibilis yeeld
to Scipios mercy

The generall Historie of Spaine.

Lib. 2.

time, with some bitter speeches giuing them to vnderstand, that they had deserued death: but G they receiued their liues by the grace of the people of Rome. Moreouer, that hee would not disarme them, which was the assurance they did vially take of rebels, but would they should hold them freely, and to be void from feare: but if they reuolted againe, they should know he would not be reuenged of innocent hostages, but vpon such as had offended, and that he would punish those that should present themselves in armes, and not the disarmed: Wherefore they should chuse, whether they would haue the Romanes fauourable vnto them, or incensed against them. Thus was Mandonius sent away, without any other punishment than money, which they commaunded him to furnish to pay the armie. Scipio hauing sent L. Marcius before, to passe the riuer of Ebro, and Syllanus to Tarracone, he staid some time, vntil the Ilergetes had paid their money, and then he followed after Martius (who approached neere vnto the Ocean) with some few men, and no baggage.

25 The treatie begun with Masiniissa had bene delayed for diuers reasons: for this Numidian would treat with Scipio himselfe, and make his promises to him. This made Scipio to vnderstand a long voiage. Masiniissa was in the island of Gades, where hauing intelligence by Martius, that Scipio approached, he told the Gouverneur Mago, That the horses and horfmen were spoiled in the island, where they caused a dearth of all things, to the hurt of others; desiring him to giue them leaue to passe into the firme land, to make some courses into the enemies country. Being past, he presently sent three of the chiefe among the Numidians to Scipio, two of the which should remaine for hostages, and the third returne to bring him notice of the day and place where the enteruiew should be; where they met with a small companie. Masiniissa first of all thanked Scipio, That he had sent him his nephew, his brothers sonne: then he said vnto him, That he had long desired to see that day, and that hee desired much to doe something that might be acceptable vnto him, and profitable to the Romans: wherein hee would imploy himselfe more willingly than any stranger whatsoeuer, the effects whereof he could not yet shew in Spain (a country vnknowne vnto him) but in place where he was borne and bred, hoping to succeed his father in the kingdom: and that if the Romanes did send Scipio into Africke, he did hope to worke so, as the estate of Carthage should not stand long. Masiniissa was welcome vnto Scipio, who heard his words with great content, knowing that whatsoeuer had bene valiantly performed in Spaine by the horfmen, was done vnder the onely leading of Masiniissa, who shewed by his carriage and countenance, that he was a yong prince of great hope. So hauing plighted their faith one vnto another, they parted, Scipio towards Tarracone, and Masiniissa to Gades: and to the end hee would not seeme to haue passed into the firme land in vaine, he spoyled some of the neighbour country, neere the shore, with Scipios consent.

26 Mago being made frustrat of his conceiued hope, to repaire the Carthaginians affairs in Spaine, by the Spaniards rebellion, vnder Mandonius and Indibilis, and the sedition of the Romanes souldiours, resolved to goe into Africke, when as being readie to depart, he receiued order from the Senat of Carthage, by the which he was commaunded to passe with all the shipping he had at Calis, into Italie, and to leaue all the souldiours he could in Gaule, and along the sea coast, and to joyne with his brother Hannibal, to the end the warre which had bin begun with such animositie, might be continued with the like resolution. For the effecting whereof they brought money from Carthage, and he for his part got all hee could from the Gaditanes, hauing not onely exhausted their common treasure, but vnfurnished their temples of their jewels and other riches, and forced euerie priuat man to bring him all the gold and siluer he had. As he passed along the coast of Spaine, comming neere vnto new Carthage he landed some souldiours, which forraged the countrey neere vnto the sea, and gaue an alarme vnto the whole prouince. Then he approached neere vnto the towne, and hauing kept his souldiours aboard the gallies in the day time, at night he put them on shore, towards that part of the wall whereas the Romanes had entred; supposing that Carthage had not been verie well manned with souldiours, and that haply some of the inhabitants might reuolt: but the flight of the countrey-men, and the centinels (which had discovered the armie at sea the day before) had alreadie giuen aduertisement to the town, who imagined that it was notwithstanding some designe, that the gallies had cast anker so neere vnto them. Wherefore the garri- son kept themselves in armes, and stood readie at the port next vnto the poole, and towards the

A parley betwixt Masiniissa and Scipio, to the preiudice of the Romanes.Mago, Hannibalis brother, commaunded to passe into Italie.Mago spoils the Gaditanes.

The generall Historie of Spaine.

Lib. 2.

A the sea. The enemies came in troupes mixt of souldiours and mariners, vnto the foot of the wall, with more brute than effect: and then the port was set open, whereas the Romanes made a furious sallie vpon them, with great cries, wherewith they were so amazed, as at the first charge, they turned their backs in disorder towards the sea, whither they were pursued with great slaughter: and if their gallies had not bene verie neere to receiue them, there had not any one escaped. Hauing gotten aboard, they were not yet assured, but feared that some of the enemies gallies would come out of the port against them: wherefore they drew vp their ladders and bridges speedily, and for that they would loose no time in weighing their ankers, they cut their cables. And it happened, that many thinking to saue themselves by swimming, were not able to discern their gallies, by reason of the darkenesse of the night, went out of their way, and were drowned. This armie returned speedily towards the Ocean, from whence they had parted. Day being come, the Romanes found about 800 men slaine, betwixt the towne and the shore, and about two thousand cuirasses. To Mago (who thought to returne vnto Gades) the entrie was refused: wherefore he returned vnto a place neere vnto it, called Cimbis, from whence he sent certaine gentlemen vnto Gades, to know the reason why they shut the gates against him, who was their friend and allic. To whom they answered, That it had bene done by the multitude, who had bene discontented at the spoiles and insolencies which the souldiours committed, when they imbarqued. Then he sought to draw their Suffetes out of the towne (which were those that held the soueraign magistracie in that Phenician nation) to parley with them, and with their chiefe treasurer. When he had them, hee caused them to be scourged with rods, and then to be hung vpon a gibet. Which done, he sayled towards the Pytiufes (being islands some hundred miles from the firme land, and inhabited at that time by Carthaginians) where both he and his whole armie were well entertained, the which was not onely refreshed with victuals, but furnished with souldiours and armes by those islanders. Mago relying vpon these things, came vnto the Baleares, some fiftie miles from thence, thinking to winter in the greater of them, the which was rich, and full of men, with a large and safe port; for now Autumne drew neere: But he found himselfe deceiued: for the inhabitants of Majorca went in hostile manner against him, no lesse than the Romanes would haue done, and with their slings kept them from landings; so as the Carthaginians were forced to put out to sea, & went to Minorca, which is the other island of the Baleares, as fertile as the other, but not so strong of men. There they landed, and without any great resistance became masters of the towne and island: where they inrolled two thousand men of that nation, the which they sent to Carthage to winter. When as Mago had left the Ocean, to enter into the strait, the Gaditanes yeilded vnto the Romans.

These were the affaires which passed in Spain, vnder the gouernment of P. Corn. Scipio, who hauing resigned the prouince and the armies vnto L. Lentulus, and L. Manlius Acidinus, returned to Rome with ten gallies: where being arriued, he made known vnto the Senat the great exploits of warre which he had done, the battels woon, the townes taken, and the people and countries subdued vnder the obedience of the Romans; finally, that in Spaine he had left no enemy. These things were deliuered by him with great state, rather to see if they would grant him a triumphant entrie into the citie, than to demanda a triumph: For in truth, vnto that day there had not any captaine entred in triumph into the citie of Rome, how great soeuer his exploits had bene, if it were not with the title of a Roman magistrat. Being entred into Rome, he brought into the publique treasure, of the remainders of the spoyle of Spaine, 14352 pounds of siluer in masse, and great store of coined money.

Mago makes a vaine attempt vpon new Carthage.Suffetes, Magistrats of the Ga-
ditanes.
Magoes tyrans
now require against the Gaditanets.The Gaditanes
yeeld vnto the Romanes.Scipio returns to Rome.Proconsuls no magistrats in Rome.

H ij

THE

A great army of Spaniards against the Romanes.

At last he returns the Romanes and Spaniards.

The Spaniards are my defeated.

The Spaniards sue to the Romanes for mercie.

The chiefe authors of rebellion do alwaies smart for the reb.

tunitie offered to effect their desires, and to make themselves kings of the other people of Spaine, which vnto that time had bene subject, sometimes to the Carthaginians, and sometimes to the Romans, and oftentimes to both; they acquainted their subjects, and the Aufetanes their neighbours, with their designe: vaunting, That if they maintained themselves in vnitie, they might easily expell the Romans out of Spaine, as well as they had chased away the Carthaginians: With whom they prevailed so by their persuasions, as in few dayes they had gathered together in the fields of Sedete 30000 foot, and 4000 horse, and there made the bodie of their army. The leaders of the Roman army, were L. Lentulus and L. Manlius, who being aduertised of this reuolt, meaning to prevent this mischief in time, went speedily to field, and passing quietly through the Aufetanes countrey, as friends, they came whereas the enemies were, and encamped within a league of them. There they tried first by messages and embassages, to diuert them from their foolish enterprise, perswading them to lay aside armes: but it was in vaine. Some forragers of the Romanes being charged by the Spanish horse, they were forced to send some troupes of horse to succour them, where there was an encounter that day, but to no effect. The day following, at the Sunne rising, the Spanish armie aduanced in battel, within a mile of the Roman campe. The Aufetanes held the middest, hauing the Ilergetes on the right hand, and on the left some other Spaniards of small fame. They had left betwixt the battailon in the middest and the two wings, a good large space, to giue passage to their horsemen, when it should be time to come to the charge. The Romanes ordered their armie after their accustomed manner, yet imitating the enemies therein, they left a space also to bring in their horsemen. This done, L. Lentulus bethought himselfe, that they should make best vse of those horsemen which should enter with them first into these spaces which were betwixt the squadrons of the enemies foot: Wherefore he commaunded Ser. Cornelius, who had charge of the Roman horsemen, to enter into those spaces of the Spanish armie. In the meane time he hauing the twelfth legion, being prest in the beginning of the battell by the Ilergetes, on the left hand, made it good vntill they were seconded by the thirteenth legion, the which he caused to aduance, to succour them in the front of the battell: and hauing thus assured that part, he ran towards L. Manlius, who did his dutie, encouraging the souldiours, and sending supplies where he saw any need; aduertising him, that the footmen on the left wing behaued themselves well, and that hee had sent Ser. Cornelius with the horsemen, to charge furiously into the enemies troupes: the effect whereof did presently appeare: for Ser. Cornelius being entred with his horse into the middest of the enemies, he made all their battel of foot to wauer, and withall stopt the passage to the enemies horse, so as they could not come to fight: which made the Spanish horsemen to leaue their horses. The Roman captaines seeing the Spaniards in some disorder, they cried out, incouraged, and intreated the souldiours to proceed valiantly, and to keepe them from joyning together againe. The enemies began now to forsake the fight, if Indibilis leauing his horse, had not come and presented himselfe in the head of the footmen. There was a long and bloudie fight, the which they maintained, vntill that Indibilis and those that fought about him, were ouerthrowne and slaine one vpon another: then they began to flie of all hands, and the Romans to pursue them, of whom they made a great slaughter, and withall tooke their campe, and all their baggage. There were 13000 slaine vpon the place, and about 800 prisoners. Of the Romans there died two hundred, or not many more, especially on the left wing. The Spaniards being thus defeated, the rest which escaped retired home into their countrey.

The Spaniards being afterwards called to counsell by Mandonius, they complained much of their losses, and blaming the authors of this warre, they said, That they were of opinion to send embassadors vnto the Romans, to beseech them to take them to mercie, and that they would deliuer them their armes: the which they did, and excused themselves, laying the fault vpon Indibilis, Mandonius, and others, which had solicited them. To whom the Romanes answered, That they would take them to mercie, vpon condition they should deliuer vnto them the authors of this rebellion aliuie, else they would intreat the Aufetanes, Ilergetes, and other their confederats, as enemies.

This answer being returned by their embassadors, Mandonius and the other authors were taken, and sent to the Romanes to receiue the reward of their misdeeds. By this meanes the troubles in Spaine were pacified, whereas they imposed a double tribute for that yeare, and a con-

con-

A contribution of corne for six moneths, with cassocks and cloakes for the souldiours: besides, the Romanes forced about thirtie seuerall provinces to giue hostages. These things were done in Spaine, whilst that P. Scipio prepared to goe into Africke, to diuert the warre which was betwixt the Romanes and Carthaginians in Italie, vvhich he had sent C. Lelius, Mago on the other side being arrived at Genes in Italie, and vpon the coast of the Ligusticke sea.

3 The Saguntines (for whose sake this second Punicke warre betwixt the Romanes and Carthaginians had bene vndertaken) had sent embassadours to Rome with Scipio, to thanke the Senate for the care they had of their faithfull allies, to protest of the loue and affection the Senate for the care they had of the people of Rome, and to offer a crowne of gold to the Commonweale of Sagunt had to the people of Rome, and to offer a crowne of gold to Jupiter Capitolinus his Temple; who were honourably entertained, and rewarded by the Senat: who hauing a desire to see Italie, were by a publicke decree conducted and accompanied with a good gard wherefoeuer they would goe.

Some moneths after, Hannibal being out of Italie, the same Saguntines surprised in Spaine certaine Commisaries and Carthaginian captaines, with a good summe of money, where-with they would haue leuiued souldiours in that countrey, whom they sent to Rome with their money, and presented them to the Senate. The Commisaries and captaines were detained prisoners, but the mony was restored to the Saguntines, with thanks by the Senat: the summe was 250 pounds of gold, and 800 of siluer.

C The Spaniards were so entreated vnder the gouernment of L. Lentulus and L. Manlius, as of the goods and reuenues of Spaine both Rome and Italie were often relieued, with corne, apparel, armes, and all other prouisions which they drew from thence. In the end, the Romanes hauing forced the Carthaginians to demaund a peace, after the defeat which Scipio manes hauing forced the Carthaginians to demaund a peace, after the defeat which Scipio had giuen vnto Hannibal in Africke, and neere vnto Carthage, it was resolved in the Senat at Rome, to call home the old souldiours which were in Spaine, to leaue only a Legion of Romanes, with fiftene companies of Latines their allies, and to send a new Gouernour thither. Wherefore L. Corn. Lentulus returned to Rome: where hauing related what he had valiantly and profitably performed, he demaunded leaue to enter the citie in triumph; the which they refused him, being against the presidents of their aunccestors: for whosoever had the conduct of an armie, being no Dictator, Consul, nor Prætor, but only holding the place of a Consul or Prætor, did not enter in triumph into the citie: yet for that the exploits done by him were great and worthie, they were content he should enter so in a fort; which was not altogether so stately and pompeous as a triumph; the which in their language they called Onatio. Hee brought into the Treasurie 44000 pound weight of siluer, and 2450 pounds of gold, and of the bootie there was giuen to euery souldiour 120 Asces, which make about a crowne and a fifth part, besides their ordinarie pay. This was during the Consulship of Ser. Sulpitius Galba and C. Aurelius Cotta: but the yeare following L. Corn. Lentulus was created Consul, with P. Iulius Apulus, or P. Villius Tapulus; and in his place C. Corn. Cethegus was sent into Spaine, who gaue a great defeat vnto the Spaniards in the fields of Sedeta, where there were about 15000 of the enemies slaine, and 78 ensignes taken. Cethegus and Manlius being afterwards called backe to Rome, the people sent in their place Cn. Corn. Lentulus and L. Stertinius. The Senat graunted to the Gaditanes (besides the conuentions which they had made with L. Martius Septimius) That they should haue no Gouernour. L. Manlius Acidinus being returned out of Spaine, demaunded of the Senate (for that he had well and vertuously gouerned the affaires) That he might enter into the Senate with the solemnitie called Onatio: but hee was hindered by M. Porcius Cæcia, Tribune of the people, who opposed himselfe, for that he had not bene in that gouernment in qualitie of a Magistrate, but as a Vice-gereut, being lesse fauoured therein than Lentulus his companion: wherefore he made no entrie: yet he brought in 1200 pounds of siluer, and some 30 of gold. Soone after C. Corn. Lentulus returned from Spaine, bringing also vnto the publicke treasure 1515 pounds of gold, 20000 of siluer, and 3455 deniers of siluer coyned. L. Stertinius being also returned, brought 50000 pounds of siluer out of the farther Spaine, and of the spoyle he caused two arches to be made in the Oxe market before the Temples of Fortune and of the goddesse Matuta; and one in the great Lists, vpon the which he set Images gilt. So as these Romanes made sharpe warres against the

The Saguntines send embassadours to Rome.

Anno Rome 553

Dictators, Consuls, and Prætors were allowed to triumph.

Onatio.

A great defeat of Spaniards.

tunitie offered to effect their desires, and to make themselves kings of the other people of Spaine, which vnto that time had bene subject, sometimes to the Carthaginians, and sometimes to the Romans, and oftentimes to both; they acquainted their subjects, and the Ausetanes their neighbours, with their designe: vaunting, That if they maintained themselves in vnitie, they might easily expell the Romans out of Spaine, as well as they had chased away the Carthaginians: With whom they preuailed so by their persuasions, as in few dayes they had gathered together in the fields of Sedete 30000 foot, and 4000 horse, and there made the bodie of their army. The leaders of the Roman army, were L. Lentulus and L. Manlius, who being aduertised of this reuolt, meaning to prevent this mischief in time, went speedily to field, and passing quietly through the Ausetanes countrey, as friends, they came whereas the enemies were, and encamped within a league of them. There they tried first by messages and embassages, to diuert them from their foolish enterprize, perswading them to lay aside armes: but it was in vaine. Some forragers of the Romanes being charged by the Spanishe horse, they were forced to send some troupes of horse to succour them, where there was an encounter that day, but to no effect. The day following, at the Sunne rising, the Spanishe armie advanced in battell, within a mile of the Romane campe. The Ausetanes held the middest, hauing the Ilergetes on the right hand, and on the left some other Spaniards of small fame. They had left betwixt the battallion in the middest and the two wings, a good large space, to giue passage to their horsemen, when it should be time to come to the charge. The Romanes ordered their armie after their accustomed manner, yet imitating the enemies therein, they left a space also to bring in their horsemen. This done, L. Lentulus bethought himselfe, that they should make best vse of those horsemen which should enter with them first into these spaces which were betwixt the squadrons of the enemies foot: Wherefore he commaunded Ser. Cornelius, who had charge of the Romane horsemen, to enter into those spaces of the Spanishe armie. In the meane time he hauing the twelfth legion, being prest in the beginning of the battell by the Ilergetes, on the left hand, made it good vntill they were seconded by the thirteenth legion, the which he caused to aduance, to succour them in the front of the battell: and hauing thus assured that part, he ran towards L. Manlius, who did his dutie, encouraging the souldiours, and sending supplies where he saw any need; aduertising him, that the footmen on the left wing behaued themselves well, and that hee had sent Ser. Cornelius with the horsemen, to charge furiously into the enemies troupes: the effect whereof did presently appeare: for Ser. Cornelius being entred with his horse into the middest of the enemies, he made all their battell of foot to wauer, and withall stopt the passage to the enemies horse, so as they could not come to fight: which made the Spanishe horsemen to leaue their horses. The Romane captaines seeing the Spaniards in some disorder, they cried out, encouraged, and intreated the souldiours to proceed valiantly, and to keepe them from joyning together againe. The enemies began now to forsake the fight, if Indibilis leauing his horse, had not come and presented himselfe in the head of the footmen. There was a long and bloudie fight, the which they maintained, vntill that Indibilis and those that fought about him, were ouerthrowne and slaine one vpon another: then they began to flie of all hands, and the Romans to pursue them, of whom they made a great slaughter, and withall tooke their campe, and all their baggage. There were 13000 slaine vpon the place, and about 800 prisoners. Of the Romans there died two hundred, or not many more, especially on the left wing. The Spaniards being thus defeated, the rest which escaped retired home into their countrey.

The Spaniards being afterwards called to counsell by Mandonius, they complained much of their losses, and blaming the authors of this warre, they said, That they were of opinion to send embassadors vnto the Romans, to beseech them to take them to mercie, and that they would deliuer them their armes: the which they did, and excused themselves, laying the fault vpon Indibilis, Mandonius, and others, which had solicited them. To whom the Romanes answered, That they would take them to mercie, vpon condition they should deliuer vnto them the authors of this rebellion aliuie, else they would intreat the Ausetanes, Ilergetes, and other their confederats, as enemies.

This answer being returned by their embassadours, Mandonius and the other authors were taken, and sent to the Romanes to receiue the reward of their misdeeds. By this meanes the troubles in Spaine were pacified, whereas they imposed a double tribute for that year, and a

con-

A contribution of come for six moneths, with cassockes and cloakes for the souldiours: besides, the Romanes forced about thirtie seuerall prouinces to giue hostages.

These things were done in Spaine, whilst that P. Scipio prepared to goe into Africke, to diuert the warre which was betwixt the Romanes and Carthaginians in Italie, whither he had sent C. Lelius, Mago on the other side being arriued at Genes in Italie, and vpon the coast of the Ligusticke sea.

3 The Saguntines (for whose sake this second Punicke warre betwixt the Romanes and Carthaginians had bene vnderaken) had sent embassadours to Rome with Scipio, to thanke the Senate for the care they had of their faithfull allies, to protest of the loue and affection the Commonweale of Sagunt had to the people of Rome, and to offer a crowne of gold to Jupiter Capitolinus his Temple; who were honourably entertained, and rewarded by the Senat: who hauing a desire to see Italie, were by a publicke decree conducted and accompanied with a good gard wheresoever they would goe.

Some moneths after, Hannibal being out of Italie, the same Saguntines surprised in Spaine certaine Commissaries and Carthaginian captaines, with a good summe of money, where-with they would haue leuiued souldiours in that countrey, whom they sent to Rome with their money, and presented them to the Senate. The Commissaries and captaines were detained prisoners, but the mony was restored to the Saguntines, with thanks by the Senat: the summe was 250 pounds of gold, and 800 of siluer.

C The Spaniards were so entreated vnder the government of L. Lentulus and L. Manlius, as of the goods and reuenues of Spaine both Rome and Italie were often relieued, with come, apparel, armes, and all other prouisions which they drew from thence. In the end, the Romanes hauing forced the Carthaginians to demaund a peace, after the defeat which Scipio had giuen vnto Hannibal in Africke, and neere vnto Carthage, it was resolved in the Senat at Rome, to call home the old souldiours which were in Spaine, to leaue onely a Legion of Romanes, with fiftene companies of Latines their allies, and to send a new Gouernour thither. Wherefore L. Corn. Lentulus returned to Rome: where hauing related what he had valiantly and profitably performed, he demaunded leaue to enter the cite in triumph; the which they refused him, being against the presidents of their auncestors: for whosoever had the conduct of an armie, being no Dictator, Consul, nor Prator, but onely holding the place of a Consul or Prator, did not enter in triumph into the cite: yet for that the exploits done by him were great and worthie, they were content he should enter so in a fort; which was not altogether so stately and pompeous as a triumph; the which in their language they called Onatio. Hee brought into the Treasurie 44000 pound weight of siluer, and 2450 pounds of gold, and of the bootie there was giuen to euery souldiour 120 Asles, which make about a crowne and a fifth part, besides their ordinarie pay. This was during the Consulship of Ser. Sulpitius Galba and C. Aurelius Cotta: but the yeare following L. Corn. Lentulus was created Consul, with P. Iulius Apulus, or P. Villius Tapulus; and in his place C. Corn. Cethegus was sent into Spaine, who gaue a great defeat vnto the Spaniards in the fields of Sedeta, where there were about 15000

E of the enemies slaine, and 78 ensignes taken. Cethegus and Manlius being afterwards called backe to Rome, the people sent in their place Cn. Corn. Lentulus and L. Stertinus. The Senat graunted to the Gaditanes (besides the conuentions which they had made with L. Martius Septimius) That they should haue no Gouernour: L. Manlius Acidinus being returned out of Spaine, demaunded of the Senate (for that he had well and veruouly governed the affaires) That he might enter into the Senate with the solemnitie called Onatio: but hee was hindered by M. Porcius Lecca, Tribune of the people, who opposed himselfe, for that he had not bene in that gouernment in qualitie of a Magistrate, but as a Vice-gerent; being lesse fauoured therein than Lentulus his companion: wherefore he made no entrie: yet he brought in 1200 pounds of siluer, and some 30 of gold. Soone after C. Corn. Lentulus returned from Spaine, bringing also vnto the publicke treasure 1515 pounds of gold, 20000 of siluer, and 3455 deniers of siluer coyned. L. Stertinus being also returned, brought 50000 pounds of siluer out of the farther Spaine, and of the spoyle he caused two arches to be made in the Oxe market before the Temples of Fortune and of the goddesse Matuta; and one in the great Lists, vpon the which he set Images gilt. So as these Romanes made sharpe warres against the

The Saguntines
send embassa-dours to Rome.

Ann. Roma 553

Dictators, Consuls, and Prators were allowed so triumph.

Onatio.

A great defeat
of Spaniards.

The Roman G-nariors great exaltors.

Anno Rome 556

The government of Spaine given to two Pretors.

The Spaniards
rise against Heluius the Pretor.

the men, but more against their purses; by reason whereof the inconstant nature of the Spaniards was now very wauering.

C. Corn. Cethegus and Quin. Minutius Rufus being Consuls at Rome, Spaine hauing vntill that time bene but one Consularie Prouince, gouerned by two Pro-consuls, was diuided into two governments, and two Pretors sent thither, who had charge to make a diuision of their jurisdictions, whereof the one should be called the hither Spaine, and the other the farther: but not as before, when as the riuer of Ebro made the limit, for the hither Spaine passed much beyond it. C. Sempronius Tuditanus was sent into the hither Spaine, and Marc. Heluius into the other, for Pretors. Both of them were intangled with great and doubtfull warres: for against Heluius there did rise Colca and Lucinius, great noblemen of Spaine, who conspired with many good townes, as Cardona, Bardona, and many others vpon the sea coast, which had not yet reuolted. As for C. Sempronius Tuditanus, hee was defeated in his gouernment, and so wounded, as he died soone after.

Wherefore L. Furius Purpureo and M. Claud. Marcellus being created Consuls, Qu. Fabius Buteo and Q. Minutius Thermus were sent Pretors into Spaine, either of them with a legion of Romane souldiours, and foure thousand foot and three hundred horse, Latines, of their allies. Thus the warre reuiued in Spaine the fifth yeare, after the end of the second Punicke warre; and from that time the Romanes had to deale with the Spaniards alone, without any support of the Carthaginians. The danger of this warre was so apprehended by the Senate, that one of the two Consuls, with a Consularie armie of two legions, five thousand foot and five hundred horse of their allies, Latines, should goe in person with twentie gallees, and such a number of other vessels, as should bee fit to transport his armie. L. Valerius Flaccus and M. Porcius Cato were created Consuls: Spaine was allotted vnto Cato, to whom P. Manlius was appointed as Pretor in the hither part of Spaine neere vnto Gaule, and Appius Claudius Nero in the further Spaine. To these Pretors were appointed (besides the legion which either of the Gouernours in Spaine then had) two thousand foot and two hundred horse, newly leuiued.

Whilest these things were preparing, Q. Minutius Thermus came to battaile with Budares and Besafides, two commanders of the Spaniards, neere vnto Turbe, where he defeated them, and slew about twelue thousand of their men, tooke Budares prisoner, and put the rest in rout. These newes did somewhat reuiue the people of Rome, who were mightily perplexed for these warres of Spaine. M. Porcius Cato being Consull, passed into Spaine the sixt yeare after the peace made betwixt the Romans and the Carthaginians, to reduce that Prouince wholly vnto the obedience of the people of Rome: wherein his seuerer carriage did much auale: for mildnesse is not alwaies fit for all nations, nor for all diseases. He embarked his armie in the riuer of Genes, whither he had drawne five and twentie ships of warre, whereof there were twentie of the state of Rome, and five of their allies, with a great number of others. They arrived safely at Rosas, then called Rhoda, at the foot of the Pyrenees, where they chased away a garrison of Spaniards which held the castle. From thence he passed to Empurias, and there he landed his souldiours. At that time Empurias was a double towne, diuided with wals, the one inhabited by Grecians issued from Phocce (from whence also the Marisilians came) the other by Spaniards. The Greeke towne was in a manner all in the sea, and was not much aboute foure hundred paces in circuit: the Spaniards habitation was much more, containing about three thousand paces; alwaies living in jealousie one of another, assured onely by their diligent gard, and continuall discipline of warre, as if the enemy had bene at their gates. The Grecians entertained no Spaniard within their wals, neither did they goe out rashly towards the land: the sea was free for all men. Amid these jealousies they receiued great commodities one from another: for the Spaniards (who were very ignorant of nauigation) had many strange commodities from the Grecians, and did furnish them in exchange with the fruits of their country. This traffique was the cause that the Spaniards towne was open vnto the Grecians, who for their better safeties were allied vnto the Romanes, and maintained themselves with as great loyalty in their friendship, as the Marisilians themselves could doe, although they were not so mightie. The Consull Cato arriuing there, they receiued him with all the honour and bountie they could. He stayed there some time to discover what forces the defeated by Q.

The Spaniards
Minutius Thermus.

A strange and envious manner of lining of the Empurians.

A the enemies might haue, and where they were; and for that hee would not spend the time in idleness, he caused his souldiours to be trained. Cato's arriuall was in haruest: wherefore he did forbid the purueyors and Commissaries to make any prouision of come, but sent them backe to Rome, saying, That the warre could maintaine it selfe. Departing from Empurias, he put the enemies countrey to sacke by fire and sword, and filled all with terror.

At the same time M. Heluius meaning to retire out of base Spaine, which he had gouerned, being accompanied with 6000 men, which the Pretor Appius Claudius had giuen him for conuoy, he was encountered by the way with 20000 Celtiberians, neere vnto the towne of Illiturge (either that which Scipio had destroyed, being repaired, or another of that name) whom he did fight withall, and vanquish, and slew 12000 men: then he tooke Illiturge, where he put all the inhabitants about the age of 14 yeres to the sword: and from thence he came vnto Cadetes campe: from whence hee afterwards passed to Rome; into the which he made a solemne entrie, with ouation, for that hee had gouerned his prouince happily. Hee brought 14732 pounds of siluer in masse, 17000 Bigats (which is a piece of coyne, stamp with a chariot drawn with two horses) and of the siluer of Osca 120438. Presently after Heluius, Q. Minutius Thermus returned to Rome, who had the honour of a triumph; which was the first that was graunted, by reason of his victories in the wars of Spaine: he brought also into the Treasurie 34800 pounds of siluer, 78000 Bigats, and 278000 of Osca.

In the meane time the Consull Cato was not farre encamped from Empurias, whereas three C embassadours came vnto him from Bilifages, Lord of the Illegetes; among the which was one of his sons, complaining, That their castles were besieged by the other Spaniards, whom they could not resist, but with aid from the Romanes. That if it pleased him to send them five thousand men, it would be sufficient to force the enemy to retire. The Consull answered, That he was moued with the danger wherein they were: but he had not at that time such forces, as he might with safetie send away so great a number, especially being not farre from the enemy, with whom he expected to fight every day. The embassadours hearing these words, cast themselves at his feet, and embracing his knees, besought him, not to abandon them in their great necessitie, seeing the Romanes were the onely refuge they had in this world: they let him vnderstand, That if they would haue falsified their faith, and conspired with others that were reuolted, they might easily haue auoided that danger; but they would not doe it, although they had bene sollicit with threats and terrifyings, hoping, that the support of the Romanes should be their warrant: but if that should faile them, and that the Consull should refuse to aid and defend them, they did protest before God and men, That they should be forced to leaue the Romane partie, least they should fall into the miseries and calamities of them of Sagunt. That day Cato made them no other answer, yet he did not leaue to meditate thereon all night, to find some meanes to free the Illegetes from this danger, and not to diminish his forces: for that would haue stayed him from fighting with the enemy, as he desired; or else in fighting he might be too weake and in danger. In the end he considered, that hypocritie and dissembling in warre haue oftentimes auailed much, and that those which attend succours, being persuaded to haue them speedily, haue often vpon this hope taken courage, and grown so resolute, as they haue preferred themselves: Wherefore the next day he told the embassadours, That he was content for their sakes to incommode himselfe, and that notwithstanding that he had great occasion to employ his souldiours, yet he would send them succours. Hereupon he commaunded they should take the third part of all the companies, and that they should prepare victuals and ships to embarke them the third day. Whereupon he sent away two of these embassadours, to carrie newes to Bilifages and the Illegetes, retaining the third, who was sonne to Bilifages, making him good cheare, and honouring him with presents. The embassadours before their departure saw the troupes embarked, and being very well satisfied, went away, making great bruit of these succours. The Consull thinking that he had made shew ynough, caused the souldiours to land againe, and to returne to the campe. And for that the season began to grow vnfit to make warre, he caused Winter lodgings to be made for the armie, within a myle of Empurias, from whence he sent the souldiours on euery side to spoyle the enemies countrey. Leauing a sufficient garrison in the campe, he made them goe forth in the night, that they might goe the farther without discouerie, and more easily surprise the Spaniards. In this manner he did exercise his new souldiours, and surprised many of the ene-

Souldiours should be alwaies in action.

A strange beginning of the war.

A notable vi-ctorie gotten by the Pretor Heluius.

Q. Minutius
Thermus triumphed first at Rome for his victories in Spaine.

Dissembling in warre doth often import.

Cato's speech to the capitaines.

Cato seeks to make his souldiers hardie by constraining, taking all places of retreat from them.

The Spaniards defeated by Cato.

enemies, who durst no more goe out of their forts. Cato hauing by this meanes sufficiently tried the hearts both of his owne men and of the Spaniards, he called the Capitaines, Knights, and Centeniers together, and said vnto them: That it was now time to set their hands to the worke which they had so much desired, to shew their vertue by a battaile, and not by raunging and spying, as they had hitherto done, and that they must no more busie themselves with the prey of the champion countrey, but prepare themselves to enioy the riches of townes. The estate of the affaires in Spaine (said he) is reduced to that point, that whereas in the time of our predecessors, when as there was neither captaine nor armie for the Romanes in this region, they did capitulate, That their power and command should extend vnto the riuer of Ebro: and now when there is a Consull, two Pretors, and three Armies, and that the Carthaginians haue beene wholly excluded for these tenne yeares, wee haue not in a manner any thing on this side that riuer. We must then recover it by our armes and valour, and reduce this nation (which hath beene accustomed to begin warre with more easinesse, than to maintaine it vertuously) vnto the yoke, which they would shake of: wherefore goe and refresh your selues, and be readie to depart this night. About midnight he dislodged, that he might encampe at his pleasure, before the enimie should haue any intelligence. So as taking a long circuit, he marched beyond the Spaniards armie; and when as day began to breake, he put his men in battaile, and sent three companies of foot vnto the rampier of their campe.

The Spaniards being amazed to see their enemies behind them, ran to armes: then the Consull said vnto his souldiours: There is now no more hope but in our valour, the which I haue done of purpose; for the enimie lies mid way betwixt vs and our lodging: all that is behind vs is the enimie; wherefore there is no better safetie than to trust to our owne vertues. He then caused his companies which were gone to skirmish, to retire, as if they would haue fled, that he might draw forth the enimie, as hee did: for the Spaniards (thinking that the Romanes had retired for feare) left their campe, and came out armed, filling the place betwixt their trenches and the Romanes armie, and there put themselves confusedly and hastily into battaile: but the Consull gaue them no leasure, but caused certaine troupes of horsemen to aduance, who came and charged these Barbarians thus disordered: but the Romanes on the right hand were presently repulsed, and, retreating in haile, had almost put the footmen in rout. The Consull perceiuing this, he presently sent two bands of foot, who passing along the enemies right flanke, presented themselves behind, before the battailions of foot came to joyne: the which did so amaze the enemies, as the partie which before was doubtfull for the Romanes, by reason of the disorder of their horse, was now almost equall: yet both the horse and foot on the right wing were so troubled, as the Consull could hardly make them stand firme: yea, he was forced to take some by the hands, to turne them against the enimie. Whilest they did fight with their darts a farre off, the encounter was doubtfull: yea, the Romanes wauering on the right wing, could hardly be kept in order. On the left wing and in front the Spaniards were sorely prest, and besides, they feared those companies which came in the reere to charge them: but when they were approached, and so joyned, as no blow fell in vaine, and that there remained no hope but in their resolutions and valours, being come to the sword, and that Cato had refreshed his tyred men with new troupes, which charged the enimie like lightening, then were they forced and put to rout, so as they did what they could to saue themselves in their campe. Then Cato galloping to the second Legion, which he had referred for succours, he caused them to aduance speedily towards the enemies campe, to force it, but with such order, as if any one aduanced too fast, or went out of his ranke, he beat him into his order with a iaveline which he carried, commanding the colonels and capitaines to doe the like. Now did the Roman armie giue an assault vnto the enemies rampiers & palisadoes, who defended themselves valiantly, repulsing their enemies with stones, stakes, and other arms: where a new Legion arriving, the combat was more furious, both parties growing more courageous; the one through hope, the other through despair. The Consull riding about the campe, obserued what part was worst manned, or weakest defended: and finding that the gate on the left hand was but ill furnished with men, he sent some of the foremost rankes of the second Legion thither, and such as carried long stakes, who forced the gate which was at this gate, and entred into the campe. The Spaniards seeing the enemies within their trenches, leaue their armes and ensignes, flye out of their ports, and cast themselves ouer their rampiers, euery man seeking to saue himselfe, and one hindering another with haile, so as there was a great slaughter of them

A great slaughter
of Spaniards.

them that fled, and their baggage was all taken. Some hold, that there died in this battaile fortie thousand Spaniards. There are three commendable things noted in Cato in this action: First, to take all hope of safetie from his souldiours, but by their armes and vertue, he had led them far from their campe and ships, betwixt the enemies campe and his countrey: Secondly, that he did send two companies behind the enemies armie, whilest that he charged them in front: and for the third, that he had referred the second Legion behind the rest, and led them in good order to assaile the enemies campe, whilest that all the other troupes were disbanded and busie in fight.

After this great victorie, he gaue his souldiours no great rest: for being a little refreshed in their campe, he led them to spoyle the enemies countrey, the which they did ouerrun at their pleasures, for that they were all fled. This was the cause which made the Spaniards of Empuria to yeeld, and many other people thereabouts. There were many inhabitants of other Cities and Communalities fled to Empuria, whom Cato caused to come before him, and courteously entreated them, commanding to giue them meat and drinke, and then he sent them home to their houses. Soone after he marched with his armie towards Tarracone, and in all places where he passed, he met with the embassadours of townes, which yeelded vnto him; so as all Spaine on this side Ebro was reduced vnder the obedience of the people of Rome before he came to Tarracone: and from all places there were presented vnto him and freely giuen an infinite number of prisoners, Romanes, Latines, and other allies, which had beene taken by diuers accidents. The bruit was, That hee would lead his armie into Turditane, which is the furthest part of Spaine, towards the strait, and some sayd, That he would passe vnto the mountaines and places vnkowne. Vpon this false bruit, there were seuen strong places in the countrey of the Bargistanes which rebelled, whom hee subdued without any great toyle, or memorable combat: but soone after the Consull being returned to Tarracone, they rebelled againe; so as hee leading his armie thither againe, subdued them: but they escaped not so good cheape as at the first; for he caused them all to be sold for slaues by the drumme, to the end they should trouble the peace no more.

The Spaniards
alwaies apt to rebell.

Cato's seueritie
in the Spaniards relapse.

In the meane time the Pretor P. Manlius hauing receiued the armie from his predecessor Qu. Minutius, and being joyned with that which Appius Claudius Nero had in the farther Spaine, all old bands, he marched into the countrey of Turditania (the which is Andalusia) and the countrey adjoining. The Turditanians were esteemed the worst warriors among all the people of Spaine; yet trusting in their multitudes, they came to encounter the Romanes: when the Romanes horsemen disordered them at the first charge; then the Legions arriving, they put them wholly to rout. But the war was not thus ended: for the Turditanians did entertaine in pay ten thousand Celtiberians, and continued to make warre with these mercenaries.

The Consull being incensed at the double rebellion of the Bargistanes, vsed his natural rigor and seueritie against all the Spaniards which dwelt on this side the riuer of Ebro: for he disarmed them all, thinking, that if they were armed, they would vpon any occasion fall into rebellion. This was taken so disdainfully by these people, as many grew furiously mad, and slew themselves: A nation in truth fierce and warlike, who esteemed not that life which passed without armes: Whereof the Consull being aduertised, he caused the Senatours of all the townes of that countrey to come vnto him, to whom he said: That what hee had done, was more for their profites, than any interest of the Romanes: For when they were to make warre, you know (said he) it was decided with more misfortune and lesse for the Spaniards, than trouble or paine for the Romanes: wherefore to preserve you hereafter from ruine, I thought there was but one onely meanes; which is, to keepe you from rebelling: Let vs then bethinke our selues of the mildest course, and giue me your aduice; beleue me I will not willingly entertaine any, but what you shall giue. These Senatours demanded time to aduise thereon: and being called againe, they answered not any thing. Whereupon the Consull caused all their townes to be demanteled in one day: and from thence marched with his armie against their neighbours, which were yet in armes, whom he brought to obedience, namely, Segestica, a towne of great importance, and rich, the which he tooke by sappe. It was a greater difficultie for Cato to subdue these people of Spaine, than it had beene for the first capitaines which esteemed not the life which passed without armes.

The Spaniards

Cato demanteled
the townes in Spaine.

which came thither for the Romanes, when the Carthaginians did rule there: for at that time if the Spaniards were wearie of the Carthaginians commaund, they had recourse vnto the Romanes: but Cato making warre against them, they had no other refuge, but from an vsurped libertie they must fall into slauerie. Finally, he found all this Prouince altered, some hauing taken armes, some being besieged by their neighbours, to force them to take armes, who (if they had not bene prevented in time) would haue also rebelled with the rest. This Confull had such an active spirit, as all things both great and small must passe through his hands, neither did he thinke it sufficient to resolue, discourse, and commaund that which he held fit to be done, but he himselfe did execute many things; neither was he more strict and seuerer to any one in his commaundements, than to his owne person. There was not any one to be found in his armie, that did watch, fast, and toyle more than himselfe. Finally, he had no aduantage among those that he commaunded, but the honour to commaund.

The Turditane warre grew more difficult to P. Manlius, by reason of the mercinarie Celtiberians: wherefore the Confull being called thither by letters from the Pretor, he marched with his armie. At his arriual he found, that the Turditanes had their campe diuided from the Celtiberians: being encamped, the Romans had continuall skirmishes and light encounters with the Turditanes, who had alwaies the worst. As for the Celtiberians, he caused them to be solicited by the colonels and captaines of his armie, propounding vnto them the choice of three conditions: If they would turne vnto the Romanes, they should haue double the pay which the Turditanes had promised them: or if they would retyre to their houses without taking any partie, they promised them abolition of all which they had done: and for the third, if they desired warre, they should come to field, and present themselves in battaile. The Celtiberians demanded respit to make answer, and then did communicate these propositions in open Councell to the Turditanes; where there was great contention, but no conclusion: so as many daies passed without any assurance of peace or warre: during the which, the Romanes ouerrun the enemies countrey, and spoyled their townes, as if it had bene in open warre: oftentimes making priuat treaties and accords, they entred, went and came into their forts. The Confull Cato seeing that hee could not draw the enemy to battaile, hee first sent some troupes with their ensignes, to spoyle that part of the countrey where they had not yet bene: then hearing, that the Celtiberians had all their baggage in the towne of Seguntia, he went thither to take it; and yet could hee not draw them out of their campe. In the end hauing mustered and payed his armie, he left all the forces with the Pretor, and returned with seuen bands (which made about 3500 men) towards the riuer of Ebro. With these few men he tooke townes, and forced obedience from the Seditanes, Ausetanes, and Succetanes. As for the Lacetanes, (a people dwelling in a sauage countrey, and out of the way) besides that their rough and barbarous disposition kept them in armes, they had highly offended the Romanes, whilest that the Confull was busie in warre vpon the marches of the Turdules, overrunning and spoyling the lands of their allies: Wherefore the Confull led vnto the siege of their towne not onely the Romane bands, but also the youth of those allies, whom they had wronged. This towne was long, but not very broad. Encamping within foure hundred paces of it; there he placed certaine chosen companies, commaunding them not to stirre, vntill he returned vnto them, and then he led the rest of his forces vnto the other side of the towne. There were a great number of Suesetane soldiours among the strangers allies, whom he caused to march against the towne, and to assaile the wall. These being discovered by the Lacetanes, and knowne by their armes and ensignes to be soldiours of Suesse, whose territorie they had spoyled at their pleasure, and many times defeated their troupes, they sallied out vpon them: but the Suesetanes scarce seeing them approach, crying out and shaking their armes, fled, and the others pursued them. The Confull, who expected no lesse, gallopped along the wals vnto the companies which he had left on the other side; and whilest the townesmen pursued the Suesetanes, he seized vpon their towne being vnmannd, and tooke it, before the townesmen were returned from the chase, forcing them to yeeld vnto his mercie. Presently after this exploit, he went against a strong towne, called Vergium, which was the receptacle of all the theues in the countrey, who robbed and spoyled all men which dwelt thereabouts, or passed that way. The Lord of the place came forth presently to meet with the Confull, excusing himselfe, That neither he nor his subjects did wrong any man, but that certain theues being

Cato seeks to corrupt the Celtiberians.

Plinie makes mention of a Seguntia in the Etrusque Prouince, besides that which is now called Segenssa.

This towne is may be it that which they now call Laceda.

A being received into the towne, they had made themselves masters thereof. The Confull said vnto him, That if it were so, he should returne into the towne, and find some meanes (when he should giue an assault) to seize vpon the citadell or fort, with them of his faction, whilest the theues were busie to defend the walls. This was cunningly put in practise, and the theues which held the towne were surprised in diuers places, being encountered on the one side by the Romane armie, and on the other side by them of the fort. Thus Cato woon this place, and hauing pardoned them which held the fort, with their kinsfolkes and friends, granting them their liues and goods, he commaunded the Tresurer to sell all the rest of the Vergetanes for slaues, to them that would giue most: and as for the theues and robbers, he caused them all to be hanged.

B By these actions the Confull Cato had reduced the Prouince to more quietnesse, and then he began to dispose of the publicke reuenues for the Romanes in these countries, renting out the mynes of yron and siluer, which made it rich. The year of his Consulship being ended, he returned to Rome, whereas P. Corn. Scipio the second time, and Titus Semp. Longus had bene created Consuls. There he entred in triumph, and brought into the Tresurie 25000 pounds of siluer in masse, 123000 Bigats, and 540 of Osca, with 1400 pounds of gold. Besides, there was payed vnto euery footman 370 Asses, and thrice as much to euery horseman, Cato saying, That euery one must tast of their spoyles.

C There were sent into Spaine for Pretors P. Cor. Scipio, sonne to Cn. cousin to the other, for the further Spaine, and Sex. Digitius (it may be it was he which was honoured with a mural crown at the taking of new Carthage) into the hither part. As for the armies, that of the Pretors was entertained, and the Consuls cast. One of these Gouvernours was more fortunate than the other: for P. Scipio did not onely defend all that which belonged vnto his prouince, but put the Lusitanians (who came to assaile him) to rout. Sex. Digitius had many great troubles in his gouernment, and many vnfortunate encounters, so as he deliuered not halfe the men which he had receiued at his comming, to his succesor: and without doubt all Spaine had risen, if the other Pretor had done no better. P. Corn. sonne to Cn. by his judgement and dexteritie did so terrifie the enemies in the farthest parts of Spaine, as aboute fittie Townes and Communitie yielded vnto him. After the expiration of his gouernment, attending his succesor, he set vpon certaine Lusitanian theues, who returned with a great bootie, which they had taken from the subjects and allies of the Romanes: and although he were in great perplexitie and danger in this charge, despairing almost of the victorie, for the which (if he did obtaine it) he did vow games to Iupiter Olympicus: yet he woon it, and (being much inferior in number of souldiours) defeated the Lusitanians; where hee slew twelue thousand vpon the place, tooke five hundred and fortie prisoners, all horsemen, and carried away an hundred thirtie foure Ensignes, hauing lost very few of his men. This encounter was neere vnto the towne of Ilipa, whither the Pretor went with his armie, and brought forth all the bootie that was recovered, suffering euery one to carrie away the goods and cattell which had bene taken from him by the enemy, and causing the rest to be sold, with the which the souldiours were recompenced. Scipio obtained this victorie in qualitie of Vice-Pretor.

E 9 L. Corn. Merula and Q. Minutius Thermus being created Consuls at Rome, C. Flaminius was chosen Pretor for the hither part of Spaine, and M. Fuluius Nobilior for the further: C. Flaminius should succeed Sex. Digitius, to repair the bad successe which had happened during his gouernment. He demanded of the Senat, That he might take one of the Legions appointed for the citie, and that mingling with them such souldiours as he should leue, he might chuse out of the whole number 6500 foot & 300 horse; and that with this Legion thus made, he might vndertake the affaires: for he did not much relye vpon those forces which remained with Sex. Digitius, the which were in a manner ruined, saying, That the warre growing here in Spaine, they might not goe vnurnished; speaking of the good and bad successe of that Prouince, as well by himselfe, as by his friends, much to his owne aduantage. The auncient Senatours were not of opinion, That the Senat should make any decrees vpon the reports of priuat men in fauour of magistrats, and that they must not giue credit to that which was spoken touching matters of gouernment, if it were not aduertised by the Gouvernors themselves, or embassadours sent to relate the successe. Finally, the Senat resolved, That if there were where any troubles in Spaine, they should leuie men there: yet they write, That C. Flaminius went into Sicile, where he enrolled certaine bands; and that passing from thence into Spaine, he was cast vpon the coast of Africke, where he tooke an oath of some souldiours which he found there, being the remainders of the armie of P. Scipio Africanus: and that besides all these, he leuied men in Spaine. But whatsoeuer he did, yet he found not the affaires of Spaine so difficult as they had giuen it out. Being in his gouernment (which extended vnto the Oretanes) he tooke the towne of Ilucia, and hauing lodged his souldiours to Winter, there were many light skirmishes betwixt him and the Spaniards, whereas he had not alwayes the better, but lost many of his men.

The wisdom of the Romans respected no common brutes in matters of state.

The other Pretor which gouerned the further Spaine did great exploits: for he fought a battaile with the Vacceans, Vectons, and Celtiberians all together, neere vnto Toledé, put them in rout, and defeated them, taking their king Hilmercaliue. The year following the gouernment was continued to these two Pretors. Flaminius tooke the towne of Litabrum by force, the which was strong and very rich: he also tooke Corribila, a nobleman of great fame, prisoner. Fulinius in the further Spaine did fight happily with two armies, tooke the townes of Vescelia and Holo from the Spaniards, with many castles, some by force, and some by composition: and then passing by the Oretanes country, he seized vpon Nobilia & Cufbis, and came vnto the riuer of Tayo, on the which Toledo stood, a small town, but strong of situation: whilst he did batter it, an armie of the Vectons came to succour it, but he defeated it: then continuing his siege and batterie, he tooke the towne. This done, he returned to Rome, L. Emilius Paulus being chosen to succeed him, when as P. Cor. Scipio, sonne to Cn. and M. Atilius Glabrio were Consuls. He entred into Rome with the solemnitie of Ouatio, bringing into the common treasure 130000 Bigats of siluer, 12000 pounds of siluer in masse, and 127 pounds of gold. C. Flaminius was continued in his Pretorship in the hither Spaine.

10 But whereas other Pretors had but six officers which carried rods and axes before them, L. Emilius had twelue, so as his Pretorship was equall with the honor & dignitie of a Consul. To either of these Pretors (besides the armies which were in the country) were appointed a supplie of 3000 foot and 300 horse, newly leuied; two third parts of them of their allies, and the other third part of Romane citizens. Paulus did twice defeat the barbarous Spaniards in battaile, and flew 30000, hauing taken his aduantage vpon the passage of a riuer. He brought vnder the obedience of the Romanes 250 places, by their voluntarie yeelding, and yet with the honour of all these gallant exploits he returned to Rome, hauing not enriched himselfe one dragma during his gouernment; the which is a rare thing in a man of command. His gouernment being then continued for another yeare, he did somewhat blemish the glorie of his victories, by a notable rout which he had in the Bassitanes countrey, whereas he lost 6000 men vpon the place, the rest of his army recouered their campe with great difficultie, and then was forced with long marches to retyre himselfe into places of more safetie: but afterwards attending the comming of L. Bebius, who should succeed him, he was reuenged of the Lusitanians for his former losse, of whom, he flew 18000, tooke 330, and woon their campe, with their baggage.

L. Bebius had bene chosen at Rome to succeed him: but as he marched by the riuer of the Ligusticke sea, he was set vpon by certaine Ligurians, who flew most part of his men, and himselfe being wounded, hee was forced to saue himselfe in Marceilles, with a small number, and without vihers, whereas the third day after he died. These newes being sent to Rome by them of Marceilles, the Senat appointed, That P. Brutus in the Pretors place should take the gouernment of the further Spaine, and leauing the armie and prouince of Tuscane to one of his lieutenants, he should speedily depart. In the other part of Spaine, neerer vnto Gaulle, L. Plantius Hipscus was appointed in C. Flaminius place, whose gouernment was reasonably quiet.

M. Valerius Messala and C. Liuius Salinator being made Consuls at Rome, the hither part of Spaine was giuen to L. Manlius Acidinus, and to C. Catimius the farther: who continued in the same charge the yeare following: in the which the Lusitanians and Celtiberians troubled the peace, & went armed to field: the which being writen to Rome by the Pretors, they did chuse L. Quintius Crispinus, who had that part of Spaine which lyes beyond the riuer of Ebro, and C. Calphurnius Piso for the other part. Whilst they prepare, C. Catimius came to fight with the Lusitanians in the territorie of Asta, whom he defeated in battaile, woon their campe, and

The happy exploits of Fulinius & Bebius.

P. Emilius Pretor with Consul Lucius auxiliaries.

The great integrity of P. Emilius in his gouernment. P. Emilius was so routed by the Spaniards.

The unfortunate encounter of L. Bebius.

Anno Rome 564

Anno 565.

C. Catimius defeats the Lusitanians.

A and flew 6000 vpon the place: but as he gaue an assault to the towne of Asta (the which was taken without any great resistance) he was wounded, and died soone after. L. Manlius the other Vice-Pretor had an encounter with the Celtiberians in his gouernment, yet no man knew who had the victorie; only the Celtiberians dislodged the night following, confessing thereby, that they were vanquished. The Romans being masters of the field, had leysure to burye their dead, and to gather vp their spoyle.

Within few dayes after the Celtiberians hauing augmented their forces, they came and assailed the Romanes neere to Calaguris, which now is Calahorra, but they were beaten, and lost 12000 men vpon the place, 2000 were taken prisoners, and they were chased out of their campe, and lost their baggage. And such was the heat of this victorie, that if they had not bene restrained by the comming of the new Pretors, the Celtiberians had bene wholly subdued. Quintius and Calphurnius, as soone as they were within their prouinces, lodged their armies to Winter. L. Manlius being returned to Rome, made his entrie with the ceremonie called Ouatio, whether he brought 52 crownes of gold, 132 pounds of gold, 16300 pounds of siluer, and declared in open Senate, That besides all that, his Treasurer Qu. Fabius brought 10000 pounds of siluer and 80 pounds of gold, to be put into the common Treasury.

11 The Spring time being come, the two Pretors went to field with their armies, and joyned together in Beturia, marching towards the Carpetanians countrey, where the enemies were then in field. The beginning of their exploits was not very successfull, but in the end they made reparation of their errors. The fight began betwixt the foragers on either side, neere vnto the townes of Hippo and Toledé; to whose succours there came some from either army, and in the end all their forces came thither: so as the Spaniards seeing themselves in a conuenient place for their manner of fighting, the two Romane armies were defeated in this vnexpected skirmish, and repulsed with great disorder and amazement, within their pallisadoes and rampiers, and yet the enemies could not follow their good fortunes. The Pretors fearing to be assaulted, dislodged in the night: and at the breake of day the Spaniards presented themselves before the trenches; but seeing no shew of any enemy, they entred into the campe, whereas they made bootie of that which the Romanes could not carrie away with them. This done, they stayed there some dayes, without attempting any thing. The Romans lost in this combat and in the flight about fife thousand men, of their citizens and allies, with whose spoyle the Spaniards armed themselves, and marched towards the banks of Tayo. All the respite the Romane Pretors had, they employed it to fill vp their bands with Spanish souldiours of their friends and allies, and to assure the rest which had bin beaten. Wherefore when as they did see their forces reasonably well repaired, and their souldiours hearts reuiued (who demanded nothing more than the enemy, to reuenge the disgrace which they had received) they came and encamped within twelue miles of the riuer of Tayo: when as a good part of the night was spent, they tooke vp their ensignes, and came by the breake of day to the riuers side, whereas they put themselves into a square battaile. The enemies were on the other side, encamped on the side of a hill, and the Romans hauing found a foord in two places passed ouer;

E Quintius on the right hand, and Calphurnius on the left, but the enemy moued not: who being amazed at their suddaine arrivall, spent time in consultation what they should do, when they might haue disordered all the Roman armie, being troubled at the passage of this riuer. In the end all passed, both souldiours & baggage, the which they laid all together: for they neither had any conuenient place, nor any leysure to make any trenches, nor to plant their campe, for that the enemy began to arme, so as they put themselves in order to fight, placing the strength of their armie (which consisted in two Legions) in the midst. The field betwixt both enemies lay open, which did assure them from ambushes and surprises. The Spaniards seeing these two Legions in two great squadrons, put themselves in battaile on the riuers side where they were, thinking to disorder them before they should be able to joyne with the bodie of their armie; wherefore they went and gaue them a furious charge. The fight in the beginning was fierce, the Spaniard being puffed vp with pride for his former victorie, and the Romans mad with desire to deface the ignominie to haue bene vanquished, contrarie to their custome. The two Legions in the midst fought valiantly, and could not be forced: wherefore the Spaniards resolving to pierce through them by some means, they sent a great troupe

He that leaves the field, confesseth he is vanquished.

The Celtiberians defeated.

Beturia now called Estremadura.

The Romans defeated, but the Spaniards can not pursue this victorie.

The Spaniards know not how to embrace the occasion.

A battaile betweene the Ro-manes and Spaniards.

in forme of a wedge, to breake this battaillon. The furie of the fight was great, and Calphurnius feared the Legions should not be able to resist: wherefore he sent T. Quintius Varus and L. Iunentius Thalus (two Lieutenants) vnto them to aduertise them, That there was no means to hold Spaine, nor to saue themselves, neither euer to see their houses, nor Italie; no, not to get vnto the other side of the riuer of Tayo, if they did not vanquish their enemies: and he at the same instant, with the horsemen of the two Legions, went and charged this pointed troupe in flanke, and Quintius came on the other side with a certaine number of horsemen, but with lesse courage than Calphurnius, who fought in the midst of the preasse: so as by reason of the Pretors prefence, and the danger whereinto hee thrust himselfe, the legionarie souldiours and all the rest were greatly encouraged to doe their duties; so as they first put their enemies to rout, and then to flight, towards their campe: whither they were pursued by the horsemen, who entred pell-mell with them that fled; where they were forely preft by them that had bene left to gard the baggage, so as they were forced to leaue their horses, and to make head against them, vntill the fifth Legion arrived, and the other bands, one after another, who freed them from this danger, and put all the Spanish armie to the sword: so as of five and thirtie thousand which were in the beginning of the battaile, there escaped but foure thousand; whereof three thousand recovered a neere mountaine, and a thousand being naked and disarmed, wandered vp and downe the fields. The Romans carried away an hundred thirtie three of the enemies ensignes: they themselves lost in this conflict little about six hundred men, and about an hundred and fiftie Spaniards of their confederats. Five Colonels and some Romane knights (which were slaine there) made the victorie seeme lesse fortunat. The Romane armie was lodged in the enemies campe, for that they had no time to rampier their owne. The day following Calphurnius did highly extoll the souldiours valour, and gaue them gifts in testimonie of their vertue: to knights he gaue caparisons, shewing, that by their valour chiefly the battaile had bene woon: many captaines of the two Legions were also rewarded. These two Gouvernours returned to Rome, A. Terentius Varro and P. Sempronius being chosen in their places, during the Consulship of P. Claudius Pulcher and L. Porcius Licinius. They brought many crownes of gold, and readie money, with gold and siluer in masse, whereof the number is vncertaine; and they triumphed for the victories which they had gotten against the Lusitanians and Celtiberians.

Ann. Rome 568

A. Terentius had the hither part of Spaine, and Sempronius the further: they also had prolongation in their charge for the yeare following. Varro had some encounters in this second yeare with the Aufetanes, a people inhabiting in the countrey of Cattelogne, not farre from the riuer of Ebro, and against the Celtiberians, whom he vanquished, and tooke some strong places and townes, which they made their retreat in those marches. As for Sempronius gouernment, it was quiet: for the Lusitanians stood in awe of the Romans fortune, and the Pretor was continually afflicted with a troublesome disease, which made him vnfit for all publicke gouernment, and in the end killed him in Spaine. P. Manlius did succeed him, who had once bene Pretor in the hither Spaine, when as Cato was Consull, and Quintus Fulvius Flaccus succeeded Varro.

Idleness and ease an enemy
so vertue, corrupt the Roman armie.

The hither Spaine was in armes, and had need of a captaine and souldiours to suppress the enemy: but in the other prouince the Romanes had no worse enemies than themselves: for that by reason of Sempronius long infirmitie, the souldiours were idle, and in a manner without a head, all were corrupted, insolent, and without any militarie discipline; the which they must chiefly remedie. The Senate therefore decreed, That there should be foure thousand foot and two hundred Roman horse newly leuied, to be sent into Spaine, with seuen thousand foot and three hundred horse of their allies.

Terentius Varro yielded vp the prouince and the armie to Qu. Fulvius Flaccus, who besieged a towne called Vrbicua, whereas the Celtiberians came to assaile him, making diuers skirmishes to rayse the siege, in the which many Romanes were slaine or hurt. But Fulvius continued firme, and by his perseuerance woon the towne, the enemies (tyred with fighting) being forced to retyre. The towne being destitute of succours, was within few dayes taken and sacked. P. Manlius did no other thing in his gouernment, but gather together the dispersed souldiours, so as both he and Fulvius after the taking of Vrbicua lodged the armies to Winter: Terentius being returned to Rome, entred in pompe, and brought into the treas-

A treasure 9320 pounds of siluer, 80 pounds of gold, and two crownes of gold of 67 pounds weight.

The yeare following these two Pretors were continued in their gouernment, and the warre grew hotter in Fulvius prouince than euer: for the Celtiberians went to field with thirtie five thousand fighting men: against whom, Fulvius fortified himselfe with all the Spanie he could leuie among the Romane confederats: but hee did not equall the enemies in number: yet hee marched into the Carpetanians countrey, and encamped neere vnto Ebura, into the which he put a garison. The Celtiberians approched soone after, and planted their campe within halfe a league of the Romanes, at the foot of a hill; whereas the Pretor sent to discover them by two companies of their confederats horses, being led by his brother M. Fulvius, commanding him to approach neere vnto the enemies trenches, and to obserue of what compass they were, and if they came forth to charge them, they should retyre without fighting: the which he executed accordingly. Some daies were spent without any action of importance. In the end the Celtiberians resolved to goe forth with all their forces, who presented themselves in battaile, in the plaine which was betwixt the two armies, and there attended the Romanes: yet Fulvius stirred not, but kept his men foure dayes together within his campe; during the which, the Spaniards shewed alwaies the same countenance: then seeing that the Romans lay still, and that there was no means to fight with them, they kept themselves also quiet for a time; onely the horsemen went forth, keeping themselves readie, if the enemy should make shew to assaile them. The forragers on both sides went forth behind their armies without any let. This hauing continued some dayes, the Romane Pretor (thinking that he had made the enemy secure) commanded L. Acilius to march with six thousand Spanie foot of their allies, and some of the horsemen of the left wing, about the hill vpon the enemies backe, and there he should attend vntill he heard the crie of the Legionaries and the rest of the armie, and that then he should come and assaile the enemies campe. Acilius parted in the night, because he would not be discovered. Fulvius at the breake of day caused C. Stribonius Colonel of the Latines, to march towards the Celtiberians trenches, accompanied with the extraordinarie horsemen of the left wing. The enemy seeing him better accompanied than the day before, sallied presently forth with all his horse, being followed by their footmen. Stribonius seeing them come, turned head, as he had bene commanded, and retyred towards the Romanes campe. The Celtiberians pursued them speedily both with horse and foot, perswading themselves, the day should not passe, before they were masters of the Romanes campe, being now within five hundred paces. Then Fulvius seeing that hee had drawne them farre ynough from their fort, he made way for his armie, being readie in their trenches, causing them to fallie forth by three seuerall ports at one instant, commanding them to make great shouts and cries, not so much to giue courage to the souldiours, as it was their custome, as to aduertise them that were in ambush behind the hill, attending a signe to assaile the enemies campe. When as they heard the crie, they ran vnto their rampiers according vnto their directions: The Celtiberians had onely left five hundred men to gard it, who made no great resistance, being amazed both at their own small number, and at the multitude of those that came suddainly to assaile them. Acilius hauing woon their campe, hee presently set fire on such places as lay open to the enemy. The flame appearing, did much daunt the Celtiberians, and gaue courage vnto the Romans, being assured thereby, that their campe was taken. Notwithstanding, the Celtiberians seeing themselves destitute of a retreat, fought like desperat men, and did much annoy the Romanes: but in the end being oppressed both with the first troupes and with fresh supplies, and by Acilius, who returned from the taking of the campe, and by the garison of Ebura, who sallied forth in the heat of the battell, they were vanquished, and great numbers slaine vpon the place, and afterwards wholly defeated, the horsemen pursuing them that fled. They write, That in this battaile there died 23000 Spaniards, and 4800 prisoners taken: the Romanes tooke about 500 horse, and 88 ensignes. Doubtlesse the victorie was great, yet not without blood: for there were slaine about 200 legionarie Romanes, 830 Latines, allies, and 2400 strangers. Which done, the Pretor brought backe his victorious armie into his campe. Acilius was sent vnto the campe which hee had taken, and the next day they gathered vp the enemies spoyles, and the souldiours being publickly assembled, euery one was rewarded according victorie of *Qu.

A memorable
Fulvius Flaccus*
against the Cel-tiberians.

The number of the dead.

l iij

to Contrebia taken by the Romans.

Another defeat
of the Celtiberians
by Fulvius.

Anno Roma 573
New Pretors
sent into Spaine.

The Romans
charged by the Celtiberians in a strait.

to his merits : then hauing left the wounded men at Ebur, the Legions were led to Contrebia, by the territorie of the Carpetanians. This towne being besieged, they sent to demand succours of the Celtiberians, but the towne was yeilded before they came. There had fallen such abundance of raine at this season, as Fulvius was forced to lodge his armie within the towne. The Celtiberians, who could not come by reason of the high waters and the bad way, knew nothing of the yeilding of this towne, vntill they were charged by the Romanes which were within it: for seeing no signes of a campe about it, they imagined the enimie had bene gone; so as they approached the towne without order, fearing no danger: from whence the Romanes sallied forth vpon them with great furie, and put them to flight: and although the field was spacious, and the commoditie great to saue themselves, yet there died twelue thousand men, fise thousand were taken prisoners, foure hundred horses of seruice, and sixtie two ensignes gotten. These Celtiberians being disperfed, they aduertised their companions which came vnto them, of their defeat: whereupon they returned, and all this preparation went to smoake. In the further or West part of Spaine, the Pretor Manlius did also fight happily against the Lusitanians. After these exploits Q. Fulvius sent L. Minutius his Lieutenant to Rome, with two Colonels. T. Menius and L. Terentius Massaliota, to carrie newes, That the Celtiberians had bene wholly vanquished in two great battailes, and that the Senate should not need to make prouision of money or any other thing for the entertainment of their souldiours that yeare, for that (sayd they) the warre was ended. They demanded also, That the Pretor might haue leaue to bring backe the armie, which he and others before him had so happily managed and employed: the which (they sayd) was not onely reasonable, but very necessarie, for that euerie one demanded leaue, speaking openly, That if it were not graunted them, they would take it.

13 At the first generall assembly A. Posth. Albinus Luscu and C. Calphurnius Piso being made Consuls, they also created new Pretors to send into Spaine: the hither part by Ebro fell to T. Sempronius Gracchus, and L. Posthumius had the West part. T. Sempronius was not much pleased with the request made on Fulvius behalfe, to whom he should succeed: whereupon he protested, That if they sent him thither with an armie newly leuied; hee would keepe himselfe within his garrisons, and not expose vnexperienced souldiours against an enimie so long trained vp in warre. Thereupon the Senate did decree, That they should raise a Legion of fise thousand two hundred foot, and three hundred Romane horse, and besides it a thousand Romane foot and fiftie horse; and the Latines their allies should be enjoyned to furnish feuen thousand foot and foure hundred horse: and that with this armie Sempronius should goe into Spaine: giuing leaue vnto Qu. Fulvius to bring backe the souldiours which had bene sent thither before that Sp. Posthumius and Qu. Martius were Consuls; which was six yeares before: and moreover, when the new leuie were come into the country, it should be also lawfull for him to bring all backe that were about two complete Legions, of tenne thousand foure hundred foot and six hundred horse, Romanes, and twelue thousand foot and six hundred horse of their allies, Latins, of those souldiours with the which Fulvius had gotten two victories against the Celtiberians.

Whilest these new Pretors were expected in Spaine, Qu. Fulvius in qualitie of Vice-Pretor vnderooke to goe and assaile the Celtiberians lying a farre off, for that they had not yet reconciled themselves vnto him. This did rather incense the Barbarians than amaze them: wherefore going to armes, they seized vpon the strait or passage called Manlian, by the which they knew the Romane armie must returne. Gracchus had giuen charge to L. Posthumius Albinus, going to his gouernment in the further Spaine, to aduertise Qu. Fulvius. That hee should come and meet him with the armie at Tarracone, where hee would discharge the old bands, distribute the supplyes which he had brought, and dispose of the whole armie; appointing a short time vnto Fulvius for the effecting thereof. Vpon which newes he was forced to depart suddainly out of the Celtiberians country: which made the people surmise, that he had some intelligence, that they did secretly arme, and that he retired for feare: Wherefore they began to gard the passage more straitly and proudly than before. The Romane armie being entered into this passage at the breake of day, they were assailed in two severall places at one instant, Qu. Fulvius giuing order for all things,

A things, according to the time and place, and making a brieve exhortation to his souldiours, he assured them. The fight began to grow hot, but not with like aduantage: for the legions and the Latines vpon the wings did fight valiantly, but their Spanish souldiours could not resist their country-men, who were better souldiours than they. The Celtiberians seeing they could not vanquish the Romanes, fighting hand to hand with them in a set battell, they had recourse vnto their accustomed fashion, which was, to shape their troupe like a wedge. Being thus ordered, they are more firme and violent, and can hardly be withstood: by this meanes they had almost disordered the legions. The which the Generall perceiuing, hee ran presently to the legionary horsemen, asking them, What they did there, and what succour might be expected from them? To whom they answered, That they were readie to obey whatsoever hee should command. Soyne then (said he) all the horses together of the two legions, and with a full carriere breake through that wedge of men which doth force our Squadron; yea take the bridles from your horses, as our auncelors haue often done with good successe, that you may overthrow them with more violence. Whereunto the horsemen speedily obeyed, and setting spurs to their vnbridled horses, they passed and repassed through this troupe of the enemies, breaking their stauies, and making great slaughter of them. When this wedge was broken and disperfed, in the which the Spaniards did wholly relye, they had no other thought but vpon flight. The Latin horsemen moued with the valour of the Romanes, without any further commaundement, fell vpon the enemies already broken, so as there was a great slaughter made in the fight throughout all the strait. For this victorie the vice Pretor did vow a temple vnto Fortune, and games vnto Iupiter. There died in this encounter seuteene thousand Celtiberians, about three thousand prisoners, and two hundred threescore and seuteene ensignes taken, and about one thousand and one hundred horses gotten. The victorious armie did neither intrench nor rampar for that day: But this victorie was not without losse to the Romans, for there were foure hundred threescore and ten citizens slaine, a thousand and nineteen Latines, and of Spaniards and other strangers, their allies, three thousand. Thus this armie hauing redoubled her fame by this victorie, it arriued at Tarracone, whereas Sempronius the Pretor (who arriued there but two dayes before) went forth to meet him, and did congratulate with Fulvius and the souldiours, their happie exploits for the commonweale. Then did they louingly and with great concord, discharge and retaine what they thought fit among the souldiours, according to the decree of the Senat: And for that yeare there was little done in Spaine by the new gouernours, for that they arriued late by reason of the death of one of the Consuls, and the subrogation of another, which staied their expedition. The yeare following they were continued in their gouernments.

Q. Fulvius Flaccus being returned to Rome, when as he stayed without the towne, to haue order for his triumph according to the custome, he was chosen Confull with L. Manlius Acidinus, and then he entred in triumph, with the souldiours which he had brought out of Spaine. He brought into the publike treasure one hundred and twentie foure crownes of gold, 31 pounds of gold, and 173200 deniers of coined money of Osca, besides he gaue fiftie deniers, being about fise crownes, to euerie footman, twice as much to the centeniers, and thrice as much to the horsemen, as much to the allies and Latines, and to all in generall double pay.

This yeare the Gouernors in Spaine diuided the warre betwixt them, so as Albinus should goe and assaile the Vaccens by the country of the Lusitanians, and from thence should come into the marches of the Celtiberians. Gracchus should enter into the heart of their country, for that the warre was hottest there. There he first tooke the towne of Munda by force, hauing set vpon it suddenly in the night, and hauing taken hostages, and put in a garrison, he battered some castles, and did forrage and burne the country vntill he came vnto another strong towne called Certimar, whereas hauing begun to plant his engines to batter it, deputies came vnto him from the inhabitants, who vied a simple kind of speech vnto him, after the auntient manner, without any dissembling, telling him freely, That they would make warre if they had meanes, desiring that they might haue leaue to goe vnto the Celtiberians campe, to demand succours: the which if they could not obtaine, they would then take counsell of their affaires distinctly from the other nations. Gracchus yeilded to their demand: and within a few daies after they returned, bringing with them ten other deputies. It was about noone. The first words which they spake vnto the Pretor, were, That they intreated him to commaund some of his

The Romans distressed.

Another great defeat of the Celtiberians by
Qu. Fulvius.

The number of the dead of their side.

Anno Roma 574

The feeble-cite of the Spaniards.

Gracchus his civillie and counsell to the Barbarians.

his people to bring them drinke : which done, they demanded more, making all the affinites to laugh at their grosseffe, and want of ciuillitie. Then the eldest among them began to speake, saying, That they had beene sent vnto him by them of their nation, to know, vpon what ground he was come to make warre against them. Gracchus answered, That it was vpon the assurance of a goodly armie, which he had, and if they would seeit, to make a more certaine report vnto their men, he would suffer them, commanding some captaines to cause them all to arme, and to make them march and skirmish together. These deputies reported vnto their people what they had seene ; which diuerted them from sending any succours to the towne besieged: The inhabitants whereof (seeing themselves abandoned) yeelded, paying the value of 60000 crownes, and gaue fortie knights, of the noblest among them, not in shew as hostages (for they put them among their bands to carrie armes) although in effect they were as pawns of their promises and accords. From thence Gracchus led his armie to Alce, a town whereas the Celtiberians (who had sent the ten deputies vnto him) were camped, against whom for some dayes he sent his light horsemen, to tire them with light skirmishes, euen within their gards, sending more men daily, to the end he might draw them out of their trenches to battell. The which succeding according to his desire, hee commaunded the Generall of the allies, to begin the fight, and that presently turning their backs, and making shew to bee oppressed with multitudes, they should returne with all speed towards the campe. He in the meane time put his armie in battell within the rampars, nere vnto euerie gate, and suddenly when he saw his men turne head towards the campe flying, as he had commanded them, and the enemie following with no lesse speed; hauing retired his men, he drew forth his armie by all those ports, with great cries, so as the enemies could not make any resistance: and it happened, that those which came running to take the Romanes campe, could not defend their owne; for presently they were repulled, put to rout, and beaten into their palisadoes, where they were soone after forced. There were nine thousand slaine that day vpon the place, three hundred prisoners, 112 horses of seruice, and 37 ensignes woon. On the Romanes side there died but 109 men. After this defeat Gracchus led the legions to spoyle the country of the Celtiberians, wasting and carrying all away. Wherefore many, either for feare, or otherwise forced, yeelded vnto him: so as in few dayes he reduced vnder the Romanes obedience one hundred and thirtene townes, and tooke great spoyles. From thence hee returned againe towards Alce, and began to assaile it. The inhabitants endured the first assault, but afterwards seeing them prepare their engines to batter it, distrusting in their owne strength, they retired all into the castle, the which yeelded soone after, submitting themselves to Gracchus his mercie. The spoyle was great, and many noblemen and of good houses were taken prisoners; among the which there was a sonne and a daughter of Thursus, who was the greatest nobleman of the country, and to whom the place belonged. Hearing what was happened, he came with a safe-conduct into the armie to Gracchus: of whom he demanded life, both for himselfe and his, whereof Gracchus assured him. Then he desired to be admitted to carrie armes with the Romanes, the which was granted him: and from that time he shewed himselfe faithfull and valiant in their seruice, and did greatly aduance the Romane affaires in Spaine.

Ergauica a mightie and famous towne, being amazed with the miseries and ruines of her neighbours, opened the gates to the Roman armie. Some write, that these yeeldings were not done faithfully, and that as soone as the legions were gone, they entred into rebellion, so as the Pretor had two encounters with the Celtiberians, the one neere vnto mount Caunus, where the fight continued six houres, with great slaughter on either side, neither partie confessing himselfe to be vanquished. The second time (which was the third day after) the Romans had an assured victorie; where there were 22000 of the enemies slaine vpon the place, and 300 prisoners, and as many horses, and 72 engines taken. By which defeat the war was ended in that country, and the Celtiberians demanded peace, the which they did faithfully entertain for a time, without rebelling. They write, that L. Posthumius had at the same time woon two batrels of the Vaccens, others say, of the Brecaires, which are betwixt Minio and Duero, and had slaine 35000 of the enemies, and tooke their campe.

Ann. Roma 975 At Rome M. Junius Brutus, & A. Manlius Volfo being chosen consuls, M. Titinius & T. Fonteius Capito were created Pretors & gouernors of Spain: Titinius had that part which was neereſt vnto

Gracchus victo ric against the Celtiberians.

Some of the ancient said these 113 towns were but farms, or dove-houses, to eclipse the glorie
of Gracchus.

Thurmus a pettie
Spanish king
lord of Alice.

Cause, want
Case at this day.

Ann. Rome 575

A vnto Gaule, and Capito the Westerne part: and then Sempronius Gracchus and L. Posthumius came to Rome, who had the honour of a triumph granted them, for that they had gouerned the affaires of the commonweale wisely and valiantly. Gracchus entred first in triumph for the Celtiberians, bringing into the treasure fortie thousand pounds weight in siluer. His companion entred some dayes after, triumphing for the Lusitanians, and other neighbour people, who also brought twentie thousand pounds. To euerie one of the souldiours was given five and twentie deniers, which is worth two crownes and a halfe: to the centeniers double, and to the horsemen treble as much, and to the souldiours of their allies as much as to them of Rome.

B Spain tyred with warre, was quiet during the gouernment of the new Pretors, who continued there two yeares.

The third year Cn. Corn. Scipio Hispanus, and Q. Petilius Spurrinus being Consuls, M. Corn. Scipio Maluginensis, and P. Licinius Crassus, were chosen Pretors in Spaine: Crassus had the hispanie, and Scipio the further; but either of them pretended excuses not to go, and therefore Titinius and Fonteius were continued in the government as vice-Pretors, to whom there was appointed to fill up their armies, three thousand foot, citizens of Rome, and two hundred horse, and five thousand Latins of their allies, with three hundred horse: yet there is no mention of any tumult in Spaine, during their abode, nor after they were changed, vntill the Consulship of Sp. Posthumus and Q. Mutius, which was two yeares after, in the which the government was so much troubled, and the further to Cn. Seruilus Cepio. We read

Ann. 577.
The new Pretors refuse their charge in Spaine
Anno Rome 579

Cunt of the higher Spaine fell to P. Enrius Philo, and the further to Cn. Seruilius Cepio. Vnder read that whilst these Pretors prepared themselves to go into their prouinces, the Celtiberians being in armes, App. Claudius Cento (who was vice-Pretor there) gaue them a great defeat, so as they were forced to submit themselves vnto the yoke. They began their rebellion by a sudden assault which they came to giue vnto the Romanes campe at the breake of day: Being discouered by the centinels, they cried to armes, so as the souldiors were presently armed, and readie to fallie forth, as they did by the ports: but the Celtiberians were so neere, as they kept them long from comming forth, so as the combat was in a manner equall. But the formost ranks being thrust on by their companions, in the end they got out of their palisadoes into the plaine, where they had meanes to draw out their front, and the wings of their battell, equal to that of the enemies, with the which they were in a manner compassed in: but they behaued themselves so well, as they repulst them, and in lesse than two houres put them to flight, with the losse of aboute fifteene thousand of their men; so as the warre was ended: for which as escape, submitted themselves soone after to the Romanes yoke, so as the new Gouernours had not any warre.

The next yeare L. Posth. Albinus, and M. Pompilius Lenas, being Consuls, Cn. Fabius Buto, and M. Matienus were chosen to gouverne Spaine: and then arrived App. Claudius, who entered the citie with the pompe of ouation, bringing ten thousand pounds of silver, and five thousand of gold. Fabius Buto, who had the hither Spaine, going into his gouernment, fell sicke at Marceilles, where he died, so as P. Furius Philo was continued in his gouernment, and E Matienus came into the further prouince. As it is a thing too well knowne, that gouernments are not affected but to get authoritie and wealth: so it falls out often, when as Gouernours find not matter to maintaine their greatnesse among the enemies by the warre, they can hardly doe iustice to their fellow citizens and allies in time of peace: then they begin to molest the richest families, by false accusations, to saue necessities, to exact vpon the publike, and to vse other such practices, to fill their cofers, and enrich their ministers with the ruine and desolation of the commons. Thus did the Pretors and lieutenants of the people of Rome in Spaine.

Spain. These two Gouernours Enríke and Matiénus, either in his jurisdiction, having (by reason of the peace) no other prey but those that were given them in ward, they polled them in such fort, as not able any longer to endure their extortions and fraud, the poore Spaniards were constrained to send embassadours to Rome, after that the Pretorship was ended : who having audience, casting themselves vpon their knees, they made a pitifull complaint of the pride and countenance of their Gouernours, beseeching the Senat not to suffer their friends and allies to be oppressed and spoyled by them with greater violence than if they were enemies. Many crimes were objected by them, but concussion was best verified. The Senat decreed, That Ca-

Anno 577.
The new Pretors refuse their charge in Spains

d Anno Rome 579

The Celtiberians defeated.

nd Publique charges affected for ts prime profits.

14
The Spaniards
complain of their governours
cruelties.

I. u. Ca.

Spaine made one government, and
L. Camilleus
Pretor alone.

L. Camilleus (to whom the government of Spaine was fallen) should chuse judges from among the Senators, to examine the fact; and that the parties should chuse advocates of the same order. Titinius, who had bene Pretor, during the Consulship of A. Manlius and M. Junius in the higher Spaine, was drawne in question: but when as they had pleaded two severall dayes, he was absolved: but P. Furius Philo (who had bene Gouverneur in the same province) and M. Matienus in the further Spaine, being accused of diuers crimes, and their causes often pleaded, when as it was againe to be heard, they were excused, being absent, for that being loath to attend the sentence, they had voluntarily retired themselves, the one to Pre-nest, the other to Tybur: and so the matter was left vndecided.

Camilleus desiring to suppress this pursute, to the end that many should not bee molested by the Spaniards, began to giue order for the affaires of his government, and to inroll souldiours, to lead them into the province which was appointed for them, and so he parted. The Senat letting passe what had bene formerly done, provided for the future, that the Romane magistrats should set no taxe vpon come, and that they should not force the Spaniards to sell the twentieth part at their pleasures, which was a certaine tribute: and that they should send no more Commissaries into their townes to leuie money.

At the same time there came another kind of embassage to Rome, from them that had bin borne of Romane souldiours and Spanish women, and not married. These were about foure thousand men. The Senat commaunded they should giue in their names, and be inrolled by L. Camilleus the Pretor: and that such as he should make free, should be conducted vnto Carteia, vpon the Ocean sea, to dwell there. That the inhabitants of Carteia that would remaine there, should be receiued, and portions of land assigned them: and this colonie should be held for Latines, and be called the Libertines.

It seemes that the Romanes hauing no warres at that time in Spaine, were resolved to reduce it to one government, and to send but one Pretor. After Camilleus mention is made of Claudius Marcellus, and then of P. Ponticus: of whose deeds there is no mention in auncient writers; so as it is to be presumed, this province continued quiet. But in the yeare 586 of the foundation of Rome, Q. Aelius and M. Junius being Consuls, they did againe create two Pretors, which were Cn. Fulvius on the hither part, & about the river of Ebro; and C. Licinius Nerua in the further. After which the Romanes contenting themselves for many yeares, with their conquests in Spaine, they fought as it seemed to make them whom they had subiected, or drawne vnto them, ciuile, and to fashion them by little and little to the manners and inclinations of the Romanes: without seeking the other people which were more barbarous, who also for their parts were glad to be left in peace, being terrified with the Romanes power, whom they would not incense, neither had they any care to seek their friendship, because they hated them, as violaters of the lawes of nature, and oppressors of mans libertie.

15 In the yeare 600 of the foundation of Rome, Q. Fulvius and T. Annius being Consuls, the Celtiberians (who had bene vanquished and subdued by T. Gracchus five and twentie yeares before) began againe to stirre, the inhabitants of Sediga, a towne of the Areuces, hauing (against their capitulations, and the commaundement of Gracchus) repaired the walls of their towne, and refused to pay tribute vnto the Romanes: by reason whereof other people being also rebelled in Spain, the Senat resolved to send an armie, and a Consul to be the General, so as Q. Fulvius was sent, who was not verie fortunat in the beginning. This yeare by a new custome the Consuls entred into charge the first of Ianuarie, whereas before they did not begin their magistracie vntill the fifteenth of March: whereunto they were induced by the rebellion of the Spaniards: the which was afterwards continued. Of this beginning followed the warre of Numancia, which lasted twentie yeares. The Senat of Rome hauing first forbidden them of Segida to raise their walls, and then commaunded them to goe to the war with their Consuls and Pretors, according to the pacification made by Gracchus, they answered, That they had capitulated, not to make any new forts, but not to repaire their old. And as for going to the warre, they were exempt from that charge, by the treatie of Gracchus: the which was true. But the Senat added a glose to these conditions, that is, As long as it shall please vs: the which the Spaniards would not heare of. Wherefore seeing that Quintus Fulvius Nobilior came against them with an armie of thirtie thousand men, they left their towne, which was not yet in defence, sent their wiues and children to their neighbours, and vnder the conduct

A colonie of Libertines.

Spaine diuided again into two governments.

Anno Rome 600

The Celtiberians
and other people repaire the demantled towne.

The Romane
Magistrats
change the day of entering into their charges.

The stranger
confirme treaties
as they please.

Carus a captain of the Spaniards

A of one Carus, they assembled to the number of 20000 foot, and 5000 horse, and came and camped in a place couered with wood, verie fit to surprise their enemies, whom he met withall in the woods, and both gaue and took many wounds. Afterwards in a great encounter Carus had the victorie, hauing slaine 6000 Romanes, wherewith being growne insolent and carelesse, the Consull had means to haue his reuenge, sending his horsemen to charge the Spaniards which were scattered and out of order: who put 6000 to the sword, and more had bin slaine, if night had not seperated them. This made the Celtiberians more circumspect. The same night the people of the country assembled at Numance, and being resolved to resist the Romanes, they made choice of Ambo and Leuco for their captaines. The Consull Fulvius hauing receiued

A conspiracie of
the Spaniards
at Numance.

B 300 horse, with some Elephants, from king Massinissa, a Moore (an auncient friend to the people of Rome) marching forward, he came and offered battell to the enemies vnder Numance. He had placed his Elephants behind the first ranks, that they might not be seene, thinking to terrifie them suddenly, and to defeat them by that meanes; but it fell out otherwise: for being come to joyne, and the ranks opened, when as the Elephants shewed themselves, they did somewhat terrifie the Spaniards and their horses, which were not accustomed to see such beasts; so as turning their backs they went towards the towne: But one of these Elephants comming neere the walls, being hit on the forehead with a stone, he entred into such a rage, as turning against the Romanes themselves, he trode them vnder his feet; after whose example the rest began to run through the Romane troupes, and disordered them: For it is the nature

C of these beasts, when they are terrified, they know neither friend nor foe: wherefore many call them common enemies. The Spaniards which were within Numance, seeing this confusion, sallied out vpon the Romanes, and slew foure thousand men, and tooke three Elephants, and many ensignes; yet they lost two thousand of their men.

Elephants held by the wife to be common enemies.

The Consull hauing refreshed himselfe somewhat after this rout, he was repulsed againe at the fort of Axenium, the which he assailed, to haue the victuals which the enemy had in it, and in this misfortune the Romanes received a third rout, whereas Biasius a leader of some horse of their allies, was slaine, with many good souldiours. These many losses did moue the inhabitants of Ocilis, or Ocelon, allies to the Romanes, and gardians of the money and victuals of their campe, to revolt, and to follow the Celtiberians partie. So as vanquished D with so many misfortunes, the Consull Fulvius could take no better course, than to fortifie his campe for to winter: the which hee did with the greatest want that might be, besides, haile, snow, raine, and all the rigour of the season, so as many of his souldiours perished for cold.

Ocelon vanishes from the Roman partie.

16 The yeare following M. Claudius Marcellus succeeded Fulvius, and brought 8000 foot and 500 horse into Spaine. This man was more politique than his predecessor, to keepe himselfe from the surprises of his enemies, leading his armie safely to Ocilis, the which hee tooke in few dayes, and pardoned their offence, paying a fine of thirtie talents, and some hostages, which he demanded of them. This clemencie of his made the Nertobriges, another nation, to send embassadors vnto him, to demand peace and pardon: to whom he made a pleasing answer, demanding an hundred horsemen of them; the which they promised. But during this treatie, they sent certaine troupes, which fell vpon the Romanes baggage, and spoyled some of it. Hereupon the hundred horsemen, which the Consull had demanded, arrived, whom he committed to prison, and sold their horses, by reason of their treacherie. Then he led his armie against their towne.

M. Marcellus
Consull sent into
Spaine.

The inhabitants seeing themselves inuironed with ditches and trenches, sent forth a herald attired in a wolues skin (a ceremonie vsed by the Barbarians in such supplications) craving pardon. To whom hee made answer, That hee would not grant it; if the Areuces and the other rebels their allies did not sue for it all together. Which being knowne vnto them, they all sent their embassadors to intreat the Consull Marcellus to referre them to the accord made in former time with T. Gracchus, imposing vpon them (according to his clemencie) a tollerable punishment.

Ceremonies of the Barbarians
when they are suer.

There were some people allied vnto the Romanes, which hauing bene wronged by them, opposed themselves to this demand: wherefore Marcellus sent them all to the Senat of Rome. The Senat made no other answer, hauing heard their debate, but that Marcellus should tell them what they were to do.

In

Ann. Rome 602

17 In the meane time, in the yeare 602, Spaine fell by lot to the Consul L. Lucullus, and G then they began first to inroll souldiours by lot. Lucullus led with him P. Scipio Aemilianus (he that made himselfe famous by the euerfion of Carthage the great, and of Numantia.) Marcellus hauing aduertised the Celtiberians of the comming of this Confull, and of the warre which was prepared, he aduised them, before they attended any greater extremitie, to yeeld to his discretion, promising them all good vsage, and reasonable conditions; for he desired to end this war before the comming of Lucullus: the which they did. This Marcellus (as Strabo writes) did build the citie of Corduba, and imposed a tribute of six hundred talents vpon Spaine, continuing his gouernment a good while after that Lucullus was chosen Confull, gouerning as Proconfull.

Corduba built by Marcellus.

Lucullus being courteous seeks occasion of war.

Lucullus finding nothing to doe at his arriual, he laid the foundation of a new warre, being as desirous to make some spoyle (for he was but poore) as to get honour. He entred therefore as an enemy into the Vaccens countrey, who had in no sort offended the Romanes: and hauing passed the riuer of Tayo, he went to besiege Cauca. The inhabitants demanded what he would of them, and why he besieged them. He answered, That they had wronged the Celtiberians, allies to the Romanes, and that he came to reuenge it. Whereupon they retired into their towne, and put themselves in defence. Soone after they fallied forth suddenly vpon them that went to forrage, and slue a great number. But the Roman souldiours going forth to succor them, they repulsed the Spaniards, beating them euen vnto their town gates, whereas they smothered one another with the multitude, so as there were about three thousand slaine. Those which remained being amazed with this losse, they sent the next day the most antient among them, with girlands of oliue branches, desiring Lucullus to receive them as friends, and to set downe the conditions; who imposed an hundred talents of silver, and hostages, commanding them to send their horsemen to the warre with him: which hauing granted, Lucullus said, That he would haue them receiue a garrison into their towne: where vnto they were also willing to obey, so as presently there were two thousand of the best souldiours in the armie sent, with commandement to seise vpon the ports, towers, and strongest places of the towne: which they did. Then Lucullus drew in all the rest of the souldiours, and by the sound of the trumpe, did most cruelly put all the inhabitants to the sword, sparing neither age nor sexe: yet some slipping ouer the walls, and creeping through the prease, escaped, who proclaimed the Romanes treacherie, couetousnesse, and crueltie, throughout all Spaine: whereupon all those that dwelt in the champian countrey, and in places of easie access, retired vnto the mountaines, or into fortified townes; carrying with them what was good and precious: and what they could not carrie they burnt, being loath to leaue any spoyle to so cruell an enemy.

Orreuous barbarians laid vpon them of Cauca by Lucullus.

Lucullus cruelty against the inhabitants of Cauca.

Cauca being thus ruined, Lucullus led his armie through a great part of the countrey which was barren and desart, vntil he came to the towne of Intercatia, where there were some twentieth thousand foot and two thousand Spanish horse, gathered together: of whom Lucullus demanded indiscreetly, If they would not come to composition with him. But they asked, If he would receive them with the like faith as he had done them of Cauca? reproaching vnto him with opprobrious words, this treacherous and inhumane fact. Wherewith Lucullus being incensed (as commonly all those are which find themselves touched) he spoiled all their countrey, and then besieged them. They knowing there was no reason to come to battel with the Roman armie, maintained themselves with skirmishes and sudden fallies. During this siege a Spanish cavalier richly armed, and brauely mounted, shewed himselfe often betwixt the armie and the towne, challenging some Roman to the combat, and seeing that no man durst come forth, he scorned them. But Scipio Aemilianus being then verie young, grieved to see the Roman knights thus dishonoured, and hauing leaue from the Confull, he went to encounter him, and vanquished him: the which bred admiration in both parties, considering the inequality of the stature of the combatants; for Scipio was little, and the Spaniard wonderful great and strong. The Romanes conceiued good hope of this victorie: but in the night they were troubled with the cries of certaine horsemen of the towne, which were gone forth before that Lucullus did inuest it, who being the same night returned, about the palisadoes of the Roman armie, made great cries and shouts, to whom the besieged made answer: so as the Romanes were forced to keepe themselves in armes, not knowing what part to gard: besides,

Truth breeds hatred and furie in the wicked when they are touched.

Scipio Aemilianus combats with a Spaniard and conquers him valiantly.

A sides, they were tyred and growne weake, for that they wanted both bread, wine, oyle, salt and vinegre, liuing only vpon venison, hares, or pouldred flesh, the which bred fluxes, whereof many dyed. Continuing their batterie, they made a great breach, but comming to the assault, (whereas Scipio was one of the foremost) and being in a manner masters of the towne, they were sharply repulsed: and in their retreat many through ignorance of the place fell into certaine priues, where they were swallowed vp. The besieged hauing repaired their breach, seemed resolute; but hunger pressing either partie, they could not long dissemble their necessities: so as Lucullus perswaded the Spaniards to yeeld, with the best words hee could, promising he would not deceiue them, so as in the end they gaue him credit, and yeelded, vpon condition B to send six thousand archers to the warre with him, giuing a certaine number of cattell, and some hostages. Gold nor siluer (the desire whereof had drawne Lucullus into Spaine) there was not any: for the people of that countrey had neuer esteemed it. Matters being thus compounded, the Roman armie was led against Palantia, a strong and well fortified towne, whither many of the champion countrey, and lesser townes were retired. Most of the colonels and captains were of opinion, That they should not strue in vaine against so mightie a town: but Lucullus, a couetous man, knowing it to be exceeding rich, would neuer leaue it vntill that hunger forced him, the horsemen of the towne (which were verie many) falling out daily vpon the Romans which went to forrage. Being thus pressed, he put his armie into battell, and retired, the Palantines following him in the taile, and pursuing him vnto the riuer C of Duero, where they left their pursute, and returned. Lucullus passing on, led his armie to winter in the countrey of the Turditanes. Thus ended the warre against the Vaccens, for the which (although that Lucullus vnderooke it without authoritie or commandement from the Senat and people of Rome) he was neuer called into question.

Intercatia taken by composition.

Couetousnesse, and no desire of honour brought him into Spaine.

Lucullus retired from Palantia with shame.

Lucullus making war without authoritie, is not punished.

18 About that time the Lusitanians, and people of the further Spaine, liuing vnder their owne lawes, had made incursions vpon the friends and allies of the people of Rome, hauing a certaine Africane for their captain, and chased Manlius and Calpurnius, Roman captains, killing about six thousand of their men, with Terentius Varro, their Questor or Treasurer. Wherewith this Africane growne proud, he went with a companie of Vectons, a neighbor people, to assaile the town of the Blastophenicians, a people who, they said, were brought and left in Spaine by Hannibal. This captain being slaine there with a stone, they did presently make choice of one called Casparus to be head of their armie: who gaue battell vnto Mumius which had bene sent from Rome with an armie, but he lost it: yet seeing that Mumius pursued his victorie inconsiderately, he turned head, and repaired his losse, so as he slew nine thousand of the Roman armie vpon the place, and not onely recovered his owne baggage, but rooke the enemies, and carried away a great number of ensignes, which the Lusitanians dragged vp and downe in scorn of the Romanes. Mumius hauing gathered together six thousand souldiours which remained, and reuiued them as well as he could, he found an opportunitie to charge the enemy going to forrage, and did so well, as he slew a great number, and recovered his ensignes.

Romans defeated by the Lusitanians.

Mumius defeats the Spaniards, and is beaten by the vanquished through his own negligence.

Mumius reuenges his losse.

E The Lusitanians which dwelt beyond the riuer of Tayo, hauing in like maner proclaimed warre against the Romanes, and tooke the towne of Conistorgis by assault, a great and strong towne, confederat to the Romanes, they being led by a captain called Caucene: and not content to make a tumult in Spaine, some of them passed the strait at Hercules pillars, and went to spoyle Affricke: the rest went to assaile Ocile. But Mumius arriuing with a thousand foot and six hundred horse, slew about fiftene thousand forragers, and made them to leaue the siege of Ocile. Then going against others, who thought to escape with the prey, hee left not one alieue to carrie newes of their defeat. Hee distributed the bootie which was portable among his souldiours, and the rest (being consecrated to those gods who hee thought did pre-side ouer the warres) he burnt. After all this, he returned to Rome, and triumphed.

F Attilius, or Acilius Balbus, succeeded Mumius, who at his first arriual cut seven hundred Lusitanians in peeces, and tooke Oxthra, being the greatest and richest towne they had, striking terror in all the neighbour people, which submitted themselves to his deuotion as far as the Vectons. But when as Acilius had lodged his armie for Winter, they rebelled, and began to annoy them that were friends and confederats to the Romanes: Against whom Ser. Galba sent Pretor to succed Acilius, meaning to succour them, made a march of 15 leagues,

K

and

Galba being victor is defeated by his rash purposes.

and being come in sight of the enemy, without giving rest to the souldiours, he led them G to fight, and vanquished happily. But as the Romanes pursued the flying enemy in disorder, and made many stands being wearie, the Lusitanians turning head, slue seven thousand, and forced Galba to flie with his horsemen into Carmel, whither many that had escaped were retired: who hauing rallied them together, and leuied twentie thousand men of their confederats, he wintered at Cunes. The Consull Lucullus who wintered in Turditania, hearing that the Lusitanians were in armes, he sent the best of his capitaines against them, and slue foure thousand of them, and afterwards hauing made a new head nere vnto Gades, hee cut fise thousand and fise hundred in peeces. And as Galba on his side pressed these people, they sent embassadors vnto him, seeming desirous to enjoy the accord made before with Attilius. H Galba made shew to pitie them, and to excuse their excess for that pouertie had made them to breake the treaties, and to steale: saying, That he knew well that the Barbarians of the country was the cause of these inconueniences: but if they had a true intent to be friends, he would diuide them into three troupes, and send them into fertile places to liue in. The Lusitanians being woon with these promises, put themselves into three troupes, and suffered themselves to be led to the places assigned by Galba, who spake vnto the first, as if they were in full peace, inioyning them to leaue their arms; which hauing done, he caused them all to be massacred: and with the like fraud and crueltie he defeated the other two troupes, before they could haue any newes of the slaughter of their companions. Many slipping through the armed troupes, escaped, among the which was Viriatus, who reuenged the trecherie & crueltie I of the Romanes against his country-men. Galba shewing himselfe as treacherous, and it may be more couetous than Lucullus, hauing filled his cofers with the spoyles of Lusitania, whereof he did defraud both his friends and souldiours, returned to Rome, where he was called in question for his abuses: but being the richest man in the citie, he escaped by bribes.

The treacherous cruelty of Serg. Galba.

20 The Lusitanians which remained of Lucullus and Galbaes treacheries, assembled together to the number of ten thousand, and did ouerrun the country of Turditania: against whom the Pretor C. Vetilius was sent; who hauing ioyned the armie which hee brought from Rome, with the forces he found in Spaine, he went against them which spoiled their friends country, and slew many of them, forcing the rest to retire to the side of a hill, where he besieged them, so as they must either end their dayes by hunger or by the sword: wherefore they resolu'd to sue for mercie, and to intreat him to appoint them a country to dwell in; the which he willingly graunted. But Viriatus being in this besieged companie, who had escaped K from Galbaes slaughter, began to speake in this manner. How wretched are we, that hauing so often tried the treacherie of these Romanes, we will againe offer our throats vnto them, and bee murdered by them, vnder the sweetnesse of their false promises? Do we not know that they with whom we haue now to deale, are the same who by their notable treacherie haue slaine our brethren and companions? Were it not better to keepe our armes, and selling our liues at a deere rate, let them seele that wee are men, than suffering our selues to be disarmed by a foolish credulitie, to bee afterwards slaine like beasts at the slaughter? No, my companions, let vs not commit so grosse an error, as to despaire in that sort: let vs rather trie to force vs a passage, and you shall find the difficultie is not so great as you imagine, if you do what I shall aduise you. This souldiour speaking with a great courage, reuiued their spirits, who with one voice cried out vnto him, That in a good houre he should be their captain, and that he should lead them whither he should thinke good. Then he put them all in battell, except some thousand of the best appointed, which he kept with himselfe, and then he commaunded euerie one to flie, appointing their Rendezuous at Tribola. Vetilius was in doubt to pursue them that fled, thinking it the safest course to assaile Viriatus, & his thousand souldiours which were in battell on the side of the hill. But they hauing spent that day and a part of the next, in making a shew that they would fight with the Romanes, easily freed themselves, being well mounted, and knowing the country, and then came to Tribola: and so this Spaniish armie was preferred by the judgement and resolution of Viriatus, who of a shepheard M became a huntsman, then afterwards a theefe, lastly he was head of an armie, and was in possibilitie to make himselfe king of Spaine. This action did win him much credit and reputation among the neighbour nations. Vetilius meaning to pursue him, fell into ambushes which he had laied in a certaine passage covered with wood: so as being charged in front by Viriatus his horsemen, and on either side by his footmen, the Roman armie was wholly defeated, and the

Viriatus chosen captain by the Lusitanians: besieged, deceives the Pretor.

The Pretor Vetilius defeated and taken prisoner by Viriatus.

Pre-

A Pretor Vetilius found among the prisoners, who being scorned as a man of no value by him that had taken him, for that he was old and fat, he was instantly slaine. The Romanes which escaped at this rout, gathered head at Tarteffe, being some 6000 men, whom Vetilius, Questor or Treasurer, caused to rest for a time: and hauing made a new leuie of 5000 of their allies, he sent them all to encounter Viriatus, but there returned not one, being all cut in peeces: whereupon the Questor kept himselfe within the wals, attending to be relieved by some other Roman armie. In the meane time Viriatus spoiled the fertile fields of the Carpetanians.

An other defeat of the Romanes.

21 Then came C. Plantius for Pretor, bringing ten thousand foot, and thirtene hundred horse from Rome: Whereof Viriatus being aduertised, hee made shew to flie, after whom B Plantius sent 4000 of his best men, who were suddenly charged by them that fled before them, and were in a manner all slaine. Viriatus passing beyond the river of Tayo, went and camped in a certaine mountaine full of oliues, called Venus mount: whereas Plantius burning with desire of reuenge for their former losses, was vanquished again with great losse, and forced to retire before his time, and winter in his forts, not daring to shew himselfe in field: so as Viriatus did run ouer all the country at his pleasure, and ranomed the townes which would saue their come, and other fruits which was readie to gather; else he set fire of it.

C. Plantius defeated by Viriatus.

22 Claudius Vnimanus, an other Pretor, being sent against this captain, was also defeated, increasing the disgrace receiued by his predecessors: where he lost all the forces which he had brought. The rods and axes, the coats of armes of Capitaines, and other spoyles taken from C the Romanes, were hung vp by Viriatus in the mountaines, in signe of his victories. And soone after 300 Lusitanians hauing encountered 1000 Romanes in a certaine strait, the Romanes lost 320 of their men, and the others but 70: besides, as the Romanes horsemen pursued some Lusitanians on foot which retired, one of the troupe turning head, thrust a Romanes horse through with a pike, and presently stricke off the mans head with his sword; whereat the rest being amazed, they staid, and pursued not this Lusitanian, who retired softly mocking them.

Cl. Vnimanus defeated by Viriatus.

23 After C. Vnimanus mention is made of C. Nigidius, who was sent Pretor into the further Spaine, and was as vnfortunate as the rest.

An. Roma 608.

D 24 Q. Fabius Maximus, and L. Hostilius being Consuls, C. Lelius was sent Pretor into Spaine, against Viriatus, who managed the warre with great wisdom; but as the daunger increased, and manie people of Spaine moued with the valour and fortune of Viriatus rebelled, the Senat of Rome decreed that one of the Consuls should goe in person to that warre, with a Consular armie: so as Q. Fab. Maximus Emilianus, sonne to Paulus Emilius (who subdued Persus king of Macedonie) was sent thither; a Captaine instructed in the seuer discipline of his father: who hauing leuied two legions of new souldiours, with some bands of their allies, he led some 15000 foot, and 2000 horse into Spaine. Being arriued at Orlone, a towne in Spaine, he would not expose his new souldiours, which had not been tryed in any incounters, but kept them within their forts, and by little and little trayned them with light skirmishes: but Viriatus carried awaie both spoyle and honor for the first yeare. But Fabius charge being E prolonged, and he remaining Proconsull in Spaine, supposing that his armie was now sufficiently trayned, he went to field, and vanquished Viriatus in a set battaile, tooke two townes from him, and pursued him to a place called Becor. After this exploit hee led his armie to winter at Cordoue.

Q. Fab. Maximus, Consull sent against Viriatus.

25

Q. Fab. Maximus, defeats Viriatus.

26 Viriatus finding himselfe neither so safe nor so strong as he was wont, he solicited the A-reuaces, Belles, and Tithes, a warlike people, and drew them from the Romanes alliance. These did raise a long and dangerous warre, which was called the Numantine, by reason of Numance one of their townes. Viriatus had Quintius, a Roman captain, against him in another quarter, by whom he was put to rout, & forced to retire into his fort on mount Venus: yet making roads from thence hee slue 1000 of Quintius souldiours at one time, tooke some ensignes, and in the end made the enemies armie retire: besides, he chased away the garrison which was in Ituca, and spoiled the Basitans country: during which disorders Quintius kept himselfe within Cordoue, either for cowardise, or want of judgement, sending a captain of the towne of Italique in Spaine against the enemy. Q. Metellus the Consull, was sent into Celtiberia, who subdued the Vacceans with great expedition, and continued his F government aboue a yeare.

K ij

Q. Fab.

Ann. Revis. 610

27 Q. Fab. Maximus Seruilianus, being Consul, succeeded Quintus, and went into Spaine with an armie according to his dignitie, making about 16000 foot and 1600 horse: he also sent to Micips king of the Numidians for elephants. As this Consul conducted a part of his armie to Ituca, Viriatus came and charged him with 6000 men, making horrible cries, and tearing long locks, after the accustomed manner of these barbarians in their warres, whom the Romanes withstood with great difficultie: but when as the rest of their armie was ioyned with them; and that ten elephants were arriued out of Lybia with 300 horses, the Consul Seruilianus went and prouoked the enimie to fight, vanquished him, and put him to flight: yet he could not so well conteyne his men, but they persued in disorder and confusion, as it falls out often: so as Viriatus watchfull vpon all occasions, turned head vpon them that persued, and with a great number, and persued the rest vnto their campe: the which he attempted to force, and without the vertue of Fannius, father in law to C. Lelius, he had entred, to the totall ruine of the Romanes armie. Night approaching, made the enimie retire, leauing the Romanes much troubled and amazed. But afterwards Viriatus, a man without rest, molested them day and night, sometimes by his souldiours lightly armed, sometimes by his horsemen, vntill that he forced the Consull to dislodge, and to retire to Ituca. Then he tooke the waie of Lusitania, being in some extremitie for want of victuals, and his forces decreasing. The Consull following him, and not able to ouertake him, made warre against the Beturians, dwelling in the countrey which is now called Extrema Dura: and caused fise townes to be sackt, for that they had giuen ayde and fauour to Viriatus: then he retires to Cunes, from whence he marched soone after against Viriatus in Lusitania; and incounting Curius and Apuleius, two Captaines of theesues vpon the waie, hauing with them 10000 fighting men, the Romanes armie was somewhat troubled; yet Curius was slaine in the fight: after which the Romanes to the aduantage, so as Seruilianus took Elicadie, Gemelle, & Oboliola, by force, with other places held by the garrisons of Viriatus, whereof some were abandoned to the spoyle, others were pardoned: he tooke tenne thousand prisoners, whereof fise hundred were beheaded, the rest he caused to be sould: and with this good fortune he retyred his armie the second yeare to winter, and then returned to Rome.

28 Q. Cæcilius Metellus hauing prorogation of his charge in the hither Spaine or Celtiria, in qualitie of Proconsull, he besieged Trebia, a rich towne of that countrey, the which tooke by his politike stratagems . It happened during this siege, that fise companies befied in gard in a certaine place , were dislodged by the enimie : Metellus shewed himselfe seuer, as he would not receiue them, but commaunded them to returne to the place, vnlesse they would be vsed as traitors, and as men that had abandoned the armie : the which he
to make them feele the paine of their cowardise , commaunding to cut them in pieces that should flie towards the campe. These souldiours forced by necessitie, shewed themselues valiant, and recovered the place from whence they had bin chased . Besieging Centobrica, a chiefe man within the towne , called Rhetogenes, retired to the Romans campe, wherewith the inhabitants being much incensed , they set this fugitiues children vpon the walles, whereas the Romanes engins did batter : the which did so moue Metellus to pitie , as he left the siege, forbearing rather to take the towne , than to kill these poore innocent creatures, such act of humanity, did much daunt the Celtiberians, so as from that time they were more tractable. Being demanded to what end hee made so manie turnings and windings with his armie, he answered, that if he thought his shirt knew his conceptions he would burne it. The enimie of his great exploits in Spaine, were blemished by the enuie he bare to Q. Pompeius his enimie, who he vnderstood should succeed him in his charge : to the end hee should find all things difficult, he gaue leaue to all souldiours that demanded it, without inquirie of the cause:
suffered them to spoyle the victuals and munition which remained; he commaunded the infantry and ordior archers , to breake their bows and arrows, and did forbid to giue the elephants their ordinary allowance. Hauing thus satisfied his spleene, he did frustrat himselfe of his triumph, which hee had deferred by so many glorious deeds, knowing better how to surmount his enemies, then his owne choler.

29 Q. Fab. Maximus Emilianus, or Seruilianus according vnto some, Proconfull, made warre in the meane time against Vriatus: and hauing taken a commander among the thecues called Connoba, by his voluntarie yeelding, he pardoned him: but he caused all his souldiours hands

The Consul Servilius defeats
Piratus in Spain, and is put to rout by him.

*Famine defends the Komane
camp from Vi-etno.*

*The exploits of
Q. Fab. Mam.
Sernilianns as Proconsul.*

Severe Execution of Spanish prisoners.

Mercellus severely against soldiers who had abandoned their posts.

Inhumanities to poor Innocents.

Metellus seeks to dishonour his private enemies,
with the prei-
dices of the pub-
like.

A hands to be cut off, and afterwards punished as many of the revolted as he could take, in the like manner. He besieged the towne of Erisane, into the which Viriatus found means to enter by night : from whence at the breake of day he sallied with great furie, with a troupe of their best men, and not onely chased away such as wrought in the ditches & trenches, but also some companies which were ferther to guard them, with great slaughter : Yet Viriatus thinking now of the change of humane things, and of the miseries which doe often follow prosperitie, vsing his good fortune with modestie, he began to giue care to conditions of peace, the which he obtained verie fauourable, both from the Proconsull and Senat, whom they called a friend to the people of Rome, and decreed, That such as had followed him, should enjoy the lands which he had conquered : this decree was seemed to be ended, but soon after it was renewed.

30 Q. Cæpio Consul being come into the further Spaine, successefor to the Proconful Q. Fabius, began to blame the capitulations made with Viriatus, as vnworthy of the honor & greatness of Rome, and had now got leave of the Senat, to molest Viriatus vnder hand, that hee might take some subject to rebell. Then by his importune letters and many messages, hee obtained a decree, to proclaim war against him: whereupon he went to besiege Arsa, the which yielded, Viriatus hauing abandoned it. Who marched into Carpetania, which is the jurisdiction of Toledo, spoyleing and burning all he left behind him: yet hee was followed and ouertaken by the Consull, but being a politique captaine, he would not hazard a battell, being but weak in regard of the Roman armie, but gaue leave to most of his souldiers to slip away, and he himselfe in the same time presented himselfe

C by certain vallies covered with woods; and he himselfe in the meane time presented himselfe vnto the enemye in a strong place, with some troupes to keepe them occupied, vntill he thought his men were retired into a place of safetie. Then he suddenly vanished by secret passages, before knowne to himselfe, leauing the Romans amazed which way he should fly. Cepio marching towards the Veſtōns, and the Calliaiques, spoiled their fields. At the same time did rise other troupes of theues in Lusitania, after the example of Viriatus, against whom (according vnto some) Brutus was sent. Viriatus desiring to come vnto the former accord, foreseeing that in the end he should not be able to resist the Roman power, sent Audax, Ditalcon, and Minure, three of his most familiar friends, vnto Cepio, to treat an accord with him: but Cepio corrupted them with great gifts and promises, perswading them to murder their captain; the which they did.

Fab. Max. does cruelly execute
the Spaniards.

Viriatns fauoured by the Senate of Rome, who gave him peace.

Анна Романовна

Qu. Cepio break
the treatie made with Viriatus.

Barbarians can be corrupted with money.

Viriatus tracherously murdered to the displeasure of Romans, and the Consul Co-Traitors deceved by him shsuborned then

Viriatu's law
sed of his son ours for his v
lent and bow

THE FOURTH BOOKE OF the Historie of Spaine.

The Contents.

- 1 Warre ill managed by Q. Pompeius against the Numantines.
The exploits of M. Pompilius Lenas his Successour.
- 2 The deeds of D. Brutus in Lusitania and Galatia.
- 3 The miseries of Mancinus and his companion M. Æmilius Lepidus, in the Numantine warre.
- 4 The gouernment of P. Furius Philus, by whom Mancinus was deliuered vnto the Numantines.
- 5 The Numantine warre ended by P. Scipio Emilianus.
- 6 The expedition of Q. Cæcilius Metellus, and his victories in the islands of the Balears.
- 7 The gouernment of C. Marius and other Pretors in Spaine, vnto L. Corn. Dolabella.
- 8 The acts of the Consull T. Didius.
- 9 Fuluius Flaccus.
- 10 Retrait of M. Crassus, flying the Romane sedition in Spaine.
- 11 Sertorius warre in Spaine, begun by Q. Cæcilius Metellus, and ended by Pompey.
- 12 Death of Cn. Piso in Spaine.
- 13 Gouernments of Calid. Tubero, and C. Iul. Cæsar.
- 14 Pompey perpetuall Proconsul in Spaine.
- 15 Cæsar disarmes Afranius and Petreius in Spaine.
- 16 Cæsar constraines M. Varro to yeeld vnto him.
- 17 Warre betwixt Cæsar and Pompeyes children.
- 18 Lepidus triumphes for Spaine, hauing done no exploits of warre there.
- 19 The deeds of Augustus in Spaine, and the absolute conquest thereof.
- 20 Spaine vnder Tiberius.
- 21 Christian religion preached in Spaine.
- 22 Saint Iames sonne to Zebedee.
- 23 Seneca and other learned Spaniards put to death by Nero.
- 24 Galba, Otho, Vitellius, Vespasian, Titus, Domitian, and the persecutions of the Church of God vnder them.
- 25 Cocceius, Nerua, Traian, and his edict to ruine the forts of Spaine.
- 26 The peopling of Spaine by Iewes, vnder Adrian.
- 27 Spaine vnder the Antonines.
- 28 The Empire of Seuerus, Caracalla, and others vnto Claudius.
- 29 The enterprises of Tetricus vpon Spaine and the Gaules.
- 30 Spaine vnder Aurelian, Tacitus, and others, vnto Dioclesian.
- 31 Cruelties of Dioclesian against the Church of God, and of his companions in the Empire, and their ends.
- 32 Constantine the Great his children, with Iulian and Iouinian, Emperors.
- 33 Valentinian and Valence, vnder whom the Gothes invaded the Roman Empire in the East.
- 34 Theodosius, Arcadius, and Honorius, his children, vnder whom the Gothes assailed Italie, and the prouinces of the Westerne Empire.

Quintus

A 1

Pompeius Aulus Consull, in the yeare 612 comming very late in his Prouince, and hauing receiued an armie but in bad equipage from the hands of Q. Metellus, he went to beseech the Numantines; for of all the townes against whom Metellus had made warre, only Numantia and Thermancia continued in armes: Thermancia was strong by nature, situated among the woods and betwixt two riuers, and therefore of hard access: wherefore hee went first to Numantia, in the

Numantia attempted in vain by Q. Pompeius.

which there were eight thousand of the best and most resolute souldiours that were in all Spaine, as the Romanes found by experience. The Romane armie was in all about thirtie thousand foot and two thousand horse. Being at this siege, the Romane forragers were charged by a suddaine fallie of the besieged, so as many of them were slaine vpon the place. Pompey was then absent; who being aduertised of this rout, hastened to the campe: but the Numantines notwithstanding his diligence retired without losse, and continued daily to skirmish with the souldiours, and to haue the aduantage: wherewith Pompey being discontented, he left it, and would attempt Thermancia, to see if he could repaire his honour, and get some profit: but he lost seuen hundred of his best men at the first encounter, and they chased a Colonel, which conducted victuals to the campe. Soone after hee had a third rout, with the losse of many horse and foot, and with such an amazement of all the rest of the armie, as they stood all night in armes; and day being come, the Thermantines running vnto their trenches, and pro- uoking the enemy, they fought with equall aduantage all day long, vntill night. Whereupon Pompey did also dislodge from thence, and marched towards Malia, a little towne held by a garrison of the Numantines; the which was yeilded by the treason of the inhabitants, ha- uing slaine the souldiours which were set there to gard it: where hauing left some companies, after that he had disarmed the inhabitants, he marched towards Sedetane, to defend it from the spoyles of Tanguin, capitaine of the thecues, whom he defeated and tooke prisoner, with a great number of his souldiours, but he could neither draw ransom nor seruice from them: for these Barbarian captiues entred into such a rage, as in a manner they all slew themselves, or

Q. Pompeius returns from Thermancia.

The Barbarians impatient of seruitude, yea, some were so malicious, as passing the riuers, they made holes in boats, so as they sunke with their felues.

C

Cburthens. After all this, Pompey would needs returne to Numantia, where he sought to diuert the course of the riuier of Duero, which passed along the towne, that hee might cut off their passage for victuals. The inhabitants and souldiours within the towne fighting against his designs, repulsed both them that were at worke, and those that garded them, or that came to succour them; and in many skirmishes and fallies they slew many Romane horsemen, with Oppius, a Colonell of a thousand foot: and in another place, at a trench which the Romanes had made, the Numantines falling forth suddainely, slew foure hundred men, with the ouer- seer of the worke.

During these exploits, there arriued certaine Romane Senatours at the campe, with some new bands, to supply the places of the old souldiours, which desired to be dismissed, hauing serued six yeares in those warres. Pompey being ashamed of his bad successe, did that which his predecessors had not yet done, continuing his siege before Numantia all the Winter: so as many which were not accustomed to the raine, snow, and cold of that Region, died of collicks and paine in their bellies. Besides, he had another rout, seeking to succour his souldiours which were gone to forrage, whereas he lost many, as well of the Roman nobilitie, as of priuat souldiours: so as tyred and wasted with so many losses, he was forced to retyre and to lodge his armie, attending him that should come to succed him in the Spring. But fearing to be censured, for that hee had managed that warre so ill, hee resolved to make a kind of composition with them of Numantia: who being much weakened with the miseries which they had endured, and fearing they should be distressed for victuals, liuing in a barren country, they consented to send embassadours to Pompey, who in open shew demanded, That they should yeeld vnto the Romanes discretion; but vnder hand he graunted many of their demands, draw- ing from them some talents, certaine hostages, and them that were reuolted. There remain- ed yet some part of the composition money to pay, for the which Pompey stayed, when as M.

Negligence and cowardise of capitaines punished some times at Rome.

Disimulation of Pompey to couer his fault.

Ann. Roma 614 Pompey dash impudently de- ceine the Numantines.

F

FPopilius Lenas a Consull arriued in Spaine to succed him. Then Pompey being freed from the care of the waite, denied that he had accorded any thing vnto the Numantines, notwith- standing

2 Popilius Lenas referred in the warre of Numantia.

Ann. Rome 615

Exploits of D.
Brutus the Consul.

The obstinate courage of the Barbarians.

Brutus the first Roman that entered with an army into Galicia.

Women in Spaine
warriors and valiant.

Brutus magnanimitie and clemencie to rebels.

A worthy punishment of a cowardly cap-
taine.

Hofilius Man-
cius referred in the warre of Numantia.

standing that many captaines and Romane Senatours did affirme the contrarie : Whereupon G Popilius sent this controuersie to Rome vnto the Senat, whereas the embassadours of Numantia and Pompey did plead : but the Senate was of opinion not to confirme any thing that Pompey had done, and that the warre should continue against the Numantines. Popilius then continuing warre against them, did nothing that was memorable, although his charge were prolonged, but lost his honour, and many good souldiors.

3 During his time, the Lusitanians hauing rebelled againe, D. Iunius Brutus was sent into the further Spaine. Others say, That he did execute that which followes, vnder the Consull Q. Cepio, and that he was sent by him as his Lieutenant, by reason of the distance of places betwixt the riuers of Betis, Anas, Tagus, Durius, and Lethes, by the which the theues escaped, H and made suddaine incursions, not onely molesting them that pursued them, but also putting them out of hope to take them, by reason of the strength of the places. Brutus therefore tooke this course, he would not trouble himselfe in running after these nimble fellowes, who knew all the means to escape; but went directly to their owne countrey, that he might in one expedition both punish them, and enrich his souldiors with their spoyle; assuring himselfe, they would come to defend their holes: wherein he was nothing deceived: for both men and women came running to repulse the Romane armie, fighting with a desperat furie: so as being halfe dead, dismembred, or couered with wounds, they were neuer heard grone: yet many lesse courageous, taking vp as much as they could carrie, fled to the mountaines, whom Brutus afterwards (vpon their suite) pardoned. Hauing passed the riuier of Duero, he subdued many I people, and tooke hostages, and was the first of all the Romans which led an armie beyond the riuier of Lethes, called Limia, where he assailed the Brecaires, a people of Galicia, who had spoiled the victuallers coming to his campe. This nation was accustomed to lead their wiues to the warre, and both men and women did fight so obstinately, as they were neuer seene to turne their backs, nor cast out any cries vnworthie of souldiors for any wounds which they re-ceiued. The women that were taken prisoners, slew themselves and their children, rather than to be slaues. Many of their townes and retreats yeelded vnto Brutus, but he was constrained to subdue them againe; for finding him somewhat retyred, they rebelled againe. The inhabitants of Talabrica in another part of the prouince made triall of the magnanimitie and clemencie of the ancient Romanes: for being often reuolted, and hauing abused the pardon which he had giuen them, Brutus hauing forced them to yeeld to his discretion, demanded first the fugitiues, and then the prisoners taken in warre. Then he disarmed them, and tooke the chiefe among them for hostages: which done, hee made them all goe out of the towne, with their wiues and children, and hauing caused them to be enuironed by the armed bands, hee spake vnto them, reproching them with their many rebellions and ingratitude; for the
which they attended no lesse than the sentence of death: but he ended his speech with reproches and bitter words, and then beyond all hope sent them home to their houses, depriving them onely of their armes, horses, and other equipage for warre, and of their common treasure. They write, That he did assigne lands for them that had serued Viriatus in the warre, and that he gaue them the towne of Valence in Lusitania to dwell in. This yeare C. Matienus being accused at Rome, That he had abandoned the army, whereof he had charge in Spaine, was beaten with rods, and sold for a Sexterce (which in our English money is a penny) by a decree of the people.

As for Popilius, who made warre against the Numantines, or rather they made warre against him, he returned to Rome, at the coming of the Consull C. Hostilius Mancinus, who was also-gether vnfortunat in his enterprises; the which was signified vnto him by presages, before he came out of Italie: for as he tooke shipping at Port Hercules, there was a strange voice heard, saying, Mancinus stay; and as hee tooke port at Genes, there was a great Snake found in his ship, the which escaped. He was beaten euery where by the Numantines, hauing thirtie thousand men in his armie. Being terrified with a bruit, That the Cantabrians and Vacceans came M to succour Numantia, he fled in the night into desert places, whereas Nobilior had encamped in former time, and there without any munition or rampier, he was the next morning found and besieged by the enemy, and constrained to capitulate a peace with them vpon like conditions, ingaging his faith to make them be ratified by the Senate. Tib. Gracchus (who was afterwards slaine) being Tribune of the people, then Questor in this armie, was the negotiator of

A of this peace: who was so faoured by the Numantines, as they hauing spoiled the Romanes campe, and among other things carried away the accompts, quittances, and other papers of Gracchus, they restored them to him againe very willingly. Although this composition were ignominious, yet did it saue the liues of twentie thousand Romane citizens: Which being knowne at Rome, M. Aemilius Lepidus the other Consull was presently sent into Spaine, and Mancinus called home to Rome, to giue an account of his action, the Numantine warre remaineing for a time suspended. By reason whereof, M. Aemilius being impatient to remaine in the Prouince idle (for captaines neuer goe to the warre, but to get honour and profit) whilest that Mancinus processe was in hand, and that hee had receiued newes, hee began to besiege Palantia, their chiefe towne, being strong and rich, calling D. Brutus his father in law to assist him at this worke, who had his charge proroged in qualitie of Proconsull of the further Spaine. The Senate aduertised hereof, sent Cinna and Cecilius embassadours into Spaine, to let him vnderstand, That the Romanes did not hold it conuenient (after so many losses) to attempt a new warre, and presented vnto him the Senates decree, by the which he was forbidden to make warre against the Vacceans. Aemilius (who had already begun the siege) answered, That the Senate was not well informed how matters passed in Spaine, nor how that he had joynd his forces with those of Brutus: and that he was well assured, that the Vacceans had relieued the Numantines with victuals, men, and money: that if he should retyre in that sort, it would be a dishonour, and that many of their allies would take occasion thereby to quit the Romanes friendship, and to contemne them. With these reasons (the which the Consull did also write vnto the Senat) Cinna returned. Then did the Consull Aemilius Lepidus and Brutus the Proconsull busie themselves to plant many engines to batter the towne, and to furnish their armie with victuals. Flaccus (who was Commissarie generall of the campe) causing great store of come to be brought, was surprised by the enemy, and so enclosed, as it was impossible to escape: but he by a singular policie caused it to bee bruiet among his troups, That the Consull had taken Palantia, the which did so amaze the enemies, as with a foolish credulitie they quit their prey, and retyred. The siege of Palantia growing tedious, the Romane armie began to suffer so much, as both men and beasts perished for hunger: so as in the end he was forced to leaue the siege, and retyre in the night, in great disorder: for there were many sicke men, who desired them not to abandon them to the enemies sword; which moued all men to pitie: and therefore it was a great hinderance vnto the armie, being pursued by the Palantines: who loosing this wished opportunitee, returned, as if some Angel had stood before them, to preuent the totall ruine of the Romane armie: yet Paulus Orosius writes, That there were six thousand men slaine, and that the rest were put in rout, and saued themselves without armes. M. Aemilius Lepidus being called to Rome by reason of these errors, was degraded and condemned in a great fine. Brutus continuing in his charge of Proconsull in the further Spaine, spent much time to order things in his Prouince, and afterwards triumphed at Rome: he was afterwards called Callaïque or Gallique, E for that he had subdued the people of Galicia.

As for the question betwixt Mancinus and the embassadours of Numantia, it was judged,
That the accord made without the authoritie of the Senat should bee void, and they decreed, That Mancinus, who was bound vnto the Numantines, should be deliuered vnto them, to dispose of him at their pleasure, after the example of the ancient Romanes, who had for the like offence deliuered twentie captaines vnto the Samnites. According vnto which decree, Mancinus was brought into Spaine by P. Furius Philus or Philo, Consull in the yeare 617, and was deliuered by him naked and bound vnto the Numantines, who refused him.
This Furius in a brauerie made Q. Metellus and Q. Pompeius Consular men, and his enemies came with him into Spaine, to serue him as his Lieutenants: and this yeare the warre was managed in Spaine with three Consular armies: but P. Furius did nothing that was memorable. After whom, Q. Calpurnius Piso came into the Prouince: who hauing ouerrun the territorie of Palantia, and taken some little prey, hee spent the rest of his time shut vp in Carpetania: and this yeare the Romanes receiued a rout by them of the towne of Numantia.

Mancinus called to Rome to answer the ignominious accord made with the Numantines.

M. Aemilius the Consul attempts warre rashly
against the Vacceans.

The policie of Flaccus Commis-sarie of the vitualls.

A shamefull retreat of two Romane armies
from before Palantia.

Aemilius Lepi-dus punished for his disobedience.

The Romanes
discharged of their bonds, in deliuering the magistrates which made still.

Mancinus deli-uered bound vnto
the Numantines.

Scipio Amilianus sent into Spaine.

Scipio reformes the armie.

The pasture of a good and wise capitaine.

A good beginning is of great importance in matters of war.

The Palantines mightie among the Spaniards.

The foresight of Scipio.

6 The people of Rome being wearie of this Numantine warre, which grew daily more difficult, in the yeare 619 they did chuse P. Corn. Scipio Amilianus, called Africanus, Consull, for that some few yeares before hee had ruined the mightie citie of Carthage; vnto whom Spaine was giuen without lot: whither he went with some voluntaries, and a small number of his friends, being some foure thousand men; for Spaine had too many souldiours, and wanted onely good captaines. He gaue this troupe in charge to Buteon his nephew, and he himselfe went speedily before. Being arriued in Spaine, he found what he had heard before; That the armie was very ill disciplined: Wherefore holding it a part of great wisdom first of all to reforme the corrupt manners of the souldiours, as loone as he arriued, he chafed out of the campe all merchants, strumpets, tellers of fortune, and the new superstitious sacrificers; to which things the souldiours were too much giuen: he cut off their carts and baggage, forbidding them to bring any thing into the campe that was not necessarie. He did forbid beds, and he himselfe gaue example vnto others, lying vpon couerings spread vpon girts. Finally, he set such an order among the souldiours (submitting himselfe vnto the rigour of his owne ordinances, as in a short time they became modest, temperat, and obedient. Then hee began to traine them in warlike exercises, remoouing his campe often, whereas he caused the souldiours to digge and make rampiers, himselfe being alwaies present, from the day breake to the Sunne set; and commonly he made them to march in a square battaile, punishing any one that went out of his ranke. Hee went about his armie to see if they marched in good order, and if he found any sicke or tyred, he set them on horsebacke, causing others to alight: and he was no lesse just vnto beasts: for if there were any horses ouerladen, he distributed their superfluous burthens among the footmen, Hee appointed euery man his charge and office, and limited a time for the finishing of their workes, which they might not neglect. When as he found his souldiours sufficiently inured to labour, and accustomed to obey their commanders, then he came to encampe neere vnto Numantia, whereas he would not lodge his armie in quarters; as others before him had done, but kept it all vnited, that the enemy should get no aduantage of him in the beginning; the which is of great consequence. He had no will to suffer any one to goe forth to skirmish, vntill he was well informed how to make warre with that people, of the opportunities he must seeke, and of their manner of proceeding, their counsels and resolutions; keeping the enemy by that meanes from straying abroad, and maintaining the country, which was behind his armie, assured for his forragers: saying alwayes, That light skirmishes affected vpon brauerie, without necessitie, should bee rejected by a wise and expert capitaine, who should respect nothing but necessitie, profit, and occasion, and then he should shew himselfe courageous and hardie. When as he saw a convenient time, hee marched with his armie, and taking a great circuit, he came and encamped in the territorie of the Vacceans, from whence the Numantines had their victuals. There hee wasted the country, burning all that could not serue to feed his armie. Not farre from Palantia is a place called Coplain, where behind a hill the Palantines had lodged a great troupe of men, hauing in the meane time sent out some companies against the Romanes, which went to forrage the country: for whose gard Scipio sent Rutilius Rufus with foure bands of horsemen, who repulsed the enemy, but with such an inconsiderat heat, as they were carried pell-mell vnto the top of the hill, where they discovered the enemies which lay in ambush: Then Rufus commaunded his men to make a stand, and to cease their pursute, for they were to defend themselves: from which danger they were freed by the Consull Scipio, who arriued with the rest of the horsemen: for hearing that the enemy began to flye at the sight of Rufus, hee doubted there was some stratagem. Being aduertised, that there were some ambushes prepared at the passage of the riuier, which was full of mud, he tooke another way, and spared not his souldiours paines to free them from danger. In this long and drie passage he digged Wells for to ease his souldiours, being oppressed with the violent heat, but they found the waters bitter. In the end he came into a more fertile country, with the losse onely of some horses and beasts of carriage.

Passing by the territorie of Cauca, whereas Lucullus had made that great slaughter, hee made

A made proclamations, That the Caucians which were absent might returne freely to their lands, and from thence he led his armie to winter in the territorie of the Numantines, whereas Asurgurthe, grand child to Masimissa, came vnto him, bringing certaine companies of archers and casters with slings, with twelue Elephants. In this place some Romanes forraging and spoyling the neighbour country, were surprisid in a Bourg, behind the which the enemies lay hidden in a valley; who were repulsed by Scipioes speedie comming to assist them, but he had no will to pursue them. Approching soone after to Numantia, he besieged it with two campees; one of the which was commaunded by Q. Fab. Maximus his brother. There the besieged made many fallies, prouoking the Romanes to skirmish: but the Consull laughed at them, saying, it had beene a great indiscretion in him to fight with desperat and mad men, whom he was assured to take in a short time by famine. He vnderooke to cast a ditch and a rampier of a league and a halfe compass about the towne: for the defence of which worke, hauing set gards in conuenient places, he commaunded euery man to be carefull in his quarter, and that when as the enemy should offer to charge in one place, that suddainely they should in the day time hang vp a red cloth on a pike, and in the night make a fire, that he and his brother might come to succour them. This worke being finished, without it he drew another ditch, making a wall with piles, of eight foot broad and ten high, the which he flanked with towers a hundred and twentie foot one from another: and for that there was a marsh ground on the one side, he caused a causey to bee rayfed of the height of this wall, which joyned vnto it. The riuier of Duero running through these rampiers, brought great commoditie to the besieged; for that way men went both in and out, and boats entred by fauour of the wind and swiftnesse of the streame: to take away the vse whereof, Scipio built two forts vpon the banks, from the which he cast peeces of timber into the water, from one banke vnto the other, in the which were fastened great pikes of yron, which went very deepe into the water; and these beames were so tied together, as they did turne continually with the force of the streame, so as not any one could passe, either by boat or swimming: for Scipio held it a good course to amaze the enemy, to take from him all meanes to haue intelligence from abroad, and withall to cut off his victuals. For the gard of these fortifications hee appointed thirtie thousand men, being the one halfe of his armie; to succour the which, hee ordained twentie thousand more, reseruing the other tenne thousand for a third supplie: which vpon a signe giuen should come vnto their quarters, without confusion. The Numantines attempted often to force these rampiers, but they found too great resistance, the Consull himselfe going the round day and night, and visiting the whole circuit, being almost two leagues; making his account, that the enemy wanting victuals, ames, and succours, could not long hold out. Matters being in this estate, Rhetogenes, surnamed Carannius, one of the chiefe and most resolute men within the towne, aduentured with fise of his friends, and so many seruants, all well mounted, to come in a darke night vnto the enemies rampiers, where they mounted and slew the enemies sentinels, and with certaine engines which they carried, passed ouer their horses: hauing sent their seruants backe, they dispersed themselves in the country of the Areuaces, where they besought those people, That as friends, kinsmen, and allies to the Numantines, they would succour them. Many fearing the Romanes, commaunded them to depart out of their countries, refusing to heare them: but the young men of Lutia, a rich towne, some tenne leagues from Numantia, pitying these poore creatures besieged, did sollicit the people to relieue them: whereof Scipio being aduertised by the ancients of the towne, went thither with some troupes, and within eight houres space shewed himselfe about their walls, commaunding, That the chiefe of these seditious young men should bee deliuered vnto him, threatening (if they sayled) to sacke their towne: so as no excuse preuailling, about foure hundred were brought vnto him, whose hands hee caused to bee cut off, and the next day returned to the campe. The Numantines prest with hunger and all other extremities, sent fise of their citizens vnto Scipio, to vnderstand if hee would receiue them vpon any reasonable conditions. Anarrus, the chiefe of this embassage, comming before him, began to discourse of the vertues and generous disposition of the Numantines, with high wordes maintaining, That it should not bee imputed vnto them for a crime, if they had so eagefly defended their liberties, their wiues and children, for the which they were now fallen into that calamitie.

Wherefore

wherefore (said he) it is reasonable, o Scipio, that (according to thy singular vertue) thou pardon our brave and valiant race, and that thou propound unto us such honest conditions, as we may endure them: for it is in thy power to haue the towne by this meanes, or to trie what souldiours (who esteeme their libertie more than their liues) can doe. To whom Scipio made no other answere, but that they must deliuer themselves, their towne, their armes, and all they had, at his discretion; for he was sufficiently aduertised by prisoners, in what estate they were. When this answer was brought vnto the besieged (although they expected no better) they entred into such a rage against these poore deputies, as they cut them in pieces, being jealous that they had made some agreement with the Romanes for their owne particular. Then resoluing vpon all extremities, after that their victuals were consumed, hauing deuoured raw hides, and such like things, in the end they fed vpon dead mens flesh: and they fell into such miserie, as the stronger oppressed the weaker, euery man regarding his own particular, being also consumed with pestilent diseases, which grew through the extremities which they endured, and from the corruption and stinke of dead carkasses. Wherefore vanquished with all these calamities, in the end they tooke counsell to yeeld, and came and presented themselves to Scipio like hideous suppliants, deformed, filthy, and torne; their haire and beards long, clotted and staring, resembling rather sauage beasts than reasonable creatures: whom Scipio commaunded to deliuer vp their armes that day, and the next day they should all yeeld themselves in a certaine place appointed them. To this they demaunded a dayes respite, for that many were yet remaining within the towne, being resolved to die rather by the sword or famine, than to yeeld, but vpon honest conditions. So being returned, and hauing consulted what was to be done, they resolved, after they had once glutted themselves with that small store which remained, they would fallie out vpon the enemy, and die fighting vertuously for their country. But Scipio knowing, that he had to deale with mad men, restrained his souldiours all he could: the which did the more enflame the Numantines, who notwithstanding all that he could doe, issued forth, and forced the Romanes to defend themselves, hauing great need to bee commaunded by a wife and valiant captaine; for they were more than once forced to fight flying: yet in the end the Numantines were repulsed, hauing lost their best men; notwithstanding they retired without disorder: their last remedie was to flye out of the towne with their armes: but that being stoppt, they shut their gates, and slew one another, by sword, poyson, or fire, and by all other kinds of deaths: so as Scipio entring into the towne, he found all consumed with fire, and not a man liuing. Others write, That Scipio burnt and rased the towne without the consent of the Senate, and not the Numantines, for the hatred which he did naturally beare to them, which he tooke by force: besides that, by the destruction of such famous townes he made his renowne greater, or else that he held it to be expedient & profitable for the Commonweale: they said also, That but some of them slew themselves, and the rest were sold for slaues, onely fiftie were reserved, to lead them in triumph.

Thus the taking of Numantia is diuersly written, the which did so long resist the Romans, and gaue them so many routs, hauing in the beginning but eight thousand men, the which in the end were reduced to lesse than foure thousand, which notwithstanding did greatly importune their enemies. The territorie of Numantia was afterwards diuided among the neighbour people; and Scipio (being then Pro-consull) hauing visited the countrey, and done right to all men, punishing the inconstant allies by words or threats, and some by pecuniarie fines, he returned to Rome, where in one year he triumphed of the Numantines, and D. Brutus of the Lusitanians and Gallicians. The Senat deputed ten Senators to go into Spaine, to dispose of the affaires of that Prouince. Thus the troubles were pacified, without any alteration for some yeares.

7 In the year 630, Q. Caelilius Metellus and T. Quintius Flaminius being Consuls, the inhabitants of the Islands of the Balears, which we call Maiorca and Minorca, liuing by pyracie and theeuing by sea, ministred occasion to the Romanes to send the Consull Metellus, eldest sonne to him that was called Macedonicus, who after a great slaughter of these theues brought them to a more ciuile life; where hauing left some Colonies of Romans, he triumphed at Rome.

8 C. Marius (he that was afterwards seuen times Consull) about the year 640 had the charge of the further Spaine as Pretor, where hee cleansed the whole countrey of theues: which

Brutish furie
of the Barbari-ans.

Miseries of a place besieged.

Numantines
reduced to extremities.

Despaire of the Numantines.

Ann. Rome 621

Metellus makes warre against the Maiorquins.

which trade those people could not forget, holding it in old time to be very honourable. Q. Seruilius Cæpio was also sent with the like charge, who fought with the Lusitanians, and did triumph. A while after there did arise new tumults among the Celtiberians: for the appeasing whereof Calphurnius Piso was sent, and after him Sergius Galba, Pretors: but for that the Romanes were much troubled with the warres of Italie, as well against the Cimbrians (a nation coming from the borders of the Northerne Ocean) as against the slaues which were in armes againe, and foraged Sicilie, they sent certaine Commissioners to pacifie the troubles without armes, if it might be. These Cimbrians being vanquished a little before by the Consull Carbo, had fallen vpon the Gaules and Spaine, from whence they had bene repulsed, and in the year 644 returned againe to inuade Italie, where they defeated the armie of M. Syllanus. Anno 648. The Lusitanians Confull: but the Lusitanians in the year 648 (P. Rutilius Rufus and C. Manilius being Consuls) defeated a Roman armie: the Authors speake not of his name that was the Generall, nor of his that was sent to suppress them, in the year 652, who subdued them. It may be it was D. Iunius Silanus. And they stayed not long to minister matter of triumph to the Romanes captaines, hauing rebelled againe in the year 654, against whom L. Corn. Dolabella a Pretor was sent, who vanquished them and triumphed. The Consull T. Didius, at the same time, after that the Cimbrians had bene driuen out of Italie, hauing had the government of Spaine about Ebro, slew in battaile 20000 Areuaces and Vacceans, and tooke the towne of Thermise, which was great and strong by situation, commaunding the inhabitants for a punishment of their ordinarie rebellion to dwell in the plaine, and not to inuall themselves: after seuen moneths siege hee also tooke the towne of Colenda, and sold the inhabitants. Other people of the Celtiberians continuing in their theeuing, were by him condemned to die, by the aduice of tenne Commissioners, which were then in Spaine for the people of Rome. Hauing then gathered them together, vnder colour that he would giue them land to manure, he caused them to be enuironed by his souldiours, and cut in pieces: for which deeds he triumphed at his returne to Rome. In the armie of this T. Didius was at that time Q. Sertorius, who had charge of 1000 men, a man of iudgement and valour, whereof he made good proofe, when as vnder this Consull Didius, the Castalonians attempted, with the help of them of Girize, to cut his regiment in pieces which wintred in their town, for that during the tumult he rallied them together which escaped the slaughter, with the which he reuenged the death of his souldiours, putting all the conspirators which he found armed to the sword: & hauing attired some of his men with their apparrell and armes, he marcht speedily towards Girize, where being let in by reason of this disguising, he made a great slaughter of the inhabitants, and sold the rest.

10 The Lusitanians and people of the further Spaine in the year 656 drew against them the Consull P. Licinius Crassus, who triumphed in like manner. And in the year 659 Fulvius Flaccus being sent against the Celtiberians, who had rebelled, he slew 20000 in battell, and restrained the rest by justice, euen those which had burnt their owne Senators, opposing themselves against the rebellion which they had intended; rasing and demanteling some townes.
Spaine by means of these executions remained quiet, vntill the ciuile dissentions betwixt Ma-rius and Sylla, which ministred occasions of new warre.

11 Whilest this Marian sedition continued, M. Crassus hauing seene his father and brother slaine by Cinna and Marius, fled into Spaine, where he had been in time past at the warres with his father, and there had gotten some friends: but finding that euerie one stood in feare of Marius, he retired to a countrey house belonging to Vibius Papiacus, where he hid himselfe in a caue, causing some to sound Vibius mind, who hearing that Crassus was escaped, he caused him to be secretly fed there eight moneths by a slaue of his, vnto the death of Cinna.

12 After the ciuile warre betwixt Marius and Sylla, the infection of this madnesse past into Spaine, by the means of Q. Sertorius, who hauing held the partie of Cinna and Marius, after the defeats of Carbo, Scipio and Norbanus by Sylla, he retired into Spaine, where he had been vnder the Consull Didius, and there he fortified himselfe against the enterprises of the Dictator Sylla, causing Iulius Salinator to keepe the passages of the Pyrence mountaines, with 6000 foot, but it was not long before that Sylla sent C. Annus, who not able to force the enemy in a place of such aduantage, obtained the passage by the death of Salinator, whom Calphurnius Lanarius (that did maligne him) slew in treason. This made Sertorius retyre, who had but three thousand men remaining in new Carthage, from whence he passed into Affricke,
and

Ann. 648.
The Lusitanians
repeale and defeat the Romanes.

9 Thermise taken and rased by T.
Didius Consull

Q. Sertorius.

Fulvius Flaccus
defeats the Cel-tiberians.

A friend is tried in need.

Sertorius warre
in Spaine.

and from thence the barbarians chased him: afterwards thinking to returne, he was repulsed from landing in Spaine: wherefore he seized vpon one of the islands of Pytusius, in distance of C. Anninus garrison: but he was chased from thence also, so as being accompanied with some foits of Sicilian pirats, he was forced to put out to sea for some daies. In the end he passed the strait, and put to land about the mouth of the riuer of Betis, where hauing information by some mariners of the fortunat islands, he began to resolute to liue there in rest: whereupon these pirats disliking his designe, abandoned him, and put themselves in pay vnder a Moore, named Afcalius, who contended with an other for the kingdome of the Ma-rufians, whose partie Sertorius maintained. Comming to fight Afcalius was defeated, and after his death of Syllas captaines, called Paccianus, who came to succour him: after which Af-calius was besieged in the towne of Tingis, and taken. By this good successe Sertorius augmented his armie with the remainders of the vanquished enemies souldiours, which came to ferue vnder him. He did so win the hearts of the Moores, vsing this victorie modestly, as they were afterwards al at his commandment: but as he was in great care what course to take,
 there came embassadors vnto him from the Lusitanians, intreating him to be their Generall;
 for that the Romans of Syllas partie made war against them, and therefore they had need of a man of judgment & experience, which honor they did according to his meritis offer vnto him:
 vpon which summons he left Africke, leading with him about 2500 souldiours, which he called Romans, & yet they were for the most part Africans; with the which hauing ioyned 4000 Lusitanians and 7000 horses, he made head against foure great Romane captaines, vnder whom there were about 120000 foot and 6000 horses, and had in a manner all the townes of Spaine at their deuotion.

At the beginning of this war, he defeated Cotta in a sea fight, neere vnto the towne of Mel-laria, and put to rout Didius or Fidius, Pretor of Betica, neere vnto the riuer of Betis, where he slue 10000 of his men: and by the diligence of his Quesior Hertuleius, he also defeated Tho-ranius, lieutenant to the Confull Q. Metellus Pius, to whom that prouince was assigned in the year 673. Afterwards he had to deale with Metellus himselfe, and did so annoy him being a great and an expert captaine, as Manlius the Proconfull of Gaule was forced to come to his succours, with three legions and 1500 horse: but Manlius being encountered by Hertuleius Sertorius Quesior, was defeated, put to flight, and forced to saue himselfe in a manner alone within Lerida. L. Domitius was more vnfortunat, who was slain vpon the place in an other in-counter: all which exploits were done by surprizes, and in flying or retiring, the Romane cap-tains not being able to draw Sertorius to fight in a pitcht field: whereupon the Senat of Rome, considering that Metellus age (which was somewhat aduanced) made him more slow, and therefore not fit to encounter Sertorius, who was in the flower of his age, accompanied with souldiours as light as the wind, inured to labour, hunger, thirst, and all the difcommodities of war, were of opinion to send Cn. Pompeius vnto him, as an assistant & companion with like au-thoritie. In the mean time Metellus besieged the towne of the Langobriges, thinking to take it without difficultie, for want of water, knowing there was but one onely well in the whole towne: but Sertorius provided for this inconuenience, for hauing promised a reward to such as I would carrie goats skins filled with water, the Moores and other aduenturous people went in with a great quantitie: so as Metellus (who had victuals but for foue daies) was forced to retyre, after that Aquinius one of his lieutenants, whom he had sent to forage with 6000 men, had bin defeated by Sertorius, who lay continually in ambush.

About that time M. Perpenna arrived in Spaine, with a great armie, the which he ioyned to that of Sertorius, not of his owne free will, meaning to make war apart, but by constraint, for that the souldiours hauing a better conceit of Sertorius than of him, would not follow him: which made Perpenna to enuie and hate Sertorius. With these forces in a manner all Spaine beyond Ebro, was conquered by him. When as Pompey was come to Metellus camp, many throgh his fame, which was great, began to doubt of Sertorius affaires, and manie townes which were allyed vnto him began to wauer; but that which hapned at Lauronne did confirme them: for Sertorius hauing besieged Lauronne, & Pompey comming thither to raise the sieg, when as the armies were neere, & that Pompey expected to giue him batle, he perceiued that at one instant Sertorius held both the towne & his armie besieged; for he had lodged 6000 men behind Pompey's army, watching an opportunitie to compass him in so as he was forced to be more carefull

Sertorius having endured many crosses, resolves to goe and live at the fortunate islands at Canaries.

Sertorius called by the Lusitani-481.

What forces were against Sertorius in Spain.

Costa, Didina and Thorania defeated by S porine.

Sertorius defeats Marlin and kills L. Do-mizius.

Pompey sent to Spain to assist Metellus.

Verne is always excited

Laurenne besieged and taken by Sertorius in Pompey's presence.

A how to saue himselfe, than to deliuer the Lauronitanes, whose towne he did see taken & burnt before his face: the which Sertorius did, not vpon any crueltie (for in the whole course of his life he was neuer noted of that exceſſe, if it were not by constraint) but to let them know (who made so great esteeme of Pompey) that he knew more than he; whom he reamed a yong man, and Syllas discipule; and in this act of Lauronna, he said, That a wife captain doth alwaies looke more to that which is behind, than before. And to say the truth, Sertorius was one of the pollicke capitaines of his time, as it appeared in this warre, whereas he maintained himselfe and those he led, alwaies inuincible, being neuer beaten but by his Lieutenants, through great errors he receiued many prejudiciall losses: the which he repaired afterwards with great honor, as the defeat of Hiruleius by Metellus, neere vnto the towne of Italica, where he lost twentie thousand men.

After the taking of Lauronne, the armies of either side having wintered (the one in Lusitania, the other neere vnto the Pyrennes) they began to seeke one another: and it happened, that Pompey hauing encountered Horrennius and Perpenna neere vnto Valence, he defeated them, and in like sort Hirtuleius, who was slaine at that time: wherewith growne proud, he marched towards Sertorius, and without attending Metellus and his forces, hee came to fight with him, neere vnto the riuer of Suero or Xucar, whereas Pompey was put to flight, and hurt. Metellus arriuing, caused Sertorius to retire; with whom he did afterwards fight in the territorie of Sagunt, whereas Memmius, Pompeyes Questor, was slaine, and Metellus wounded: but Sertorius seeing that he had the worst, retyred himselfe cunningly, suffering himselfe to be besieged in the towne of Calaoire, a strong towne in a mountaine country, where he did more annoy the enemye, than they did him: in the meane time leuying men in the townes of his allies, hee made a furious rally, and dispersed his enemies; so as Metellus went to Winter in Gaule, and Pompey in the territorie of the Vaccans: where hauing besieged Palantia, Sertorius made him to rayse his siege. In this cuntry Pompey found himselfe much distressed, so as he was forced to demaund money, clothes, and come for his armie, from the Senat, else hee should be forced to bring it backe into Italie: Whereupon the Confull Lucullus gaue order hee should be furnished, fearing, that if he brought his armie backe into Italie, he would sue vnto the people for a Commission to make warre against Atithridates, which charge hee affected.

During the Consulship of L. Lucullus and M. Cotta, the Proconsuls Metellus and Pompey did all they could against the townes allied to Sertorius; who did so terrifie them, as Metellus despairing ever to vanquish him with all the force of the Romans during his life, made a proclamation by the found of the trumpet, to give 100 talents to him that could kill him, amounting to 60000 crownes, and besides, 20000 acres of land, if he were a Romane; if a banished man, restitution to all his goods and honours . The banished Senatours of Rome, which followed Sertorius army, did all malice their Generall, wherunto Perpenna (alwaies jealous of his glory) did still incite them: wherefore they began to crosse him vnder hand in many gallant designs, abusing the authoritie which Sertorius had given them over the Spaniards, proudly, courtou-

Battle betwixt Pompey and Sertorius, where as Sertorius had the better.

d Ann. 679.

1) Servorius life
d set to sale, contrarie to the vertue of the ancient Romans

h Sertorius grow
A cruell against his nature.

ey Perpenna and his adherents murder Sertorius treacherous

making mention, that he was buried there. He had many times made offer to Metellus, to lay aside armes, so as he might be called home by a publique decree: for he protested that he made not warre for the Spaniards greameffe, but to maintaine the people of Rome, whom he loued and honoured: so as there is no doubt but he was of a mild and gentle disposition, but that necessity had forced him to this contumacie and rebellion, and the violent and ambitious pursute of his fellow citizens. Perpenna thinking to doe some great exploit, made vse of Sertorius forces, but hee was deceived: for it soone appeared, that he was not fit to commaund, being in a short time vanquished, taken, and slaine by Pompey. This traitor to redeeme his life, offered Sertorius papers vnto Pompey, where there were many letters from the Senatours of Rome, persuaading Sertorius to passe with his armie into Italy: but Pompey tooke these papers, and would not once read them, but burnt them all, and so put Perpenna to death, to the end he should not name any one, nor reueale that which was contained in them; the which might haue rayfed a new ciuile warre: which was no act of a young man. Of all the towns in Spaine, Auxima, at this day Osina, and Calagurri, held out for a time against Pompey: but in the end they were taken by force and ruined; Auxima by Pompey, and Calagurri by Afranius: and so this Sertorian warre was ended: the last exploits whereof were about Osca and Ilerda in Catalonia, tenne yeares after the beginning thereof, in the yeare 682: in the which, Metellus and Pompey for their successfull exploits in Spaine triumphed. At that time Pompey was but a Roman knight; and they say, That he afterwards erected his trophies in the Pyrence mountains, where he caused to be written the names of 871 townes in his victories, among the which, he would not put that of Sertorius. This was the beginning of Pampelone, according vnto some. There were found in those dayes, in the vallies of Andorre and of Altauca, certaine great buckles of yron, folded into the rockes with lead, which were held to be the trophies of Pompey. A yeare after we find mention made of M. Pappius Piso Pretor, who triumphed also for some victories gotten in Spaine.

13 In the yeare 688 L. Aurelius Cotta and Lucius Manlius Torquatus being Consuls, Cn. Piso a young man, audacious, poore, and seditious, suspected to haue conspired with Cateline, was sent into Spain with charge (vnder pretext to do him honor, but the true cause was to get him out of Rome) where he was slaine, troubling the prouince with exactions, and other excesse: & some say it was plotted by Pompey. Then mention is made of Q. Calpurnius Pretor in the yeare 692: and after him, of Tubero in the further Spaine, who gaue the Prouince to Caius Iul. Cesar his Quæstor, in qualitie of Pretor, Q. Metellus and L. Afranius being Consuls at Rome, in the yeare 693 of the foundation thereof: whereas in few dayes he subjected vnder the Roman yoke all that was to be subdued in Galicia, Brecaire, and Lusitania: among others, he destroyed Brigantium in Galicia (the which is Bragance, if it be not the Port of Corugna, or the Groine, called in old time Portus Brigantinus): He dispersed the Herminian mountaineers, inhabiting betwixt the riuers of Duero and Minio, and forced them to retire into the islands of Cincies, which are those of Bayonne of Minio. And if hee shewed himselfe actiue and valiant in matters of warre, hee woon no lesse honour in administration of iustice, and other actions of peace: aboue all things hee pacified many suites, commenced by vsurers against their debtors; the which he so ordered, as the creditors should haue two third parts of their debtors goods, and the rest they should haue for their maintenance, vntill the debt were payed: and he made many other good ordinances, for the which he was much honoured. After Cesar's returne, he being Consull, there was a complot made betwixt him, Crassus, and Pompey, who diuided the Roman Prouinces betwixt them: whereof Spaine fell to Pompey; the which he gouerned by his Lieutenants: then P. Lentulus was sent thither as Proconsull, and after him Q. Metellus Nepos: in whose time the Gaules of Aquitania made warre against Cesar and the Romanes, employing the captaines and Spanish souldiours which had carried armes vnder Sertorius.

From that time Spaine was gouerned by Pompey, or men of his faction: so as vpon the beginning of the ciuile warre betwixt him and Cesar, L. Afranius, M. Petreius, and M. Varro did gouerne it for him: against whom Cesar marched, after that he had chased Pompey out of Italy; knowing well, that Spaine was a seminarie for souldiours, and if he tooke it not from Pompey, his designs would proue but vaine: being well aduertised, that Pompey had sent Vibullius Rufus thither, to keepe that great prouince at his deuotion, and to oppose him against Cesar in those parts.

Perpenna punished for his treason.

Pompey's wife came to extinguish the ciuile warre.

Ann 682.

Pompey's trophies, and the beginning of Pampelone.

Cn. Piso slaine in Spaine.

C. Iul. Cesar's exploits in Spaine being Pretor.

Pompey perpetual Governour in Spaine.

A parts. The lieutenants vpon Vibullius comming put themselves in order, every one in his gouernment. Petreius made a leue of horsemen in Lusitania: Afranius did the like among the Celtiberians, and that part of the Cantabrians, where he commaunded. They joyned their forces together on this side the riuier of Ebro, making their store-houise for the war at Ilerda, hauing in their armies five Roman legions, almost 80 companies of Spaniards, and about 5000 horse. Cesar being resolu'd to fight with them, and to chase them out of Spain, had sent C. Fabius with three legions to seize vpon the passages of the Pyrence mountains: then he followed with about 6000 Italian foot, which had alwaies serued him in the wars of Gaule, and 3000 horse, and the like number of other souldiours leuied in Aquitania, most of them of the mountaines; of whom he had politickely borrowed all the money they had to pay his armie: where he found, that Fabius and the Pompeians were neere, and often skirmished about the riuier of Sisoris or Sigro, whereas Fabius had made two bridges, by the which he sent his souldiours to forrage, for all neere vnto him was consumed, Petreius and Afranius lying beneath the enemy. It happened, that Fabius meaning to passe two legions ouer one of his bridges, to second his forragers, when as the souldiours were past, & the baggage following them, the bridge was so ouercharged with weight, as it brake; so as Fabius armie was diuided, and these two legions engaged, and cut off by the riuier from the rest of their horse and foot: which the enemies (who lay beneath them) perceiving by the timber and other stuffe which came down with the streame, Afranius did suddainly cause foure legions and all his horse to passe, to charge Fabius two legions, which were led by L. Plancus: who hauing put them into a long forme of battell, least he should be enuironed by these horsemen, he endured the shooke of these foure legions, vntill that C. Fabius came to succour him, and to vngage him: for when he saw the bridge broken, he doubted what the enemies would doe, and therefore had caused all the rest of his army to passe by the other bridge, which was a good league aboue it. Hereupon Cesar arriued with his armie, and marched towards the enemies to draw them to bataille, but he could not: skirmishing for three daies together vnder the towne of Ilerda, with losse on either side, Cesar's armie (which lay then in a country about seuen leagues compasse, betwixt the two riuers of Sisoris and Cinga, which were not to be waded through) was much annoyed with raine and tempests that fell, wherewith (the riuers being much risen) the bridges which Fabius had repaired were carried away; so as they could not bring any victuals from their confederat townes, nor out of Gaule nor Italie, neither yet got to forrage: and if any did stray out farte to seeke victuals, they were compassed in by the waters, and could not returne to the campe. And on the other side, Afranius and Petreius armie lived in abundance: and to encrease Cesar's miseries, great store of victuals, stayed by the riuers which were ouerflowne, being conducted out of Gaule, with a good number of foot and horse, were stopped and dispersed by Afranius, who departed in the night with three legions and all his horsemen to defeat them. But the Gaules defended themselves so valiantly, as most of them escaped in the mountaines, the which Cesar (hauing found meanes soone after to repaire his bridges) receiued, with their leaders. Many daies were spent in light skirmishes, and to cut off them that went for forrage: in the meane time there were many secret practises; so as Cesar drew vnto him five townes and nations; Osca, Calagurri, Tarracone, the Lacetanes and Auseranes: and in the end, the Spaniards which were in Afranius campe began to disband, and to flye to Cesar's campe; yea, whole bands of the Ilurgauonians: And after the example of these neere townes, those that were farthest off sued to Cesar for his friendship; who making many ditches and trenches, drew the riuier of Sigro or Sisoris into so many streames, as his horsemen might wade through it. Afranius and Petreius being amazed thereat, resolu'd to dislodge, and passe the riuier of Ebro, to retire into the Celtiberians countrey, where they did thinke to get many horsemen, victuals, and other commodities. According to this resolution, they dislodged in the night from Ilerda, where they left a good garrison, and marcht towards Ebro.

F Cesar hauing passed his horse, followed them in the reere, and in the end he was so importuned by the legions, as he caused them to wade through the riuier whereas the horsemen had passed, and made such speed, as he ouertooke the enemies in the morning, so as the armies were again neere together, yet did they neither fight nor march, spending some time to discouer the countrey; yet Cesar in the end found meanes to get (but not without a sharpe encounter) certaine straits, whereby he stopped Afranius and Petreius designe for their going to Ebro.

Great preparations to resist Cesar in Spaine.

Cesar disarms Africanus and Petreus.

Whilest they consult what they had to doe, and how to preuent Cæsars surprises, their armie G wore of them, and woon with Cæsars fame and reputation, was easly corrupted by the Cæsarian souldiours: the which Africanus and Petreus sought to hinder; yea, Petreus vsing his absolute authoritie, slew many of them that parled. Thinking afterwards to returne towards Ilerda, and to passe the riuier Sisoris, but being hindered by Cæsar, they put their armie in bataille readie to fight: but Cæsar holding them as it were besieged, reduced them to that extremite, as they demaunded their liues of him, resigning their Legions vp vnto him, and all the Prouince.

*Varro follows
the time and seasons.*

17 M. Varro, who was in the further Spaine, hearing the successe of the affaires in Italie, in the beginning, he did hold Pompeys ruine to be most certain: wherefore he spake very honourably of Cæsar, and seemed to desire to be a neuter in these quarrels: but when as he vnderstood, that Africanus and Petreus were gone to field with so great an armie, and in what difficulties Cæsar was vnder Ilerda for want of victuals, he then changed his mind, and followed Pompeys partie; and filling vp two legions which he had, to the which he joyned about thirtie bands of allies, he began to make prouision of great store of corne to send to Africanus, and in like manner to the Marfilians, whom Cæsar caused to be besieged: and assuring himselfe of the citie of Gades, he caused all the gold, siluer, and jewels which were in Hercules Temple, to be transported thither, making Caius Gallonius, a Roman knight, Gouvernor thereof, with six companies of Spaniards, carrying all the citizens armes into his lodging. Then he began to change his speech of Cæsar, and of his exploits, contrarie to that which he had of late vsed: wherefore the citizens of Rome being disperfed ouer the Prouince, being amazed, did easly suffer themselves to be taxed in a great summe of money, for the seruice of the Commonweale, not sparing (as it is to be conjectured) the townes which he thought to be affected vnto Cæsar. And if there were any one which durst speake against them that followed Pompey, he did confiscate their goods, forcing euery one to take an oath to him and to Pompey, and so he prepared himselfe to the warre, making his account to lodge with his two legions in Gades, vpon all euents, and to bring all the corne thither, and to gather together all the shipping of that prouince, the which he knew to be too well affected vnto Cæsar. Finally, he perswaded himselfe, That hee might prolong the warre in this island as much as he pleased. Cæsars affaires prest him to returne into Italie, yet holding it necessarie to disarme all those that held Pompeys part in Spain, he sent two legions towards Betica, vnder the command of Q. Cassius, Tribune of the people; after the which he went with some troupes of horse, hauing in the meane time order for the calling of a generall assembly at Cordoua: whither deputies came from all the townes, and in a manner all the Romanes that were in those marches, being much inclined to do what Cæsar should command them. M. Varro was excluded by the assembly of Cordoua, who set gards in their ports and towers, and they of Carmone chased away the garrison which Varro had placed there, which made him hast the more to bring his two legions to Gades, least he should be preuented: but he was not farre aduanced, before he receiued letters, by the which he was aduertised, That the Gaditanes hauing agreed with the capitaines of the garrison which was within their town, had forced Gallonius to depart, protesting, That they would keepe the town for Cæsar: whereupon one of Varroes legions resoluéd to leaue him, taking the way towards Seuille. Wherewith Varro being amazed, and seeing himselfe coopt vp in that countrey, so as he had no meanes to passe into Italie, he resoluéd to yeeld vnto Cæsar, deliuering vp his legion which remained, with all the money and victuals that was in his power. Cæsar held an assembly at Cordoua, and thanked the deputies of townes, the citizens of Rome, and all the captains and others which had shewed themselves fauourable to his cause: hee restored euery man to his goods that had been spoyled, and filled all men with hope by his promises. From Cordoua he passed to Gades, and restored to Hercules Temple the gold and jewels which had bin taken away: and hauing left Q. Cassius with foure legions to gouerne the Prouince, he passed by sea to Tarracone, where the deputies of all that part of Spaine attended him: with whom hauing conferred, and disposed of the affaires, he went by land towards Narbone, and from thence to Marfeilles, which his lieutenants did besiege. This was in the yeare 704.

Varro bandies himselfe against Cæsar.

*Varro disarmed
by Cæsar.*

*Ann. Rome 704
Cassius crucifies and condemnes thruitts Cæsar
into a new war.*

18 At Marfeilles Cæsar had news, That he was created Dictator at Rome by M. Lepidus the Pretor: after which time Spain was gouerned in his name by M. Lepidus and Q. Cassius his lieutenants: But they of Corduba oppressed with the crueltie & couetousnesse of Cassius, forsooke (with

A (with two legions) Cæsars party; whereby the war was reuiued in Spain by Pompeys children, after the defeat and death of their father, in the yeare 708. This Cassius being couetous, and a great exactor, did incense the souldiours against him; who hurt him, and hadlike to haue stabd him with their daggers: The authors of this exceffe were L. Rucilio, Annius Scapula, and Minutius Silo: yet he was cured; and as he thought to passe into Africke by Cæsars commandement, almost all his souldiours abandoned him, and did chuse one Thorus, of the towne of Italica, for their leader. To this Thorus (who made a shew to besiege Cordoua) Marcellus did joyne, but they did inuest Mia (which is likely to be Monte-Major at this day:) thereupon M. Lepidus came from Rome, where he had proclaimed Cæsar Dictator, who kept them from forcing and taking Cassius. Marcellus referred their quarels to Lepidus: but Cassius being loath to trust him, was content to leaue the prouince, and to giue place to Caius Trebonius. Being imbarqued at Malaca, with all that he had gotten in Spaine, to passe into Italie, his ship was cast by a tempest vpon the coast, where it perished, not farre from the mouth of Ebro.

B These two legions were somewhat pacified by C. Trebonius, who succeeded Cassius Longinus, yet they feared to be punished for their rebellion: wherefore they solicited Scipio, who held Africke for the Pompeyan faction, to send Cn. Pompeius, sonne to the great Pompey, into Spaine; who went thitherward: but he staid long at the islands of the Balears, as well to subdue them, as by reason of sicknesse. The legions hearing afterwards of Scipios defeat in Italie, and that Cæsar sent Didius with an armie against them, fearing to bee oppressed before

C Pompeys coming, they did chuse T. Quinctius Scapula, and Q. Apponius, for their commanders, chasing C. Trebonius out of the Betique prouince. Hereupon Pompey arriued, whom they acknowledged for their Generall; so as in a short time he reduced the further Spaine vnder his deuotion: with whom there came Mitius Varus, and Labiencus. Cæsar aduertised of these things, being in Italie, he sent Q. Pedius and Q. Fabius Maximus into Spaine: but they were not able to resist Pompeys forces; so as Cæsar being solicited by the townes that were allied vnto him (especially by them of Corduba) he went in person into Spaine. Then did Sextus Pompeius, the younger of the brethren, hold Cordoua, the chiefe towne of the gouernment, with a good garrison, and Cn. the elder brother besieged Vlloa, into the which Cæsar found oportunitie to put some succours, by the meanes of a great wind and raine, and by the dexterity of L. Iunius Pacieus, a Spaniard, to whom he had giuen the charge: which put Cn. Pompeius out of hope to take it: whereupon he dislodged, and led his armie towards Cordoua, whither Sextus his brother, fearing to be forced by Cæsar, did sollicite him to approach. Hauing encountered Cæsar vpon the banks of Betis, there were many bloudie skirmishes, with variable successe. Cæsar dislodged in the night, and went to besiege Ategua, whither Pompey went, and camped betwixt Ategua and Vcubis, hauing thirteene legions in his armie; yet he made no account but of three, for all the rest were composed of fugitiues, and men of no value. Cæsar was much stronger in horse, and Pompey had no will to fight, but was willing to prolong the warre all he could: yet being desirous to force a certaine garrison which Cæsar had set to keepe a peece of ground which was commodious for either of them, there was a great skirmish, Cæsar committing himselfe to second his men with three legions; so as the Pompeyans had the worst, and were repulsed. Wherewith Pompey being amazed, there being new supplies of horse come to Cæsars campe, hee dislodged, and retired towards Cordoua, being followed by Cæsars horse, whereof he flew many, being ingaged in one of his legions. Some past from his campe vnto Cæsar, among the which were Q. Martius and C. Fundanius. Ategua being forely battered, and well defended for many dayes, in the end yeelded. The which Pompey vnderstanding, he marched towards Vcubis, where he caused a search to be made for all the inhabitants which fauoured Cæsar, cutting off the heads of seuentie foure, and casting many women and children ouer the walls; which made many to flie to Cæsars campe, yea capitaines, and heads of bands, and the souldiours of some legions, with some townes. Wherefore Pompey fearing that by his delaias he should loose both his allies, & his armie it selfe, hauing spent some dayes in turning vp and downe, in the end he resoluéd to giue Cæsar battell neere vnto Munda. In both armies, besides Romanes and Italian allies and Spaniards, there were many Moores: for Boechus a Moorish king, had sent two of his sonnes to succour Pompey; and Bo-gud another king of the same nation, was in person in Cæsars armie: yet the battell was fought in a manner by the Romanes alone. On Cæsars side the souldiours were encouraged by their

*Cn. Pompeius
gets the further Spaine to be as his deuotion.*

Ategua taken by Cæsar.

Moores in both the armies of Cæsar and Pompey.

Gene.

Battell betwixt Cesar and Pompey.

Generals presence, and did wonderfull deeds of armes. In Pompeys armie, whereas the fugitive legionaries were, despair to get their pardon made them to fight resolutely. Being come to joyne, the allies of either part turned their backs presently, so as the Romans must trie it who should haue the better, the which was done with great obstinacie on either side; so as there could no grones nor lamentations be heard, of any one that was dying or wounded, but onely striking and killing, one encouraging another, and shewing themselves more prompt with their hands than tongues. The battell was long doubtfull, neither could Cesar or Pompey judge which had the better, who after they had long beheld it in great perplexitie, they came among them to encourage their fouldiours, whereof there was no great need. King Bogud was the cause of Cesars victorie, who standing without the battell with his Moores, went vnto the trenches of Pompeys campe, to spoyle it: the which Labienu perceiving, he went out of his ranke to make head against him: but the rest of Pompeys fouldiours taking it to be a flight, with the apprehension thereof they were all put to rout; and although they did soone after find their owne errors, yet could they not rally themselves together againe, but some fled to their campe, and some towards the towne of Munde. The slaughter was great on either side, even at the taking of the campe, whereas Cesars men could neuer enter before they had slaine all those that defended it, with like losse of their own men. Cesar hauing gotten the victorie with great difficultie and danger, he said vnto his fouldiours, That he had often fought for honour, but now he had fought for his life. There dyed of Pompeys fouldiours 30000.

A mistaking in the cause of Pompeys ruine.

Great slaughter
on both sides.

After this rout Cordoua being abandoned by Sex. Pompeius, yielded, in the which Scapula (who had bene author of the fouldiours sedition) caused a slave of his to kill him, and to burne his bodie, with all the treasure he had. Seuill, Munde, and other places, were some taken by force, with great slaughter of the inhabitants, and some by composition. Many towns in Spaine (flattering Cesar) after these victories, called themselves after his name: Vcubis was called Claritas Iulia, Ebora, Libertas Iulia. At this time Cesar did not spare the treasure of Hercules temple in Gades, being greatly distressed for money: He took away many of their lands, & laid new raxes vpon those towns which had rebelled, that he might reward his friends.

Pompey hauing escaped by flight, he came to Carteia, where he thought to make vse of the armie at sea, which he had kept readie thereabouts: but he was pursued, and the ships after a great fight falling into the power of Didius, were some of them carried away by him, and the rest burnt; so as Pompey sore wounded in the shoulder and leg, seeking to flie by land, was pursued, ouertaken, and slaine, with many of his men, by the horsemen and some companies of foot which were sent after him. For these victories gotten in Spaine, not against strangers, but against citizens of Rome, Cesar, Q. Fabius, and Q. Pedius, did triumph at Rome, to the great griefe of the people. After that these things had been exploited by Cesar, and all ciuile diffentions quenched, as he thought to enjoy his Dictatorship, suffering kingly honours to be done vnto him, he was slaine by Cassius, Brutus, and other conspirators. Then was the estate of Rome in greater confusion than euer, by the diuision betwixt Octavius Cesar and M. Antonie; and afterwards by the cruell proscriptions of Octavius, M. Antonie, and Lepidus: which Lepidus had triumphed for Spaine in the yere 707, I know not for what victories. It is certaine that he gouerned the hither part of Spain by Cesars gift, but it was by his lieutenants, hauing neuer done any exploit of warre. Dio saith, That he persuaded Sex. Pompeius to leaue Spaine, promising him restitution of his fathers goods. Domitius Caluinus, C. Norbanus, Flaccus, and Asinius Pollio, were afterwards Gouernours of Spaine, of whose exploits there is no memorable mention. In the yere 713 Cornel. Balbus, borne at Calis, was Confull at Rome: and in the yere 714, the second diuision of the empire being made betwixt Octavius Cesar, M. Antonie, and M. Lepidus, after the reconciliation betwixt Octavius and M. Antonie, and the Perusine warre, among other prouinces, Spaine fell to Octavius: and from that yere the Spaniards began to account their yeares by the Arke or rule of Cesar, the which was 38 yeares before the comming of our Sauour, the which they did continue vntill the yere 1383 of our saluation, when as this custome was left, as shall be said.

Augustus in
Spaine.

In the yere 726 of the foundation of Rome, Augustus being sole Emperour, he undertooke to subdue the Cantabrians, Asturians, and Gallicians, who had alwayes held their libertie, lawes, and auncient customes, to rob and spoyle their neighbours, and would wholly

A wholly subiect them vnder his empire: wherefore he resolved to goe in person into Spaine, where he found those nations assured in their countenances, and full of contempt, relying in the strength of their mountains, from whence they made many sudden enterprises, verie preiudiciall to the emperours armie, the which camped at Sigifama (the which some thinke was that which at this present they call Veisama, in Guipuscoa or Biscaye, and not Sigifama Iulia) where he made three troupes of his forces. Hauing spent many dayes there, and nothing aduanced his affaires, Augustus fell sicke with care and trauell: wherefore hauing left the charge of the warre to C. Antistius, he caused himselfe to be carried to Tarracona. The Cantabrians assailed both by land and sea towards Gaule Aquitaine, came to fight with Antistius and Firminus, by whom they were defeated in many encounters, and their townes taken. A great number of Gallicians hauing fortified themselves on a mountaine, then called Medullius, neere vnto the riuer of Minio, they were besieged, and so pressed as they must of necessitie either fight or yeeld: but hauing not the courage to defend themselves, and being loath to fall into seruitude, they all slew themselves. The Asturians being camped neere vnto the riuer which giues the name vnto their countrey, thought to surpriſe the Romane armie, and without doubt had defeated them, if their enterprize had not bene discovered. They were afterwards put to rout by P. Carisius, but not without great slaughter of his men. Hee also tooke Lancia, the chiefe towne of Asturia, being abandoned. So the warre ended, and at the same instant Augustus hauing dismissed the old fouldiours, hee gaue them leaue to build the towne of Emerita in Lusitania, at this day it is Merida in Portugall. Then also the towne of Salduba was first called Cesar Augusta, in honor of Octavius Augustus, it is now Saragosse, the which he did much enlarge with buildings. Fieue and twentie yeares before the birth of our Sauour, the way was paved from Cordoua to Astigi vpon the Ocean. It appears by this inscription which is at Cordoua, on a pillar of greene stone, whereon Augustus name is grauen, and the number of twelue miles, which is the distance from Cordoua to the sea.

Cruell obstinacie of Barbaſians.

Emerita founded by Augustus Saragossa.

Imp. Cesar. Diui. F. Augustus
Cos. V I I I. Trib. Potest. X X I.
Pont. Max. A. Bete. & Iano.
Augusto. Ad. Oceanum.
C. X X I.

This Temple of Ianus was by all coniectures built by Augustus at Cordoua, in signe of a perpetuall peace. After Cesars returne Sextus Apuleius Proconsull, shewed some proofes of his valour in Spaine, for the which he triumphed: and afterwards L. Emilius suppressed the Cantabrians, and Asturians, who rebelled againe: After which time Spaine was gouerned by Pretors and Proconsuls, the which are sometimes called in Latine Presides, vnto the time of Dioclesian and Maximin. Strabo saith, That in his time, which was during the empires of Augustus and Tiberius, the prouince of Betica was giuen vnto the people of Rome, who appointed a Gouernour or Pretor, hauing a Lieutenant and a Treasurer; the rest of Spaine remaining at the emperours disposition: who sent two lieutenants, the one in qualitie of Vice-Pretor, the other as Vice-Confull. The Vice-Pretor, with the helpe of a lieutenant or legat, did justice, and had iurisdiction ouer all Lusitania, from the riuer of Betis vnto Duero: the other part, being Taracconese, did obey the Vice-Confull, who had a great armie entertained with three lieutenants; the one commaunded the Cantabrians, Asturians, and the countrey of Gallicia; the other gouerned along the Mediterranean sea; and the third had charge of the inner countries. The Generals place of residence was at Carthagene, or Tarracone. The emperours which came after, made first two, and then one Gouernour of Spaine, and not alwayes of one sort. About the time of Maximinian and Dioclesian, the Gouernours were called Earles, and their lieutenants Vicars: and when as the Gothes began to erect a kingdome, that small portion which held for the Romanes, along the shore of the prouince of Carthagene, and the mountains of the Cantabrians and Asturians, were gouerned by Dukes, whom they called Presfelli.

Gouernment of Spaine vnder
the emperours.

Earles and Vicars
gouerning
Spaine.
Dukes called Presfelli.

Octavius Cesar, surnamed Augustus, had held the empire about two and fortie yeares, when our Sauour Iesus Christ the eternall sonne of God, was borne God and man, of the virgine

The first yere of Christ.
752 of Rome.
Marie,

Marie, of the tribe of Iuda, in the citie of Beth-leem of Iuda, which was in the yere 757 of the foundation of Rome. The night when as the Lord of peace came vpon the earth, was (as some write) as bright and cleere in Spaine, as the noone day. The computation of times shall hereafter be taken from the birth of our Sauour, in the 16 yere of whose life Augustus died. Then Sextilius Elena, a Poet of Cordoua, flourished in Spaine, being now brought wholly to the manners of the Romans.

An. 16 of Christ

Triton a disturbance.

Vibius Serenus
a tyrannous gouernor punished.

Tiberius doth indefatigably refuse diuine honours,
Anno 16.

An exacting go-uernour slaine
by a peasant.

Anno 34.

The Gospel preached in Spain in Tiberius time.

Anno 39.
Herodes and Herodiad died in Spain, as the Spaniards affirm.

21 The Spaniards being much affected to Augustus, did obtaine of C. Tiberius Nero, his successeur, leaue to build a goodly temple in honour of him, in the towne of Tarracone. This emperor kept the Gallicians, Asturians, and Cantabrians vnder, with strong garrisons, hauing bene formerly subdued by Augustus. In his time they of Lisbon gaue it out, That they had seene and heard Triton in certaine hollow rockes, singing and playing vpon a cornet, as they painted him: And Plinie reports, that vpon the sea shore a Nereide had bene seene couered with scales, yea whereas she caried a humane shape: and that they had heard the groines and complaints she made dying. Vnder Tiberius, Vibius Serenus Proconsull of the further Spaine, accused by his owne sonne, and conuicted, was condemned as a tyrant, and banished into the island Amorgos, one of the Cyclades. Iunius Gallio, brother to Seneca the Senator, was also banished, for that he had propounded in Senat, to honour the old fouldiours which had bene dismissed, with higher seats in the Theatre, and at publike shewes; hauing not first spoken thereof vnto the emperor Tiberius. The Spanish flatterers, doing idolatrie vnto princes, would also haue made a temple vnto Tiberius and to his mother, the which was prohibited; Tiberius saying, That he was a man and no god, demanding no other thing of them, but that they would retaine a good and commendable memorie of him after his death.

The six and twentieth yere of our saluation, L. Piso, a great oppressor of the people, was slaine in the hither Spaine, where he was Pretor, by a peasant of Termes, who being taken and tortured, would neuer confesse who had made him to commit this murder. This man slipping out of the officers hands which led him to the racke againe, beat his own head so violently against a stone, as instantly he lost both fence and life. In those times one of the richest men of Spaine, called Sextus Marius, was accused, to haue accompanied with his owne daughter carnally: for the which he was cast downe headlong from the rocke Tarpeien: but his great wealth was the cause of his death, more than his crime.

Tiberius had reigned seenteene yeres, when as our Sauour Iesus Christ suffered death for the redemption of mankind, hauing finished the three and thirtieth yere of his life.

22 The healthfull doctrine of our redemption by him, was during the empire of Tiberius knowen in Spaine, as some hold: but it is doubtfull who was the Apostle. Wee read in the Epistles of Saint Paul, that he had a desire to go thither, but it is not certaine that he performed that voyage, although that Epiphanius and others do beleue it. The Spaniards affirme, That Saint James the sonne of Zebedee, came thither to preach the Gospell in the seuen and thirtieth yere, and that he onely conuerted nine persons: Others, as Pope Calixtus, write, That he had many Disciples, but that he had twelue speciall ones, nine whereof hee conuerted in Gallicia. Others affirme, That when he preached at Saragosse, hee dedicated to the virgine Marie, the temple which is at this day called Nuestra Señora del pillar: and that hauing left two of his Disciples in Spaine, he returned into Iudea. Wee comprehend by the holy writ, that this holy Apostle liued almost all his life in Ierusalem, and thereabouts: and wee know, that Herodes caused his head to be cut off, in the third yere of the empire of Claudius.

The nine and thirtieth yere of our saluation, as some authors write, Herodes and Herodias (the which incited her incestuous husband, to cut off Saint Iohn Baptists head) retired themselves into Spaine: who (being spoyled of all their goods and dignities, by C. Caligula) dyed there for sorrow. Caligula was slaine by Cherea and other conspirators: But before them Aemilius Regula of Cordoua, hauing attempted his death, was preuented and executed. This yere M. Anneus Lucanus the Poet, was borne at Cordoua, whose father was Luc. Anneus Mela, brother to Seneca the Philosopher: his mother was called C. Acilia, daughter to Acilius Lucanus the Orator. This child being but eight moneths old, was carried to Rome.

23 Wee haue said, That Saint James the sonne of Zebedee was beheaded in Ierusalem by Herods commaundement, in the third yere of the emperor Claudius. The Spaniards and other authors write, That his Disciples gathering vp his bodie and head, imbarqued it at Iop-

K

L

M

A pa, and carried it into Spaine, for feare of the Iewes; and that they landed at a place called Iria Flauia, now Padron, where they buried it in a secret place, where since it was discouered, and carried to Compostella. In Claudius time liued Pomponius Mela, borne at Mellaria, and Turanius Graccula. Anneus Seneca of Cordoua, banished by Claudius, was in fauour of Agrippina (whom the Emperour had newly married) called home againe, made Pretor at Rome, and appointed schoolemaster and gouernor to Nero. This Seneca was a famous Orator and Philosopher, as it appeares by his workes, highly honoured for his great memorie, and auditor to Sotion the Philosopher: L. Anneus Seneca the tragical Poet was his sonne. Then did also flourish Porcius Latro, a Spaniard, an excellent Orator. Vnder the Emperour Claudius there gouerned Spaine, on this side Ebro, Drusillus Rotundus his Libertine, with the title of Dispenfer, and Vibonius Silio ruled Betica.

In those times, as Buter sayes, S. Saturnin was sent into Spaine, he who was afterwards Bishop of Tolouse, and preached at Pampelone, where in seuen daies he conuerted fortie thousand persons; a great number for that place: among the which was S. Fremin, a citizen of Pampelone.

In the yere 61 of the natiuitie of Christ, Otho (who was Emperour after Galba) was sent by Nero into Lusitania: which prouince hee gouerned tenne yeres modestly, and without oppression of the people; the which was strange, considering the disposition of Spaine.

C In the yere 64 Lucan the Poet, a confederat of Pisos conspiracie, caused his veines to be opened, and died in the 28 yere of his age. His father Mela pressing Nero with great importunitie, for the restitution of his sonnes goods, was accused as guiltie of the same treason, and forced to haue his veines opened, and so die. Seneca was brought to the same death by his disciple Nero, against the promises which he had so often made and sworne, not to giue eare to his accusers, nor to hurt him in any sort: Seeing the blood come slowly out of his veines, he hastened his owne death, with poyson taken in a hot bath, the 114 yere of his age, or according vnto some, the 120. Paulina his chaste wife, and a rare president of loue to her husband, caused her veines to be opened, to follow him: but whether through womanish weaknesse, or that Nero hindered it, she suffered them to be bound vp. L. Iunius Moderatus Columella liued also in those times, the author of the bookes of Husbandrie, borne in Gades.

In the yere 70, which was the last of the life of Nero, Silius Italicus was Consull at Rome, being borne in Italica, a towne in the prouince of Betica, not farre from Scuille: and at that time Cluius Rufus was in Spaine with some commaund. The abominable disposition of Nero made the Spaniards and many other nations to rebell against the Romane Empire, a little before his death; for the suppressing of whom, he sent Sergius Galba: but this old man (who had before time gouerned the prouince of Tarraconese eight yeres) hauing discouered, and that Nero had giuen a secret Commission to kill him, he declared himselfe Emperour, and in stead of a iudge, became head and captaine of the rebellion; whereunto both the prouince and the Romane armie did consent: but his Empire lasted not long, nor of his two successors, Otho and Vitellius: for in lesse than two yeres they lost both their liues and the the Empire; one defeating another, to make place for Vespasian, who came vnto the imperiall seat in the 72 yere of the Natiuitie of our Sauour Christ, and graunted vnto the Spaniards the priuiledges of the Latines, which were, That they might demanda offices, and enjoy some immunities, but not so amply as the citizens of Rome, yet somewhat more than the liberties of other cities of Italie. Otho was the first which joynd Mauritania Tingitania vnto Betica in Spaine, making it of the iurisdiction of Gades. At that time liued Bellila, a Spanish Christian woman. Fabius Quintilian had bene brought vnto the citie of Rome verie young by Sergius Galba: about the 90 yere he erected a schoole at Rome, with a publike pension, and had manie schollers; among the which, they name Iuuenal and the younger Plinie: As for Iuuenal, they doubt whether he were a Spaniard, but Martial without all question was borne, and died at Bilbilis, seated neere vnto the place where as now stands Calataud or Calataub, of the name of Aiuab a Moore, who built it with the ruines of Bilbilis. Canius a Poet, who liued also in that age, was a Gaditane, and Decian of Emerita.

After

The Spaniards
opinion of S.
James bodie.

24.
The death of many learned Spaniards by Nero.

Galba sent to suppress rebels
in Spaine.

25
Anno 72.

Anno 81.
Domitian the second persecutor of the church.

After Vespasian, his children reigned at Rome. Titus in the yeare 81, and two yeares after Domitian, the second scourge of the Church of God, in whose time lived Eugenius, the first bishop of Toledo, Disciple, as they say, to Denis Arcopagita. This Eugenius was slaine at Paris, whither he was come to visit his master. Of the Flavian familie, from whence these emperours were issued, there remained some markes and remembrances in Spaine, by the denomination of many townes, as Flauio Brigo, Flauium Brigantium, Iria Flauia, Flauium Axatanum, Aquæ Flauie in Gallicia, &c.

A diuision of the government of Spaine.

Domitian did prohibit by a new edict, That they should not plant any more vines in Spain, fearing least come should faile them. Vnder these Flavian emperours they number eight Romane Colonies, planted in the prouince of Betica: and foure places for justice, which they termed Colonies, at Gades, Seuille, Astigis, and Cordoua.

Lusitania had five Romane Colonies, one priuiledged citie called Olisippo, and now Lisbon, and three seats of iustice at Emerita, Pax Augusta, and Scalabis. In the rest of Spain which was the quietest government, there were foure Romane Colonies, thirteene priuiledged townes, and seuen courts for justice. At new Carthage, Tarracona, Sarragossa, Clunia, Asturica, Lugo, and Bracara.

Anno 97.
26
Traian a Spaniard the third persecutor of the church.

Cocceius Nerva came vnto the Empire in the yeare 97. a prince who seemed to be called by God, to repaire the confusion which Domitian had caused in the world, vnder whom the Christians had some rest. The Spaniards will haue him to be of their nation, but it appeares not plainly. But he adopted Vlpian Traian a Spaniard without all doubt, borne in the towne of Italica, who through error caused the third persecution of the Church, whereof being admonished by Plinius Secundus, he moderated his edicts. Mancius a citizen of Rome in this tempest suffered death for the confession of the Christian faith at Ebor in Lusitania, vnder the government of Valerianus. By the liberalitie and bountie of Traian, Spaine was enriched with many goodly buildings, among the which is the bridge of Alcantara, vpon the riuer of Tayo, where at this day are to be seene these inscriptions following.

The bridge of Alcantara Traians worke.

Imp. Cesari Diui Nerva F. Traiano Aug. Germ. Dacico. Pontif. Max.
Trib. Potes. VIII. Imp. VI. Cos. V. P. P.

Vnder the Arch is in a Table on the one side,

|                         |                         |
|-------------------------|-------------------------|
| Municipie.              | Interannienfes.         |
| Prouincie.              | Colarni.                |
| Lusitanie stipe conlata | Lancienfes Transcudani. |
| Que opus Pontis per-    | Arani.                  |
| fecerunt.               | Meidubrigenses.         |
| Icedisani.              | Arabrigenses.           |
| Lancienfes Oppidani.    | Banienfes.              |
| Talori.                 | Pafures.                |

There is place for three other such like Tables, which haue beene taken away. Ouer the dore of S. Iulians church, at the end of the bridge, is written that which followeth, in Romane capitall letters.

Imp. Nerva. Traiano Cesari. Augusto. Germanico. Dacico. Sacrum.

Templum in rupe Tagi Superis & Cesare plenum.
Ars ubi materia vincitur ipsa sua.
Quis quali dederis voto fortasse requirer,
Cura viatorum quos noua fama iuuat.
Ingentem vasta Pontem quod mole peregit,
Sacra litaturo fecit honore Lacer.
Qui Pontem fecit Lacer & noua Templa dicauit Illis se solu Vota litant.

Pontem

Pontem perpetui mansurum in secula mundi
Fecit diuina nobilis arte Lacer.
Idem Romuleis Templum cum Cesare Diuis
Constituit felix vtraq; causa Sacri.

C. Iulius Lacer. H. S. F. & dedicauit amico
Curio Lacone Iacitano.

The aqueduct of Segobia, is also held to be Traians worke, where they may easily obserue the stately manner of building of the Romanes. This emperour sent two legions (of fourteene, which were appointed to keepe the prouinces of the empire in awe) into Spaine, to put his edicts in execution, and to rafe all the townes and castles which were situated vpon the mountaines or places of strength: with commaundement to the people, to build in the open country, where the access was easie. Sublancia was ruined by vertue of this decree, and a towne built, which then was called Legio Germanica, or Gemina, according vnto some, but now it is Leon, a royall citie. Vnder Traian Plinie the yonger had charge in Spaine.

Edict to rafe the townes standing in the mountaines

The citie of Leon built.

Anno 118.

Adrian, who was emperour after Traian, in the yeare of our Saviour 118, was also borne in the towne of Italica, in the prouince of Betica, as Eutropius, Orosius, and Ser. Sulpitius doe witnesse. Domitia Paulina his mother, was of Gades. He had some instruction, or good opinion of the Christian religion. Being at Tarracone (where he had called a generall assemblie of all the people of Spaine) he caused (at his owne charge) Augustus temple, which went to ruine, to be repaired. In which towne he was in danger to haue beene slaine by a slaue that was made, who set vpon him with his sword drawne, as he walked without any feare in a garden. This slaue being taken, when as the emperour vnderstood that he was made, he layd nothing, but that they must put him into the Physitians hands. Having subdued the Iewes which were rebelled in Palestina, he sent a great number in exile into Spaine, so as from that time this sect was seled there, & had their Synagogues, vntil the raigne of Dom Fernando and D. Isabella, in the time of our forefathers. Spaine was then diuided into six governments, two ruled by vice-Consuls appointed by the Senat, which were Betica and Lusitania; and foure by the emperors lieutenants, which were the prouinces of Carthage, Tarracone, Gallicia, and Mauritania Tingitana, where the strait is.

A generous act of Adrian.

Adrian peoples Spaine with Iewes.

27

28 After the decease of Adrian, there succeeded in the empire, in the yeare 139, T. Aurelius Fuluius Antonius Pius, whom the Spaniards hold to be of their nation. As for his successor M. Aelius Aurelius, coming to the empire in the yeare 162, he was without doubt of a Spaniard race; for his predecessors were of the towne of Succubite in Betica. Hee was the first, who was the fourth persecutor in the Christian Church. In the time of M. Aurelius, the Moores inuaded Spaine, and did infinit harme: whom notwithstanding hee repulld by his lieutenants, namely by Seuerus, who afterwards was emperour. This prince was wise, vertuous, and courteous: but as he was indowed with all good qualities, so his sonne Commodus, who reigned after him in the yeare 181, was detestable and vicious. He was the first of the Romane princes, which through couetousnesse sold offices for money. Vespasian had done it before him, but through necessitie, finding the commonweale charged with debts, and the treasure exhausted. Vnder Commodus were slaine in Gallicia, Facundus and Primitius, holy Christian souldiours, vpon the banks of the riuer Cea, by Atticus the gouernor. After him, about the yeare 194, Rome lost two emperours in lesse than a yeare, Perinax and Didus Iulian, so as in the yeare 195, L. Septimius Seuerus, a great personage, borne in Africke, he who had gouerned Spaine in the time of M. Aurelius, tooke the government of the empire. Vnder him was the fifth persecution of the Church, especially in Spaine, whereas Cornelius was gouernor, who put Felix a priest, Fortunatus, and Archilochus to death at Valence, for that they had preached the Gospell.

Anno 139.

29

L. Commodus Verus, a persecutor of the Church.

Anno 181.

Anno 195.

The fifth persecution vnder

Vnder his sonne Caracalla, Opilius Macrinus, Heliogabalus, and Alexander Seuerus, who reigned from the yeare two hundred and thirteene, vnto two hundred thirtie and eight, the Spaniard historie doth not furnish any thing memorable, although those times did not passe without great exploits, whereof there remaine some obscure markes among the stones and medailles

M

dailles

dailles. At Gades there is the basis of the image of Mamma, mother to Alexander Severus, where this inscription is to be seene.

Julia Mammea. Aug. Matri. Imp. Cesaris.
M. Aurelij Seweri. Alexandri Pij. F. Aug.
M. Castrorum. Col. Jul. Gem. Accitana.
Deuot. Numini. M. Q. Eius.

But Maximin being come to the empire, the first persecution began of the Christians, in the which Maximus and many other faithfull were slaine, neere vnto Tarracone. After Maximin vnto Decius, the empire of Rome was in great combustion, by reason of the ordinary murders of such as did affect the foueraigntie, for the space of fifteen yeres; in the which there perished by a violent death, Maximin Balbinus, Puennus Gordian, and Philip: during which time we find not any thing of Spaine worth the writing, but that about the yeare 241, Antherus bishop of Rome did write vnto the bishops of the prouinces of Betica and Toledo, admonishing them among other things to be graue and constant, and not to flee from church to church, if necessitie and the publique good did not presse them: whereby it wil appear by this history, that their successors had small regard vnto this aduertisement, but haue rather sought their priuat commoditie. Many other epistles of holy men are found written to the bishops of Spaine, and to their churches, & among others an epistle decretall of S. Ciprian and other bishops assembled at the Councell of Africk, by the which Basilides and Martiall, Idolaters and infected with many vices, were declared vnworthie of all Episcopall dignities: and it seemes that the one was bishop of Legio Gemina, and the other of Emerita. Whilest that Decius gouerned the empire (vnder whom began the 7 persecution of the Church) the first Councell of Spaine was held at Toledo, whereas Xyste a Grecian was present, who soone after was bishop of Rome: yet there is no mention made of this Councell but by Spaniards. The Spanishe histories write nothing of his time, nor of Gallus Volusianus, nor Emilianus, which succeeded him. As for Valerian, who came to the empire in the yeare 256, he was verie cruel against the Christians, and his persecution is accounted the eight. Vnder him and Decius, S. Laurence borne at Osca in Catelogia, was martyred, whom Xyste, who (as we haue said) was come to the Councell of Toledo, had led with him to Rome, passing by Sarragossa, whereas this holy man spent his time in studie. Vnder the same Valerian, by the commandement of Emilian, the gouernor, there were also put to death for the faith of Christ, Fruictuosus bishop of Tarracone, with Augurinus and Eulogia, two deacons, of whom Prudentius, a Christian Poet, did write hymnes. Parmenius was also put to death at Cordoua. Valerian author of these wicked persecutions, did soone after receiue a worthy reward for his impietie: for he was taken by Sapor king of Persia, and kept all his life time ignominiously in chains, the which it seemes did moue Galien his son and companion, to leaue the Churches in quiet, although he were the most corrupted prince vpon the earth; whose basenesse caused many tyrants to vsurpe the title of Soueraigne, in diuers prouinces of the empire, and encouraged barbarous nations to inuade them: for in his time Spaine was full of great troupes of Getmans, Saxons, and French, vnder the conduct of Anthaire and Lothaire, princes, who ruined Tarracone, and spoyled the country, almost for the space of 12 yeres. To the former martyres we will adde Narcissus, who came to Girone to preach the Gospell.

30 After Galien, Claudius was emperor, vpon whom Tetricus vsurped Spaine and Gaule, being the chiefe strength and sinewes of the empire. During the raigne of Aurelian (vnder whom was the ninth persecution of the Church) and of Tacitus and Florian, which were from the yeare 273, vnto 280, there is no mention made of Spaine. But Probus gaue leaue to the Spaniards and Gaules, to plant vines: for good husbands held it not profitable for the commonweale, that the land should be too much imployed to this kind of plant: but Probus was much affected to it, and therefore he caused the mountaines of Almus and Aureus in Hungarie and Myfia, to be planted at his owne charge. In his time the Spaniards did mutine, but Saturinus did pacifie them. One called Bonofius, borne and bred in Spaine, whose father was a Britan, and his mother a Gauloise, a great drinker, caused himselfe to be proclaimed emperor in Germanie, and with one Proculus would haue seized vpon Spaine, Gaule, and other prouin-

Anno 241.

Basilides and Martiall condemned by the Councell of Africk.
The seventh persecution.

Anno 256.
The eighth persecution vnder Valerian.

Saxons and French inuade Spaine.

The ninth persecution vnder Aurelian.

31

provinces: but they were defeated by Probus. The short empire of Carus Numerianus and Carrinus, make no mention of any thing that belongs to Spaine. Dioclesianus Ionius, who succeeded them in the yeare 288, & Maximianus Herculeus, made companion of the same dignity the yeare after, haue left (by their great crueltie against the faithfull) an infamous memory of them, in Spain, & throughout all the world. They made an edict in the yeare 306, That all the Christians temples should be beaten downe, and all those that confessed Iesus Christ, tormented and massacred. This was the 10 & the cruelliest persecution of the Church of God: for during the space of 10 yeres, there was nothing to be seene but burning of temples, running away of poore innocents, murders, and executions of martyres, wherof Spaine (it may be) did furnish as many as any nation in the world, to their great commendation. The names of these constant witnesses of the truth of Christ, should not be suppressed. In Sarragossa there were 18 at one time, of whom the Christian Poet Prudentius made a goodly hymne. These were Optatus, Succensus, Urbanus, Pubius, Felix, Euentius, Luperus, Martialis, Julius, Fronto, Cecilianus, Primitius, Quintilianus, Apodemius, and foure Saturines. Encratia a noble virgine, daughter to a great nobleman of Lusitania, betrothed to a duke or gouernour of Gaule Narbonoise, did there also end this fugitiue life. Dacian was then Gouernour of Spaine, and a diligent minister of these impieties; who residing at Sarragossa, and seeing the constancie of the Christians to surpass his inhumanitie, he caused a proclamation to be made by the sound of the trumpet, that all those that were Christians should depart the towne, and haue leaue to retire where they pleased. The faithfull being joyfull hereof, went forth in great troupes, thanking God for this libertie, thinking they would suffer them to depart: but they were not gone farre from the gates, before they were compassed in by armed souldiours, and cut in peeces. The multitude of those that were thus villanously murdered, was verie great, and therefore in those dayes the Christians by a certaine humane affection, more than for any religion, made account of the ashes, bones, and all things which did belong vnto those holy martyres, and did reuerence the places where they had frequented, or were buried: not for any superstition, but to incite the liuing to imitate their pietie. This cruell Gouernour hauing committed this horrible massacre, sought also to depriue the faithfull seruants (if any remained in the country) of all comfort: Wherefore hauing gathered all their bodies together, and murdered vpon them all the offenders, which were committed for any crimes, he burnt them all together, that the ashes (being thus mingled) should not be gathered vp by the Christians: whereupon the bruit was, That God (meaning to giue a testimonie of the innocencie of his people) made the ashes of the faithfull to appeare verie white among the rest, the which, with a small shewer which fell, were gathered together in white heapes: wherof those which haue come after, being moued with another zeale than the Christians of those times, haue made their profit. Lambert seruing a country man, was also beheaded, for that he would not renounce Iesus Christ. The bruit was, That hauing taken his head in his hands, he went two good leagues, vntill he came vnto the place where the bodies of the martyres aboue mentioned lay, and that there he began to sing, Exultabunt sancti in gloria, and that they answered, Et letabuntur in cubilibus suis; and then he fell vpon them: the which I will not call into question, considering the end of myrales. There were many others put to death in Spaine, for the profession of the Gospell, during the gouernment of Dacian, whose names for breuities sake I omit, being not much pertinent to a historie. Dacian, a bloudie instrument of these cruelties, was during these executions slaine with fire from heauen. The like persecutions were in the other prouinces of the empire.

At this time liued Prudentius, borne in the prouince of Cantabria, of the country which is now called Alaba: he was bishop of Tarracone, and not the Poet aboue mentioned. There is a decretall epistle extant of Melchisedech bishop of Rome, who liued in those times, vnto the bishops of Spaine, touching the Primacie of the Romane Sea: but it fauours not of the Latine stile of that age, no more than those of Marcelin, Marcellus, Eusebius, Syluester, Marc, Iulius, Liberius, Damasus, and Syriscus: which must bee read with judgement. As for the politique Arres of Dioclesian and Maximian, although they were great, and worthie of memorie, yet the histories of Spaine make no mention of them. They receiued into their companie to gouerne the empire, Maximus Galerius, and Constantius Chlorus: the last in a good time tooke vpon him the gouernment of Spaine and Gaule, who dying

M ij

Anno 288.

Anno 306.

Edict to ruine the Christian churches.
The tenth persecution.

Martyres at Sarragossa.

From a humane affliction of the ancient Christians, grown the superstition, which in the end is become impiety.

The wicked end of Dacian the persecutor.

in England, left the dignitie of Cesar to Constantine his sonne, who leamed the first principles of religion, of a certaine Spaniard, as some write. Galerius adopted Seuerus, and Maximian the young. At the same time Dioclesian and Maximian resigned the imperiall dignitie at Milan: but Maximian repenting himselfe, as he did strive to resume his authoritie at Rome, being rejected by his sonne Maxence and the Pretorian souldiours, he fled towards his son in law Constantine, against whom he practised treason, and was slaine at Marfeilles. Dioclesian a strange monster, who caused himselfe to be called, Brother to the Sunne and Moone, and to bee worshipped, lived long a priuat life: but God shewed a testimonie of his wrath vpon him in the end of his dayes; for he died madde, eaten with vermine, and so infected and stinking, as none could endure to come neere him, howling (as Nicephorus writes) like a dog. Galerius slew himselfe, as cruell as a butcher; for so he had beene from his youth. Seuerus was slaine by the faction of Maxence, whom the Pretorians had created Cesar. Maximian the younger died eaten with wormes, having beene vanquished neere vnto Tharfe, by Licinius, whom Constantine had sent against him. Maxence, a cruel tyrant, and therefore hated of the Romans, as he thought to make head against Constantine, was defeated in battel neere vnto Rome, and drowned himself in the riuer of Tiber: all cruell and bloudie princes, enemies to the Church of God, remarkable for such as persecute it. After these, Licinius and Constantine held the empire, the one in the East, the other in the West. But Licinius who had married Constantines sister, a cruell and barbarous man, an enemy to Christians and all learning, tearing them a plague to the commonweale, having no good thing in him, but that he persecuted the courtians, whom he feared, fought to breake the order made betwixt him and Constantine: wherefore after that he had bene suppressed aboue once, and reconciled to his brother in law, by the meanes of his wife Constance, he was slaine by his commaundement at Thessalonica; so as Constantine called the Great, remained sole emperor, who gaue peace vnto the Churches, much desired, and (if they could haue vsed it to the aduancement thereof) most happie. This prince did great honour vnto the Christians, imbraced the true religion, endowed the churches with rents and riches, caused the Gentiles temples to be beaten downe in many places, assembled by his imperiall authoritie the Councell of Nice in Bithinia, in the year 326, or 328, where there met 318 bishops of diuers countries; among the which was Osius bishop of Cordoua, who was also at the Councell of Gangre, celebrated the same year. That of Nice is held the first generall Councell, where the impietie of the Arrians was condemned, the which notwithstanding did afterwards infect many nations. That Constantine made a donation of the cite of Rome, of Italie, and of all the Westerne empire, vnto Siluester then bishop of Rome, or that he had declared him head and primat ouer other bishops, and granted vnto him and his successors, other things contened in that which is called Constantines donation, besides, that Pope Pius the second doth jeast at it, there is no receivable testimonie thereof, nor any probable conjecture: besides, the histories of following emperors, do argue the contrarie, euen they of the West. In the time of this emperor the Northerne nations invaded Spaine, and spoiled that part of the countrey which lies neere the Ocean, from Galicia vnto the strait: whither he led a great army, chased away the enemies, & restored the Spaniards (which were fled into mountaynes) vnto their houses, and settled an order in the province, as well for that which concerned the temporalitie, as the churches. There was a provinciall Councell held by his commaundement at Illiberis, at the foot of the Pyrennees, some call it Eliberis, a towne in the marches of Grenado: whither came Helena the mother of Constantine, with Constantine his eldest sonne, to whom he had assigned the Gauls and Spaine, for his portion. In this Councell Spaine was diuided into fise provinces; that is, that of Tarracone, Carthage, Betica, Lusitania, and Galicia, in either of the which there was a Metropolitan appointed at Tarracone, new Carthage (to whom Toledo hath since succeeded) at Seuille, at Merida, and at Bracara. Some hold, that this Councell was more anient than that of Nice, among which Beuter affumes, That Constantine bishop of Cordoua, Osius predecessor, was there present: others say, that it was Osius himselfe, & Quintian bishop of Ebora. Some beleue that the emperor Constantine was not baptized vntil he drew neer his death, being deceived by the error of some, which beleued that the circumstance of places gaue more authority to baptisme: for he had a great desire to be baptized in Iordan. Many thought, that in the end of his daies he fel into the heresie of the Arrians, for that he had banisht Athanasius by the persuation of the Arrians, & that his sister Constance liuing

The miserable
end of tyrants.

Licinius an enemy to learning.

33 Constantine a good prince.

Anno 326.

Nice the first general Councell

A false donation ascribed vnto Constantine.

Illiberis where Cathartes was built.

Spaine vnder
Constantine diuided into fise provinces.

A liuing with him was an Arrian: but it is most certaine, that before his death he commaunded that Athanasius should be called home againe, and that he did not beleue the confession of faith, nor the exposition made by Arrius, after that he had called him from banishment, but sent it to the Councell of Ierusalem, there to be examined. Of Constantines deeds in Spaine there are many medailles found in that countrey, and elsewhere, in our time, that beare witness. After him there raigned in the West Constantine and Constans, his sonnes, the East remaining to Constantius their brother. To Constantine was assigned Spaine, Gaule, and the islands of Britaine, or that which the Romanes held there. But Constantine being a proud and turbulent prince, he would make warre against his brother Constans, and take Italie from him: in which enterprise he was slaine neere vnto Aquilea, in the 25 yeare of his age: wherefore all the prouinces of his portion fell vnto Constans: in whose time the Poet Aurelius Prudentius Clement was borne at Sarragossa, or rather at Calaoorra: Pacian bishop of Barcellona flourished in doctrine and good life.

Constantine the young had Spaine
and other prouinces for his portion.

The repeale of Arrius, granted by Constantine the great, had caused greater troubles in the Church than before: for being returned into Alexandria, he had confirmed his doctrine, and drawne many bishops vnto him; yea the emperor Constantius, who held the empire in the East, was infected with this error, and did persecute the faithfull beleueers: so as Athanasius being banished againe by him, and Paul of Constantinople, who retired to Constans his brother, they wrought so, as by the consent of the two brethren princes, a generall Councell was called at Sardica, a towne in Illiria; whither came two hundred and fiftie bishops, among the which was Osius bishop of Cordoua, who was then verie old, Anianus of Castulo, Cosius of Sarragossa, Domitian of Augusta (that is to say, Bracar) Florentine of Emerita, and Pretextatus bishop of Barcellona. There the confession of the faith, or Symbole of the Councell of Nice, was confirmed: But at the same time by reason of the bad agreement which was betwixt the two brethren Constans and Constantius, there was another assemblie of the Easterne bishops at Philipopolis in Thracia, who agreed not with any that held with Athanasius and Paul. And after that there was another held at Syrmium in Hungarie (whither Constantius went in person) and others elsewhere. The Councell of Sardica being ended, Constans entreated his brother Constantius, to restore Athanasius: the which he did, partly for loue, and partly for feare of warre: But Constans being dead, Athanasius was forced to saue himselfe by flight, being accused to haue perswaded Constans to make warre against his brother for his sake: and then the Arrian bishops began to persecute them that made profession of Athanasius his doctrine, more cruelly than the Dioclesians or Maximians. The Councell of Syrmium, contrarie to that of Nice, was held in the yeare three hundred and threescore, or three hundred fiftie and six, according vnto some, whereas many wicked decrees were made and maintained, especially by Photinus, bishop of that place, who rebuied the blasphemies of Samoſatenus, denying the two natures in Iesus Christ, borne of the virgine Marie.

The Councell of Sardica.

Councell of Syrmium.

Arrians persecute the faithfull
Anno 360.

This Councell, to suppress all controuersies, would disguise the tearmes and manner of speaking, received in the Church; and in stead of saying, That Iesus Christ was coessentiall with the Father, or of the same essence, they propounded the tearme of Like in essence: Which two words in the Greeke tongue, doe somewhat symbolize, homoiousios, and homoiousios. By this disguising, vnder which the poyson lay hidden, the good old man Osius the Spaniard, hauing constantly maintained the truth all his life time, suffered himselfe to be deceived and wooon: whether that his great age had dulled his vnderstanding, or that he did it for feare of the emperor, who examined him vpon that point, and threatned him in the towne of Rimini, where hee had againe assembled many bishops, causing him to commit this error; saying, That both the one and the other said well. But the Orthodoxes did soone after reject that word of homoiousios, as captious and deceitfull. Osius, as Isidore writes, dyed soone after in his impietie, stricken with the hand of God, in his bishoprick: and that being brought to Cordoua, Gregorie bishop of Illiberis, according to the Edict made by Constantius the emperor, against the Christians, to force them to the Arrians opinion, he refusing to yeeld vnto it, Osius prest Clementine Gouverneur of the province, to banish him: but he answered, That he could not banish a bishop before he was deposed from his bishopricke, and judged incapable. Whereupon Osius richly attyred like a king, meaning to giue sentence against Gregorie, who

The error of Osius.

The magistrat
did not meddle with clergie
men, before they were degraded.

*Ofius stricken with the hand
of God.*

Anno 369.

The Gothes invaded the Ro-mane empire.

The impietie of Valens.

Anno 385.

Anno 368.

Priscilian the heretic beheaded at Treves.

*Bishops excommunicated for
that they made themselves criminal parties against an here-ticke.*

lay prostrate vpon the earth, praying vnto God, that he would maintaine the glorie of his name, and his truth, against all Apostats: the which he demaunded earnestly, not to saue his life, the which he was readie to loose a thousand times for the confession of the faith, but to the end the simple should not be abused with the deceits of the Apostat Ofius. Whereupon it happened, that as Ofius was readie to pronounce sentence against Gregorie, he sunke downe to the ground, hauing his mouth and necke drawne on the one side, and so dyed. The Gouernor amazed at this strange accident, kneeling downe, asked Gregorie forgiuenesse, confessing his ignorance, and excusing it vpon the commaundement of the emperour his prince. These things are written by Isidorus: but S. Augustine giues a better testimonie of Ofius, writing against Parmenian.

In the yeare of our redemption 369, there came vnto the bishopricke of Rome, which was not yet soueraigne, Damasus a Spaniard, borne at Vimaranes, a place in Portugall, betwixt Minio and Duero, three leagues from Braga: he succeeded Felix, who was an Arrian, and therefore not numbred in the catalogue of the Bishops of Rome; for that they would make this see without all blemish. Among his other qualities, they say, he was a good Poet: Saint Ierome was his Secretarie. During the time of Constantines children, Iuuenius, a Spaniard, priest, and Poet, liued. Constantius the emperour was already dead, with Julian and Iouinian his successours, of whom Spaine hath nothing to speake. And then did Valentinian raigne in the West, and Valens in the East. Vnder Valens the Gothes chased by the Dacians, invaded the Romane empire, whereas at the first they were receiued in peace: but the couetousnesse and wickednesse of Gouernours made them take armes, so as there grew a sharp warre, in the which the emperour Valens himselfe was slaine. This nation did erect a kingdome in Spaine, whose race, according to the common opinion, hath continued vnto this day. The emperour Valens was addicted to the Arrian heresie, to Negromancie, and other impieties. We read, that being carefull who should succeed him in the empire, he was deceived by the enemie of mankind, a murtherer from the beginning, who shewed him the letters of E. E. O. A. and perswaded him, that his name that should hold the empire after him, should begin with them: Whereof the emperour growing jealous, he caused all the Theodores, Theodoses, Theophiles, and others, whose names were compounded of Theos, to be slaine. But Theodosius, who succeeded him, a Spaniard borne, fell not into his hands. Hee was adopted by Gratian in the yeare three hundred fourescore and two, or fourescore and three, according vnto some, and raigned after him in the East, Valentinian the second brother to Gratian holding the Westerne empire. His father was called Theodosius, and his mother Thermantia, and descended from the race of Traian. During his empire, there came out of Italie into Spaine, Paulin the Poet, a great friend to Ausonius, who became a monke, and liued a solitarie life. At the same time Priscilian bishop of Auila, published his heresie, mingled with the impieties of the Manicheans and Gnostiques, the which was condemned in a Counsell held at Bourdeaux, some time after. He was a sectarie to one Marke, a Disciple to Basilides, who during the empire of the Antonines had brought this heresie into Spaine, where it was receiued and fauoured by a great ladie called Agape, and drew to his opinions Helpidius a Rhetorician; so as this mischief lay smothered for a time, vntill that Priscilian did publish it: a man issued from a noble familie in Gallicia, eloquent and subtile. The fourth yeare of Theodosius empire, which was in the yeare three hundred fourescore and six, or fourescore and seuen, there died at Constantinople in Theodosius his court, Athanaric king of the Gothes, who was become a friend and allie to the Romanes. Isidorus affirms, That the yeare following the Gothes, being impatient of the Romane yoke, did chuse Alaric for their king. Others hold, that it was 14 yeares after, whereof we will intreat at large in the next booke.

In the yeare 388 Priscilian hauing beene condemned in the Counfel of Bourdeaux, he retired to Treues, to a tyrant called Maximin, some call him Clemens Maximus: who hauing caused Enodius his constable to heare him, he cut off his head, and of other his sectaries, among the which was Matronianus a Spaniard, an excellent Poet. Ithacius and Visatius, Bishops, were accusers, and parties against Priscilian, by reason whereof they were excommunicated and banished. Sigebert saith, That it was taken ill, when as by the accusation of any man a Bishop was put to death. For one hereticke, author of a sect in Spaine, there liued in those times many religious and learned men; as Lucimus, Betinus, Abigaus, Abundus, Auitus,

Auitus, Olympus, Audentius, Vigilantius, who although he were a Gaule, yet he did reside at Barcelona; against whom S. Ierome did write very vehemently, for that hee did condemne the superstitious honour done vnto the reliques. Theodosius hauing in the yeare 387 made his sonne Arcadius, Cæsar; tenne yeares after he aduanced Honorius his other sonne to the same dignitie, who after his decesse were Emperours, Arcadius in the East, and Honorius in the West, by the death of Valentinian the second, and of Eugenius the tyrant: these two princes were borne in Spaine, as the Poet Claudian writes. In their time the Gothes began to disperse themselves ouer the West, where they committed infinit spoyles, vntill in the end they sedled themselves in Gaule, Spaine, and lastly in Italie, blemishing the name and maiestie of the Emperours in these rich Prouinces.

THE FIFTH BOOKE OF the Historie of Spaine.

The Contents.

- D 1 The beginning of the Gothes, and their adventures in Hungarie, Media, and Thrace.
2 Their Religion.
3 Their warres against the Emperours of the East.
4 Descent of the Gothes into Italie vnder Alaric.
5 Arthaulphe who first erected the Gothes kingdome in Gaule, and invaded Spaine.
6 First Councell of Toledo, and the estate of religion then in Spaine.
7 Vallia the first king of the Gothes, which erected a kingdome in Spaine.
8 Reigne of the Suenes in Gallicia.
9 Reigne of Theodoric the second king of Gothes in Spaine.
10 Torismond the third king of Gothes.
E 11 Theodoric the second of that name, and fourth king of Gothes.
12 Henry the fifth king.
13 Alaric the second of that name, sixth king.
14 Gensalaric the seuenth king, his cruelties and death.
15 Amalaric the eighth king, and vnder him the second Councell of Toledo.
16 Councils at Tarracone, Girone, Sarragosse, Ilerda, and Valencia.
17 The second Councell of Toledo.
18 Discourse vpon the vncertainetie of the histories of Spaine, touching the reigne of Amalaric, and deeds of Theodoric king of Italie, whom the Spaniards make his grandfather by the mothers side.
19 Theude the ninth king of the Gothes in Spaine.
F 20 Theodiscle the tenth king of the Gothes in Spaine.
21 Agila the eleuenth king.
22 Athanagilde the twelfth king.
23 Luiba the thirteenth king.
24 Leonigilde the fourteenth king, and his deeds.
25 End of the reigne of the Suenes in Gallicia.

*Ofus stricken with the hand
of God, yeth.*

Anno 369.

The Gothes in-uaded the Roman empire.

The impietie of Valens.

Anno 383.

Anno 368.

Priscilian the hereticke beheaded at Treues.

*Bishops excommunicated for
that they made themselues crea-tured partiers against an hereticke.*

lay prostrate vpon the earth, praying vnto God, that he would maintaine the glorie of his name, and his truth, against all Apostats: the which he demaunded earnestly, not to saue his life, the which he was readie to loose a thousand times for the confession of the faith, but to the end the simple should not be abused with the deceits of the Apostat Ofus. Whereupon it happened, that as Ofus was readie to pronounce sentence against Gregorie, he sunke downe to the ground, hauing his mouth and necke drawne on the one side, and so dyed. The Gouernor amazed at this strange accident, kneeling downe, asked Gregorie forgiuenesse, confessing his ignorance, and excusing it vpon the commaundement of the emperour his prince. These things are written by Isidorus: but S. Augustine giues a better testimonie of Ofus, writing against Parmenian.

In the yeare of our redemption 369, there came vnto the bishopricke of Rome, which was not yet soueraigne, Damasus a Spaniard, borne at Vimaranes, a place in Portugall, betwixt Minio and Duero, three leagues from Braga: he succeeded Felix, who was an Arrian, and therefore not numbred in the catalogue of the Bishops of Rome; for that they would make this sea without all blemish. Among his other qualities, they say, he was a good Poet: Saint Ierome was his Secretarie. During the time of Constantines children, Iuuenius, a Spanish priest, and Poet, liued. Constantius the emperour was already dead, with Julian and Iouinian his successours, of whom Spaine hath nothing to speake. And then did Valensinian raigne in the West, and Valens in the East. Vnder Valens the Gothes chased by the Dacians, inuaded the Romane empire, whereas at the first they were receiued in peace: but the couetousnesse and wickednesse of Gouernours made them take armes, so as there grew a sharp warre, in the which the emperour Valens himselfe was slaine. This nation did erect a kingdome in Spaine, whose race, according to the common opinion, hath continued vnto this day. The emperour Valens was addicted to the Arrian heresie, to Negromancie, and other impieties. We read, that being carefull who should succeed him in the empire, he was deceived by the enemye of mankind, a murdurer from the beginning, who shewed him the letters of E. O. A. and perswaded him, that his name that should hold the empire after him, should begin with them: Whereof the emperour growing jealous, he cauled all the Theodores, Theodofes, Theophiles, and others, whose names were compounded of Theos, to be slaine. But Theodofius, who succeeded him, a Spaniard borne, fell not into his hands. Hee was adopted by Gratian in the yeare three hundred fourescore and two, or fourescore and three, according vnto some, and raigned after him in the East, Valentinian the second brother to Gratian holding the Westerne empire. His father was called Theodosius, and his mother Thermantia, and descended from the race of Traian. During his empire, there came out of Italie into Spaine, Paulin the Poet, a great friend to Ausonius, who became a monke, and liued a solitarie life. At the same time Priscilian bishop of Auila, published his heresie, mingled with the impieties of the Manicheans and Gnostiques, the which was condemned in a Counsell held at Bourdeaux, some time after. He was a sectarie to one Marke, a Disciple to Basilides, who during the empire of the Antonines had brought this heresie into Spaine, where it was receiued and fauoured by a great ladie called Agape, and drew to his opinions Helpidius a Rhetorician; so as this mischief lay smothered for a time, vntill that Priscilian did publish it: a man issued from a noble familie in Gallicia, eloquent and subtile. The fourth yeare of Theodosius empire, which was in the yeare three hundred fourescore and six, or fourescore and seuen, there died at Constantinople in Theodosius his court, Athanaric king of the Gothes, who was become a friend and allie to the Romanes. Isidorus affirmer, That the yeare following the Gothes, being impatient of the Romane yoke, did chuse Alaric for their king. Others hold, that it was 14 yeares after, whereof we will intreat at large in the next booke.

In the yeare 388 Priscilian hauing beene condemned in the Counsell of Bourdeaux, he retired to Treues, to a tyrant called Maximin, some call him Clemens Maximus: who hauing caused Euodius his confitable to heare him, he cut off his head, and of other his sectaries, among the which was Matronianus a Spaniard, an excellent Poet. Ithacius and Prifatius, Bishops, were accusers, and parties against Priscilian, by reason whereof they were excommunicated and banished. Sigebert saith, That it was taken ill, when as by the accusation of a fanny man a Bishop was put to death. For one hereticke, author of a sect in Spaine, there liued in those times many religious and learned men; as Lucimus, Beticus, Abigaus, Abundius, Auitus,

Auitus, Olympus, Audentius, Vigilantius, who although he were a Gaule, yet he did reside at Barcelona; against whom S. Ierome did write very vehemently, for that hee did condemne the superfluous honour done vnto the reliques. Theodosius hauing in the yeare 387 made his sonne Arcadius, Cæsar; tenne yeares after he aduanced Honorius his other sonne to the same dignitie, who after his decease were Emperours, Arcadius in the East, and Honorius in the West, by the death of Valentinian the second, and of Eugenius the tyrant: these two princes were borne in Spaine, as the Poet Claudian writes. In their time the Gothes began to disperse themselves ouer the West, where they committed infinit spoyles, vntill in the end they settled themselves in Gaule, Spaine, and lastly in Italie, blemishing the name and maiestie of the Emperours in these rich Prouinces.

THE FIFTH BOOKE OF the Historie of Spaine.

The Contents.

- D 1 The beginning of the Gothes, and their aduentures in Hungarie, Mesia, and Thrace.
- 2 Their Religion.
- 3 Their warres against the Emperours of the East.
- 4 Descent of the Gothes into Italie vnder Alaric.
- 5 Athaulphe who first erected the Gothes kingdome in Gaule, and inuaded Spaine.
- 6 First Councell of Toledo, and the estate of religion then in Spaine.
- 7 Vallia the first king of the Gothes, which erected a kingdome in Spaine.
- 8 Reigne of the Suenes in Gallicia.
- 9 Reigne of Theodoric the second king of Gothes in Spaine.
- 10 Torismond the third king of Gothes.
- E 11 Theodoric the second of that name, and fourth king of Gothes.
- 12 Henry the fifth king.
- 13 Alaric the second of that name, sixth king.
- 14 Gensalaric the seuenth king, his cruelties and death.
- 15 Amalaric the eight king, and vnder him the second Councell of Toledo.
- 16 Councils at Tarracone, Girone, Sarraçosse, Ilerda, and Valencia.
- 17 The second Councell of Toledo.
- 18 Discourse vpon the vncertainetie of the histories of Spaine, touching the reigne of Amalaric, and deeds of Theodoric king of Italie, whom the Spaniards make his grandfather by the mothers side.
- 19 Theude the ninth king of the Gothes in Spaine.
- F 20 Theodisic the tenth king of the Gothes in Spaine.
- 21 Agila the eleuenth king.
- 22 Athanagilde the twelfth king.
- 23 Luiba the thirteenth king.
- 24 Leonigilde the foureteenth king, and his deeds.
- 25 End of the reigne of the Suenes in Gallicia.

- 26 Ricared the fifteenth king: abiuration of the Arrian heresie at the third Councell of Toledo: re-formation of the Gothicke lawes.
- 27 Luiba the second of that name, sixteenth king, cruell, his death.
- 28 Vuiteric the seventeenth king, a tyrant.
- 29 Gundamyrt the eighteenth king.
- 30 Sizebut the nineteenth king.
- 31 Suintilla the twentieth king, deposed for his vices.
- 32 Sizemant the one and twentieth king: the fourth Councell of Toledo.
- 33 Cinthilla the two and twentieth king: and the fifth and sixth Councils of Toledo.
- 34 Tulba the three and twentieth king.
- 35 Cindasunthe the foure and twentieth king, under whom was the seuenth Councell of Toledo.
- 36 Reccefinthe the five and twentieth king: and the ninth and tenth Councils of Toledo.
- 37 Bamba the six and twentieth king: rebellion of Paule and others in Gothike Gaule, and their punishment.
- 38 The eleuenth Councell of Toledo under him, and some decrees.
- 39 Eringe the seuen and twentieth king, and under him the twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth Councils of Toledo.
- 40 Egica the eight and twentieth king, under whom were the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seuenteenth Councils of Toledo.
- 41 Vitiza the nine and twentieth king, cruell and infamous: the eighteenth Councell at Toledo.
- 42 Roderic the thirtieth and last king of Gothes in Spaine, his vices: invasion of Spaine by the Moores and Arabians, and the end of the Gothes reigne.
- 43 A Catalogue of the auncient Bishops of Spaine.

BEing to treat of the Gothes kingdome in Spaine, it is fit to know from what region they are come, and by what accidents they first seated themselves in Spaine, Honorius sonne to Theodosius the Great then reigning in the West.

In the Gothes are issued from the Getes, and their first beginning was in Asia: they passed into Europe long before, and did first seize vpon the higher country of Thrace and Mysia, which is at this day Bulgaria, Bosnia, Rascia, Seruia, and, it may be, a part of Hungarie; and in the end they came to either banke of the riuer of Danube: and then by degrees peopling all that lyes betwixt that riuer and the Northerne shore of the Baltike sea, they did in the end hold all that continent, which extends it selfe in manner of an island in the bosome thereof, with all the neighbour islands. They were famous for a long time in Dacia, in those regions which wee now call Valachia, Transylvania, and Moldavia, where they were called Getes and Gepides. In the times of Alexander the Great there were certaine encounters betwixt the Grecians and the Gothes, not farre from the island of Peuce, aboue Constantinople, at the mouths of Danube, or Ister, as they called it in that place. Syrmius reigned ouer that nation at that time. We read also, That Isimachus, one of Alexanders successors, was vanquished in battaile, and taken by a king of the Gothes, whom hee afterwards set freely at libertie, and married his daughter. After which, in tract of time other nations being mingled with them, those which did inhabit the great Peninsule, which the auncients called Scandia and Scandinavia (yet little knowne to them) retained the name of Gothes and the language; the which, as some affirme, was like vnto that of the Celtes: others hold, That it was the Teuton or Dutch tongue: which languages being corrupted, differ much at this day from those times, when they were in their greatest puritie. From these Northerne regions, which containe at this day the realmes of Sweethland and Denmarke, often and vpon diuers occasions there came great troupes of people, who tooke possession againe of the countries joyning to the Venetique or Baltike sea, and of the islands thereof, chasing away the inhabitants; and aduancing into the maine land, they did repofesse Dacia and Mysia, and ouerrun the higher Thrace, vnder Fithmer, sonne to Gandaric, who was the fift king after this returne. In these countries they planted their bounds vpon the Danube, and there reigned some ages: they did encrease their fame with great victories, and did giue their name to many nations whom they subiected. They invaded the Ro-

mane

The Gothes
come out of Asia into Europe.

Gotes, Getes, & Gepides, all one nation.

The Gothif
language.

A mane Empire in the time of Decius, vnder the conduct of their king Gius, and did vanquish the Romanes in a great battaile, whereas Decius and his sonne were slaine: after which, by many victories they made themselves fearefull to the Romans, so as the Emperours were often glad to haue them for friends and companions in arms; and by the vertue and valor of their troupes, which they entertained, did often execute great matters.

About the time of Valentinian and Valens, Hermanaric reigned ouer the Gothes, who vanquished many nations: who notwithstanding yielded to the force of the Hunnes, fathers to the Hungarians, who came at that time out of Asia into Europe, in great numbers, through the fennes of Meotides. Hermanaric being dead, and Vithimir his successor slaine in battaile, the Gothes estate was ouerthrowne, and troden vnder foot by the Hunnes: wherefore such as would not liue vnder the Conquerors subiection, retired themselves into diuers other countries. Athamaric, who had shewed himselfe an enemy to Valens, in supporting Procopius his tries. Athamaric, who had shewed himselfe an enemy to Valens, in supporting Procopius his tries, would not trust him, and therefore he tooke his course towards the North, and did inhabit with his troupes in the Forrests of Sarmatia. But Fritigerne and Alanin being followed with a great number of Gothes, came vnto the bankes of Danube, vpon the confines of the Empire, where desiring to be admitted to dwell with the other subjects, Valens consented, supposing that they should serue as a rampier against forraigne nations, that would invade the empire on that side.

Then there arriued vpon the same marches Vitheric, sonne to Vithimir, with his tutors Alatheus and Safrax, and also Farnabe, conductors of other great troupes. Then did the Romans begin to distinguish these people, into Ostrogoths or East Goths, and Visigoths or West Goths: calling those which did remaine vnder the domination of the Hunnes, Ostrogoths; and those Visigoths which had passed the Danube, and dwelt in Hungarie, Mysia, and Thracia: the which distinction was ancient among them, according to their countries and abodes, and was againe practised in Italie, Gaule, and Spaine, when as this nation had erected kingdomes there; whereof the princes were diuided into two families or factions: that is, the Amals or Amaltes, and the Baltes.

2 The name of Iesus Christ had bene many yeares preached among this nation, before the Emperour Valens time: for we read, That at the Councell of Nice, which was vnder Constantine the Great, among others, there came Theophilus a Bishop of the Gothes: wherefore they were already Christians and Orthodoxes, although there were some idolatrous princes among them, and by consequence, part of the people: so as when they came vpon the territories of the Empire, Valens reigning in the East, they had Bishops, whereof the most famous was Vulphilas.

The manner how they became Arrians, is reported by Theodorite, in the fourth booke of the Ecclesiasticall Historie, saying, That after the Gothes had passed the riuer of Ister or Danube, and that they had made their peace with Valens, Eudoxus who was an Arrian, perswaded Valens, who was also infected with this heresie, to draw the Gothes to his opinions, for that conformitie in religion would make the peace more firme. Wherevith Valens having acquainted the princes & heads of the Gothike nation, they made answer, That they could not charge the doctrine of their ancestors. Then Eudoxus addressing himselfe to Vulphilas, whom he knew to be couetous and ambitious, he prevailed so with faire words & money, as he got him to perswade the Gothes to receiue the Emperors confession of faith: the which he did, saying, That they were but childish contentions, and debates for words, and not for doctrine: for this Vulphilas was in great credit with the Goths, and they say, that he inuented the Gothike letters, and translated the Bible into that tongue. Thus were these people governed by their Bishops and Prelates: they were a free people and couragious, and withall, tractable and apt to learning and Philosophie, the which they learned, frequenting with more ciuile nations: hardie and valiant, and yet familiar and liberal; apt to arms, tall and of a goodly stature, strong and patient to endure all the discommodities of warre.

F This new nation being seated in the territories of the Empire, the Emperour was aduised to make his profit of them, and to draw money and other commodities from them for their dwellings, and for the vse of the land, water, and ayre which he graunted them; the which he could well put in practise, especially his gouernors & lieutenants, so as this nation found themselves in a short time oppressed with a harder seruitude vnder the Roman Empire, than their countrymen

Distinction of
the East and West Gothes.

Christian religion among the Gotes.

Gotes made Arrians by the Romanes.

Doctrine of the Gothike nation.

The crueltie, avarice, and insulence of Valens
and his lieutenants against
the Gothes.

treymen were vnder the Hunnes: For the Gothes being distressed for victuals, Lupicin and Maximus Gouvernours of Thrace, inuented all the wicked deuices they could to make them poore, and to strip them of that they had, making them to eat dogs and other beasts, for euery one of which they were forced to giue a man to be a slaue. Besides Lupicin hauing caused Fritigerne and Alauin, captains of the Gothes, to come to Martiapolis, to conferre with them vpon the complaints which were made of these inhumanities, hee incensed them with proud and injurious words: so as hauing cunningly escaped out of his hands, they afterwards declared themselves enemies to the Romane Empire, so as there grew a great and cruell warre betwixt the Gothes and the Romanes, by the which the Emperour and his lieutenants were punished for their couetousnesse and impieties: Lupicin seeking to suppress the spoyle which the Goths made, was defeated, and in the end after many vnfortunat encounters betwixt both parties, the Emperour Valens hauing lost a battraile, where the best of his men died, he also lost his life, being burnt by the Gothes in a country house, into the which he was retired wounded, after the losse of the battraile: and without the valour and wisdom of Theodosius (whom God raised vp to succeed Valens in the East) the Gothes had rooted out the name of the Romanes in that country. But Theodosius a Spaniard, a wise and vertuous prince, did suppress them, and afterwards made a peace with them: so as after the death of Fritigerne, his successor Albanicus, a friend and well affected to the Romane Empire, died in Theodosius court: after which, the Gothes remained 14 yeares quietly vnder the Romane Emperours, without any king of their nation, vntill that Alaric, one of their captaines, who had serued Theodosius in his warres against Eugenius the tyrant, rebelled, and put the Gothes in armes, Arcadius and Honorius, sonnes to Theodosius, sitting in the imperiall seat.

Defeat of the Emperour Valens
and his miserable end.

Theodosius a good Prince.

Alaric chiefe
of the Gothes.

Radagase slain,
and his arme of Goths ruined.

The French inuade Gaule.

The Barbarians
divide the conquest of Spaine betwixt them.

Alaric passeth into Italie.

3 The Gothes disdaining to be any more subiect to the Romanes, and meaning to chuse a king of their owne, there grew a sedition and warre among themselves; some desiring Alaric, others Radagase: but Alaric had the soueraintie. Wherefore Radagase with aboute two hundred thousand of that nation went into Italie, whilst that Alaric oppressed Hungarie; against whom Stilico, who gouerned the Westerne Empire vnder Honorius, opposed himselfe: and finding this armie of Gothes shut vp in the Appenine hills, bordering vpon Tuscane, it was consumed with hunger and pouertie: their leader Radagase was taken and strangled, and those which remained, were sold in great troupes, for slaues, at a small rate. This Radagase was an idolatrer, and would haue planted idolatrie againe in Italie. It was at such a season, when as the Romane Empire was in greatest combustion; especially in the West: for besides the inuasion of the Gothes in Italie, the Frenchmen, a people of Germanie, bordering vpon Gaule, sought to make a breach there, and entred in great troupes vpon the countrey adjoining vpon the riuer of Rhene: against whom, Stilico (who was a Henete or Sclauonian borne) meaning to fortifie himselfe with barbarous nations called into Gaule the Bourguignons, Sueues, Alanes, and Vandales, nations which were chased out of their countries; on the one side by the Hunnes, and on the other by the Gothes: who afterwards raunged and spoiled Gaule themselves, and would haue seized thereon; for the which they had many encounters with the Emperours Lieutenants, with variable successe. Great was the vertue and valour then of Constantius Patricius, who gouerned Gaule Narbonoife, the which wee now call by the name of Prouence and Languedoc; by whom the Vandales were repulsed, and forced to passe into Spaine; where for a time they did ouerrun the countrey, and being afterwards followed by the Alanes and Sueues, they sought to settle themselves there. Gunderic reigned ouer the Vandales, Hermeric ouer the Sueues, and the Alanes were commaunded by Resplandian or Atace, according vnto some. These diuided Spaine betwixt them: so as the Alanes should make warre in the countrey of Carthagene, and in part of Portugall or Lusitania, as it was then called: part of the Vandales, called Silinges, should conquer Betica, called since Andalusia: and the other Vandales, with the Sueues, should settle in Gallicia.

4 After the defeat of Radagase, Alaric marched into Italie with a great armie, and demaunded to diuide the Empire with Honorius; to whom by the counsell of Stilico, Honorius graunted the possession of Gaule and Spaine, who were also in prey to the French and other nations. Alaric and the Gothes marching towards the Alpes, doubting no surprize, were charged by an armie which Stilico had sent after them, to keepe them from spoyleing Italie,

A Italie, vnder the commaund of a Iew called Saule, who had a secret commaundement to set vpon the Gothes armie, when they should be most buised in the straits of the mountaines; the which hee could not put in execution: for the Gothes seeing themselves betrayed, gathered their forces together, and put themselves in battraile as well as they could, defending themselves so valiantly, as the imperiall armie was defeated: wherefore Alaric being victor, and full of a furious desire of reuenge, leauing the way to Gaule, he turned backe, and did miserably spoyle the countries, which were since called Lumbardie, Tuscane, and Romania, putting all to fire and sword, euen to the gates of Rome; the which he tooke after a long siege, and sacked it, pardoning the holy places, and those that were fled into them. From thence hee did ouerrun Italie, euen vnto the furthest bounds: then returning towards Rome, he died suddenly neere vnto Cosence, and was buried in the riuer of Barfente, turned out of her course for that cause, and afterwards drawne againe into her old bed by the Gothes: who after his death made choice of Ataulphe, his cousin, for their king, being a very wise man. Hauing brought backe the armie to Rome, he spoiled all that remained of the first sacke: yet he was somewhat pacified by the loue of Placidia Galla, sister to the Emperour Honorius, being prisoner; whom by reason of her nobilitie and beautie; he married at Forly in Romania. From that time hauing some respect to Honorius, as his allie, he resolved to leaue Italie, and take his way into Gaule, according to the first agreement betwixt Honorius and Alaric; where hee erected the kingdome of the Visigothes, restrained the French within certaine limits, and helped to chase away the rest of the Vandales, Alanes, and Sueues, beyond the Pyrenees, where he afterwards pursued them.

A little before these accidents, one Constantine, of a simple souldior being growne capitaine of the Legions which were in great Britaine, hauing slaine a tyrant who had seized vpon that island vnder the Roman Empire, called Gratian, had passed into Gaule, to vsurpe the imperiall title there, and from thence had sent Gouvernours into Spaine. But two noblemen Spaniards, Didimus and Seuerianus, or Verianus, or Verinianus (for this diuersitie is found in authors) rich and mightie men, opposed themselves: and seeking to preserve the prouince for the lawfull Emperour, they gathered some troupes together, of friends and subjects, and seized vpon the passages of the mountaines, to keepe these gouernours and their companies from passing. Against these Spaniards, the tyrant sent a sonne of his called Constant, whom hee had drawne out of a Monasterie, and proclaimed him Cesar: who being followed by an armie of Barbarians, which he called Honoriaques, he defeated and slew the two brethren. These Honoriaques being masters of the straits and passages of the Pyrenees by this victorie, and hauing afterwards rebelled with their capitaine Gerontius, they (as some hold) deliuered Spaine to the Vandales, Alanes, and Sueues, after the death of the tyrant Constantine, and of his sonne Constant, whereof the one was taken at Arles, and the other dispatched at Vienna: These nations joyning together to rob and spoyle, Palantia, since called Palenza, was the first towne of Spaine, which fell in prey to these Barbarians, who besieged Toledo in vaine, ranfomed Lisbon, and committed infinite spoyle, whilst that Maximus, another tyrant, being rebelled against the Emperour, sought during these combustions to make himselfe king of Spaine of another side: who being taken by them that did yet reuerence the maiestie of the Romane Empire, he was deprived of his vsurped royalty, yet his life was sau'd.

Spaine for the space of two yeares was thus miserably oppressed, as well by tyrants as by these cruell nations: so as there remained nothing but the mountaines of the Cantabrians, at this present Biscaye and Nauarre, in the quiet possession of the Romanes, maintained by Constantius Patricius, who was the Emperours Lieutenant on this side the Alpes: which was at such time as the Vandales, Sueues, and Alanes made the diuision of Spaine. Then did Ataulphe passe into Spaine, to dispossesse them, according to the right he had by an accord made with Honorius his brother in law: but as he was at Barcelona, he was slaine, with six children which he had had by another wife than Placidia. The time and cause of his death are not reported alike. Iornandes sayth, That he was slaine (hauing reigned three yeares in Spaine and Gaule) being thrust into the flanke by Vernulphe, whom he was accustomed to jest at. Some affirme, That he had been chased, and forced to passe into Spaine by Constantius Patricius Gouvernour of Gaule.

5 Trecherie of Stilico and defect of the impe-riall army.

Rome taken by
the Gothes.

The death of Alaric.

Ataulphe Alaric successors pacified by Placidia.

Constantine a tyrant.

Maximus a tyrant.

Ataulphe slaine
by his owne men.

Ann. 402.

6

The first Council of Toledo,

The Christian religion during these troubles and foraine inuasions was not neglected among the Spaniards: for in the year 402 (although others write 420) was held at Toledo the first Council by 29 Bishops, where Patron Bishop of Toledo did preside against the heresie of Priscilian. He had beene Bishop of Auila, and had published an heresie mixt with the errors of the Gnostiques, Manicheans, and auncient Philosophers: among other opinions, he maintained, That the soule of man was a portion of the Diuinitie: he was condemned first at a Councell held at Bourdeaux, and from thence he appealed to Maximian the tyrant, who caused him to be heard at Treues; then he commanded his head to be cut off, with some of his followers. This Councell notwithstanding gaue place to a single life, and decreed, That priests should liue continually vnmarried. This decree was contradicted by Vigilantius, who lived then at Barcelona, who did also write against the abuse of reliques, against whom S. Ierosme was very bitter. Many learned men liued at that time in Spaine, as Lucinius, Abigaus, Abundius, Auitus, Olympus, Audentius, Turbius, P. Orosius, and others: yet the Church was declined much from her auncient puritie, and then grew in request ceremonies, vowes, merits, reliques, and miracles; for the clergie was then much infected with couetousnesse and ambition. Then came the Vandales and Gothes, who were all infected with the heresie of Arrian, who did in some sort persecute the good, as we shall heare.

Learned men in Spaine.

Astaulphe being dead, the Gothes did chuse Sigeric for their king, who reigned but a year, and was blaine by his owne men, in disdain that he was too desirous of peace. He left many children, Giseric, Huneric, Gunteward, Trafamund, and Hilderic: yet Vallia succeeded him, to the end he should breake the peace with the Romanes: but God had otherwise decreed, for he confirmed it more. With him (according vnto some) begins the reigne of the Vice-Goths in Spaine.

Vallia first King of the Gothes.

Ann. 418.

Vallia a friend to the Romanes, makes warre against the Barbarians in Spaine

Alanes and Vandales defeated by the Gothes,

IN the yeare of Christ 418 Vallia was chosen king of the Gothes, whereof next vnto Narbone, Tolouse was the royall seat. In his time the French began to erect a kingdome in Gaule vnder Pharamond. Constantius Patricius, Gouverneur for the Emperour in Gaule and Spaine, was admitted by Honorius to the dignitie of Cesar, which in those dayes was a degree to attaine vnto the Empire, as in our time the dignitie of king of Romanes, during the life of the Emperour of Germanie. This Vallia shewed himselfe a friend and well affected to the Romane Empire. He restored to Honorius Placidia his sister, widow to king Astaulphe, whom he had honoured, and kept in his house since the death of her husband. She was afterwards married to Constantius Cesar aboue mentioned, by whom she had Valentinian the third, who was the last Emperour in the West vntill Charlemagne. Vallia vnderooke by a contract made with Constantius, to chase the barbarous nations of Vandales, Alanes, and Sueues, out of Spaine, to the benefit of the Romane Empire, and his owne: whereupon he entred into Spaine, being called by Constantius to begin this warre, in the year 420, and assailed the Alanes and Vandales, who held Betica and Lusitania, slew their king Atace, and reduced them to that extremitie, as those few which remained went and joined with Gunderic, who reigned ouer the other Vandales in Gallicia: the battaile wherein they were wholly defeated, was giuen neere vnto Emerita, the which is Merida in Portugall. These victories obtained, he meant to passe into Africke, but he was put backe by a storme, and therefore returned into Gaule, where hee purchased vnto the Gothes all the countrey from Tolouse to the Ocean, bounded in by the Pyrennee mountaines, and the riuier of Garonne.

8 Sometime after the Alanes, which were retired to Gunderic in Gallicia, shooke of his yoake, being loth to subiect themselves vnto him, and returned into Lusitania, Betica, and the prouince of Carthage, yet not chusing any prince ouer them: there they obtained certaine lands, and liued tributaries to the Romanes, dispersing themselves as farre as the riuier of Ebro, and to the foot of the Pyrennee mountaines, where some maintaine, that of their name the countrey of Cattelogne was called Cattalania, for that they did inhabite there, being mingled with the Cattes, a nation of Germanie, which had passed with them into Spaine. In Gallicia (which contained at that time part of the realme of Portugall) there grew debate betwixt Gunderic king of the Vandales, and Hermeric king of the Sueues, so as they fell to armes, and the Sueues were besieged in the mountaines called Narbascens: where in Spaine betwixt the Vandales and Sueues, but the Vandales left them there, despising that barren countrey, and came into the prouinces of Betica and Carthage, the which they foraged: then passing into the islands of Majorca and Minorca, they sackt them: returning into Spaine, they tooke and ruined Carthage, and brought backe their armie into Betica, the which was afterwards called Vandalusia, of their name: there they ruined the towne of Seuille, and made the countrey desolate. Gunderic died at the sacke of Seuille, vpon the threshold of S. Vincents temple, which he had commaunded should be spoyle: he was sonne to Godigisque, after whose decease Giseric or Genferic his bastard brother was chosen king of the Vandales.

25

Vallia entred againe into Spaine, to suppress the spoyle and cruelties of these Vandales, whither there was also sent by the Emperour a captaine called Castinus, who should ioyne with Boniface Gouverneur of Africke, and jointly make warre against the Barbarians. But as Castinus had nothing in him but vanitie and foolish presumption, he disdaind Boniface, who was a valiant and wise nobleman; against whom hee did also bandie Ætius Gouverneur of Gaulles, either through emulation and enuie, or for some other cause of hatred: so as when Vallia came with his armie of Gothes to set vpon the Vandales, Boniface, who was retired into his gouernment of Africke, being incensed, sent messengers vnto Genferic, to sollicite him to passe the strait, promising to giue him means to lodge himselfe in Africke with all his men, in despight of the Emperour; the which fell out happily for him, being oppressed with many enemies: wherefore he left Spaine, but not without blood: for in a battaile which was giuen him by the people of Spaine, subiects to the Romanes, and by the Gothes, he slew twentie thousand of his enemies vpon the place at his departure. The Vandales being then passed into Africke with all their families, there remained not any foraine power to make head in Spaine, but that of the Sueues, with their king Hermeric, who being fallen into a grievous sicknesse, died about that time, after he had languished long. In the meane time Vallia incensed against the Vandales, prepared to pursue them into Africke, but he was preuented by death, hauing reigned 22 yeares.

2. Theodoric or Roderic.

D 9 Theodoric succeeded Vallia, Valentinian the third being Emperour in the West, in the year 440. Hermeric about a little before his death had so pacified the people of Gallicia, as he reigned ouer them, and of two nations he made one, taking his sonne Rechilan for companion, whom he made his heire and successor in the kingdome, and sent him into Betica or Vandalusia against Andenot, a Romane captaine, whom he defeated neere vnto Singil, a riuier vpon that continent, where he was much enriched. Returning, he besieged Merida, tooke it, and enlarged the kingdome of the Sueues, the which had a beginning about the year 437. Theodoric reigning ouer the Gothes, they brake the peace made by Vallia with the Emperour Honorius, & besieged Narbonne, the which was relieved by Licorius, Gouverneur in those parts for the Empire vnder the Generall Ætius: but Licorius was defeated soone after by the same Gothes, the which was a great prejudice to the Romanes. By reason of this defeat, the peace was renewed among these potentates.

Rechilan being king of Gallicia after his fathers decease, hee sought also to enlarge his limits: wherefore he first assayed Vandalusia, and the countrey about new Carthage, the which he made subiect vnto his crowne, and did wholly suppress the name of the Silinges Vandales in Betica. Hee made a certaine composition with the Romanes, to whom he yeilded the countrey of Toledo in Carpetania, and new Carthage, called now Carthage.

Theodoric hauing also made a peace with the Romanes in Gaule, made a designe vpon Spaine; yet being called backe to ioyne with the Romanes against the Hunnes, who were entred in infinit numbers into Gaule vnder Attila: hee was in that memorable battaile, whereas Attila was defeated, in the which there died aboue an hundred and eightie thousand men vpon the field; and among others, Theodoric king of the Gothes, hauing reigned foureteeen yeares, according vnto some. The cause of this warre, which Attila vnderooke, was his bad disposition to ruine the whole world: whereunto he was incited by Genferic, king

Defeat of Attila Anno 453.

Five kings in the battell where-as Attila was defeated.

Recciaire third
K. of the Sueues
in Gallicia.

king of the Vandales, who was trecherous, cruell, and inhumane, hauing a desire to ruine the Visigothes in Gaule and Spaine, both for that he had bene chafed and pursued by them, as also fearing that Theodoric their king would seeke to reuenge the injurie done vnto his daughter, who being married vnto Humeric, the sonne of Genferic, had bene sent backe by him vnto her father disfigured, without a nose, vpon a suspition which Genferic had, that she would haue poisoned him. In this battaile there were fūe kings: Attila king of the Hunnes, Generall of the warre: Valmir, of the Ostrogothes, who were tributaries to Attila: Theodoric, of the Visigothes in Gaule and Spaine: Ardaric of the Gepides: and Meroue of the French. This was in the yere 453, and was fought in the fields of Maroche, a word corrupted of Maurice, otherwise called Cathalaunians: a battaile as remarkable as hath bin since the deluge, in regard of the great number of men that were in arms, and the strange designes of Attila, a common enemy of all mankind. Besides those that died in the battell, there was an encounter the night before betwixt the Gepides and the French, in the which there were about 90000 men slaine.

Rechilan died a little before in Merida, being an idolatrer, and after him his sonne Recciaire reigned ouer the Sueues in Gallicia, who was baptized, and had received the Christian religion. Hee had also married a daughter of Theodorics, king of Gothes, whereby he grew proud, aspiring to great matters. He inuaded the Valcons country, which is now Nauarre, and spoiled it. From thence he went to see his father in law, and in his returne, with the helpe of the Gothes, he sackt Saragosse, and all the country which we now call Arragon, the which obeyed the Empire. He spoiled that of Carthagene, the which his father by a treatie made with the Romanes had yeelded vnto them. This past before the defeat of the Hunnes.

3. Torismund.

An. 453.

10 A fter that Theodoric had bene slaine in that great battaile, the which was woon by the fauor of God, and to the great good of all the countries of Europe, against that cruell tyrant Attila; his sonne Torismund succeeded him ouer the Visigothes, whose seat was at Tolouse. He had many brethren, Theodoric, Frederic, Turic, Kothemer, and Humeric. Ætius lieutenant Generall for the Emperour Valentinian, made him jealous of them, least they should seize vpon the realme in his absence, aduising him to goe speedily to Tolouse, and to cause himselfe to be crowned. This Ætius did, for that he distrusted the Gothes, whom he loued not neere him; yea, he was grieved to see this yong prince full of courage after this victory lately gotten against the Hunnes, hauing a desire to pursue the remainder of this defeated army, and to root them out quite; the which Ætius held not profitable for the Romans: for knowing the nature of the Goths to be proud and actiue, he feared, that being puffed vp with many victories, they should enter into the territories of the Romanes: wherefore he suffered the remainders of the defeated armie of the Hunnes to slip away, which gaue his enemies subject to disgrace him with the Emperour Valentinian, who afterwards put him to death: whereby (as some said) he cut off the right arme of his estate; for he was a wise and valiant captaine: yet some say, That betwixt Torismund and Attila there were some happie encounters for the Gothes. Torismund I. hauing reigned three yeares, was slaine by his enemies, as he was let bloud, being sicke. They write, That one stole away his armes, which he kept by his bed, yet hauing a penknife in his hand, he slew some of the murderers which came to assault him. It is doubtfull whether they were his brethren, or others by their procurement. Some say, That the murderers name was Ascalerne, and that he reigned but a yere.

Torismund slaine
by his brethrens procurement.

4. Theodoric the second of that name.

A damnable desire of reuenge
in a woman.

11 T heodoric the 2. succeeded his brother Torismund, about the time that Valentinian the 3. was slaine by the friends of Ætius. The Empire of Rome was then held by one Maximus, who married Eudoxia by force, being widow to Valentinian that was slaine, thinking by this conjunction to be more respected in the imperial dignitie, which he vsurped: but this woman mad for the wrong she thought was done vnto her, sought to be reuēged of Maximus, to the prejudice of her selfe, of Rome, Italy, & of the whole Empire: for by the means of Boniface she caused Genferic to come out of Africke, who with an army of Vandales, Africanes, Moores, & others, entred

A entred Rome, and slew Maximus, sacked and burnt the towne, spoiled all Italie, and led away Eudoxia and her daughters, with many thousands others, prisoners into Africke: yet afterwards he set Eudoxia and her daughters free, except one, whom he kept to marrie to his sonne. This was done by a treatie made with the Emperour Martian, who reigned in the East at Constantinople, who also suffered Theodoric, in recompence of the succours which the Visigothes had giuen the Romanes against Attila, to reigne in Spaine, and to get what hee could from the Sueues.

Theodoric then entred into Spaine in the yere 458, against whom, Recciaire king of the Sueues opposed himselfe, reigning in Lusitania and Gallicia: there was a battaile fought neere vnto the riuier of Vrbic, twelue miles from Asturica, betwixt Asturica and Leon, in the which the chiefe of the nobilitie of the Sueues were slaine, and Recciaire was constrained to saue himselfe by flight: meaning to passe into Africke, to Genferic king of the Vandales, hee was put backe by a tempest to Porto, and there taken and deliuered to Theodoric, who caused him to be slaine, although he were his brother in law. Gallicia being come into Theodorics power by this victorie, he left one of his captaines called Aclius of Auvergne, Gouvernour in his name, whilst that he pursued his conquests: but when as Aclius saw that Theodoric had returned his back, he caused himselfe to be proclaimed king, and seized vpon the kingdome, forgetting his faith, and the dutie which he ought vnto his master, who had honoured him so much: wherewith Theodoric being much moued, he returned, and finding him readie to resist him, he fought with him, and slew him vpon the place.

The Sueues desirous to be reconciled to Theodoric, caused their Bishops to sue for their pardon; the which they not onely obtained, but he also gaue them leaue to chuse a king of their owne nation. So the Sueues in the furthest parts of Gallicia made choice of Masdra, the sonne of Masila, for their king; but being of sundrie opinions, another faction proclaimed Franta. Theodoric after all this passed into Lusitania, meaning to sacke Emerita or Merida, but either for the respect he bare to S. Eulalie, or for feare (as they say) he did abstaine. From that time hauing diuided his armie into three, he sent one part into Vandalustaine. The other third part returned into Gaule Gothique, which was Languedoc, where in few dayes he tooke Narbonne, by the treason of Count Agrippin or Rauennius, who was Gouvernour thereof: or, according vnto some, hee receiued it of Gilon, who then reigned in Fraunce, during the time that Childeic was in exile, meaning by this bountie to fortifie himselfe with the Visigothes against the French, who began to be discontented with his exactions and tyrannies. The majestic of the Romane Empire in the West was then troden vnderfoot, after the death of Valentinian: for in euery prouince the gouernours and captaines of armies caused themselues to be proclaimed Emperours, and supported one another: so as Spaine was wholly abandoned to the Visigothes, and the Gaules to them and the French, and to pettie tyrants.

E The Sueues being diuided in Gallicia, had chosen (as is said) two kings; one faction would haue Masdra, the other obeyed Franta, but he died within few daies; after whom, the same faction did chuse Rechimund, who hauing made an accord with Masdra, they entred jointly with a great armie into Lusitania, and spoiled it. Masdra was slaine by his owne people; after whom, that partie created Frumar king, but Rechimund opposed himselfe: so as these two pettie kings impatient one of another, fell to spoyle Gallicia, one on the one side, and the other on the other side. Frumar being dead, Remismund or Arismund, the sonne of Masdra, brought all the Sueues vnder his obedience, and was peaceable king of Gallicia. The Sueues since Recciaire had receiued the Christian religion, reasonably pure concerning the principall points, and had continued in the same, vntill the time of this king Arismund, who receiued a certaine Gaule called Aiax an Arrian, thinking ill of the myserie of the holy Trinitie, into Gallicia, who infected the whole countrey with his heresie, the which was maintained many yeares by many kings, whose names and deeds haue bene buried by writers in hatred of their impieties.

In the meane time there had bin ten Emperors in Italie of small fame, and of lesse exploits, who made no great opposition against the Visigothes and French: so as the one seized

An. 458.

Defeat of the Sueues, and the death of Re-cciaire.

Aclius punished for his treacherie.

Humilitie of the Gothes to the Sueues was quiesced.

Gouernours ambitious and disloyall.

Four kings of the Sueues in Spaine.

Arismund R. K. of the Sueues.

Resignation of Bishoprick re-proved.

vpon Spaine, and the other vpon Gaule, leauing but very obscure markes of the imperiall au-thoritie: it may be for the good of these two rich regions, who were better gouerned vnder those generous and free nations, than they should haue bene vnder the Romanes, who were corrupted with all vices, and but a medley of all other nations. In these times the Bishops of Spaine would in their life time chuse successors to their Bishopricks; the which was reprooued in a Councell held at Rome, vnder Pope Hilarie. Remismund or Arismund sought friendship and peace with Theodorice, the which he did courteously graunt: and moreover, Theodoric made an alliance with him, by the marriage of a daughter of his, the which hee sent him vnder the conduct of Sallan, Maior of the palace, with rich presents. Remismund growne proud with these honours, he seized againe vpon Lusitania, where he tooke Conimbrica, and spoyled it: Lisbone was deliuered vnto him by Lusides, who commaunded there: during which things, Theodorice was slaine at Toloufe by his brother Euric or Henry, hauing reigned foureteeen yeares: vnder him liued Sydonius Apollinaris, who of an Earle became a Bishop.

5. Henry or Euric or Eoric.

Ann. 471.

Exploits of Henry.

Prodigies.

Henry an Arrian a persecutor
of the Church.

12 DEsire to reigne induced Henry to kill his brother Theodorice, who (as some say) recei-ued that which he had done to another: for some did thinke, that Theodorice and Frederic had bene authors of the death of Torismund their eldest brother. Leon was at that time Emperour of Rome, sitting at Constantinople. As soone as Henry was seated in the royall throne of the Visigothes, he entred into Spaine with a great army, and seized vpon the whole countrey on this side Ebro; for he tooke Pampelone, Sarragosse, and other places of the prouince of Tarracona: then running into Lusitania, and seeing the combustions which were in the Romane Empire, on this side the Pyreneces, he assailed Arles and Marfeilles, and joyned them vnto his kingdome, and defeated Riothime, king of the Britons, who came against him in faueur of the Romanes, with twelue thousand men. Vindemir, brother to Theodomir, and vicile to Theodorice, an Ostrogothe, being king of Italie, brought him forces out of Hungarie, and gaue him meanes to seize vpon part of Gaule. Hee caused the Gothes lawes to be set downe in writing, who vntill that time had bin gouerned by customes. Being at Arles, where he held a generall assembly in armes, according to the manner of that nation, they did see the yron of their launces and other weapons change colour, looking greene, red, blacke, yellow, and of diuers other colours; and soone after the king died, hauing reigned 17 yeares: He was an Arrian, as his predecessors, and did persecute the churches, shut vp the temples, and caused them to be hedged about with thornes, that they should forget the way to assemble. During the reigne of this Henry, Odoacer a Herule or Saxon entred into Italie, who hauing forced An-gustule (who tearmed himselfe Emperor) to leaue his purple robe, he made himself king of Ita-lie, the which he held the space of 15 or 16 yeares.

6. Alaric.

Punishment of a treacherous Gouernor.

13 Alaric succeeded his father Euric, being the second of that name, who reigned ouer the Visigothes at Toloufe, when as Clouis the first Christian king reigned ouer the French. In his reigne the Romanes had yet some lands in Spaine, and in Gaule, where they had gouernours; one of the which called Burdunel, seized vpon the countrey which he commaunded in Spaine, and became a tyrant, but he was taken by the Gothes, and burnt at Toloufe in a bull of brasse. Apollinaris was also at that time Earle, and gouernor of Auuergne, kinsman to Sydonius.

Warre for irreligion betwixt
the French and the Visigothes.

Before this time the Visigothes and the French had been good friends: but Clouis with most of his people hauing embraced the Christian religion, and left their idols, he thought himselfe also bound to pursue those that were not of the same opinion, and to force them thereunto by armes. He therefore fell in dislike of Alaric and the Visigothes, for that they were Arrians: besides, he tooke an occasion, for that his enemies and the banished men of Fraunce had sought refuge at Toloufe and other places belonging vnto Alaric: and moreover Clouis complained,
That a day and place being appointed them to parle, he was aduertised, that Alaric had layd an am-

A ambush to kill him: wherefore there grew a great quarrell betwixt these two princes, the which they would decide by single combat betwixt themselves: but king Theodorice (who had newly dispossessed Odoacer of Italie, and there erected the kingdome of the Ostrogothes, a wife and valiant prince) reconciled them for that time, and the Visigothes turned the warre into Spaine, where they tooke Tortose, and slew one Peter who had played the tyrant there, whose head was carried to Sarragosse.

The hatred betwixt the French and the Gothes encreased daily, so as they must come to blows, and there was a battell fought neere vnto Poitiers, in the plaine of Voglad, to leagues from the towne, whereas Alaric was slaine, and with him Apollinaris Earle of Auuergne. There was also another battell neere vnto Bordeaux, where there were an infinit number of Gothes Arrians slaine, so as the place is to this day called the field of Arri. Among the spoyles of the Visigothes, there were certaine vessels found, consecrated in old time to the temple of Ierusalem. This king Clouis is by some called Lodom. By meanes of these victories the French seized vpon Aquitain, & on Toloufe, the chiefe towne of the Visigothes, they besieged Carcaffone, and meant to pursue their victorie, but Theodorice coming out of Italie, made them to rayle their siege.

At that time Toledo was the royall towne in Spaine. Many Christian Bishops chased out of Africke by the Vandales Arrians, were rettyred into Italie; from whence some were sent into Spaine. At that time liued Fulgentius, Bishop of Ruspence, a learned & an eloquent man, who was chased away and persecuted by the Arrian Gothes. Alaric (as the Spaniards write) had married Amalasunta, daughter to Theodorice, king of the Ostrogothes and of Italie, and had a sonne by her called Amalaric, who was yet a child, when his father died: wherefore Gesslaric
(who was bastard brother to Alaric) tooke the gouernment of the kingdome, his brother hauing reigned 22 yeares.

7. Gensolaric or Gesslaric.

14 Gensolaric was sonne to Euric, by a concubine, hee vsurped the crowne at Narbonne, his nephew Amalaric being yet but siue yeares old. He was bafe and a coward: for being assailed by Gundebault king of the Bourguignons (who had also erected another kingdome in Gaule, to the prejudice of the Romanes) after that he had receiued a great rout neere vnto
Narbonne, he fled ignominiously into Spain, and shut himselfe vp in Barcelone, vntill that Ilba (sent by Theodorice king of Ostrogothes, grandfather as they said by the mothers side vnto yong Amalaric) came out of Italy to chase him from thence. Some make this Gesslaric bastard sonne to Alaric, and brother to yong Amalaric.

This K. Theodorice sent 80000 men out of Italie into Gaule against the French, to reuenge the death of Alaric. Ilba (who was Generall) joyned his forces with the Visigoths, and defeated the French, where there were about 20000 of them slaine. Prouence remained then vnto the Ostrogothes, and was a member of the realme of Italie, and Languedoc and Gasconie returned vnto the Visigothes, as before. Ilba then past into Spaine, to settle the estate of yong Amalaric, and chased K. Gesslaric out of Barcelone, the third yeare of his reigne, who fled into Africke to the Vandales, hoping to recouer his dignitie by their means, but he labored in vaine:
wherefore being returned into Gaule, he was slaine neere vnto Durance.

Amalaric eight King of the Gothes.

15 The Spaniards write, That K. Theodorice came out of Italie (where he had reigned 18 yeares) expressly into Spain, to settle his grandchild Amalaric in his kingdome, where (as they say) he continued 15 yeares, and that Clouis the French king being dead, and his kingdome diuided betwixt his four sonnes, they made a peace with yong Amalaric, & assured him their sister Clotilde, restoring to him Toloufe, or at the least the vsufruit of it. This treatie was made with Theodorice his grandfather and tutor.

16 Vnder these Arrian princes the Christian religion was somewhat maintained by the Bishops, touching the fundamentall points, although intermixed with superstitions, the which encreased daily. There assembled tenne Bishops at Tarracone, who decreed, That the feast of Sun-

Sunday should begin on Saturday. From whence it came that in Spain and many other places they hold it a profane thing to work on the Saturday; no nor the women to spin. This Council makes mention of the first Monks in Spaine. At Girone was another prouinciall assembly of 7 Bishops: at Sarragosse of 12: in Ilerda at the foot of the Pyrenes of 8: at Valence of 6 Bishops, whereas alwaies the Bishop of that place did preside. These Councils were not very free nor assured in the Arrians iurisdiction: but in those places which the Romans did yet hold in Spaine, the pure Christian religion was fauoured. The counsell of Sarragosse did ordayne, that no Nun should were a vayne nor be professed before the age of 40 yeares. Theodorie king of the Ostrogoths, regent in Spaine, tooke to wife, as the Spanish authors write, a noble woman of that countrie, at whose intreatie he set at libertie all those of her nation that were in prison, and had by her a sonne, called Seuerin, Duke of Carthagea, father to Leandre and Isidore, who were faints. The 15 yeare of his gouernment, he resigned the kingdom of the Visigoths to his graundchild Amalaric, being now of age to commaund, and returned to his realme of Italie. This was in the yeare 526, when as Iustinian being emperor, the warre began in Africke by Bellisarius against the Vandales, and Gilimer their king, whereof followed the taking of the king, and the end of the Vandales royaltie, the which had continued in these countries 113 yeares. Vnder the raig of Amalaric was celebrated the second Council of Toledo by eight Christian Bishops, although the king were an Arrian. He hauing (as we haue said) married Clotilde, daughter to Clouis king of France, intreated her verie ill, by reason of the diuersitie of religion (for she was well instructed) so as going through the streets, the people cast stones and durt at her in contempt: being retired she wip't off the bloud and durt with a handkerchiefe, the which she sent vnto her brethren, letting them vnderstand the disgraces and wrongs which she suffered: wherewith being incensed, they proclaimed warre against Amalaric: the armies incountred neere vnto Narbone, whereas Amalaric was vanquished, who thinking to faue himselfe in Barcelonne, was slaine, being forsaken by his men. The annales of France say, that Childebert king of Paris did this execution, and that he tooke Toledo, the royall seat, spoiled the temples, and carried backe into France, 60 chalices, fiftene plates, and twentie little cofers, where they kept the books of the Gospell, al of pure gold, and much other treasure, and that he did distribute these ornaments among the Churches of France. Amalaric reigned fife yeares and eight months after the gouernment of Theodorie. After his death, the kingdom of the Visigoths remained vnto Amalasunta his mother, say the Spaniards, I know not by what title. I cannot concurre with them in this opinion, that this Amalasunta was daughter to Theodorie king of Italie, the which we read was married to a prince of the bloud royall of the Visigoths, and of the familie of Hamels, called Euthaire, and had Athalaric by him, to whom Theodorie his graundfather dying, left the kingdom of the Ostrogoths in Italie. Procopius sayes, that the wife of Alaric, and mother to this Amalaric, was called Theodetuse, the which by the report of Iowrdain, who names her Theudicode, Theodorie had by a concubine when he was yet in Misia: others say, that this Theudicode was married to Gundebault king of Bourgogne, and that the wife of Alaric, mother to Amalaric was called Ostrogotte, bastard also to this king Theodorie. Howfoeuer it be, it is not credible that Theodorie king of Italie, should so much affect the affaires of Spaine, as hee should abandon Italie for fiftene yeares, to remaine in Spaine. And there is lesse likelyhood, seeing that Athalaric sonne of Euthaire and of Amalasunta succeeded him in the realme of the Ostrogothes, the which hee had of a lawfull marriage, whatsoeuer the Spaniards write, duke Seuerian of Carthage, father to Isidore and Leandre bishops of Seuille, and others, the which Seuerian should rather haue succeeded him in the realme of the Ostrogothes, than his graundchild, the sonne of his daughter. That which others write, that he sent Ilba with an armie against the French, to reuenge the death of Alaric his kinsman, and that he had reteyned for his paines and the charges of war, Prouence (for these princes notwithstanding all their charitie, did not labour for nothing) and that for the loue of consanguinitie, beeing all of the familie of Hamels, he had sent one of his captaines called Theude into Spaine, to be tutor and regent of the yong king Amalaric and of the realme of the Visigots, with his mother Theudetuse or Amalasunta, as she was called: that I say comes neere vnto the truth, as we may see by Procopius. All the raig of Amalaric, as well vnder his tutors, as alone, is counted by all probabilite 15 yeares.

Theude

An. 526.

End of the Vandals raig in Africke.

17

Diuerfite of religion killed charitie.

Amalaric slaine by the French and the Goths deposed.

18

Theude the ninth King.

19 SO it is, that Theude or Theodat, as others name him, raigned after the death of Amalaric, if we shal beleue Procopius, hauing married a great lady of the countrie of Spaine, who, the Spaniards say, was mother to the deceased king. The resemblance of names hath deceiued them in al their discourses: for at the same time, or therabouts, Amalasunta mother to Athalaric, heire of the realme of Italie, married an other Theude or Theodat (seeing that she was not feared nor respected by the Ostrogoths, for that she was a woman) and made him tutor to her sonne, and regent of the realme, to her owne preiudice, but this hath nothing common with Spaine. At the coming of Theude the Visigoth, the French entred into Spaine, and spoiled the countrie of Arragon, and other places thereabouts: but they were defeated by the Visigothes, led by Theodisclé their captaine, who seased vpon all the passages and straits of the Pyrenes. They say, that seeing themselves inclosed, they entreated them to giue them a day and a night to passe away, the which the Gothes graunted, and all that remayned behind, after that time, were put to the sword: a remarkable victorie, but it was afterwards blemished by the defeat of the Gothes in Africke, as we will shew. The French notwithstanding returned, and tooke Sarragosse, with other townes in Spaine: the French inhabitants to abiure the Arrian sect, thinking they should doe much for and forced the inhabitants to abiure the Arrian sect, being ignorant that religion is a profession of the spirit, the which may well be perswaded by reasons and doctrine, but no waies forced. It was the cause of all the French wars in those daies, toynd with ambition and the insatiable desire of reigne, which vice they thought to obscure, fighting (said they) for the Christian religion, and enriching the Clergie men of their countrie, with spoiles and other gifts. In the meane time most of the Monks that were then in credit, song in the Churches, and the bishops became like dumbe dogs, following the courts of princes, and armies; a mischief which hath not bene since repaired. In Spaine, whereas the Clergie was not in so good estate, their gouernment was somewhat better: for many of their bishops were learned, according vnto those times, as some writings, which yet remaine, doe witnesse, namely Aprugius bishop of Paccence, Iustinian of Valence, Iuste of Vrgell his brother, Leandre of Seuille, and according to some of Toledo, and others, who did often assemble for the affaires of the Church, and held Prouinciall councils: yet they were not without blemishes, buying themselves more than was fit, about seruices, ceremonies and exterior ornaments: from whence sprung many superstitions. Childebert brought from Sarragosse, as some say, Saint Vincent's shirt, the which was put at Saint Germain's by Paris, where he built a temple to that Saint: and the authors say, that they of Sarragosse redeemed their towne from spoiles by this iewell, the which is credible, considering the deuotion of that nation. After the retreat of the French, the Visigoths would passe the strait into Africke, to chase away the Romanes, who had surprised the towne of Septe from them: but as this nation possessed with a superfluous feare, would not vse their armes vpon a Sunday, for the reuerence of the day, the Romanes who had no such scruple, fell vpon them, and finding them carelesse and disarmed, they made a pitifull slaughter; so as there escaped not any one to carrie newes. It hapened at the same time that King Theude (the newes of this rout beeing published abroad) was slaine in his chamber, by one that made himselfe a iester, to haue the better access, who stabbed him in the bellie with a dagger. The king feeling himselfe wounded to the death, conured the noble men that were about him, not to doe any harme to him that had hurt him, saying, that God had sent him a worthy reward for his merits, for that he had also bene the murtherer of his captaine. He raigned 17. yeares and fife moneths.

10. Theodisclé.

20 Theodisclé seased vpon the realme: he was generall or Constable of the Goths armies, he gaue himselfe to lust and adulteries, polluting honest families and great houses, the which he filled with murders by reason of his excessse: wherefore the chiefe of the Goths conspired

An. 526.

The French defeated in Spaine.

The French invaded Spaine.

Learned and religious Bishops in Spaine.

The Goths defeated in Africke by the Romanes.

The reward of a conspired to kill him at Seuille, rioting in his banquets. Some say, that he was sonne to the G unjust tyrant. fister of Totilus king of the Ostrogothes in Italie, and held the kingdom one yere & 7 monthis.

11. Agila.

21 THe Gothes did chuse Agila for their king, who assailed the towne and territorie of Corduba, or Cordoua, & did all the disgraces he could vnto the Christians, treading the bones of Aseiscles and Vistor who were martyres, vnder his horses feet, whereof among that nation the superstition was great. Comming afterwards to fight against the Gothes, which were of a contrarie faction, he was vanquished, his armie defeated, his sonne slaine, and all his baggage, which was verie rich, lost: he himselfe flying into Merida, was slaine by the faction of Athansgilde, who succeeded him, hauing reigned fve yeares.

12. Athanagilde.

Anno 551. 22 Dyring the life of Agila, Athanasgilde had attempted to seize vpon the kingdome of the Visigothes by force, the which after his death he obtained without any difficultie: about the same time the kingdome of the Ostrogotes in Italie was extinguished by Insimian, or Bellisarius, Generall of his armies, and his lieutenant in the West. The Visigothes were diuided; some followed Athanasgilde, whom others loued better for a companion than a master. There was an armie raised against him by Agila, who was head of the other partie: being come to battell neere vnto the towne of Seuille, Agila was defeated. Hereupon the Gothes considering, that by reason of their diffentions, the Romanes, and Spaniards lying vnder their authoritie, might invade them, to their great prejudice, they agreed in the end, and did acknowledge Athanasgilde for their king, Agila hauing beene vanquished and slaine at Merida. They hold, that this king did secretly detest the profession of the Arrians, and fauoured the Christians. He dyed at Toledo, of a naturall death, hauing reigned foureteene yeares: during the which he had many encounters with the Romanes and their partie, with variable successe. In his time the Sueses of Gallicia left the Arrian sect, and submitted themselves to the Christians Church. Theodemir was the first king of Gallicia which embraced the true religion, by the persuation of a bishop, or an Abbot of Dume, called Martin, who reformed the churches of Gallicia, by the Counsels held at Bracar and at Lugo. Brunichilde, who was daughter to Athanasgilde, was married to Siebert king of Mets, to be a plague to France.

12. Luiba, or Liuba.

23 THe Gothes disagreeing in the election of a king, the royall seat was vacant for some moneths: in the end they chose *Lui*ba at Narbone, who admitted Leouigilde his brother to be partner in the kingdome, giuing him the gouernment of the hither Spaine. This Leouigilde tooke to wife the widow of Athanagilde, called Gisuintha; but he had had another wife, which was Theodofa daughter to Seuerian duke of Carthagene, by whom hee had Hermingilde and Ricard. This Seuerian of whom we haue made mention, is held to be the sonne of Theodorick king of the Ostrogothes in Italie: and the Spanissh authors say, that he had many sonnes and daughters by Theodora his wife, issued from the blood royall, all which were Saints and men of the Church, as S. Leandre and S. Sifforde bishops of Seuille, Fulgentius bishop of Astigi, and then of Carthagene; Florence an Abbess, whom some call Iustina, and others. *Lui*ba hauing reigned 3 yeres, died at Narbone, leauing no other memorie of him, for he was not warlike.

14. Leouigilde.

Ann. 567. 24 Leonigilde remained sole king of the Gothes, both on this side and beyond the Pyrenees, after the decease of Luiba his brother: He did overrun the territories of the Bastitanes, and of Malaca, which is the country of Grenado and Mutcia at this day. Hee took

A rooke Afinode, or rather Affidon, a verie strong towne, by a composition made with one Framedanc, who commaunded there, and added it to the Gothes kingdome. This place had a garrison of Romane souldiours, and had defended themselves till then vnder the maiestic of the Romane empire, Iustine the young sitting then in the imperiall seat at Constantinople. Leonigilde did many other exploits of war against the Romanes and their partisans in Spaine, Exploits of Leonigilde. and did much enlarge the Gothes dominions. Cordoua (which they had often attempted in and did much surprisid in the night, many towns & castles forced, with great slaughter) was by this king surprisid in the night, many towns & castles forced, with great slaughter of the people. Vpon the frontiers of Gaule hee made warre against them of Sauoy and Dauphaine, if writers erre not. He diuided his kingdomes betwix his sonnes Hermengilde and Dionard, the which he had by his first wife.

B Ricared, the which he had by his first wife.
Miro king of the Sueues in Gallicia, made warre at that time against the Vafcons, which are the Nauarrais and Bifcaines: but Leouigilde stayd him, and sent his owne forces to the Cantabrians, towards the Ocean (that is Bifcaie) from whence he chased all such as had vsurped any townes or feigniories, reducing in a manner all those pettie potentates which were risen in Spaine, to the prejudice of the Romane empire, vnder the crowne and scepter of the Visigothes. Hee made a peace notwithstanding for a time with Miro, by meanes of his embassadours: So hauing enlarged his dominions in Spaine, he gaue himselfe to ciuile affaires.

C He built a towne called Ripol, in the hither Spain, beautified it with buildings, and endowed it with priuiledges. He also built the towne of Victoria in Bifcaie, which is not Victoria at this day. He married his eldest sonne to Iugunde daughter to Sigebert king of the French: he caused a Councell to be called at Toledo, of the Arrian bishops, where he heapt erroure vpon error, forcing the Chriſtians to be rebaptized, after the Arrian manner, which was, In the name of the Father, to the Sonne, by the holy Ghost: and not, In the name of the Father, the Sonne, and the holy Ghost: meaning thereby to make three effences of that which is but one, distinct in three qualities. Herein he was assisted by Vincent bishop of Sarragoſſe, an Apostat, against whom Seuerus a Chriſtian bishop of Malaca did write.

posat, against whom Seuerus a Christian binopor Malaca did write.
 As Leonigilde busied himselfe about these matters, some good and profitable, others pro-phane and wicked, his peace was troubled by the rebellion of his owne sonne, who either through desire to raigne alone, or otherwise, and by the perswasion of Goswinthe his mother in law, he seized vpon Seuille, and many other places; and leuid men to fortifie himselfe against his father : who hauing put a great armie to field, marched to Seuille, to suppress the rasi-nesse of his ill aduised sonne, besieged the towne on all sides, and began to batter it with all sorts of engines. Miroking of Gallicia came to this siege, with good troupes, as a friend and allie to aid him. The auintient towne of Italica was not farre from Seuille : for we read, that Leonigilde made his store-houise for the warre there during the siege, hauing caused the walls, which were ruined, to be repaired, the which did much annoy them of Seuille; from the which he turned the riuer of Betis, and prest the besieged by continuall batteries, assaults, cutting off their victuals, and all other acts of hostilitie : so as in the end he tooke it, and soone after the towne of Cordoua also, in the which his sonne had fortified himselfe, with all the other places which he had vsurped. Being thus spoiled of all, and deprived of his dignitie, Hermengilde was confined to Valence. This ciuile warre did afflikt Spaine, more than all the former, as the Spaniards write.

25 During the siege of Seuille, Miro king of Galicia died, to whom Eburic his sonne succeeded: but Andeca seized vpon the realme of the Sueues, married Sisguta, left by king Miro, tooke Eburic, and shut him vp in a cloister of Monkes. To reuenge this iniurie, and also to make his profit thereof, Leouigilde entred into Galicia with an armie, tooke Andeca, caused him to be polled, and sent him to Badaios, to liue for euer in a cloister. He reduced Galicia to a prouince, and joynted it to the Gothes kingdome, the which had continued an hundred seuentie and seuen yeares.

*Hermengilde a Christian slain
by his father's commandment,
being an Arrian*

War between the
the French and
the Gothes, for
the death of Hermengilde.

Myracles.

A counterfeit begger diuinely punished.

Birth of Mahomet.

Anno 580.

doth witnesse: and it is likely that this prince was drawne vnto the true doctrine by Leandre G bishop of Seuille, and by his wife Iugunde a French woman, whom, they say, he, put in the beginning of the ciuile warres, into the hands of those that gouerned the lands of the empire in Spaine, vnder Maurice the emperour, being newly brought in bed of a sonne, fearing the threats and furie of his father: and that after her husbands death the Romanes caused her to passe into Africke with her little infant, where she died; but the child was carried to Constantinople. Childebert king of France, to reuenge the wrong done vnto his brother in law, tooke armes against the Gothes, and hoping to recouer his sister and his nephew, hee made a league with the emperour Maurice. Against the French which did forrage Languedoc, was sent Ricared the other sonne of Leonigilde, who repulst them with great losse of their men, entering into their territories, where he tooke a great spoile.

They speake of many myracles during the raigne of this king, which God did in fauour and confirmation of the Christian religion, against the Arrians and their sect, the which hee had decreed should haue an end with this king Leonigilde. The ciuile warre being (as we haue said) hot in Spaine, the armie of Leonigilde pursuing his sonne, and passing by the territories of Valencia and Murcia, the Monkes of the Abbey of Saint Martin in those marches, being terrified, abandoned their Abbot, and fled all into an island of the sea neere adjoining. The foulidours being entred into the Abbey, and finding the Abbot all alone, being a verie deuout and religious man, and crooked with age, they did him many outrages: one of them hauing drawne out his sword to cut off his head, he fell downe starke dead; the which did so terrifie the rest, as they presently fled. This being reported vnto king Leonigilde, he commanded, that all the goods which had beene taken in that monasterie, should be restored. An Arrian bishop meaning to deceiue the king (who reproached him, that the Arrians did no myracles) suborned one of his sect, who could counterfeit himselfe blind, causing him to stand in the way whereas he knew the king should passe: there this gallant began to crie out, and to entreat this bishop which did accompanie the king, that he would make him recouer his sight by his prayers. The bishop approached, and laying his hands arrogantly vpon his eyes, the king being present, and attending to see this myracle, it happened, that hee which did counterfeit himselfe blind, lost his sight in good earnest; and withall was so full of paine in that part, as detesting the bishop and his counsaile, hee confessed openly before the king and his traine, That the bishop had induced him to act this tragedie, and had corrupted him with money. Many other signes are written to haue beene seene in those times, the which we will not call into question, for that the end and vse of myracles, is to witnesse, and to giue credit to the word of God, and his true doctrine, which was then disgraced by the Arrian princes.

Spaine was furnished with many learned and holy men, whilst that the Arrians did raigne in Africke, and did persecute the Christians. They make mention of one Donat an Abbot, who passed out of Africke into Spaine, with about 70 Monkes, and a goodly librarie, where he was the founder of the monasterie Seruitane: and that they were entertained by a rich ladie called Minica, who then built the first monasterie at Serabis, which is Xatua. This Donat did first set downe certaine rules and orders for a monasticall life among them; for vntill that time they were not tyed by any vowes, neither had they liued in cloisters, but were dispersed in woods and desarts, leading a solitarie life, from whence he retired them. Leandre bishop of Seuille, was then famous for his learning and holinesse, a great friend to S. Gregorie, whom he had knowne at Constantinople: of which friendship, they say, that the image of the virgine Marie, which is in great, yea in superstitious veneration in these dayes at Guadalupe, is a witnesse, and that S. Gregorie lent it to Leandre.

As one kind of Antichrist should haue an end, so it was necessarie, that (to exercise the Church of God) others should come. Wherefore during the raigne of Leonigilde, Mahomet the great seducer was borne, with whose doctrine the Arabians did a while after infect Spaine; and soone after that grew the quarell for the Primacie, betwixt the bishops of Constantinople and Rome. And as among those which made profession of the Christian religion there were many abuses which had beene receiued and embraced, or else dissembled by the most learned and religious, the rashnesse of the one, and the negligence of the other, gaue place to impietie, the which hath since preuailed in the world, vsing force with the one hand, and fraud with the other. This was in the yeare 580, which the Spaniards account of

of

A of their Æra: yet others say, That it was in the yeare of Christ 591, that this scourge of Gods Church was borne in Arabia, of the race of Agar and Ismael. His father was called Abdalla, or Abdela, his mother Emina. A little before the death of Leonigilde, Amalaric the tyrant would haue made himselfe king of Gallicia, but he was taken by the kings lieutenants in those marches.

Leonigilde hauing raigned eightene yeares, dyed at Toledo: who by the report of Saint Gregorie, repented himselfe of the rigour and crueltie he had vsed to his sonne Hermengilde, being desirous to reforme himselfe to the pure religion; and dying, recommended his other sonne Ricared to Leandre, intreating him to instruct him as he had done his other sonne: and he commaunded Ricared to call home the Christian bishops which he had banished. He was the first king of the Gothes raigning in Spaine, which vsed a robe of purple, or other royall ornaments: for vntill that time the kings of that nation were apparelled like vnto the other nobles. He first of all began to heape vp treasure, and filled his cofers with spoils of temples, confiscations, and other violences vsed to good men, whereof many were put to death by him. He corrected the lawes made by Euric his predecessor, and reduced them into better forme.

15. Ricared.

C 26 Ricared being crowned by Leandre, as Luke Tudenfis writes, hee was instructed in the true Christian religion, the first yere of his raigne, and preuailed so with mild words and strong reasons, as hee perswaded many of the Arrian bishops to leaue that heresie, and to follow the better partie; and so consequently the noblemen & common people. He ordained, That the goods which had been taken and confiscated for that cause, should be restored; and of a destroyer he became a builder of churches. He put Sisbert the murtherer of his brother Hermengilde ignominiously to death: he discovered & suppressed the conspiracy of bishop Sunnas, and of Sugga, Arrians, who would haue made themselves tyrants. The bishop was banished, and Sugga hands cut off, and then confined into Gallicia. There was another conspiracy auerued of bishop Vlila, and of queene Goswintha, against Ricared, and punished: Vlila was banished, and Goswintha died soone after: she had beene a perpetual enemy to the Christians. The French being come into Languedoc with a great armie of about threescore thousand men, vnder a captaine called Desiderius, and then vnder Boson, being sent by Guntran king of Orleans, Ricared sent Claude duke of Lusitania against them, who obtained one of the greatest and most memorable victories that euer was, neere vnto Carcassonne: For we read, that with 300 men or thereabouts, he defeated all this great power of the French, and tooke all their baggage.

The fourth yeare of his raigne he caused a Councell to be called at Toledo, which was the third; at the which there were assembled threescore and two bishops of his realme, of either side of the Pyrene mountains, or threescore and ten, according vnto some. There he did renounce and abjure the Arrian heresie, and Badda his wife, with all the noblemen Gothes, did the like, all confessing the equalitie of the three persons in one diuinitie. The Metropolitans at this Councell were: 1 Mausona of Merida. 2 Leandre of Seuille, whom Luke Tudenfis calls Primat and the Popes Legat. 3 Euphemius of Toledo. 4 Pantard of Bracara. 5 Nigith of Narbona. 6 Stephen of Tarracone.

These were the Archbishops and Metropolitans, by the which the Arrian heresie was condemned, with the which the noblemen Gothes had beene abused two hundred and threene yeares. At this Councell did preside Leandre bishop of Seuille, and Eutropius Abbot of the monasterie of Serui, afterwards bishop of Valence. Among other decrees it was ordained, That no Iew should be admitted to any publike charge. The acts of this Councell were not onely allowed by the king, but also confirmed vnder his hand. Since that time the custome is in Spaine, that euerie one that presents himselfe vnto the Communion, is bound to rehearse the articles of the Apostles Creed after the priest. This was in the yeare of our Sauour five hundred eightie nine, and adding thereunto thirtie eight yeares, it makes the 627 of the Spaniards Æra. King Ricared being thus in peace, and imploying his time about matters of religion in Spain, he discovered domestike trecheries, which did much trouble him:

Repentance of Leonigilde.

Anno 585.

Ricared of a destroyer becomes a nurse of the churches.

An admirable victory, and scarce credible.

A Councell of Toledo, where the Gothes ab-jured the Arrian
heresie.

Anno 589.

Argemund a traitor punished

him: for a chamberlaine of his, of the number of his captaines, called Argemund, attempted against his estate and life, to raigne in his place. The enterprife being proued, his partisans were executed, and he also, after that he had beene whipped, and led vpon an asse through the citie of Toledo, to serue for an example to all subiects, not to rebell against their princes for ambition.

Reliques.

The Iewes did what they could to procure the king to abolish the decree of the Councell made against them: and as in a maner all that nation haue euer giuen themselves to the trade of merchandise, and are therefore full of money, they offered a great summe to haue it effected: but the king continued constant, and they must haue patience. This holy resolution of king Ricared and his nobilitie, was ill seconded by the Pope and the Prelats of those times, being already accustomed to make superfluous shewes, and oftentimes merchandise of external things, which were of small vse for pietie. The king sent royall presents to pope Gregorie the first, who was called Holy, and an Angell vpon earth: and he requited him with reliques, with a linke of the chaine wherewith Saint Peter had beene bound by the necke, when he suffered martyredome; of the wood of the verie crosse, of Saint John Baptists haire, and such other singularities, with an Archbishops cloke for Leandre bishop of Seuille. These were the exercises of pietie, which were then too much vsed among Christians: At that time there was another Councell held at Seuille, of eight bishops, whereas Leandre their pastor did preside.

Councell at Seuille.

Learned and religious bishops.

In Spaine there did flourish in those times, besides the aboue-named bishops, John abbot of Valclaire, who was afterwards bishop of Gironne, a Goth by race, but borne at Scalabis in Lusitania, who hath written a Chronicle vnto the yeare five hundred and ninetie: Fulgentius bishop of Astigi, then of Carthage, brother to Leandre, a man well scene in the Greeke, Latine, Arabike, and Syriack tongues, and hath written many bookes: Senerius bishop of Carthage, Licinian of Malaca, and others. Florentine the sister of Leandre, was Prioresse of fortie Nunnes in the towne of Astigi.

Queene Badda, who was daughter to king Arthur of great Britaine, dyed; after which Ricared married Clotofinde sister to king Childebert of Mets: by meanes of which mariage a peace was concluded betwixt the Gothes and the French.

Pope Gregorie would not haue the name of Primat, yet in the meane time he did exercise a iurisdiction in Spaine: for Iannarius being deposed from his bishopricke of Malaca, by the praictises of some of his enemies, he sent one called John to take knowledge of the cause, who with Apostolike authoritie, restored him to his bishopricke, and punished his aduersaries. Ricared hauing held the kingdome of the Gothes in Spaine and in Gaule fifteene yeares, dyed at Toledo, much lamented of all men: for he had reigned verie mildly, so as they called him Father of the people. He reduced the Gothike lawes into order, enlarged his dominions, hauing bene alwayes in armes against the Romanes, and their partisans which remained in Spaine: he was verie deuout and bountifull to the Clergie, so as hee was commended for a verie religious prince, especially for that he had giuen vnto the church of S. Felix at Gironne, the crowne of gold which he ware vpon his head: but, that which is of more esteeme, he purged Spaine of all heresies.

The death of Ricared: and his vertues.

16. Luiba 2, and Victorix 17.

Anno 601.

27 *T*O Ricared succeeded his son Luiba, or Liuba, Maurice reigning then at Constantinople. Some Spaniards say, That he was a bastard, others denie it, and giue him two brethren, Suinshila and Geila. Victorie seized vpon the Gothes kingdome, and taking this yong prince, who was but fixteene yeares old, he cut off his right hand, and in the end slew him the second yeare of his raigne. Then dyed Leandre, to whom succeeded Isidore his brother at Seuille.

Crueltie of Victorix to yong Luiba.

28 Victorie was an vnfortunate king, for in many encounters which he had with the Romanes, and those that held their partie in Spaine, he was still beaten. Moreover hee strined to aduance the Arrian heresie againe, and in these miserable designes reigned seven yeares. He married his daughter Hermenberge to Theodorice king of Mets, who could neuer know her, wherefore he sent her back to her father a virgine vn corrupted: and they say that Brunichilde, Theodorices grandmother, had bewitched him, and made him vn able to vse his wife, whom he hated,

A hated, Theodorice being otherwise verie licentious, and had made good prooffe with other women. We read, that during the raigne of Victorie, in the yeare six hundred and fife, Mahumet came into Spaine, to preach his doctrine at Cordoua; and that being discouered as they went to seize on him, he fled away so secretly, as no man knew what became of him. But we know, that Mahumet proceeded to the publication of his doctrine after a more violent meanes, hauing by money and persuations corrupted the Arabian theecues, whose armes he employed to propagate his errors, among other nations, vnder the empire of Heraclius: yet it is not impossible, that Mahumet, being then about fife and twentie yeares old, seruing arich marchant of Arabia, whose widow he after married, should come into Spaine for his masters affaires, and to haue giuen some knowledge of the poysion which lay in his breast. King Victorie (whom others call Deteric, and some Bertric) as he had put the innocent prince Liuba miserably to death, was by a iust reuenge miserably slaine by his owne people, as he sat at the table: a base king, who did nothing aduance the kingdome of the Gothes, but in taking the towne of Siguenfa from the Romanes.

A discourse of Mahumet not very credible.The miserable end of the tyrant Victorix.

18. Gundamir.

29 *T*HE Gothes after the death of Victorie, created Gundamir king, who came to the crowne about the sixt yeare of the empire of Phocas, in the yeare 610: his wife was called Hilduare. This king at his conming made the churches sanctuaries, forbidding to take or force any criminall person that had fled thither: the which was done at the pursute of a Councell then held at Toledo, of foureteene bishops, and other Clergie men, Aurassius being bishop there: in the which the Archbishop of Toledo was declared Primat of Spaine. All writers make not mention of this Councell, but onely (as the Spaniards say) there are memorials found thereof at Toledo: and it is written, That the rights of this Metropolitane were debated there, where he had his Suffraganes assigned him in all the prouince of Carpetania, which did comprehend Carthagene: so as in this regard the Metropolitane of Toledo had then a greater iurisdiction than at this day. Isidore of Seuille, Innocent of Merida, Eusebius of Tarracone, and Beniamin of Dumes, among others, assisted at this Councell. Hee had ware against the Valscons or Nauarrois, and against the Romanes or their partisans with happie successe. He reigned two yeares, and dyed at Toledo, of his naturall death.

Anno 610.

Liberties of Churches.

19. Sisebuth.

30 Sisebuth succeeded Gundamir, a wise and valiant prince, learned and eloquent (as the Spaniards say.) He chased away the Iewes which would not bee baptized, wherewith France was soone filled: but they were againe forced to flie, Dagobert the French king hauing made an edict, by the which they were injoynd to conformance themselves to the Christian religion, vpon paine of death. Sisebuth employed his time to conquer the townes, castles, forts, straits and passages of the mountaines, which were yet held by the Romane garrisons, and did in a manner make himselfe master of all Spaine, Cesarinus commanding there for the Romanes.

Anno 612.

The zeale of religion was great in many at that time in Spaine, but most of them wanted the true knowledge. The Church of Toledo was gouerned by Heladius, who of a Courtier became a Monke, and from thence had bene taken and aduanced, in his age, to the Archiepiscopall dignitie, the which was now growne full of state, but not such as it hath been since. Agapite, or Agapie, being also turned from a fouldiour to a Monke, had bene made bishop of Corduba, not for any learning hee had, but for meere zeale. The nourishment he gaue to his diocefans, and his religious exercises, were in the inuention and veneration of reliques of the bodies of martyres: whereunto the world was then more addicted, than to know the grounds of their Faith. Yet there was a Councell held at Seuille, of eight bishops, against the heretikes which were called Acephali, or without a head, the which denied the truth of the two natures, diuine and humane, in Iesus Christ, where as a certaine Syrian bishop, a great defender of that heresie, was vanquished by the strong arguments of Isidore.

A Councell at Seuille.

dorus bishop of that place, and President of the Council. In all the Ecclesiastical orders which were made in Spaine, during the raigne of king Sisebut, he interposed his authoritie. He forced Cecilus bishop of Mentefa, to give a reason, for that abandoning his bishopricke he had made himselfe a Monke: and he depofed Eusebius bishop of Barcelona, for that he had suffered certaine Comedians to make playes of the false Pagan gods. At the said Council of Seuille, it was decreed, That Nunnes should not talke to any man, except the Abbesse to the Abbot or Monke which had the charge of their monasterie, and that before one or two witnesses. Mahumets sect began then to spread in Africke, which was in the yere six hundred and twentie of our Sauour, and the six hundredth fiftie and eight of the Spaniards Era; the which did run wonderfully throughout all Asia, and part of Europe, in a short time: whilest that the Pastors of the Church of Christ did busie themselves to adorne their exterior Hierarchie, and to conuert it into a mundane Principalitie; and that the summe of the doctrine of the Gospell was reduced by them to build churches and chappels, and to heape vp rents and reuenues, to seeke out and oftentimes to supposse the dead bodies of Saints, and that which had belonged vnto them in this corporall life, to reuerence them after an extraordinary manner, with other such like traditions; which approached neere to impietie, couering all with a cloake of well meaning. We read in the acts of Sisebut, That he made a law, by the which he cursed all his successours kings, which should suffer any Christian to be held as a slaue, or to serue a Iew. There is another law of his found, which ordaines, That those which should not go to the warre when the armie should march, or should flie from the enemy, should bee for euer noted with infamie. This last hath bene since corrected, as too seuer. He was happy in warre, subdued them of Asturia, who had rebelled, and triumphed twice for the victories he obtained against the Romanes: To conclude, he was so mild and courteous, euen vnto his enemies, as being prisoners he paid their ransoms to his owne men, and sent them home free; so as he exhausted his treasure in the redeeming of prisoners. Hee built the church of Saint Leocadia at Toledo, and hauing reigned eight yeares, he died, leaving Ricared his sonne, successour in the realme; but verie young, and of a short life, whom they doe not put in the number of the kings of Spaine. Some write, that he liued but three moneths after him, others seuen.

20. Suintilla.

Anno 621.
Monarchie of the Gothes in Spaine.
Royaltie of the Gothes electiue.
Suintilla deposed for his vice.
The power of bishops, ballanceing that of kings.
31 THe Gothes did chuse Suintilla for their king, being sonne to the first Ricared. This was the first king of the Gothes, which obtained the absolute monarchie of Spaine, and wholly dispossessed the Romanes. By that which hath bene said they conclude, That among the Gothes they did not raigne by right of succession from father to sonne; but those were chosen kings among them, which were held worthie to gouerne: which election was made by the nobilitie and the people: and if any one did affect that dignitie by any other vnlawfull meanes, he was excommunicated, and rejected from the companie of Christians, as it appeareth by the fift Council of Toledo. The Vascos inhabiting the countrey which is now called Nauarre, were entred into Arragon, whom he suppressed, and forced them to build at their owne charges, the towne called Olit, or Oligil, neere to Tafalla (which hath since bene the kings houses in Nauarre) to keepe them in awe. We find that the towne of Fontarbie was the worke of this king Suintilla, called properly Ondarriua, which signifies in the Basques language, sand of the riuer. He admitted his sonne Ricamire to a part of the gouernment. In the beginning hee was a good prince, but in the end hee grew exceeding couetous and cruel: wherefore the Gothes made him to resigne his kingdome, the which Sisenand his aduersarie obtained, with the consent of the people, and with the helpe of king Dagobert of France, who sent Abondant and Venerand, two of his captaines, into Spaine, with forces which they had leuiued of the nobilitie of Bourgogne. Suintilla was not onely deprived of the crowne, but also excommunicated by the bishops (whose power at that time began to equall that of kings) at the fourth Council of Toledo, where they did interdict him, Geilan his brother, with their wiues and children, the communion and fellowship of the Church, and the possession of their goods, gotten by violent and tyranous meanes. Suintilla reigned ten yeares.

21 Sisenand

21. Sisenand.

Anno 631.
4 Council at Toledo.
32 Sisenand being seated in the royall throne, by the aid of the French, the fourth Council of Toledo was celebrated, of sixtie bishops, or sixtie seuen, according vnto some, and as others say, by seuentie: whither among the rest came Isidorus of Seuille, Iustus of Toledo, who did preside, Julian of Bracar, Stephen of Merida, Andax of Tarracone, Silua of Narbona, all Archbishops. In this Council it was decreed, That from thenceforth the Iews should not be forced to make themselves Christians: for the spirit by the which the doctrine is apprehended, is not to be forced, but perswaded. The Iewes were in the meane time debarr'd of all publike charges, least they should thereby doe iniurie vnto the Christians. Clergie men were exempt from all politike care, that they might with more liberty attend that which did belong vnto their spirituall charge; and as Baleus writes, who hath taken it out of Isidorus, lawfull marriage was restored vnto the Clergie, and the vse of concubines forbidden: And it was decreed, That no priest should be admitted, before he were thirtie yeares old. Yet were these good and wholesome constitutions, mingled with externall ceremonies, which were in great credit in those dayes. Some good men had then care of the Church, but there were others which were violent and ill instructed. They say, that Iustus Archbishop of Toledo was strangled in his bed, by some of his owne Clergie: he was a man without modestie, and so violent in his actions, as before his death his fences failed him. King Sisenand died nineteene dayes after the Archbishop Iustus, hauing reigned about six yeares. The Gothes lawes and ordinances in Spaine, were also reformed in this kings time, with the authoritie of the Council aboue mentioned, in the which was receiued the razing of Clergie mens haire in manner of a crowne.

22. Cinthilla.

Anno 637.
5 Council of Toledo.
33 Cinthilla reigned after Sisenand; in the first yere of whose raigne the fift Council was held at Toledo, Eugenius the Archbishop of that place presiding, where there assembled 24 bishops, among the which the vertue and doctrine of Braule bishop of Sarraosse was famous. Eugenius was also learned, especially in Astrologie: The same yere Isidorus Archbishop of Seuille died, of whom the Spaniards make great esteeme, for his sanctitie and learning, and for the number of booke which he hath written. The yere following there was another Council held at Toledo, whither came 44 bishops, and six suffraganes, or vicars; being in all as some write, 52; where Eugenius did also preside. There was a perpetual law imposed vpon the kings of Spaine, not to suffer any one to liue within their dominions, that was not a Catholike, the which their kings should solemnely sweare before they were crowned: and if any king should goe against that law which he had thus sworne, he should be excommunicate and accursed. Thus did those reuerend Fathers labour to draw the sick and languishing to their saluation, after the example of our Sauour Iesus Christ and his Apostles. Cinthilla dyed the fourth yere of his raigne.

23. Tulca.

Anno 641.
34 After him Tulca was chosen king, endowed with all the vertues requisite for a prince, but he died the second yere of his raigne, as the Spaniards write: but Sigebert saith, that the Visigothes did reject him, for his lightnesse and youth; and that hee was made a Clergie man.

24. Cindasunthe and his sonne.

Anno 742.
35 Cindasunthe tooke the place of Tulca, and reigned six yeares alone ouer the Gothes, and foure yeares and seuen moneths with his sonne Flavius Reccesunthe. The bishops of Rome were now inthronized in their Primat, & began to force obedience throughout all

O ij

Chri-

Pope Primas Christendome, no lesse from princes and kings, than from their fellow bishops: wherefore to settle the Primat in Spaine, they were forced to haue a Bull and permission from Pope Theodore the first, or Martin the first, then reigning; by the which this primacie was referred to the election of the bishops of that prouince. Vntill that time the Archbishop of Seuille had held this ranke, rather of honour than of power: but it falling out, that Theodisque the Archbishop, a Grecian borne, a man more leamed in the tongues, than religious, seeing himselfe pursued by the other bishops and prelats of Spaine, being accused to haue corrupted the workes of Isidorus, who was held a Saint, and therefore deposed from his Archbishopricke in open Councell, he was so transported, as hauing abandoned the Christian religion, he retired himselfe into Africke with the Mahumetists, the Primacie of Spaine was then transferred from Seuille to Toledo, whereas the seventh Synode was celebrated, by fortie bishops, the first yeare of the raigne of Cindasunthe, when as he receiued his sonne for a companion and assistant in the government of his estate, seeking thereby to make the kingdom of the Gothes hereditarie. This young prince was held verie deuout and studious of diuinitie; but about all things he was curious to build and enrich churches. During their raigne there liued another Eugenius, successour to the Archbishop of Toledo, about mentioned, famous for his sanctitie of life and doctrine, aduanced by force by the king to the Archbishopricke.

*Seuille yields the Primacie to Toledo.
7 Councell at Toledo.*

King Cindasunthe dyed of poyson, as some beleue, hauing reigned ten yeares, or thereabouts: he and his wife are interred in the monasterie of S. Romane, at this day called Hormisga, betwixt Toro and Tordeuillas, vpon theriuier of Duero.

25. Reccesunthe.

*Anno 673.
8 Councell of Toledo.*

36 Reccesunthe his sonne, reigned alone, and soone after his fathers decease there was a Councell held at Toledo of eight and fortie bishops, and ten vicars, of such as had lawfull lets and could not come; there were some abbots, and many earles and dukes did assist there. In those times, earles were of greater dignitie than dukes. In this Councell, being the eight, it was decreed, That they should abstaine from eating flesh in Lent, without leaue, in cases of ineuitable necessitie, vpon paine of excommunication, and not to eat any flesh in a yeare after: so much they did regard these accessaries of religion, confirming and amplifying in the meane time their authoritie with the people.

Irene a chaste virgin.

In Lusitania certaine lewd and cruell persons sought to rauish a virgine called Irene, against whom she made such resistance, as being impatient in their damnable lust, they slew her, and cast her into the riuer of Nabanin. Her bodie was carried to the towne of Salabis, the which changed the name, and is called Saint Irene; an argument of great sanctitie, seeing she preferred her chastitie before her life. The chiefe of these lustfull murderers was called Britand.

Decree of the Councell of Toledo.

Portamus Archbishop of Bracar, was not so vertuous: for the celibate of Clergie men being then in request, and the children begotten by them declared incapable to inherit their fathers goods, and were deliuered for slaues to churches, by the ninth Councell held at Toledo, in the seventh yeare of Reccesunthe, he fell to be loofe of life: yet hee did acknowledge it openly in the Councell following, held at Toledo, which was the tenth, and did willingly resigne his Archbishopricke; to whom Fruosus succeeded, a man of a noble familie, being then bishop of Dume, the founder of many monasteries and chappells. The eight yeare of the raigne of Reccesunthe Spaine was much terrified, for that there appeared starres in the firmament at noone day, and the Sunne was eclipsed.

Heretikes Heludians.

There came two heretikes, called Theude and Pelagius, out of Gothike Gaule into Spaine, who denied the perpetuall virginitie of Marie the mother of our Sauour; renewing the heresie of Heluidius: the which were confuted by Alphonfus, nephew and successour to Eugenius in the Archbishopricke of Toledo, who wrot a booke vpon that argument. Whereupon the Spaniards say, that the virgine Marie appeared vnto him: and to this apparition they adde the gift of a cope, to weare when he should say Masse, the which they affirme is kept at Toledo, or at Oquedo; but they know not well at which of these two places it remains

maines

A maines: for being not lawfull for any one to vse it after the death of Alphonfus, it hath remained inuifible. To this Archbishop, they say, that Saint Leocadia did also appeare, who reuealed vnto him the place where his bodie was buried, and had lyen many yeares hidden. Such graue testimonies haue they of the holinesse of this Archbishop Alphonfus, surnaming him Chrysostome, the Anchor of the Faith, attributing vnto him other like epithites, by reason of his learning and pietie.

Apparitions and reuelations beleeued by the Spaniards.

There is no other thing found written of this king Reccesunthe, being credible, that hauing no warres, he did not much trouble himselfe, leauing all the affaires of state and Clergie to bee managed by the Prelats and frequent Councels: yet there are some lawes found made by him. Hauing reigned nineteene yeares and three moneths, he dyed at Toledo, leauing two brethren, Theofred, who was father to Roderic, the last king of the Gothes in Spaine and Iafila. He was interred in the towne which in old time was called Gertic, and now Bamba, in the territorie of Palenza.

26. Bamba.

37 The same day that Reccesunthe dyed, Bamba before desired by the noblemen Gothes, was chosen king. Some say, that he would neuer haue receiued this honour and charge but by constraint; and that refusing it absolutely, there was a nobleman among the Gothes, which drew his sword, and threatened to kill him, if he did not yeeld to the Gothes intreaties: whereupon he condescended, more for feare, than for any desire to raigne, and was crowned by Quirin, or Quirice, Archbishop of Toledo, in our Ladies church; where they report, that there was scene coming out of his head, from among his haire, a vapour like smoke, in forme of a pillar, going vpward. There he made a confession of the Catholique Faith, confirmed the ciuile lawes and ordinances of the kings his predecessours, and receiued a solemne oath from the people. These ceremonies were scarce ended, when as they had newes, That the earle of Nismes, called Hilperic, or Hilderic, concerning the ordinances of the precedent kings of the Gothes, had brought the Iewes againe into the countrey, and made all Gothike Gaule in a manner to rebell against the king. And for that Arege bishop of Nismes had contradicted him in this excessse, he had chased him away, and against the canons had consecrated another by two bishops of his faction. Gumild bishop of Maguelone did counsell and assist him in these actions. Wherefore Bamba to suppress the insolencie of this earle, sent a captaine named Paul, allyed to the deceased king, but faithlesse and treacherous to his prince; who turned the armie which had bene giuen him, against him, and made an agreement with the enemie, causing himselfe to be crowned king at Narbone, where he set vpon his head the crowne which king Ricared had giuen to Saint Felix church at Gironne. Hee drew vnto his partie Rasmonde duke of Tarracone, and Hildagise, who was Gardingue (which was an office of the Crowne) and vsed all the treacheries hee could deuise against king Bamba. He spoyled all the churches of Languedoc, and fortified himselfe with men which hee had leuiued in Fraunce and Gascoine. But as such attempts doe seldome prosper, so this succeeded ill with him: for Bamba hauing raised great forces in Spaine, came against him, and in lesse than six monethes did happily end a most difficult warre: He tooke Barcelona, Gironne, and Narbone, the which he besieged both by sea and land; then Magdelone, Agde, Beziers, and in the end Nismes, whereas the chiefe of this rebellion with the rest of his faction fell into his hands, the same day twelue monethes that hee came vnto the Crowne. Hee repaired the ruines which had bene made at Nismes, and throughout all Gothike Gaule, and caused restitution to be made of that which had bene taken out of the churches. At the intreatie of Arceband Archbishop of Narbone, he gaue the offenders their liues, reseruing to himselfe all other punishment. He repulsed Loupa Commaunder of certaine French bands, neere vnto Beziers. These things being happily performed by him, he returned to Toledo, triumphing, and carrying his rebels in pompe before him, hauing their beards and heads shauen, bare legged, attired in sackcloth, and mounted vpon Cammels. Among others Paul the chiefe of the rebels, carrying a crowne of pitched leather,

*Anno 673.
Bamba made king against his will: a rare example.*

Hilderic earle or Governour of Narbone.

Disloyaltie of Paul, Bamba's captaine.

Defeat of the rebels.

Punishment of the rebels.

leather, followed by a long traine of his confederats, was led in shew, and exposed to be scorned of all men, and in the end they were all put into darke filthie dungeons, where they miserably ended their dayes.

These troubles being pacified, king Bamba caused the walles of Toledo to bee built, and fortified them with towers and bulwarkes, in one of the which were written these Latine verses.

Erexit fauore Deo Rex inclutus urbem, Bamba, sue celebrem protendens gentis honorem.

And vpon a port neere vnto the bridge called Alcantara:

Vos Domini sancti, quorum hic presentia fulget, Hanc urbem, & plebem solito seruare fauore.

11 Council of Toledo,

He caused the eleuenth Council of Toledo to be held, vnder Quirice, or Quirin, Archbishop of that place, and Primat of Spaine; where there were fixteene bishops present, and many deputies for others that were absent. They had bene many yeares without calling of any Council, wherewith the Fathers had bene much troubled, this was in the yeare 675: there king Bamba hauing caused the acts of the kings his predecessours to be sought out, according to that which they had decreed, and with the consent of the Fathers, he assigned to euerie diocesse the bounds of his jurisdiction. The bishopricks of Lugo and Leon were declared exempt, and not subiect to any Metropolitane, as they had bene vntill that time. Another Council was held at Bracar: these were prouinciall Councils, which were to be held euerie yeare; and at certaine times they were to call a generall Council of all the bishops of the Gothes kingdome, of either side of the Pyrene mountains, the which was done at Toledo the chieftowne.

Provinciall Councils annual

Arabians first attempt vpon Spaine,

Bamba poisoned by Eruinge.

In this kings raigne the Arabians holding Africke, began to inuade Spaine: they had a fleet at sea of two hundred threescore and ten vessels, the which by the diligence and valour of Bamba were in a manner all burnt, and the Arabians put to the sword. They did then spoile a great part of the countrey along the coast. There was in the Court a nobleman called Eruinge, issued from a daughter of king Cindaufinthe, and a gentleman of Greece, called Ardauaste, who being chased from Constantinople, had fled into Spaine, where he had bene well entertained, and honoured with this allyance. This Eruinge being ambitious of commaund, poisoned king Bamba, so as he became madde; for the curing whereof there were many remedies applied, both naturall and superstitious, but to small effect: so as Bamba (either willingly, finding himselfe vnable, or otherwise) quit the crowne, and rettyred himselfe into a monasterie, where he liued seuen yeares and one moneth, after that he had bene king nine yeares. The place where he passed the remainder of his life, is called Pampliga, neere Burgos. Thus Eruinge seized by force, as they say, of the kingdome of the Visigothes in Spaine, the which the Archbishop of Toledo doth affirme: yet it doth not accord well with the acts of the twelfth Council held at Toledo, vnder Eruinge, where the election of this king Eruinge is confirmed, and allowed as lawfull. But to reconcile these contrarieties, it is to bee presumed, that Eruinge being king, and hauing power in his hands, gratifying the Fathers in some sort, that he was also gratified by them, as one hand washeth another, or, as they say in France, one Barber shaues another.

27. Eruinge.

Anno 681.

39 When as Eruinge was seated in the royall throne, hee confirmed the lawes of the kings of the Gothes his predecessours, and did authorize with his name, some made by Saint Isidorus: and that to the end it should not seeme, that the Clergie vnder the title of the Church, would vsurpe a ciuile jurisdiction; he rejected many of the plebeians from all dignities and honours, hauing gotten them by money, and other vnlawfull meanes,

to

A to the dishonour of nobilitie: he ordained (but with the aduice of the Romane See) That no Archbishop should be subiect to the Primats. To fortifie the beginning of his reigne against Theofride the sonne of Bamba (whom he feared much) he gaue Cixilone his daughter, whom he had by Luibigotte his wife, to an Earle who was rich, and of great authoritie among the Gothes called Egica, cousin to Bamba deceased. And soone after the twelfth Council was held at Toledo, which was in the yeare 681, Julian Archbishop of Seuille being President, where there assisted one and fortie Bishops, fise Abbots, and fiteene great Noblemen. By the acts of this Council in the seventh Article it appears, That the kings of Spaine had power to giue Bishopricks, and that to that collation, the confirmation of the other Bishops of Spaine was required, especially of the Archbishop of Toledo; the which doth also appeare by the answer of an Epistle written by Braule Bishop of Sarragosse, to S. Isidorus, where he is admonished to chuse some good man in the place of Eusebins, Archbishop of Tartacone deceased: Isidorus answers him, That he did not know the kings pleasure therein. This Council did abolish certaine Bishops newly erected, and created by king Bamba, in some townes which were not very conuenient.

12 Council of Toledo, Anno 681.

Nomination of Bishops belonged to the kings of Spaine.

Three yeares after, in the yeare 684, was another Council held at Toledo, which was the thirteenth, of eight & fortie Bishops, and three Archbishops, of Toledo, Bracar, and Merida; yet the Authors varie in the number of these Bishops: one of the decrees of these fathers was, That neither the king nor any other should marrie the widow of the deceased king, nor defile her by adulterie, vpon paine of excommunication, and to be damned to hell fire. And in the yeare 685 the foureteenth Council was assembled at Toledo, of fixteene Bishops, and many Vicars of them that were absent, to confirme the acts of the fixt Council of Constantinople, begun vnder Constantine the fourth, and some yeares after ended, against the errors of Apollinaris, renewed then, denying the two natures, diuine and humane in Iesus Christ: which acts the Pope sent into Spaine, that in a generall assembly of the Prelats they might be read, and by their authoritie allowed, and published throughout all the kingdome of the Gothes. The Archbishop of Toledo was then called Julian Pomer, of the Lewes race, whose father and mother had made themselves Christians; a learned man, religious, and of a good life. Eruinge hauing reigned seuen yeares, died at Toledo of a naturall death, leauing his kingdome to Egica his sonne in law. In his time there was a great famine in Spaine.

13 Council of Toledo, Anno 684.

Decree not to marrie the kings widow.

14 Council of Toledo.

28. Egica.

40 As soone as Egica, or (as others call him) Egican was king, he put away his wife Cixilone, for the wickednesse which her father had committed against king Bamba; yet he did auow the infant Vitisa which he had had by her, and caused it to be nourished (in hope to make it his heire) in the towne of Tude or Tuy in Galicia, as if he had giuen it the realme of Galicia, and of the Sueues, for a portion, whilest that he reigned ouer the Gothes. He caused himselfe to be absolved at a Council held at Toledo, in the first yeare of his reigne, of the oath which he had taken against his dutie to that vnlawfull king. This Council was called the fiftenth at Toledo, whereas Julian the Archbishop of that place did preside, where there were fixtie one Bishops, or fixtie six, according vnto some. There Julian did maintaine by reasons and good authoritie, what he had written in a confession of the Faith sent to Rome, as well in his name, as of all the Bishops of Spaine; which was, That in our Lord Iesus Christ weré the word, the bodie, and the soule; the which had bene rejected by Pope Benedict the second, who (as it seemes) did not well vnderstand these things: the Article was allowed by the Council of Toledo, and afterwards being well considered, was receiued at Rome. The acts of this Council were published in Gothique Gaule in the Cathedrall Churches, for that the Bishops of that Prouince could not come to Toledo by reason of the plague; being enjoyned to receiue them vpon paine of excommunication, and the losse of the tenth part of their goods that should oppugne them. Six yeares after there was the fixteenth Council held at Toledo, Sigebert being Archbishop of that place, after the death of Julian, and was deposed by this Council for his ill deseruing, and in his place was set Felix Archbishop of Seuille. Fausin Archbishop of Bracar was aduanced to Seuille, and Felix Bishop of Portogallo

Anno 688.

15 Council of Toledo.

Pope Benedict an heretick.

16 Council of Toledo.

to

to Bracar: this alteration being made, they did proceed to the acts. The cause why they G deposed Sigebert, was, for that he had attempted to deprive king Egica of the realme, for the which hee was degraded, banished, his goods confiscated, and excommunicated; so as hee might not receiue the Sacraments but at the houre of his death: yea, a penaltie was inflicted vpon all clergie men, of what degree soeuer they were, that should attempt against their prince.

17 Council of Toledo, Ann. 694.

A decree against the Iewes.

What the Councils of these times were.

The yeare following, which was 694, the seuenteenth Councell was held at Toledo, whereas the king with great humilitie demanded many things of the Fathers: among other, there was a decree made against the Iewes, who being accused not onely to haue reuolted from the Christian religion (in the which they had bene once baptized) but also to haue conspired against the King and the State of Spaine, it was said, That their goods should be confiscated, their persons, wiues and children, and their descendants held for slaues, and dispersed throughout Spaine: That those which had them in seruice, should not suffer them to exercise their Iewish ceremonies: That their children being once seuen yeres old, should be sent away from their parents, and giuen to Christians to bring vp, and then married to Christians, and by all meanes drawne from the conuersation and acquaintance of their parents, and men of their sect: this is to be seene in the eight article.

These last Councils were generall assemblies of the nation, whereas the Clergie held the first place, the which in name and shew were made to determine of matters concerning religion, but in effect they treated of matters of State, whereas controuersies betwixt great men and other politicke matters were there decided: and although there were men of all estates, yea and of the noblest houses, and that there was an order, that regular men should take knowledge of regular causes, and secular causes should be decided by the secular men, yet it is easie to judge, that the soueraigne and last decision depended vpon the authoritie of the Fathers in all things: so as the spiritualtie in the confusion of these two powers did often vanish among worldly affaires, and ciuile policie vsurped by clergie men, became tyrannie, as we shall soone see.

Fasila Governor of Biscaye.

Egica growne old, had settled his sonne Vitiza as Viceroy in Galicia, holding his seat at Tuy, then Tude, whither a little before he had confined Fasila, duke or gouernour of Biscaye, sonne to king Cindasunthe, as some hold, for certaine attempts made against him, whose wife was corrupted by Vitiza, who afterwards by her instigation slew Fasila, that they might enjoy their loues more freely. This excessse happened in a towne which was then called Douzemains, and now Palatio, neere vnto the riuer Vrbicum. This Fasila was father to king Pelagius, who restored Spaine, being oppressed and ruined by the Moores. Egica hauing reigned about thirteene yeares, died at Toledo, being honoured for a wife and temperate king.

29. Vitiza.

Ann. 701.

18 Council of Toledo.

The impure and lewd life of Vitiza.

41 T He dishonour and infamie of the kings of the Gothes was in the person of this Vitiza, being full of all excessse in his lust, without feare or reuerence of God in his actions, an hypocrite and dissembler: for at his first comming he shewed himselfe mild, liberal, and religious, but soone after he turned to his owne nature. He called a Councell of Bishops and Noblemen at Toledo, to consult touching the government of his realme: he caused *Theofred*s eyes to be pulled out, who had bene confined to Cordoua, least that hee who was beloued of the people, and brother to Reccesunthe, should aspire vnto the Crowne. Hee intended to doe the like to Pelagius, the sonne of Fasila, whom hee had slaine, but hee escaped, and fled into Biscaye, being referred for greater matters. Hee committed manie villanies the first two yeares, yet secretly, but afterwards he exceeded in all vices, without any shame: he filled his palace with many wiues which he had married, and an infinite number of concubines, the which he would haue publickely allowed vnto all men, and did perswade the Noblemen to follow his example. Hee did likewise disannull the Popes Constitutions for a single life, and by an Edict which he caused to be set forth, suffered Clergie men to marrie, and to haue as many women married or vnmarried

A vnmarried as they pleased, vsing all the inticements he could to infect them with his licentiousness, least they should oppose themselves against him, and by their censures draw the people from obeying of so filthie and vnchast a king. And to preuent all rebellions, this man blinded with his lustfull pleasures, caused (vnder the colour of peace, which Spaine did then enjoy) all the townes of his realme to be demanteled, except Leon, Toledo, and Asturica. Besides hee disarmed the people, and depriued Sinderede Archbishop of Toledo (were it justly or vnjustly) of his dignitie, giuing it to his brother Opas, who was Archbishop of Seuille: hee disannulled all the immunities and priuiledges of Churches, called backe the Iewes, and restored the banished men to their goods and possessions, giuing them more priuiledges than euer they had before. Finally, as a presage of the future miseries, he shewed (in all sorts of excessse and violence contrarie to the lawes of God and men) what principles, ill instructed and ignorant of true pietie, could doe. In the meane time blind Theofred, confined to Cordoua, being newly married to Recilone, a ladie of the bloud royall of the Gothes, had begotten two sonnes of her, Roderic and Cosia, to whom Vitiza would haue done as much as hee had done to the father; but they escaped, and implored the Romanes aid, as the Archbishop Rodrigo doth report, or else of the nobilitie of the Gothes, who in remembrance of Reccesunthe gaue them aid, to chase this infamous monster out of the royall throne, which he did vnworthily hold. Being come to battaile, Vitiza was defeated and taken, and according to the president which he had giuen, his owne eyes were put out, and hee confined to Cordoua, without title or honour, where he spent the rest of his life in miserie, hauing reigned tenne yeares. Thus Roderic obtained the crowne by the fauour of the Romanes and the suffrages of the people.

Towns of Spaine demanteled, and the people disarmed by Vitiza.

Vitiza taken, and his eyes put out by Roderic and Cosia, sons to Theofred.

30. Roderic last King of the Gothes.

42 T He time was now come when as the kingdome of the Gothes in Spaine must haue an end, being come to the height of their iniquities: for in their Commonweale all things, both holy and prophane, were managed with fraud and violence, and their princes affected confusion, to satisfie their ambition and infamous lusts: wherefore it pleased God to confound them in their imaginations, to blind them that would be blind, to root out the incorrigible, and to take his graces from them that did obstinately contemne him. Roderic hauing bene an instrument to punish a tyrant, made no vse of this correction, nor acknowledged the fauour from whence it came, but presently after his comming to the crowne he followed *Vitiza*s steps, yea, he exceeded him in all vices. He shewed himselfe cruell and inhumane to Sisebut and Elba, the children of Vitiza, whom he pursued with all the indignities that might be, and forced them to flie into Africke, depriued of all their goods, where they were entertained by Recila, Earle and Gouernour of Tanger or Tingis. Hee addressed himselfe to the daughter of Iulian, Earle or Gouernour of Ceuta, called Caba or Causa, the which was bred vp in the Court, as other virgines of noble families, according to the custome, and rauished her, whilst that her father was in embassage in Africke, for the affaires of the kingdome. The place where he committed this rape is called Pancoruo, betwixt Vitoria and Burgos. This was the occasion which made the Moores to inuade Spaine. Some authors write, That Caba or Causa was wife and not daughter to Count Iulian; yet wee find, that his wife was called Faldrina, and that shee was sister to king Vitiza. The Earle did wickedly reuenge this priuat iniurie by the ruine of the whole kingdome: for returning into Africke, whither he led Causa, causing her to embarke at Malaga, of whom the port of the said towne is yet named, he went to Musa Abenzair, Gouernour for the Emperour of the Arabians, whose name was Vlit, and promised to make him Lord of all Spaine, if hee would giue him men and meanes to make warre there. Musa hauing aduertised Vlit, he aduised him not to giue too much credit vnto the Earle, before he had tried him: Wherefore at that time they gaue him a hundred horse and foure hundred foot, with promise of greater forces.

Roderic more vicious than Vitiza.

Palatide the cause of the ruine of the Gothes kingdome.

A priuat iniurie furiously pursued with the ruine of the publicke.

Count Iulian brings the Moores into Spaine. Anno 713.

This man transported with the dishonour done vnto his house, led these Moores into Spaine, and hauing joyned with some of the countrey, whom he had corrupted, he spoiled

Gibalter so called of Tarif, a captain of the Moors.

Goths defeated. An Estate without armes in lame and dejection.

Anno 714.

The total defeat of the Gothes.

An Epitaph upon Roderic.

The continuance of the Gothes reign.

led all the coast along the Ocean, which now is Andalusia and Portugall, and then led them backe into Africke, laden with spoyle for a testimonie of his actions. This first descent of the Moores was in the year 713. The Arabians hauing made this triall of Count Julian's affection, the Gouvernour Musa gaue him twelue thousand Moores, vnder the conduct of Tarif Aben Zarcas, which Tarif (according vnto some) had bene in the first passage of the Moores into Spaine. Passing the strait, he landed his men at the foot of the mountaine Calpe: by reason whereof this place changed his name, and was in the Arabian tongue called Gebel Tarif, that is to say, the mount of Tarif. And the next towne taken by that capitaine, which was either the auncient Carteia, or Mellaria, was called Tariffe. This armie being secretly fauoured by Sisbut and Eba, the sonnes of Vitiza, aided and fortified by Ricila Gouvernour of Tanger, and other noblemen Gothes, to whom the present estate was displeasing, being friends and affected, and it may be alike interested with Count Julian, ouerran and spoyled all Andalusia, and a part of Lusitania, entering into Seuille, and many other places which had bene dismantled, by the foolish aduice of king Vitiza. In these combustions, Roderic his successour both in his vices and kingdome, was so vnprovidid, as his enemies had meanes to doe what they would, without resistance. In the end hauing assembled some troups in haste, he sent them against the Moores, vnder the command of a kinsman of his, called by some Inigo, by others Sanche. But the Gothes hauing in a manner forgotten to manage armes, by reason of the long peace which they had enjoyed, could not withstand the Moores force, hauing been for many yeares in continuall warre, so as they were defeated, which made Count Julian to grow proud and insolent, and his enterprises to bee more fauoured: so as vpon the newes of this victorie in Africke, an infinit number of Arabians, Moores or Sarafins, and other Africanes, passed into Spaine, as to the assured spoyle of one of the richest regions in the world.

Roderic seeing this fire to encrease daily, hauing called all the Nobilitie together, and rayed an armie, he marched against his enemies, hauing not all his forces yet joyned (for they of Biscaye and of the Asturias, and in a manner all those on this side the riuer of Ebro, were not yet arrived) finding the Arabians vpon the riuer of Guadalete, neere to Assidone, which either is Xeres or Medina Sidonia at this day; whereas the two armies standing in view one of another, for the space of eight dayes, they had many bloudie skirmishes, without any great aduantage: but in the end they came to a battaile betwixt Medina Sidonia and Xeres, vpon a Sunday in September, in the year 714, whereas king Roderic was a spectator of his souldiours deuoires, being mounted vpon a great horse which they called Orelia, in a royall mantle, and a crowne vpon his head, with other rich ornaments, after the manner of the kings of the Gothes in those times, which made his souldiours the more courageous, and was the cause of a great slaughter that day of Sarafins or Arabians: but the multitude of the enemies one supporting another, and the tyred being still relieued with fresh supplies, in the end made the Gothes and Spaniards to quit the field: and it is written, That the sonnes of Vitiza, called home by Roderic, and to whom indiscreetly he had giuen the command of two points of his armie, reuolted during the fight; whereupon all his men were cut in pieces, and all Spaine was thereby lost in few dayes, except the Asturias, Biscaye, and some part of the Pyrenees, whither the remainders of the Nobilitie and people fled, which refused to liue vnder the Arabians gouernment. King Roderic was neuer scene more; his horse and spoyle were onely found in a bogge: yet in the towne of Viseo in Portugall there is at this day this inscription to be scene in Latine.

Hic iacet Rodericus, ultimus Rex Gotorum: maledictus furor impius Iuliani, quia pertinax & indignatio, quia dura, Vscanus furia, animosus furor, oblitus fidelitatis, Immemor religionis, contemptor Diuinitatis, crudelis in se, Homicida in Dominum, Hostis in Domesticos, Vastator in Patriam, Reus in omnes: Memoria eius in omni ore amarescet, & nomen eius in aeternum M putrescet.

In this king ended the Gothes kingdome in Spaine, the which had continued (if wee account as the Spaniards doe, according vnto Isidorus, from Athanasie, who reigned in the year 370 in Myfia and Thrace) 344 yeares: but for that hee had no entrance into Spaine,

A Spaine, but onely Ataulphe, who reigned in the year 413, and was the first Gothish king which entred there about the year 417, the Gothes reigne in Spaine had continued but 297 yeares.

After this defeat there was no order nor gouernment among the Gothes, euery man followed what partie did best please him. Some rettyred into the mountaines of Asturia and Biscaye, and into Nauarre; others went into Gaule: many passed into Italie, Germanie, and England, begging aid from those princes (but in vaine) to restore the ruined estate of Spaine, and elsewhere as God directed them. Sindered Archbishop of Toledo (who had been deposed by the violence of Vitiza) attended not the end of the warre, but leaving his flocke, fled into Italie. Oppa who had succeeded him, tooke part with the Moores, and negotiating for them, lost himselfe in Asturia; in whose place the afflicted Christians did chuse one Vrbain, a religious man. The traitors which had drawne in the Moores to reuenge their priuat injuries, were all disappointed of the promises which had bene made them, and did perish miserably in diuers seasons, and after diuers manners: especially Iulian, after that he had scene his wife stoned by the Moores (who allowed the treason, but hated the traitors) his sonne cast from the top of a tower in the towne of Ceuta, himselfe miserable, being depoyled of all his goods, died in a prison in Arragon, in the territorie of Huefca, as some write. The name of the Gothes from that time was in a manner rooted out from the face of the earth: for since there is no memorie of any Estate, Policie, or Gouernment of this nation vnder this name, the which in former times was so great and famous, as well in the East as West, since the first remembrance of any people. The losse of one battaile did blemish all the beautie of their posteritie, who had vanquished and slaine that great Cyrus king of Persia, and of all Asia: who had made head against the armies of Alexander the Great, foraged the kingdomes conquered by him, and carried away the kings (his successors) prisoners: troden vnder foot the maiestie of the Romane Empire, triumphed ouer Emperours, and ouer so many great Capitaines and armies: taking the best townes in Italie; yea Rome, the Queene of all other townes, sackt by them: the which had seized vpon the most populous and richest Prouinces of the West; where they had reigned happily for so many yeares, with so many remarkable examples of pietie, iustice, and valour. This braue nation was in one day ouerthrowne, so weak is the support of humane greatnesse.

Traitors from estate of their boyes.

The miserable end of Count Iulian, his wife and children.

The weaknesse and vanitie of humane greatnesse.

THIS ruine of the kingdome of the Gothes in Spaine hauing caused so great a confusion in all things, as not onely religion, the manners of the inhabitants, the language, and the lawes, but euen the face of the earth, and the seat and names of townes were peruered and changed, it shall not be from the purpose, if wee make a catalogue of the auncient Bishoprickes established by the Christians in that region, whereof mention is made by writers, and namely, in the treaties of Councels, the which haue bene gouerned by many holy Pastors, as well in the time of the Romane Emperours, as of the kings of the Gothes, and were at the entrie of the Arabians ruined wherefoeuer they commaunded: wherein for the more ease of the reader, we will obserue the order of the Alphabet.

These words Tol. Merid. Brag. Seuil. Tarrag. noted in the margent, signifie Toledo, Merida, Braga, Seuille, and Tarracone, Archbishoprickes or Metropolitane sees, whereof were Suffragans the Bishops or Bishoprickes set in their places.

Abdera, whose Bishop was called Abderitain, was whereas now the citie of Almerie stands, or that of Vera, according vnto some.

Abula, now Auila, a Bishopricke also in our time.

Acci, whose Bishop was called Accitanus, is likely to be Guadix in Grenado.

F Agra, and the Bishop Agragensis: it is a question whether it were a towne in Spaine or Africke.

Arcobrica, and the Bishop Arcobricensis, in the prouince of Tarracona, not farre from Calatajub.

Affindon, the Bishop Affindonensis, whereas now Medina Sidonia, or Xeres in Andalusia stands.

Athugia, the Bishop was called Astigianus, it is held to be Ecchia in Andalusia.

Merid.

Tol.

Seuil.

Tol.

Seuil.

Seuil.

Astu.

Brag. Asturica, Astorga, and the Bishop Asturicensis, it is a Bishopricke at this day.
Aug. Augusta was a common name to many townes in Spaine: for Bracar, Asturica, and others were so named, yet it is to be presumed, when as they doe simply make mention of the Bishop of Augusta, they meane Bracar or Braga, as they say at this day.
Brag. Auriensis Episc. possible it is that of Orense, which is a Bishopricke at this day.
Tarrag. Aufonia, the Bishop Aufonienfis, at this present Vic or Vic-d' Ossone in Cattelogne.
Tarrag. Auca, a citie not farre from the place where since the citie of Burgos was built: the Bishop Aucitanus, in the mountaine Idubeda, vpon that continent which now they call the mountaines of Oca or Auca.

B

Tarrag. Barcino and Barcinonensis Episc. Barcelone.
Tarrag. Bassitania, a region where the towne of Ofca stood, as Plinie writes: the Bishop was called Bassitanus or Basitanus.
Tol. Bastitania, Baza at this day, in the kingdome of Murcia, and the Bishop was called Bastitanus.
Tol. Biaria, Barra.
Tol. Bigastrensis or Bistargensis, it was a Bishopricke in the prouince of Carthagea.
Merid. Bigerra, at this day Beijar, Bigerrensis Episcopus.
Metropol. Bracar, it is Braga an Archbishopsricke, contending for the primacie with Toledo.
Brag. Britolenfis Episc. it was a towne neere vnto Tuy.

C

Merid. Cauria, at this present Coria, retaining the name and Episcopall seat.
Tarrag. Cesar Augusta, and Cesar Augustanus Episc. Saragosse a famous Archbishopsricke in these times.
Tarrag. Calagurris, it may be Calaoire at this day, the Bishop Calagurritanus.
Merid. Colimbrica or Conimbrica, Coimbra in Portugall, and Colimbrensis Episc. or it may be Conimbrensis, a Bishopricke and famous Vniuersitie at this day.
Tol. Carthago noua, Carthaginenfis Episc. Carthagea, in old time the chiefe towne of all Spaine.
Seuil. Castulo, at this day Castlona, Castulonensis Episc.
Merid. Catraleuci, people in old time about the riuer of Guadiana, Catralencensis Episcopus.
Tol. Complutum, and Complutenfis Episc. Alcala of Henares.
Seuil. Corduba, and Cordubenfis Episc. it retains the name and Bishopricke at this day.

D

Tarrag. Dertosa, and Dertosanus Episc. Tortosa vpon Ebro, it hath his Bishop.
Tol. Dianium, Dianienfis, Denia, now it is no Bishopricke.
Brag. Dumienfis, it was a Monasterie neere to Braga, where there is a church to be seene at this day.

E

Tol. Egarenfis Episc. it may be it was of those people which were called Egurti, neere to Medina del Riosecco.
Merid. Egitanus Episc. or rather Igeditanus: for Igedita was a citie in Lusitania, now a little Bourg called Edania.
Tarrag. Egibinenfis, it may be they should haue written Egofenfis: for Egofa was a towne in Cattelogne neere to Girone.
Merid. Eboria is a renowned towne in Portugall, the kings abode; the Bishop was called by the Latines Elborensis.
Seuil. Eliberis, in old time a great and well peopled citie, neere to Granada, since reduced to a castle, built and inhabited by the Iewes, and therefore was called the Iewes towne: the Bishops of Eliberis were called Eliberitani. There was another towne of that name at the foot of the Pyrenees, but the one and the other were by some called Illiberis, and more properly.
Tol. Eliocrota, and the Bishop called Eliocrotensis, betwixt Carthagea and Castlona: Some hold, that the Vandales ruined it.

Elpa

A Elna, and Elnensis Episc. in Gaule Narbonoise.
Emerita, Emeritanus Episc. called Augusta, it is Merida at this day: it hath nothing singular, Metropol. but some ruines and markes of antiquitie.
Eminium or Euminium, betwixt Coimbra and Porto, vpon a riuer of that name, Eminienfis Brag.
Episcopus.
Ergauica a towne of Arragon, now called Alcanniz: it is no Bishopricke at this day. Tarrag.

G

Gerunda, and Gerundenfis Episc. Girone. Tarrag.
Gerabraca or Ierabraca, betwixt Lisbon and S. Irene, Gerabricsenfis Episc. Merid.

H

Hispalis, and Hispalenfis Episc. Seuille. Metropol.

I

Ilerda Merida, Ilerdensis Episc. in Arragon, now a Bishopricke and an Vniuersitie. Tarrag.
Ilice, Illicenfis Episc. from whence Sinus Illicitanus was named, in the kingdome of Valence, vpon the sea, looking to the islands of Pitryeufes. Tol.
Ilands of Majorque and Minorque had their Bishop. Seuil.
Iliapa, a citie in the strait of Betica or Andalusia. Tarrag.
Illiberis or Eliberis, at the foot of the Pyrenees, neere to Colibre.
C Immotinenfis, it may be Imomönsenfis Episc. there is now no memorie of it: some thinke it is Merid.

Montanches.
Imopyreneus, was called the Bishop of Rhoda: it is Roses at this day, of the diocesse of Girone. Tarrag.

Impuritanus, or rather Emporitanus of Empuria, of the same diocesse. Tarrag.
Iugastrenfis Episc. or rather Iuncarienfis: Iuncaria was neere to Girone, Iunquera. Brag.
Intercatienfis, Intercatia was neere to the Astures. Brag.
Iria flauia had a Bishop called Iricenfis, at this day it is Padron: the Bishops See was transferred from thence to Compostella. Seuil.

Italica a citie neere to Seuille, whereof there are not any markes remaining, Italicenfis Episc.
D Hispalis the old.

L

Lambria, and Lambrionensis, neere to the riuer Limia in Portugall. Brag.
Lacobrica, and Lacobricenfis Episc. there were two townes of this name, the one at Cap S. Vincent, the other neere to Palenza. Merid.
Lameca is a Bishopricke yet in Portugall, Lamecenfis Episc. Brag.
Legio, Legionenfis Episc. at this day Leon, the chiefe towne of a realme, and a Bishopricke, enjoying the priuiledges of a Metropolitan.
Lucenfis Episc. Lugo in Gallicia. Brag.

M

E Malaca, and Malacitanus Episc. it is at this day a citie and Episcopall See. Seuil.
Mentefa, now Montijo, or else Iacn in Andalusia. Tol.

N

Nouienfis, Nouium in Gallicia, it may be Noya. Brag.

O

Olisipo, and Olisiponenfis Episc. Lisbon, most famous in our time. Merid.
Orcelis, whose Bishop was at the Councell of Arles. Merid.
Oretan, and Oretanus Episc. Calarraua, where there is an order of knights. Tol.
Ofca, that is Huefca in Arragon, a Bishopricke and an Vniuersitie. Tarrag.
F Ossobonenfis Episc. Ossobona was in Algarbe, neere to Pharo, which by the Moores was called Exuba. Merid.

Oxonienfis and Oxouienfis, it is Ofona, a Bishopricke at this day: Vxania, Plinie. Tol.
P
Pacensis Episc. a Pace Augusta: it is now Badaios, which the Moores did call Baxangus, corrupting the word. Merid.

P

Palentia

- Tol.* Palentia or Palantia, and the Bishop Palentinensis: it is a Bishopricke at this time of the same name.
- Tarrag.* Pampilonensis Episc. or Pampilonensis, Pampelone, the chiefe citie of Nauarre: it is a Bishopricke at this day.
- Merid.* Placentia, and the Bishop Placentin: it is now so called.
- Brag.* Porto or Portogallo, Portogalensis Episc. at this day a good port of the sea, and a Bishopricke.
- S
- Merid.* Salmantica, Salmanticensis Episc. Salamanca a Bishopricke, and a famous Vniuersitie.
- Tol.* Segobia, and the Bishop Segobienfis, it holds yet the name and dignitie; in old time Secobia Antonin, Segouia Plinie.
- Tol.* Segobrica, Segobricensis, Segorbia in Arragon.
- Tol.* Seguntia, Siguença, Seguntinus Episc. in the limits of Castille and Arragon: it keeps the name and the dignitie.
- Tol.* Serabis, Xatiua in the realme of Valence, and the Bishop Setabienfis: it is now no Bishopricke.
- Merid.* Sarabrienfis Episc. in whose place is written in the bookes of Councils, Sibarienfis. Sarabris it may be was Zamore or Toro.
- Seuil.* Sitia, Sitianensis Episc. it was in Betica, depending vpon Corduba for the temporall.
- Seuil.* Sitalensis and Sitalensis, all one.
- T
- Metropol.* Tarracon, Tarraconensis Episc. it is an Archbishopricke at this day.
- Tarrag.* Turiasso, Turiassonensis Episc. Tarrassone in the limits of Nauarre.
- Metropol.* Toletum, Toletanus, a well knowne Archbishopricke, Primat of Spaine, in old time Metropolitan.
- Seuil.* Tucca, Tuccitanus Episc. it was in Betica, neere to Castulo.
- Brag.* Tude or Tyde, it is Tuy in Galicia, now vpon the riuer of Minio, Episc. Tudenfis: it holds the dignitie.
- Tarrag.* Tullica, and his Bishop Tullicensis, in Cantabria among the Autrigons, whereof Calagurnis was the chiefe.
- V
- Tol.* Valence, a famous Archbishopricke at this day.
- Tarrag.* Valeria, at this day Concia or Cuenca, Conciensis Episc. it was sometimes called Valerienfis.
- Merid.* Vellenfis or Velienfis, it was a Bishopricke among the Autrigons.
- Tol.* Vesci, Vescienfis Episc. it is Viseo a citie in Portugall.
- Tol.* Vrci, Vrcitanus Episc. neere Murcia or Almeric.
- Tarrag.* Vrgelitanus, it is Vrgel in Arragon, a Bishopricke
- Tol.* Vxama.

These townes vntill the destruction of the Gothes kingdome haue beene Bishops seats, according to the order and discipline which was then obserued in Christian churches. Those of Seuille, Toledo, Merida, Braga, and Tarragone, were Archbishopricks, Metropolitanes, and Primats: Diuers names, but of one signification, which did not inferre any superioritie one ouer another, for they were equall in power: and they did preside in Councils, according to the antiquities of their seas.

THE

THE SIXT BOOKE OF the Historie of Spaine.

The Contents.

- 1 OF the Moores or Arabians which inuaded Spaine, their beginning and manners.
- 2 Mahumets sett his birth, designs and Empire, & of his successors, vnto Vlt the tenth Caliph.
- 3 Conquest of Spaine by the Moores.
- 4 Pelagius the deliuerer of Spaine, and first king of Ouiedo.
- 5 Garcia Ximenes deliuerer of the Christians oppressed in Spaine, first king in Sobrarbre and Nauarre.
- 6 Fasila second king of Ouiedo: many Gouvernors Moores in Spaine in his time.
- 7 Alphonse third king of Ouiedo.
- 8 D. Froila fourth king of Ouiedo, the first which vsed the title of Don.
- 9 Abderamen first soueraigne king of the Moores in Spaine, sitting at Cordona.
- 10 D. Aurelle fift king of Ouiedo.
- 11 D. Sillo sixt king of Ouiedo.
- 12 D. Aznar first Earle of Arragon vnder Nauarre.
- 13 D. Garcia Inigo second king of Sobrarbre or Nauarre.
- 14 D. Mauregat seuenth king of Ouiedo.
- 15 D. Bermund eight king of Ouiedo.
- 16 Hizen second soueraigne king ouer the Moores in Spaine.
- 17 D. Galinde second Earle of Arragon.
- 18 Cattelogne, the name, and the gouernment of the Christians in that prouince vnder Bernard.
- 19 D. Alphonse the chaste, ninth king of Ouiedo.
- 20 Inuention of S. Iaques his sepulchre, as the Spaniards asfirme.
- 21 Haliathan third soueraigne king ouer the Spanisb Moores.
- 22 Expedition of Charlemaigne into Spaine, and the defeat at Ronceaux.
- 23 D. Fortun third king of Sobrarbre and Nauarre.
- 24 D. Sancho Garces fourth king of Nauarre.
- 25 D. Ximen Aznaris third Earle of Arragon.
- 26 D. Ximen Garces fourth Earle of Arragon.
- 27 D. Garci Aznaris fift and D. Fortun Ximenes sixt Earle of Arragon.
- 28 Geoffrey of Aria the stemme of the Earles of Barcelone.
- 29 D. Ramir the first of that name, tenth king of Ouiedo.
- 30 D. Ximen Inigo fift king of Nauarre.
- 31 Muza Aben-Cacin makes himselfe king of Toledo.
- 32 Mahumet fift Miralmumin or king of the Moores in Spaine, the first of that name.
- 33 D. Geoffroy second Earle of Barcelone, successor to Bernard.
- 34 D. Alphonse third of that name and twelfth king of Leon.
- 35 Toledo reduced vnder the obedience of the Moores kings of Cordona.

P ij

36 D. Inigo

- 36 D. Inigo Arista sixt king of Sobrarbe and N.uarre.
 37 D. Garcia Inigo third of that name, seventh king of N.uarre.
 38 D. Suria a Scottish man, the beginner of the Lords of Biscaye.
 39 Almundir sixt Moorish king in Spaine.
 40 D. Garcia first of that name, the thirteenth king of Ouedo and Leon.
 41 Abdalla seventh king of the Moores in Spaine.
 42 D. Fortun second of that name, eight king of N.uarre.
 43 D. Salomon third Earle of Barcelone.
 44 D. Geoffrey the hairie, fourth Earle of Barcelone, and first Proprietarie.
 45 D. Ordogno second of that name, fourteenth king of Ouedo and Leon.
 46 Abderamen Alinanor eighth king of the Moores.
 47 The death of the Earles of Castille, among the which was D. Diego Porcello.
 48 D. Froila second of that name, fifteenth king of Leon.
 49 The alteration of the state in Castille, and the government of the Prouince by two Iudges.

In this sixt Booke there is speciall mention made of the beginning of the Estates of Ouedo and Leon, of Sobrarbe and N.uarre, of Cordoua, Cattelogne, Castille, and Arragon, and of the Prouinces thereof, which were these.

OVEDO and LEON. Kings.

- 1 Pelagius.
- 2 Fasila.
- 3 Alphonso 1.
- 4 Froila 1.
- 5 Aurelle.
- 6 Sillo.
- 7 Mauregat.
- 8 Bermund 1.
- 9 Alphonso 2.
- 10 Ramir 1.
- 11 Ordogno 1.
- 12 Alphonso 3.
- 13 Garcia 1.
- 14 Ordogno 2.
- 15 Froila 2.

NAVARRE. Kings.

- 1 Garcia Ximenes 1.
- 2 Garcia Inigo 2.
- 3 Fortun 1.
- 4 Sancho Garces 1.
- 5 Ximen Inigo.
- 6 Inigo Arista.
- 7 Garcia Inigo 3.
- 8 Fortun 2.

ARRAGON. Earles.

- 1 Aznar.
- 2 Galinde.
- 3 Ximen Aznaris.
- 4 Ximen Garces.
- 5 Garci Aznaris.
- 6 Fortun Ximenes.

CASTILLE. Earles.

- 1 Nugno Fernandes.
- 2 Diego Porcello.
- 3 Nugno Bellides.
- Iudges.
- 1 Nugno Razura.
- 2 Flavin Caluo.
- Gonsal Nugnes.

CATTELOGNE. Gouernours.

- 1 Bernard.
- 2 Geoffrey Aria.
- 3 Salomon.
- A proprietarie Earle.
- 1 Geoffrey the hairie.

MOORES.

There were many Gouernours vnder the Caliphes and Miralmumins of Asia and Africke, vnto Abderamen, who first erected a Soueraignetic at Cordoua.

Kings.

- 1 Abderamen 1.
- 2 Hizem.
- 3 Hali Athan.
- 4 Abderamen 2.
- 5 Mahumet 1.
- 6 Almundir.
- 7 Abdalla.
- 8 Abderamen 3.

The

A

The Arabians Mahumetists which conquered Spaine, were also called Moores, for that they crossed Mauritania, a region of Africk, which is opposite vnto Spaine, from the which Tingitana is diuided by a small strait, the which when as Tarif passed, was subject vnto the Gothes, and gouerned by Recila, a friend and partisan to Count Julian. It is therefore expedient to speak something of this nation, whose power in a short time did in a manner surpasse all the Monarchies which haue been in the world.

Arabia is a spacious region, diuided into many parts: The auncients made a partition into three; the Happie, the Stonie, and the Defart. Arabia the Happie was so called, in regard of the two other which are barren, little knowne to the auncients, and nothing at all annoyed by the Romane armies. Arabia Petrea or Stonie carried that name of the capitall citie Petra, which had their kings, sometimes friends and allied, but most commonly enemies vnto their neighbours, and often tributaries to the auncient kings of Persia and Egypt (whereunto they joyne) and afterwards to the Romanes. The Defart Arabia hath not at any time had any certaine policie, and very few townes, whose princes were but leaders of troupes of theeces, enemies to all quiet, seeking nothing but warre, mercinarie to kings and princes that would employ them, a people without humanitie, without faith, and without any religion. All this countrey extends from East to West, almost from the floud Euphrates vnto Nyle, hauing Syria on the North side, and the Ocean to the South. Whilest that the Romane Emperours were in continuall warre against the kings of Parthia and Persia, either partie employed this nation, who went for the most part to the warre on horsebacke, fit to spoyle a countrey, to seize suddainly vpon a passage, to discouer, surprize, or doe any other action of warre, which required expedition, especially if there were more question to forrage & spoyle than to fight. This race is descended from Ismael, of whom it is said, That his hand should be against all, and all hands against him.

Among these people Mahumet was borne, in the yeare of our redemption 580 (some say, it was in the yeare 591, and others 593) to trouble Christendome, and to punish their ingratitude, which tearmed themselves Christians, Maurice being then Emperour of Constantinople. The place of his birth was called Itririp, a little towne neere vnto Mecque; his father called Abedels, was a Pagan and an Idolater, and his mother Emina a Iew, a poore begging girle, the which was taken vp by Abedels for loue, for that she seemed faire. At the age of two yeares he was left an orphan; whereupon he was taken by a vncle of his, called Salutalebi, and bred vp in his house by Halima his wife, vntill the age of sixteene yeares, and then hee was carried away by a troupe of Arabian theeces, who met him alone, and sold him to a rich marchant, who said, That he was of the race of Ismael, and was called Abdimonepli, who employed Mahumet some yeares in his trade of marchandise, whereby he had occasion to see many countries, and to tast many religions; especially the Iewish and Pagan, to the which was added the Christian religion, which was then much corrupted, and was made much worse to him by the conuersation of an Arrian Monke called Sergius, who haunted the house of his master Abdimonepli. With this Monke and others he layed a plot to make himselfe famous by a remarkable impietie, and framed a doctrine drawne from the Iewish and the Arrian, mingled with other their inuentions: the which he afterwards brought in, partly by persuations, partly by money, and partly by force, being enriched with his masters treasure, after whose death he had married his widow called Adegiah; so as about the yeare 623 he was receiued and acknowledged by the Arabians for their captaine and great Prophet. Then was Heraclius in the imperiall seat at Constantinople; and a little before there had risen many seditions in Syria and Egypt, during the which, Mahumet had plotted his designs, and had made himselfe famous among the seditious. And moreouer, certain mercinarie bands of Arabian Scenits being cast and sent away with injuries by the Commissaries of Heraclius the Emperour, he drew them vnto him, and with these forces in a short time seized vpon a great part of Arabia, namely, of the townes of Mecque and Itririp, the place of his birth, the which was afterwards called Medinath-Al-Nabi, that is to say, the city of the great Prophet; and from the day that place was taken, in the yeare 617, the Arabians and sectaries of Mahumet account their yeares, as we do ours from the Natiuitie of our Lord Iesus Christ.

P iij

Others

Others say, That Medina or Almedina was another rich towne inhabited by rich Iewes, G whereof Mahumet gaue the spoyle to his souldiors, abhorring it about all other sects, for it seemed more opposit to his doctrine than any other; yet it is most certain, that he vsed Iewes to compound his doctrine. And vpon a defeat which the Persians had by the Romanes in those times, he tooke occasion to inuade Syria, and seized vpon the countrey about Damas, and then tried to extend his limits all he could, employing in the end of his dayes his Lieutenants to make his conquests, whilst that he rested at Mecque, which was in the beginning the seat of his Empire. In his later daies he made foure capitaines, the which he called the cutting swords of God, the common sort teamed them Amiraux; the which were Ebubezer, whom some call Ybequar, others Bubacus or Eubocara; then Homar, Ozman, and Aly. This last was son to Salutaleby, Mahumets vncler. Ebubezer was his father in law; for Mahumet had many wiues, and Ebubezers daughter was called Aixa or Aissa. This monster hauing reigned about ten yeares, hee died at Medinath Al-Nabi, in the house of this Ebubezer, of poyson, as some say: for hauing published among other articles, That he should rise againe within three dayes after his deccale, one of his disciples impatient to attend, and curious to see the experience of his doctrine, poysoned him secretly: and some say, That he kept him 12 daies, and in the end seeing that he was dead, and his bodie so corrupted and stinking, as no man could endure it, this disciple being forced to retire by reason of the abominable smel of carrion, and returning soone after, he found the dogs had torne it in pieces: wherefore hee gathered the bones together, the which were put in a coffin of yron, and in time caused a chappell to be built, vaulted with adamant stone, so as the cofer being put into it, the vertue of the stone drew it vp into the ayre, where it did hang, which seemed miraculous vnto the ignorant; yet such as haue trauelled into those countreies in our time, say there is no such thing now to be seene. He had one son called Cacin, who died before him, and many daughters, whereof Fatima is famous among the Arabians, as the stemme of the royall race of Aben-Alabery, & was wife to Aly, according to the most certaine. Zeineb also, another of Mahumets daughters, wife to Ozman, or (as some say) to Muhauias (it may be to both successiuelly) is honoured by this nation, and Muhauias her husband (as the beginning of another royall familie) called Aben-Humeys. There is mention made of Imiculin and of Nephissa, daughters or neere kinswomen to this false Prophet: The sepulchre of the last was found in Caire by Sultan Selym, Emperour of the Turkes in our fathers time, and in it about the value of 500000 duckats in gold coyned, with much other treasure, which was giuen and carried thither for almes.

Cacin, Mahumets sonne, Fatima and Zeineb his daughters.

Ebubezer Caliph or high Priest of the Arabians in the 11 yeare.

Sarafins why so called.

Homar Caliph the 14 yeare of the Arabians.

Mahumet had decreed, That Aly his cousin german, and sonne in law, one of the abouenamed Amiraux, should succeed him in the realme established by him: but Ebubezer his father in law, who was rich and mightie, and had Ozman and Homar on his side, brake this ordinance: for he pretended, that Mahumet had gotten a great part of that which he enjoyed at his death, by his means, credit, & wealth, & seeing that he died in his house, it was reason he should be his heire. Ozman and Homar were nothing discontented: for hauing also a desire to reigne, they were more willing the crowne should come to Ebubezer (who they did confidently beleue would soone die, by reason of his age) than vnto Aly, who was yong and in the prime of his age. Ebubezer therefore reigned, & was created High Priest of the Arabians, otherwise called Sarafins, as in the time of the Christian Emperors of the East, who did willingly entertaine this nation, they were commonly called. The name comes of the country Saracena, in Arabia felix, or the happie, in which region, according to the same author, was the towne of Saraca, but farre off from these other people. Howsoever it be, it seemeth this name comes from Sara, Abrahams wife, notwithstanding they auow themselves to be descended from Ismael the son of Agar: but they take no pleasure she should be termed a chambermaid. Hauing reigned 3 yeares, he died, not without suspicion of poyson: after which time these princes entitled themselves Caliphs, that is to say, Gouernors, Rectors, and soueraigne Princes, properly heires and successors.

After Ebubezer, Homar held the scepter ouer the Arabians, being sometimes called Humar, M sometimes Humar, Hemer & Homer, by writers, to whom is attributed the taking of the towne of Bozra, the chiefe of Arabia, of Damas and of Ierusalem, and in the end of all Phenicia, Syria, Mesopotamia, and Egypt. And hauing vanquished Orismada or Horismida, King of Persia, in battaile, he seized vpon that great and mightie kingdome, to whose succour then came the Turkes from the Caspian ports and straits, but in vaine: so as the name of the Persians was then cx-

A extinguished, and they were all called Sarafins. He was suspected to be a Christian; for his father Catab was a friend and benefactor to the Christians, whom he drew to Ierusalem, and for that cause built the temple which remains vnto this day, with other shewes of superstition. Homar being in this esteeme with his people, he was slaine by a seruant of his, a Pertian, called Amigira, making his prayers vnto God. This prince was hardie and warlike, and did effect great matters: he reigned ten yeares. He died in the yeare of Christ 641, and the 24 of the Arabians raigne.

Ozman, or Hotman, Asman and Autumar, for this diuersitie of names are found in authors, sonne in law to Mahumet (for they hold, that he was married to two of his daughters, whereof it may be Zeineb was one) was the fourth Caliph of the Arabians. There was already growne great contention among this nation, touching matters of religion, it being vaine and without ground, by reason of many absurdities, which did contradict one another: which was no maruell; for Mahumet being ignorant of all learning, could not set downe his conceptions with any good method or order; but as they came into his braine he wrote them downe, and neuer perused them after: so as oftentimes forgetting what he had before set downe, preached, or otherwise published, he ordained diuers things which were repugnant and absurd. Whereunto the people which then followed him, being all giuen to armes, poore, needie, grosse and ignorant, tooke no good regard, their spirit being attentue to the exterior countenance; and if there were any more subtile, force and danger stoppt their mouthes. But after some yeares, they had more libertie and leasure to thinke thereof, and to examine Mahumets doctrine which was taught, so as they grew into many disputes. To remedie the which, Ozman caused the papers of the Prophet to be sought out, whereof they found a great cofer full in the house of Aissa his widow, with the helpe whereof he caused their Alcoran, or Alfurcan, to be compiled, shewing himselfe verie liberal to them that laboured therein. Yet some thinke, that this worke was begun by his predecesour Homar, and that he did reduce it into a better method, and into chapters.

Mahumet ignorant of all learning.

Alcoran of the Arabians.

Hucha one of his lieutenants inuaded Africke, and ruined Carthage, so as Tunis came then to be well peopled, and soone after Cairoan, an hundred miles vp in the countrey, and somewhat farre from the sea, was built, which since was a royall seat of the Arabians. Muhauias also who gouerned Egypt, went with an infinit number of vessels into Cyprus, which island he spoiled. This Muhauias was the founder of Caire, neere vnto the ruines of the auncient Memphis, the which from a little burrough came to the greatnesse and state wee haue seene it in our fathers time, and by his wisdome and conduct the estate of the Arabians was much augmented. He assailed the Romanes armie vpon the confines of Lycia, and put it to rout, so as the emperour Constant then raigning, was forced to flie in a disguised habit. Muhauias being puffed vp with this victorie, he besieged and tooke Rhodes, beat downe that great Colosse of the Sunne, being 70 cubits high, or 80, as some write, and sold the mettall to a merchant Iew, who laded 900 cammels therewith, and carried moreouer out of that island, infinit other goodly and rich workes, for it was replenished with such things, as Plinie writes, who wimetheth, that there hath bene numbered in it 73000 figures, or statues, and an hundred Colosses.

Cairoan built.

Caire built by Muhauias.

Rhodes taken by Muhauias.

E After these exploits he sent his armie at sea to the island of Sicile, from whence they were repulsed by Olympius, Exarch or Gouernour of Italic. He himselfe returned into Syria, and there raised a great armie by land, to inuade Capadocia, whither he marched. By these high exploits Muhauias was in great reputation among the Arabians, which made him aspire to the soueraigne dignitie, whereunto the death of the Caliph Ozman seemed to inuite him, wherefore he brought backe his armie.

Ozman dyed in the twelfth yeare of his raigne, the 653 of our Sauour, and the 36 of the Arabians, being set vpon in his palace by the Sarafins, which were of the faction of Ali his brother in law, they forced him to kill himselfe, for that hee would not fall aliue into their hands. Some write, that Ali himselfe slew him, by the persuation of Aissa Mahumets widow.

The miserable death of Ozman.

F There was great dissention then among the Arabians, vpon the election of a new Caliph: the competitors were Ali, Muhauias, and Mahumet: Ali obtained it by armes against Mahumet, but he was to trie it with Muhauias, who finding himselfe followed by a great armie of old old fouldiors, Egyptians and Syrians, and himselfe being also and expert capitaine, hee gaue G him many crosses for the space of a 11 moneths, so as by a common consent their quarell was put to the arbitrement of Alafates and Alafci, two old men of great reputation among them; who notwithstanding could neuer agree, so as they returned againe to armes, till that Alu was slaine by the practises of Muhauias, neere vnto the towne of Cufa in Arabia, and there buried: wherefore the place is called vnto this day Massad Ali, that is to say, the house of Ali. The inhabitants of Cufa and Aratha, did chuse for Caliph in his place Albacem, eldest sonne to him and to Fatima, eldest daughter to Mahumet, who in his carriage and behauiour represented his grandfather by his mothers side. Being established, hee marched with an armie against Muhauias, but being one neere vnto another, when as euerie man attended a bloudie H battell, suddenly Albacem, either moued by feare, or pietie, and his natural mildnesse, came and cast himselfe at Muhauias feet, acknowledging him his superiour: so as they entred into Cufa, the which they did ranfome for a great summe of money; and being come from thence to Ietrib, Muhauias set the royall diademe with his own hands vpon Albacem's head, and would haue him raigne, which he assured himselfe would not be long, for hee dyed within six moneths after. Thus Muhauias being freed from all competitors, raigned alone: he was (according vnto some) sonne in law to Mahumet, hauing married his daughter Zeineb, as it is likely, in her second marriage, from which mariage the royall familie of Aben Humeia is descended. It is hee which changed the Caliphes seat to Damas. He first inuaded the Romane empire with happie successe, Constant sitting in the imperiall seat, from whom hee did exact a tribute. He ouerrun Africke, from whence there were brought by the Sarafins about fourescore thousand persons, slaues: And in the time of Constantine, surnamed Pogonat, or the Bearded, hee tooke Cizicus a sea towne, from whence afterwards with a great fleet of ships he infested the prouinces of the empire, yea and Constantinople it selfe, but vnfortunatly for the Arabians: for after great losses both by sea and land, Muhauias remained tributarie to the Romanes, to whom hee promised to pay yearly three thousand pounds of gold, fourescore slaues, and as many hories, and withall to deliuer 50 Christian prisoners at the emperors choyce. By this meanes there was a peace, or truce concluded for thirtie yeares, betwixt the Romanes and Arabians; during the which Muhauias began to trouble the Potentates of his owne sect, reformed and subdued the Persians, and gaue them Matur for their G uernour.

Muhauias Caliph of the Arabians.

Damas the seat of the Caliphes.

Arabians tributaries to the Romanes.

A Council of Mahumet at Damas.

Four sects in Mahumet's religion.

Muhauias vnlearned.

the 6 Caliph

Mahumet's sect was spread farre into the East, but with great inconstancie, and mingled with heresies: by reason whereof hee called a Councell at Damas, of the Aliaquins of Mahumet's law; whither he commaunded to bring all the writings that could bee recovered as well of their Prophet Mahumet, as of the Caliphes his successours, and other interpreters: but there was nothing but contention and confusion, without any resolution: Wherefore there were five of the most learned men chosen, that is, Boar, Buora, Anocci, Atermunde, and Dauid, who were enjoined to gather out of all the volumes (the which as they write would haue laden two hundred cammels) what they thought came nearest to their Prophets will, which they held the trueth. These being shut into a house, after they had turned ouer, and conferred these writings, they made six bookes of Mahumet's doctrine, the which were presented by them, vnto the king or Caliph Muhauias, who published them, and by his authoritie caused them to be receiued, vpon paine of death to any one that should dispute the contrarie. The rest of the papers were tome in peeces, and cast into the riuer. From these six volumes there haue since growne foure sects among them, the Melicians, Afafians, Alambeilians, and Buanifians, the which maintaine themselves at this day in the great cite of Caire. After these things Muhauias dyed at Damas, an excellent prince, and verie warlike, of an active spirit, nature recompensing that which he wanted by art: for he could neither read nor write, to the great grieve of them of his sect, whom they held verie fit to haue advanced it, if he had been learned. He died in the threescore and seuenteenth yeare of his age, 678 M of our redemption, and sixtie one of the raigne of the Arabians, hauing raigned 24 or 25 yeares.

Hizit his sonne, or Gizit, or Iezid, was chosen Caliph after him, degenerating wholly from his father: For as he was active, resolute, and valiant, so this was base, voluptuous, and a coward: Whereupon Matur (whom his father had placed Gouernour of Persia) made himselfe

A himselfe king and Caliph, faining to be a Prophet; and of his race the Sophies which raigne there at this day are descended. The people of Cufa in Arabia, seeing the vnworthinesse of Hizit, chose Hocem the sonne of Ali Caliph against him; but he was slaine by Abdalla the son of Hizit, leauing twelve sonnes, which were, Zemal Abadin, Zemal Muamed, Bagner Muamed, of Hizit, leauing twelve sonnes, which were, Zemal Abadin, Zemal Muamed, Bagner Muamed, Taguin Muamed, Giasar Cadene, Giasar Musa, Ali Mucerat, Alle Muamet, Taguin Muamet, Halmaguin Alle, Hacem Alquerin, Hacem Muamed Mahadin, the which are buried in diuers places. The Persians beleue, that Hacem Muamed Mahadin alone of all the brethren, is not yet dead, and that he will come one day mounted vpon a braue horse, to conuert all the world, and to preach the law to all men, beginning with the towne of Massad Ali, where his grandfather was interred, where at this day they keepe a horse readie for him, the which they lead vnto their Mosquee, when they doe their seruice, with torches and lights in great pompe.

Hocem being slaine, and Hizit dead the third yeare of his raigne, Abdalla there raigned: Civile warres in Arabia. but for that he was a tyrant, they advanced Marian to the dignitie of Caliph, betwixt which two the warre continued two yeares: at the end whereof the Arabians held an assembly, in manner of a parliament, at Cufa, a towne in Arabia the happie, where Abdalla being deposed, Abdimelec was chosen in his place, who was verie young, of the race of Ali, and therefore much honoured by the Arabians: For, Ali (as we haue said) was appointed heire and successor of the kingdom, by the Prophet Mahumet, whereas Abdalla descended from Ebubezer, who had bene an vsurper. There was another nobleman of Arabia, called Dadar, which did bandie himselfe against Abdimelec, and was vanquished by him: but Abdalla did still hold the cite of Damas, and pursued another Caliph which was risen in Mesopotamia, which country is now called Diarbec. Against him Abdimelec sent a great capitaine, a kinsman of his, called Ciasar: who hauing encountered Abdalla vpon the riuer Euphrates, returning victoriously from Mesopotamia to Damas, fought with him, and defeated him, but with great effusion of blood. Abdalla being vanquished, thinking to saue himselfe in Damas, hee was kept out by the inhabitants, for his tyrannies: wherefore he fled to Caire, which at that time was not verie great, where they also refused him the entrie. Being therefore chased, and abandoned by all men, thinking to crosse ouer into Greece, he was slaine in a little island, whither a torment had cast him. With him ended the race of the Caliphes of Damas, called by the Arabians, Marauians, descending from Muania and Ebubezer. Ciasar pursuing his victorie, entred into Damas, and there vied all the cruelties he could against the Marauians, taking the bones of the Caliph Hizit out of his graue, the which he burnt publicly, and cast the ashes into the riuer. Yet one of Muanias descendants, called Abedramun, escaped, flying into the furthest parts of Libia, towards the West Ocean, into Mauritania Tingitana, whither the Arabians were newly come: For all the length of Africk, from Nile vnto the Ocean (except some places vpon the sea coast, which were yet subject vnto the Romane empire) had bene ouerrun and subdued by this nation. There this prince being acknowledged by the Sarafins to be of the race of the Caliphes of Damas, was well entertained and honoured by them: Wherefore taking courage, he erected an Estate, and built the towne of Maroc, which was afterwards the head of a great kingdom. He was the first which called himselfe Miralumun, that is to say, Prince of the beleueers. Abdimelec nor Ciasar pursued him not, being verie farre off, and for that he had limited his designs and ambition in those remote parts, not affecting to make himselfe greater: besides, the plague, famine, and many seditions, but about all the attempts of the Romanes, did much trouble Abdimelec, so as he was forced to renew a peace with the emperours of Constantinople, and make the Arabians againe tributarie to Iustinian the 2 then raigning, promising to pay him ten pounds of gold, a slaue, and a horse euery day: by reason of which peace so deerly bought, he conuerted his forces against Persia, whereas one Abdalla Zubir had newly seized vpon that region, after that he had vanquished and slaine Matur, who had vsurped it vpon the Caliph Hizit. Abdimelec sent all his forces against this Abdalla, and hauing chased him out of Persia, he recovered that prouince. Then he sent one of his captaines, called Cagian, to pursue Abdalla, who was retired to Mecque, where hee was besieged, the towne taken, and Abdalla slaine by Cagian, who then burnt the auncient idole, and the temple there.

After these things, the Caliph Abdimelec was againe ingaged in warre against the Christians, by the treacherie of Iustinian, who snarled for it: for being defeated with most of the Grecians,

Abdalla deposed and Abdimelec chosen the ninth Caliph.

Race of the Caliphes Marauians descended from Damas.

Abedramun the summe of the kings of Maroc.

A grievous tribute paid by the Arabians to the Romanes.

Roman chafed out of Spaine.

Grecians, he was forced to save himselfe by flight, and was afterwards chased out of the imperiall seat by Leonce, with great troubles throughout all the Easterne empire of the Christians: whereby the Caliph had not onely meanes to recover all that the Romanes had taken from him in Asia, but also to chase their Gouvernours and armies out of all Africke; so as there was nothing remaining of the Roman name: yet his lieutenants were beaten invading Cilicia, by the care and conduct of Heraclius, a Romane capitaine, about which time Abdimelec dyed, hauing raigned ouer the Arabians one and twentie yeares. Whilest hee was busie in these warres, the same of the sanctitie and iustice of Abdramon (who as wee haue said had built Maroc) grew so great, as he was held by those Westerne Caliphs, and more than a Caliph: and the opinion of his vertues passing into Arabia, and throughout all the East, it happened, that dying and leaving his sonne Klis successor of his goods and good fame, all the Arabians with one generall consent chose him for their Caliph in the place of Abdimelec, who dyed in the yeare seven hundred and seven. So the race of the Marauians raigned againe, which was the posteritie of Zeineb, daughter to Mahumet, ingendred (as some beleue) on Aissa the daughter of Ebubezer.

Klis Caliph of the Arabians,
the 90 yeares of
the Arabians,
and the 707 of Christ.

Klis was the mightiest of all the Arabian princes, his predecessors, rainging in a maner from the Western Ocean, vnto the riuer Indus. He gaue the government of Africk to Musa, with the title of Admirall, and in a manner absolute power, all which was subject to his empire, except a small portion of the countrey which the Gothes held neere vnto the strait, whereas the towne of Cepta stands, the which is now called Ceura: all the rest had bin conquered by his predecessors, Caliphs. You must vnderstand, that the Arabians entring into Africke, they brought in Mahumets law, their language and their manners: so as the great number of Christians was much decreased, but not wholly extinguished, and many goodly churches came to ruine: the African tongue was in a maner lost, and the Arabian was made common. Yet there is at this day a certaine people found, which haue preferred the African tongue, as the Biscanes haue done the antient Spanish, as some hold. They dwell in the mountaines of the kingdom of Sus, about Cap d' Aguer, towards the Western Ocean, and call their language Thamazel, the which differs from the Arabian as much as the Biscane from the Castilian; and the Moors of qualitie in that countrey, learne the Arabic tongue in schools, or in courts, that they may be able to conuerse with them. It hath also appeared since, that many families haue retained the Christian religion, and the holy Scriptures, with some forme of Sacraments, but not altogether pure: for Ferdinand the third, called the Holy, rainging in Castille, and since in the raigne of John the first, there were found in the citie of Maroc, certaine antient families, called Farfanes, which retained still the name and profession of Christians, about 680 yeares after that the Sarafins had seized vpon Africk, whereof some came into Spaine, to Alcala de Henares. Moreouer, it was seene in our daies, that after that the citie of Tunis had been taken by the emperor Charles the 5, from Haradin Barberousse, there were many habitations of Christians in that citie, hauing retained, and as it were inherited from father to sonne, for the space of about 800 yeres, the articles of our Faith, not without great admiration of the diuine providence, who liued in a suburbe without the towne, at the South gate, men much esteemed of their kings, and valiant and hardie in the warres. They had a temple separated from the Moors, who called them Rabatines, and of them the gards of the kings person did consist. These Rabatines were afterwards transported to Naples by the emperor, that they might be instructed in the Romish religion.

The Arabian tongue common in Africke.

Christian religion preserved in Africke.

Rabatines Christians
in Africke.

The wrath of God vpon states
for their vices.

Faults in the warre.

3 Whilest that Klis raigned ouer the Arabians, and that Musa gouerned Africk, the Moors passed into Spaine, as we haue said, against the kingdom of the Gothes, whereby there followed a lamentable desolation: a nation without doubt fatall to Christendome, which had shewed it selfe rebellious, and to contemne so many graces it had receiued: For in that age, ambition and tyrannie did tread all diuine and humane lawes vnder foot, and all good order was peruerced, as well in Ecclesiasticall as ciuile governments. The bishops did then contend for the Primacie, being growne insolent, by the carelesse of princes, who had referred the whole charge of affaires vnto them, abandoning themselves in the meane time to pleasures and disorderly lusts, with an opinion to be absolved of all their excesses, in building of churches, conuents, and retreats for Clergie men, and endowing them with great reuenues, diuiding with them the spoiles they tooke from the people: who for their parts being

ing ill instructed, and corrupted with the superstitions and traditions of men, could doe no other seruice vnto God, but set vp Images and altars, seeke out the bones of dead Saints, and such other things, little seruing to true pietie; thinking the paine they tooke in these exercises, a good satisfaction for all their offences. To conclude, there was then so great a confusion (the which is not yet amended) as God being iustly offended, gaue scope to the furie of the Arabian nation, the which invaded the Potentates of Christendome with such furie, as in lesse than an hundred yeares they ouerthrew all the power and riches of the Romane empire, of the Persians, and of other Estates. This was not a passage, as that of the Gothes, Hunnes, Lombards, and other nations of Sithia: the which passed soone away, as an overflowing deluge, or if they stayed among vs, they soone conformed themselves to humanitie, pietie, and iustice: but this plague was durable, and did still increase; for the Turkes empire at this day is nothing but a remainder of the Arabians, mingled with the Hunnes, from whence the Turkes are come. There remaine few certaine families of that Turkish nation which came from the Caspian straits, in the time of Orismada the last king of Persia, who was defeated by Haumai, Caliph or king of the Sarafins, and the which did afterwards vanquish them: and yet they grew so familiar with them, as after that time the Turkes and Sarafins were reputed but one nation.

We haue thought it expedient, for the more light of our historie, to make this digression and to seeke out the beginning of this indomptible power of the Arabians, and to relate the succession of that Estate, vntill their entrie into Spaine vnder the conduct of Tarif, or Tarif Aben Zerca, who defeated king Roderic, as we haue shewed in the former booke, where this king dyed, and in a manner all the flower of the nobilitie of the countrey, in the yeare of our saluation seven hundred and fouretee, in Iuly, or according vnto some, in September.

Returning then to our historie, we say, That the Arabians, or Moors (as wee will rearme them indifferently hereafter) hauing obtained this great victorie, in a realme without forts, it was then easie for them to rauage and spoile the whole countrey at their pleasure, seeing there was no force to withstand them. They diuided their armie into many troupes, & at one instant assailed all the places which they thought to be of any strength. One of their armies went against Malaga, and tooke it: another marched to Cordoua, vnder the conduct of a Christian Kenigado, called Magetard. Tarif with another troupe tooke Iaca, then called Mentisa, which defended it selfe to the last extremitie, the which he rafed: then he tooke Toledo and Guadalaiaara. And passing on, hauing for his guide Mugnuza, or Numatius, a Goth, hee came vnto the Asturias, where he seized vpon Gigion and Astorga. Returning towards Catalogne, vnder the conduct of Mugnoc, earle of Cerdagne, he made himselfe master of that countrey, and left the earle there for Gouvernour. Another armie conquered the countie of Murcia and Granado, but not without resistance: for neere vnto Horiuela there was a cruell battell, the place carries the name vnto this day of the bloody field, yet the Sarafins were victors. Valencia yielded after that the inhabitants had beene beaten in field, yet vpon condition, to leaue a temple to the Christians, which is now that of S. Bartholemew, and was then a colledge of S. Basil. Among other riches, mention is made of a table of Emeraud, which they carried away, the which was in a place since called Medina Talmid, it is Siguenza, or Medina Zelin. It was rather a certaine kind of Indian Iasppe, very like vnto an Emeraud, and very common in the East, whereof they hold, that Catin to be, which is so famous at Genua. The greedinesse of spoyle was the reason they wanted not any souldiors, for all Africk posted thither. The taking of Toledo was vpon a Palme Sunday, in the yeare 715, by the treacherie of the Iewes, whilest the Christians were at a Sermon at S. Leocades church in the suburbe.

Musa Gouvernour of Africk, jealous of the fortunat successe of Tarif, came himselfe in person into Spaine, and would haue the best part of the spoile. Afterwards they made war joyntly together, notwithstanding that they were deadly enemies, and took Sarragosse & other towns. The reliques of Saints which they had so much reuerenced, and worshipped in stead of God, could neither defend the Spaniards, nor save themselves: for it is to be presumed, that these Barbarians did not bear them any great respect, after they had seized vpon the ornaments and chests of gold or siluer, where they had bin kept: yet if you wil beleue the monks and other their fauourers, they lost not many, the greatest part hauing bin preferred by the care of the Clergie

Arabian and Moors one nation in this li-storie.

Exploits of the Arabians in Spaine.

A table of Em-
eraud.

The Moors were first conquerors in Spain.

The least care of conquering a religion.

Seven churches left to the Christians at Toledo

The Moors are said to have followed by many Christians for spoyle.

Quiedo,
Pelagius first Christian king of the Asturias.

Clergie, and other deuout men, who transported some into Fraunce, others into Germanie, England, and other places, where in the time of our predecessors they were yet worshipped. Some authors write, That the Moors were eight moneths about the conquest of Spaine, others foureteene, many two yeares; but the most probable, five yeares: for it is not credible, that so great a country, where there were so many Christians, and so many places of strength, at the least by nature, should fall in so short a time into the Infidels power, without any opposition: for they maintaine, That in diuers encounters, assaults, and sieges of townes and castles, there died about seven hundred thousand Christians. Tarracone among others defended it selfe virtuously, who shewed by their valour, that it was a true auncient Colonie of the Romanes. In the end God hauing decreed to punish this people for their sinnes, and to admonish the other profaners of his glorie, it was forced to yeeld.

All the regions, cities, townes, and castles of Spaine, except some places in the mountaines of Asturia, Biscaie, and Nauarre, were made subject and tributaries to the Moors; who had no great care at that time to force men in their religion, but did allow them the exercise thereof: and to some townes they granted many priuiledges, for that they would not vnpeople the country, burthening them with great tributes, which was all they sought.

The citie of Toledo among others had seven churches granted them for the exercise of their religion, which were, S. Iuste, S. Luke, S. Torquat, S. Marke, S. Eulalie, S. Sebastian, and S. Marie. Moreouer, it was granted, that they should haue judges of their owne religion and nation, and be gouerned by the lawes of the kings of Gothes, with other priuiledges. By this meanes the Moors retained an infinit number of Christian families, which liued and multiplied vnder them, else Spaine had bene left desart, for the Arabians could not people it. The Christians which liued among the Arabians, were called Musarabes (as it is likely) of the name of the Gouverneur Musa, who would bee famous by this conquest. These Musarabes Christians did celebrate their diuine seruice, as it had bene vsed in the time of the kings of Gothes, and according to the institution of Isidorus bishop of Seuille, or of Leandre, as they had accustomed to serue God in those times throughout all Spaine, and continued vntill the seruice, called Gregorian, or Romane, was brought in, as we shall shew hereafter. This Musarabic seruice, is entertained at this day for a marke of antiquitie, in the chappell of the companie of Christs bodie, in the great church of Toledo, and in other places of that citie. They hold it for certaine, that all the Moors and other Africanes which past into Spaine, were not of Mahumets sect, but a good number of them were Christians: For it is not credible, that the Africanes, who were made subject vnto the Arabians, a little before their passage into Spaine, borne and bred in the Christian religion, and vnder Christian princes, should so soone haue changed their religion: But it is probable, that being newly subjected to the Mahumetane kings, many followed their armies wherefoeuer they went, without any scruple of religion, although they were Christians, hauing no other end but spoile, as most souldiours doe commonly.

The kings and Caliphes of the Arabians, did not care to force people newly conquered, to change their religion, but suffered them to liue with libertie, least they should vnpeople the country, and diminish the fruits of their victories. And that Africke had preserved families of Christians, it is verified by experience, as we haue formerly shewed. The like was in Spaine, the which notwithstanding the gouernment of the Moors, did still retaine a great number of Christians, as well borne in the country, as others that came out of Africke to dwell there, holding the Moors partie, the which made the enterprises of the kings of Leon and Castille, and of other Christian princes, more easie to be executed, when following the steps of Pelagius (who first tooke arms against the Moors) they began to recouer the country.

Pelagius first King of the Asturias, the deliuerer of Spaine.

4 Pelagius (as we haue said) was the footman of Fasila, Gouverneur of Biscaie, whom Vitiza before he was king had slaine, that he might more freely enjoy his vnchaste wife: After whose death Pelagius retired himselfe into a place of safetie in the mountaines, and there was pre-

A preserved through the fauour of his kinsmen and friends, by the prouidence of God, who had so decreed to giue a beginning to the deliuerie of Spaine. They say, that the Cantabrians were the last people of Spaine, which were made subiect to the Roman power; and the last also that were drawne away, to vndergoe the Gothes yoke: whom notwithstanding they could neuer so subiect, as they would euer yeeld to any other lawes and manners, than those that were fit for them. During the Moors conquest, it is also to be presumed, that they maintained themselves in some libertie; and in like manner all the other people of Spaine, where as the mountaines, and places of hard access, gaue them any meanes to defend themselves. Yet we must confesse, that they could not altogether assure themselves from that horrible inundation; but they escaped better then the rest of the Spaniards which were found in the champion country of more easie access. The which is euident, by the report which the Spanish Authors make of this Pelagius; saying, That after the Moors had reigned five yeres in Spaine, he hauing resolved in himselfe to giue some succours to the afflicted Christians, left his secret retreats, and came into the Asturias of Quiedo, where there was one Nymistius, otherwise called Magnusa, by corruption of the language; a Christian by profession, but seruing the Moors, and by them made Gouverneur of the country of Gigion, into whose friendship and seruice he did insinuate himselfe. Whereby we may coniecture, that betwixt the Moors and Cantabrians there was some commerce, some league, and (it may be) subiection, yet vpon honest and tollerable conditions, by reason of the strong situation of their country.

As lust had bene the cause of the ruine of the kingdome of the Gothes in Spaine, so voluptuous desire made the Moors power decrease there. For Pelagius hauing a faire and louely sister in his house, this Magnusa grew in loue with her; and fearing he should not obtaine her, she being wife, and well bred, her brother being in the country, he resolved to giue him a commission, to goe to the great Admirall Musa in embassade, to Cordoua, during which voyage he forced this Gentlewoman. Pelagius aduertised at his returne of what had past, notwithstanding that all might be couered vnder colour of mariage, which Magnusa said he had promised to his sister, yet he held this rape and violence done to the contempt and dishonour of his house: but he dissembled it for the present, and when he found a conuenient opportunitie, he retired himselfe with his sister into the strongest parts of the mountaines of Asturia, watching meanes to reuenge himselfe. Magnusa incensed, for that he had taken her from him whom he loued, and who he said was his wife, and finding his honour thereby interested, he gaue the Gouvernors and Commanders of the Arabians in Spaine to vnderstand, That Pelagius made attempts against their State: wherefore thinking it needfull to prevent it in time, they sent great store of souldiers to Magnusa, to suppress him, who had almost surprised him: but it was the will of God that Pelagius should haue intelligence of this storme which was comming towards him: who hauing past the riuer of Ponia, he retired into the vallie of Cangas, where he found many wandring Christians, liuing in those places in great feare of the Moors. Whose wills he hauing founded, and exhorted them to be courageous, and to fight valiantly for the common cause, and to relie vpon the assistance of God, he found them readie to imploy themselves for the libertie of their country; and moreover they were so affected vnto him, as they chose him their capitaine and leader in this wortheie enterprise, giuing him then the title of King. And within few dayes the brute of this enterprise being dispersed through the mountaines, the Chrihians which lay hidden, came vnto him from all parts, so as in a short time he found himselfe strong ynough to defend himselfe against any that should come to assaile him. The Moors armie hauing failed at this time, returned to Cordoua.

We may well coniecture, that Pelagius was of the Gothick race, yet the Spaniards denie it, hauing no forcible argument, but that the name of Pelagius was not vsuall among the Goths, and they maintaine, without any other proofes, That he was defended of that country by long succession, whereof we can speake nothing assured: But whatsoeuer he were, that honor is due vnto him, as a valiant Prince: for although it seemes that he was forced to take armes for the private iniurie done vnto his sister, and himselfe; yet he shewed great discretion, that he could wisely ioyne the publick cause with his priuat interest, and pursue the reuenge of the one and the other, by all the iust meanes which opportunitie and the estate of their affairs did allow.

Magnusa a Christian ser-
uing the Moors.

Magnusa firceth Pelagius
sister.

Pelagius persuaded his sister
into the mountaines of Asturia.

Pelagius chosen
king of the Christians dispersed.

Gar-

Garcia Ximenes first King of Sobrarbre, deliuerer of Spaine.

AT that time such as had retired, and preferred themselves in the Pyrennees, Nauarre, and the high country of Arragon, began to stirre; who chose Garcia Ximenes for their head, being a noble house among the Gothes, although the name seemes to come to contradict that opinion: who in the beginning gathered together 600 resolute men, with the which he did great exploits, as the Spanish Authors say; who report, That after he had recovered Ainsa from the Moors, & given them a great defeat, he tooke for the royall Armes of Sobrarbre, a red crosse planted vpon an Oke in a field, or, for that such a signe had appeared vnto him during the conflict before the which he caried only a field of gold. These were the beginnings of the realmes of Ouiedo and Nauarre, or Sobrarbre, as it was then called, about the year Anno 716. 716, and according to the computation of the Spaniards Era 754, or as some say, 718, and 756, the Moores being Lords and masters of all the good townes in Spaine.

In all places held by the Moores, there were many Christians, retained by their mildnesse, and the loue of their naturall country, which contended themselves to liue tributaries: to whom the Christian religion was allowed, wherein they had bene bred, and to celebrate that forme of seruice which had bene instituted by Isidore, or Leandre, Bishops of Seuille. These Christians, as we haue said, were called Musarabes, and their seruice Musarabic. The forme of their Masses and ceremonies is described by Vasee and others, to whom we referre the curious reader. Whilest that Vrbain, who had bene chosen Bishop of Toledo, liued, he was carefull of his flocke: but about all he had a care to transport the reliques of his church to Ouiedo. Frodoaire Bishop of Eccia, and Euatius Archdeacon of Toledo, were famous for their learning and integritie, with Iohn Bishop of Seuille, who translated the Bible into the Arabian tongue. The Arabians hauing settled their affaires in Spaine, and provided for the safetie of their places and forts, Musa and Tarif prepared to repasse the sea, being called home by Vlit, great Miralmumin, or Miramamoln, to giue him an account of their conquests, and government. Wherefore they left the gouernment of Spaine to Abdulazis, the sonne of Musa, who kept his court at Seuille, and there married the widow of king Roderigo Egilone: and to Alcaman a captaine of the Moores, there were great forces giuen both of horse and foot, to goe against Pelagius, who gathered souldiers together in the mountaines of Asturia.

Abdulazis first gouernor of the Moores, residing at Seuille.

Anno 618.

Ouiedo.

This Alcaman led Oppa, or Olpa, sometimes Archbishop of Toledo, in his companie. Pelagius in the meane time fortified himselfe, and being aduertised of the Moores approaching, he marched towards them with his troupes, and came & lodged at mount Auseba, and seised vpon the straits and passages thereof; where hee attended with a thousand choyce Christians, hauing disposed the rest (which were lesse assured, and worse armed) vpon the top of the rockes and eminent places, as he thought it fit, to annoy the Moores, if they came on.

Oppa Archbishop of Seuille,
an Apostat.

A notable victory of the Christians
against the
Moores.

He was first solicited by the Archbishop Oppa, to lay aside armes, and to submit himselfe to the mercie of the Miralmumin Vlit; assuring him that he should bee well intreated both in his goods and honour. That if he should persist in his rebellion, he should consider into what miseries he plunged himselfe, and what small likelihood he had to make head against the great power of the Arabians, whom the force of all the Gothes could not resist. Which persuasions Pelagius did virtuously reiect, so as comming to fight, God assisted him, and gaue him victorie ouer this multitude of Barbarians, of whom there were slaine (as they write) about twentie thousand vpon the place: not without some miracles in the furie of the fight; for they say, that the arrowes which were shot against the Christians, returned against the enemies themselves. Alcaman the Generall of this armie was slaine there, and no man knew what became of Oppa. This admirable victorie was the first testimonie which God gaue the afflicted Christians of their restauration, the which Pelagius obtained in the year 718, Musa and Tarif being not yet embarked, but they parted soone after, leauing the reuenge of this losse to Abdulazis.

Ta.

ATarif got the start, and arrived at the Court of Miralmumin Vlit, before Musa, whom he accused of many abuses and exactions; and did so incense the Prince, as Musa at his arriuall was not onely disgraced, but condemned in a great fine, so as he died for griefe. His gouernment was giuen to Alabor by Vlit, or by his successor Zuleima, otherwise called Zulcimin: for they say that Vlit died in the same year 718. Alabor hearing of the defeat giuen vnto the Moores by Pelagius, had a conceit, that it happened by the fraud or trecherie of Cont Julien, and the children of Vitiza: whereupon he put them to death, and did forfeit their goods. Abdulazis, who held Seuille, being importuned by his wife, who was grieved, that from being a Queene she was now become the wife of a Viceroy, or Gouernour of Spaine, tooke vpon him the title and Royall Diademe, against the custome of the Arabians: but it lasted not long; for in the third year of his raighe he was slaine in a church as he was at prayers, by certaine Arabians, which had conspired against him, being persuaded that he was become a Christian. His wife was also slaine.

The Sarafines
inuaide Languedoc.

After him Aiub raigned, who changed the royall seat from Seuille to Cordoua: some Authors say it was his successor Alabor. He built againe the towne of Bilbilis, which had bene ruined, and called it by his name Calat Aiub. The Sarafines were growne so proud, as not contenting themselves with the conquest of Spaine, they attempted to passe the Pyrennee mountaines, and inuaide the Gotick Gaule, which is at this day called Languedoc, all which they conquered in a manner, euen vnto the Alpes. And, whilest they fedd themselves with hope to become Maisters of all Gaule, they neglected the affaires of Asturia, and the enterprises of Pelagius: who hauing woon great honour by the victorie which he had obtained, he found himselfe fortified in a short time with a great number of Christians, which came vnto him from all parts, yea out of those townes which were held by the Moores: Wherefore he neither lost time nor opportunitie, but taking occasion when they were busied in their other warres, he tooke Leon from them, going on still in his course. This was in the year 722. Leon taken by the Christians. Then he left (as the Spaniards say) the Gothes Armes, and carried a Lion gueules in a field argent, which are at this day the Armes of Leon: Yet he called himselfe King of Ouiedo, without any other title. Yet it is not verie certaine, that these Armes of a Lion gueules were first of all carried by Pelagius; but it is without all question, that the Lion which is in the Armes of Leon, hath no reference to the name of the towne, which was in old time called Legio. Among others which had followed Pelagius in diuers encounters which he had against the Moores, there was a Nobleman of Biscaie, of the bloud royall, descended from Ricarde, named Alphonfus, sonne to one Peter gouernour of Biscaie, or Duke, as they were then called, who, it is likely, was substituted in the place of Fasilla, slaine by Vitiza. To this Alphonfus (for that he was wise and valiant, and had drawne many good offices from him) hee gaue his daughter Ormisinde in mariage; from whom and this Alphonfus are descended the kings of Leon.

Alphonfus a Biscaie sonne in law to Pelagius,
the stem of the kings of Ouiedo
and Leon.

On the other side there was some alterations in Nauarre, whilest the Moores were busie in Languedoc, and other parts of Gaule, so as Garcia Ximenes laid the foundations of his principallitie or kingdome in these mountaines. The histories of Arragon attribute the honour of the beginning of this royaltie to their country, calling it the kingdome of Sobrarbre, the which are mountaines at this present in the confines of Arragon: But we find that this Garcia was Lord of Amescua and Abarfusa, places neere vnto them, where as the towne of Estella was afterwards built. There were other enterprises made in Cattelognia, & elsewhere.

Moores.
Alabor third Viceroy.

After Aiub, Alor, or Alabor, sonne to Abderramen, was Viceroy of Spaine, about the year 719, and the Era 757: who shewed himselfe rigorous to the Moores and Arabians, who had first taken and sackt Spaine: whom he intangled in diuers accusations, that he might spoyle them of the wealth which they had gotten. So as, if the Christian Spaniards were punished, those which punished them had no great content of the aduantage which God had giuen them ouer their people. To Zubeima the Caliph, there succeeded in the year 719, two of his nephewes, Homar the sonne of Abdimazir, and Iziz, or Giziz, the sonne of Abdimetec: but Iziz died soone after, and Homar raigned alone, who sent Adam the sonne of Melic into Spain for Gouernour, who (as they say) made the bridge at Cordoua. We haue said (according to the opinion of many graue Authors, well informed of the disposition of the Arabians) that it is a nation which hath euer bene enemie to rest, and to all good lawes and policie, the which can-

Homar and Iziz Caliphs.
Adam fourth Viceroy of the Moores.

Q ij

cannot long containe it selfe in any good order, nor vnder one prince, or lawfull magistrat. According to their naturall disposition, those which inhabited Spaine, made hauocke of all things by their robberies and thefts: whereupon this Viceroy Adam punished many of them by pecuniarie fines, and thereby made himselfe partaker of their spoyle. They say he exacted the fifth part of their substance: the which he did also of the inhabitants of the townes and castles of Spaine, which he tooke by force, and the twentieth part of them which yielded willingly vnto him. He died at Tortose, returning from the spoyle of Tarraffone. At that time the Sarrafines made great conquests in Gaule; they tooke Narbone, and besieged Toulouse, vnder the conduct of Zama, who was slaine there. Eude, a Goth, a nobleman of Biscaye, Duke of Aquitaine in the right of his wife, kindled this warre, and perswaded Muniz, a Moore, making warre in Languedoc, to rebellion against Abderramen; giuing him a daughter of his to wife. By reason whereof he was assailed by Abderramen, besieged, and taken in Cerdagne, and his head sent with his wife into Africke. Abderramen pursuing his victorie against Eude, defeated him neere Arles, and gaue him another rout about Bourdeaux, spoyleing and burning all the countrey betwixt the Pyrenees & the riuer of Loire: Yet in the end they concluded a peace, the Moore fearing the French whom he had incensed by these spoyle.

Abderramen's fifth gouernor of the Moors in Spaine.

Anno 725.
Eucled Caliph.

Eude draws the Moors into Spaine, & then betrayes them.

An. 730.

*Ishba 6 Viceroy.
Moore.
Adaisa 7.
Hiemen 8.
Autuman 9.
Albatan 10.*

The second en-trie of the Moors into Gaule.

*Quiedo.
An. 735.*

*Vertue is not aduaiced here
at all.*

Eude died in the year 725, whom Eucled his sonne succeeded, and was vnsfortunate. During whose raigne, Eude Duke of Aquitaine, being threatened by the French, who raigned in Gaule, to whom he was suspect: and fearing their power, he called in against them that great multitude of Arabians, and Sarafines, which were defeated in Touraine by Charles Martel; which some affirme, were about foure hundred thousand men, who notwithstanding were betrayed, and abandoned to the slaughter, by Eude, hauing ioynd with Martel the day of the battell, and turned his forces against them who were come, by his persuation, to inhabit Gaule. Their Generall Abderramen gouernour of Spaine, was slaine there, with about three hundred thousand Arabians. This memorable battell, which faued Gaule and the kingdome of the French from vtter ruine, was fought in the year 730, or according to some Spanish Authors, 734: who say, That during these practises, Pope Gregorie the third then resident at Rome, had sent vnto Eude certaine hallowed sponges, the which being cut into small peeces, and distributed among the souldiers, preserved all such as carried them from being wounded, both in that battell, and afterwards in all other incounters.

Eucled sent Ishba into Spaine for Viceroy, who gouerned two yeares, and was the sixt, residing at Cordoua. To Ishba Adaisa Alcazazim succeeded, a rash inconsiderate man, and therefore soone deposed: whom Hiemen succeeded, who liued but six monethes; and then Autuman was aduanced, but he died within foure monethes after. Albatan followed him, who was cruell and inhumane, by reason whereof he lost both gouernment and life, by the commaundement of the great Emperor or Caliph, Eucled, hauing gouerned Spaine two moneths only. It may be it was in his time that the children of Eude Duke of Aquitaine deceased, being depriued of their possessions by the tyranie of the French, called the Arabians and Sarafines againe into Gaule, who spoiled the whole countrey betwixt the Pyrenees and the riuer of Loire, Languedoc, and Prouence, and seised vpon many strong places, whereof Auignon was one. The sons of Eude were Hunola, Ysfar, and Azner. The head of the Moores in this expedition, were Athin and Amorree: Athin was defeated by Charles Martel, and being chased out of Auignon, he fled to Narbone: where being besieged, Amorree comming out of Spaine to raise the siege, he was also defeated with all his armie, and pursued and slaine neere to Colible, at the foot of the Pyrenees. Charles Martel pursuing his victorie, committed greater spoiles then the Sarrafines and Infidels had done. Athin saued himselfe in Spaine, and hauing afterwards past into Africk, he died at the siege of Tanger.

This yere of Christ 735 king Pelagius died at Cangas, leauing to succeed him his son Fasila, and his daughter Orsuinde, or Ormisinde, the wife of Alphonso of Biscaye, one after another; hauing reigned 19 yeres, or 17 according to the most certaine. His wife was called Gaudienfe. They were interred in the church of S. Zulalia of Valania.

Fasila second King of Quiedo.

F Fasila sonne to Pelagius, second king of Quiedo, reigned onely two yeares. He was not so carefull as his father, to aduance the Christians Estate in Spaine. The Moores in like maner

A ner did not arme against him, for they were much troubled with the French warres. Wherefore this king giuing himselfe to the pleasure of hunting, more then was fit for his estate (not yet settled) was slaine by a Beare, which he pursued in the mountaines, being abandoned by his followers: Which some hold was in the year 737, but Garibay sayes, that there is a great error in the computation of these yeares. He was married to a Ladie called Froena, and they are both interred at S. Croix neere to Cangas.

After the death of Albatan gouernour of Spaine, Manes succeeded, who continued not long: then Mahomet, who liued but two monethes: After him Abderramen, who gouerned three yeares; who being dead, Abdemic ruled Spaine foure yeares, who punished some pertie tyrants, and hauing drawne a new people out of Africke, he filled the townes that were made desolate by the about mentioned defeats. He was chased out of his gouernement by Orba, who held it five yeares: then Abdemic returned, and gouerned a yere and a halfe, in whose place Alcataran was gouernour: who seeking to free Spaine of many strange souldiers; who were entertained then by the Caliph, he was slaine by them: So as the gouernment was vsurped by Aben Hax, who was presently set vpon by the children of Alcataran; who hauing vanquished him, he died within 15 dayes after: and then there grew great diuisions and troubles in Spaine; to suppress the which, the Emperour of the Arabians sent Zubeir with great forces, who pacified all these diffinitions, and contented the mutined souldiers with great entertainments: to satise the which, he tooke from the Christians (which liued vnder the subiection of the Moores) the third part of their goods. This gouernour Zubeir meaning to enter into Gaule, was preuented by the king of the French, who it seemes was Pepin, and defeated beyond the Pyrenees. He also sent a captaine against D. Alphonso the first, king of Quiedo: but he was vanquished by the Christian armie; and in this battell were slaine all the Arabian souldiers which had mutined. After Zubeir, Abderramen came to gouerne Spaine: then Iber Vzit, who liued little, and to him succeeded Abubacar, but he was slaine there, and in his place Rodon gouerned at Cordoua. It was the seat for the generall Gouernor of all Spaine, of whom depended all other Gouernors, Captaines, or Admiralls.

D Alphonso, the first of that name, and third King of Quiedo.

7 Alphonso called the Catholicke, sonne to Peter, Duke or Gouernour of the Cantabrians, Quiedo. or Biscains (of the Gothes race) descended from king Ricaredo, succeeded Fasila in the kingdome of Quiedo, in the right of his wife Orsuinde, or Ormisinde, daughter to Pelagius, and sister to Fasila, in the yere of Christ 737, and of their Era 775. It is likely this was the first woman which did inherit the Crowne in Spaine, vnlesse Alphonso were chosen king by the Spaniards, the which is credible: for the right of succession was not then in vse among those people, in regard of kingdomes. It is likely the name of Catholicke was giuen to this Alphonso.

E so, by some writers, for that he was a deuout Prince, and verie curious to enrich temples: yet the title of Catholicke which is giuen to the kings of Spaine at this day, comes not from him, the which we know was granted by Pope John the eighth, vnto king D. Alphonso the third; and by Pope Iulio the second, vnto the king D. Ferdinand the fifth, in the time of our fathers, for some considerations which we will hereafter shew. This prince was warlike, and tooke from the Sarafines the townes of Lugo, Tuy, Astorga, and a great part of old Castille, the second yere of his raigne: then Porto, Beia, Flauia, Ledesma, Zamora, Cimancas, Duegnas, Saldagne, Miranda, Segobia, Ofme, Auila, Sepulueda, Birbiesca, and all the countrey of Bureba, Braga, Vila, Salamanca, and others, which at this day belong to Portugal, Leon, Castille, & Nauarre; restoring the Bishops to their auncient seas, cherishing the Clergie, and making libraries in many parts of his countrey: he also tooke the towne of Pampelone in Nauarre. All which conquests he made, the Moores being not onely busied in the warres of France, but in ciuile diffinitions among themselves; being also fauored & receiued by the Christians which were the inhabitants in many places, whom they called Musarabes, liuing tributaries vnder the Moores. In his time Cixila was Bishop of the Musarabes of Toledo, a holy and learned man, as they say, who succeeded Yrbain, & after him Peter, surnamed the Faire, gouerned that church.

Q iij

Anno 737

The surname of Catholicke.

*The conquests of king Alphonso
the first.*

Bishops of Toledo in the time of the Moors.

The

Moors.

The estate of the Arabians was full of troubles after the death of the Miralmurim Enclid, being in contention for the government: in the which Gizeis the third was slaine, and Hizes his sonne remained Emperour, who reigned a yeare: After whom Marnan, of the race of Humeis, reigned six yeares. But there grew great civile warres by reason of these diuisions, the which in the end ruined their Estate. In the yeare 753 Toaba was sent to gouerne in Spaine, a souldier, and a man of worth; but he liued only a yeare. Ioseph was substituted in his place, a great enemy to the Christians: who hauing bene vnfortunate in his warres against king Froila, who slue about 50000 of his men in two battels: he was disdained by the Moores in Spaine, who called in Abderramen to rule ouer them.

Three Sunnes
seene in Spaine.

Ouiedo built.

At that time there were three Sunnes seene in Spaine, and for the space of two yeres there fell not any raine from heauen, which caused a great dearth of corne, and of all other things: and soone after king Alphonso died. Some hold that this king was the founder of the towne of Quiedo, whereof he intituled himselfe king: others say it was Pelagius; and some make it more auncient. He reigned 19 yeares, and liued 64, and was buried with his wife in S. Maries monasterie at Cangas. They held him for a Saint, and they say, that at his funerall there were voices heard singing in the aire, this verse in Latine; Ecce quo modo tollitur iustus, & nemo considerat, ablatus est à facie iniquitatis, & erit in pace memoria eius: Behold how the iust man is taken away, and no man considers it; he is taken from the face of iniquitie, and his memorie shall rest in peace. He had three sonnes by his wife Ormesinde; Froila, who succeeded him in the kingdom of Quiedo, Vimaran, and Aurelius; and one daughter Odesinde: he had also one sonne I called Mauuegar, by a concubine.

D. Froila fourth King of Ouiedo.

Anno 756.
Priests forbidden to marie.

8 IN the yeare 756 Froila was king in the place of his father Alphonso. They attribute to him, as a holy ordinance, that he did forbid the Clergie of Spaine to marie, the which they had vsed, and it may be abused since the raigne of Vitiza, and had made them subiect to the decree of Pope Gregorie the first, and the Councell of Rome. This act is written of him as good and holy, although in many other things he shewed himselfe cruell and wicked. Ioseph K gouernour for the Moores being in armes against him, and hauing spoyled the confines of Gallicia, they came to battell, which Froila woon: he slue 54000 Moores, and put the rest with their Commaunder to a shamefull flight.

A great defeat
of Moores.Nauarro or Sa-brabre.

Garcia Ximines, who (as we haue said) had begun a principalltie or royaltie in Sobrabre, tooke to wife a Ladie of a noble house, called Iniga; by whom he had one sonne, called Garcia Inigo. He intituled himselfe king of that countrey: wherewith the Nauarrois being discontented, they abandoned him, and ioined to the king of Quiedo. The first occasion which the Christians (inhabiting in the mountaines of Nauarre and Arragon) tooke to erect an Estate, and make head against the Moores, was of an assemblie at the interment of an Hermit which liued in the rockes neere vnto Iaca. This Hermit was buried in the place whereas afterwards the monasterie of S. Iohn de la Pegna was built, the which at the first was a Colledge of Chanoins. Garcia Ximines reigned 42 yeares, and left his pettie kingdom to Garcia Inigo his sonne, to whom the Nauarrois submitted themselves againe: but Froila reigning in Quiedo, forced them by armes to returne to his obedience.

Ouiedo.

Title of Dom
first vsed.Froilamurthers
his brother.

Froila married the daughter of Eude Duke of Aquitaine, called Menine, or according vnto some, Momerane; by whom he had two sonnes, Alphonso, called the Chast, and Bermond, or Veremond, both which reigned, although that D. Bermond was made by the Clergie: and moreover he had a daughter by her, called D. Ximina, who was mother to Bernard of Carpio. This king did first vse the title of Dom, which the king and all the Noblemen of Spaine haue euer since obserued. What the furious desire of raigne is, and with what ielousie kings are often tormented, Froila shewed by the cruell parricide of his brother Vimaran, whom he caused to be slaine through ielousie, seeing him to be a gallant Knight, and generally beloued for his good parts; yet he repented the fact, but too late. For satisfaction whereof, they write, that he adopted the sonne of Vimaran, called Veremond, to succeed him in the kingdom: the which hath bred some doubt, whether this Veremond (which came to the Crowne in the fourth

A fourth place after Froila, were the sonne of Vimaran, or of Froila himselfe; who soone after was also slaine by his other brother Aurelius, in reuenge of the death of Vimaran, hauing reigned eleven yeares and a halfe, or thereabouts.

9 During the raigne of this king the Arabians of Spaine diuided themselves wholly from the Caliphs of Damas, vnder Abderramen, who chased and in the end slew the Gouernour or Viceroy Ioseph, made himselfe king, and Miralmurim or Miramomelin, and field Spaine with that title 33 yeares, not acknowledging the Emperour or Caliph of Damas in any thing. This was in the yeare 757 of our redemption, and 138 yeares after the Moores descent in Spaine; by reason of the diuision of the foueraigne dignitie of the Arabians in the East: for against

B Marnan, who had succeeded Hizes, Caliph of the Arabians at Damas, there had risen many tyrants, whereof he punished some, but Asmulin vanquished him. This was of the race of Mutar, who had reigned in Perfia, and followed his sect, maintaining that Ali had bene the true Prophet, and greater then Mahumet: he commaunded then ouer the Corasenes, a people in Perfia: He was aduised by Caraban his friend, to procure the slaues throughout all Perfia to kill their masters, and to rob them; the which they did, and came rich with their masters spoyles to Asmulin. Soone after being impatient of ease, they diuided themselves into two sects, the Caismes and Lamonites; Asmulin taking part with the Lamonites, defeated the others, and with his victorious bands assayed Iolin, Gouernour of Perfia, vnder the Caliph Marnan, whom he vanquished, and Marnan also, who came against him with aboute three hundred thousand fighting men, forcing him to flie into Egypt, whither he was followed,

Asmulin Caliph
and his villo-
ries.

C defeated, and slaine by Salin, the sonne of Asmulin, by whom through his victories the kingdom of the Perfians was setled in his familie. The rest of Marnans familie and followers were disperfed in Asticke, where they erected the kingdom of Fez, and some passed into Spaine, which might be that race of Abderramen, of whom we here intreat; who notwithstanding Vasee affirmes was basely descended: and Garibay on the other side sayes, that he was issued from the race of Aben Humeis, and from Zaineb the daughter of Mahumet. His father was called Moabia, and his seat was also at Cordoua: he brought his armie before Valence, which resisted him, and tooke it. They say, that the bones of S. Vincent were worshipped there, and that many families among these Christians, ill instructed, fearing the coming of this Saracene king, dislodged, and carried these relickes into the woods and mountaines, which lye betwixt Valence and the mouth of the riuer of Guadiana: and hauing passed vnto that point which in old time was called the holie Promontorie, they were encountered by a Moore of Fez, called Alibouze, who rauaged the countrey of Algarbe; he slew these men, tooke their children prisoners, and left S. Vincents bones vpon the field, where they were afterwards found, and thereof this Promontorie was called Cap S. Vincent.

whence came S.
Vincent in Al-garbe took the name.

The Almighty God (although that he had deliuered his Church into the hands of Barbarians and Infidels, by reason of the prophanation of his name, and that the Spaniards made little vse of their chastisements) maintained alwaies some light of the Gospell among them, raising vp men, who entertained some order and shew of Christianitie, and had the Scriptures and their ceremonies throughout all the towne of the Moores jurisdiction. They make mention of Venus Bishop of Seuile, at that time a learned man, and of a good life. Cixilas was Archbishop of Toledo, to whom PP. Adrian (as the Spanish Authors say) did write a letter, blaming the custome of the Christians in Spaine to eat flesh on Saterdayes, wherefore they made an order, not to eat any that day but the entrailes, head, and feet of beasts, the which hath bene since obserued.

D. Aurelius fifth King of Ouiedo.

F D Aurelius succeeded his brother D. Froila in the realme of Quiedo, hauing slaine him in the yeare 767. notwithstanding that, he left a sonne called D. Alphonso the chast, with other children: but the hatred which the noblemen of the countrey did beare vnto his father, was the cause of his reiection, being then also verie young: whereby it appeares, that the right of succession was not in those dayes practised in Spaine. This Prince was politticke, and of an active spirit, yet not giuen to armes: wherefore he made a peace with the Moores, Ouiedo.

An. 767.The right of succession in the Crown had yet no place in Spaine.

Moore, so as during his raigne they did not attempt any thing one against another. The G bondmen in his countrey being murined against their masters, and in armes, they were supprest by the wisdom of this king, and reduced to their first condition of seruitude. They report a shamefull and abhominable thing of him among Christians, That in his capitulation with Abderramen to haue a peace, besides that he made himselfe his tributarie, he promised among other things, to giue euery yeare to these Barbarians a certaine number of virgins, yet Vascon doth attribute it to Mauregat. He married his sister D. Odesinde or Vsende, to a renowned knight called D. Sillo: and hauing reigned six yeares and six moneths, this king D. Aurelius died. All these kings were in a manner buried in the towne of Languas, which many write Cangas: We do not find that he had either wife or children. H

D. Sillo, sixt King of Ouiedo.

An. 774. 11 D. Sillo his brother in law, and his sister Vsende or Odesinde, obtained the kingdome of Ouiedo, in the yeare 774.

Arnar first
Earle of Arra-gon.

12 In Arragon there was an Earle called Arnar, risen in armes: some hold, that he was sonne or grandchild to Duke Ende of Guyenne, who comming to serue D. Garcia Inigo king of Sobrarbre, tooke Jaca, and obtained of him in gift the countrey which lyes betwixt the two riuers, called Arragon, with the title of Earle or Gouernour: dying, he left two sonnes, Galinde and Ximen Garces.

Ouiedo.

As for D. Sillo, the beginning of his raigne was troublesome, many refusing to obey him: wherefore to assure his estate, he renewed the peace with the Arabians in Spaine, and subdued his rebels by a victorie which he got of them vpon the mountaine of Zebrero in Gallicia. In the end, seeing that he had no children, he resigned the charge of affaires to D. Alphonso the chaff, nephew to his wife, and to her, giuing himselfe wholly to a contemplatiue life.

Moore.

In his time the noblemen Arabians enjoying the townes and prouinces of Spaine, vnder the Miralmumin Abderramen, impatient one of another, according to the naturall disposition of this mutinous nation, they fell to warre among themselves: Abubatar Denisfer, K and others, had chased away Ibnaballa of Saragosse, who is also called Abi Arabi, who called in Charlemagne king of France to his aid, and he entred into Spaine with a great armie, besieged Saragosse, tooke it by composition, and settled Ibnaballa in his Seigniorie, making the noblemen Moores that were his neighbors, his tributaries. Among other conditions accorded betwixt Charles and the Moores, it was said, that they should suffer (others say heare) the preachings of the Christians, the seruants of God.

The French
drawne into Spaine by the Moore diuisions.

D. Garcia Inigo, second King of Sobrarbre or Nauarre.

Nauarre or Sobrarbre.

13 IN this growing kingdome of Nauarre, D. Garcia Inigo had succeeded his father Garcia Ximenes in the yeare 758, who reigned 44 yeares. This king enlarged his limits by reason of the Moores dissensions, and tooke Pampelone from them; the which we read was also taken about that time by Charlemagne, king of France: so, as it seemes, that being readie to come into Spaine to succour Ibnaballa, the petty king of Saragosse, he would seize vpon Pampelone, to assure his passage; and then hauing restored Ibnaballa, and defeated Abderramen, killing about 30000 of his Moores, as the Spanish Authors report, he demanteled it in his returne into France, so as it was easie for D. Garcia to seize thereon. M

D. Mauregat, seuenth King of Ouiedo.

Ouiedo.
An. 783.

14 D. Sillo died in the yeare 783, hauing held the royall seat nine yeares and one moneth, and was interred at Ouiedo, in Saint Johns Church, which he had built,

A built, and was afterwards transported to S. Saluador: After whose decease, by a generall consent, the realme of Ouiedo was giuen to D. Alphonso, the chaff: but his vnkle D. Mauregat, bastard brother to his father, as he had beene vnlawfully begotten, so he shewed himselfe in his actions and affections, both to him and the State, without law, without piete, and without honour: for being desirous to raigne, he layed a plot with the Moores, and by their aide, chased Alphonso his nephew, out of the Asturias and Leon, forcing him to retire himselfe into the counties of Alaua, and Biscaye, where he had many allies, who preferred him from the treacherous practices of this tyrant. The accord hee made with the Barbarians, to procure succours from them, was villanous, and vnworthie of a Christian Prince: for hee bound himselfe to pay them a tribute contrarie to all law and honestie, which was, fiftie virgines of noble families, and as manie of baser condition, the which hee should send yeaerly: this impure and brutish king exposing those poore Christian creatures, by an expresse agreement, vnto the damnable appetite of Infidels: by reason whereof he was hated of all men, and (as it is likely) of God also. He reigned fise yeares and fise monethes, dying without children, and was buried at Prauia.

A detestable tribute payed
by a Christian Prince to Infidels.

In his time Abderramen raigning ouer all the Moores in Spaine, he did wonderfully spoyle the Christians, being verie mightie; for he had thirtie thousand horse and two hundred thousand foet in his ordinarie warres: with which forces he draue the kings of Ouiedo into the mountaines of Asturia, and brought vnder his subjection Gallafray king of Toledo, who made head against him, with manie other noblemen of his sect. He caused the Mosque or Mosque of Cordoua to be built, of a rich and stately structure. The Cathedral Church of that citie, admirable for the greatnesse and number of goodly pillars: the gardens and castle called Arrizaphe or Alixares, are also his workes. This Prince died in the yeare 787, and 170 of the Arabians, leauing eleuen sonnes and nine daughters. He was interred in the castle of Cordoua, and had for his successor in Spaine his sonne Izen, or Ixeza, or Ismen, for so he is called by diuers Authors.

Moore.
The power of Abderramen,
His work,

D. Veremond, first of that name, and eighth King of Ouiedo.

15 D. Veremond, or Bermond, the sonne of Froila, reigned after Mauregat in Ouiedo and Leon, hauing beene of the Clergie, and made a Deacon. Wherefore fearing to offend God, if he did forsake his Clericall profession to gouerne the kingdome, he left this dignitie, and resigned it to his brother D. Alphonso the second yeare, or as some write, the third, of his raigne. And moreover, being married to a Ladie called Imoline, from that time he did forbeare her companie, notwithstanding that he had had two children, Ramer and Garcia: He liued foure yeares and six moneths after that with D. Alphonso, and lyes interred at Ouiedo.

Ouiedo.
An. 789.

A Prince too
superstitious.

16 In his time, Izen, Osmen, or Ismen, the second sonne of Abderramen, reigned at Cordoua, who seized on the Crowne, to the preiudice of his elder brother Zuleima, who gouerned at Toledo. The inhabitants of Toledo, and all that iurisdiction, obeyed Zuleima still, who tooke vpon him the title of King, seeing himselfe assured of his people. D. Hizen being jealous thereof, came to assaile him, where there was a great and a bloudie battaile betwixt the two brethren, neere vnto a place called Vilches, in the which Zuleima was defeated, and all the passages being stoppt, that he could not fortifie himselfe in Toledo, he fled into Murria; from whence he afterwards passed into Asticke, to seeke in-vaine for meanes to recouer that which he had lost in Spaine. Hizen after this victorie marched towards Toledo, and did so terrifie them of the towne (who were neither well furnished with souldiors, nor victuals) as they yeelded presently, vpon honest conditions for the inhabitants. Thus Hizen remained peaceable king of Spaine, being wonderfully proud and haughtie, so as presently after he sought to continue the warre in Languedoc, which his predecessors had begun, where he did much annoy the Christians, and carried away great spoyle, with

Moore.
Warre betwixt
two brethren
Moore.

The Moores
make warre in Languedoc.

with the which he did enrich the Mosquee which his father had begun at Cardoua, especial-ly with the pillage of Narbone and Gironne. In Spaine he sent a great armie vnto the Asturias, against king D. Alphonso the chaste, who refused to send him that vnworthie and tyrannous tribute of virgines, whereunto king Maurice the bastard had submitted himselfe. He found the Christians in armes neere vnto a Bourg called Ledos or Alado, where they fought with such obstinacie, as there were slaine aboute seuentie thousand Moores vpon the place, with their Generall Maugay, by meanes whereof the kings of Ouiedo and Leon were from that time freed from that villanous tribute. This battaile was woon, whilest that D. Bermond or Vermond the Deacon yet liued. The Moores were afterwards set vpon by the French, vpon the confines of Rosillon, who did succour and fauour the enterprises of D. Alphonso the chaste, in Castille and Galicia, Charlemaigne then reigning. Wee read, that the French captaines forced Zato or Saad, Gouverneur of Barcelone, to yeeld himselfe tributarie to king Charles, and to receiue French garisons into many places of that countrey: as they of Huesca did also, who notwithstanding freed themselves soone after: for Huesca lying farre into the enemies countrey, they could not so easily keepe it as Barcelone, being a sea towne. There was then a battaile betwixt the French and the Moores in the valley of Currol, at this day Corbiere, in the countrey of Cerdane, which the Moores lost. This was the first Prince of the Moores, which set any fleet to sea in Spaine, hauing rigged forth many ships and galliots at Almerie, whereof he gaue the charge vnto a captaine called Mahamet, who sackt the Islands of Maiorca, Minorca, Iuiza, and Sardaigne.

A memorable defeat of Moores.

The Moores of Barcelone tributaries to the French.

Nauarre.

Aragon.
An. 795.

Don Garcia Inigo, second king of Sobrarbre and Nauarre, had some difference at the passage which they say had been made by the French into Spaine, vnder Charlemaigne; for which cause Charles demanteled Pampelone, the which he had seized on, comming to Saragosse. This D. Garcia reigned 44 yeares, and had one sonne called D. Fortun Garcies, who succeeded him in the kingdom of Sobrarbre and Nauarre. He lyes at S. John de la Pega.

17 In Aragon there had succeeded to Cont Aznar, his sonne D. Galinde, surnamed Aznarris, in the yeare 795. This Earles seat was at Iaca, acknowledging the kings of Nauarre for Soueraignes. We find nothing memorable written of him, but that he was founder of some Monasteries, and built certaine forts, and among others the castle of Athares. He had one daughter called Theude, the which he married to Don Fortun, Infant of Nauarre: others say, that she was first married to one Cont Bernard, a vassale to king Charlemaigne, who hauing seized on the mountaines of Ribagorfa, did much annoy the Moores. This Earle Galinde had one sonne called D. Ximen Aznarris, Earle of Aragon after him, and another called Endregot Galinde: D. Ximen died in the battaile which D. Fortun king of Nauarre had against the Moores, who were entred into his countrey by the valley of Roncal, and left no children.

Cattlogne.

whence the name of Cattellogne comes.

18 Cattlogne began also at that time to haue Christian Earles. It is one of the most fruitfull countries in Spaine both for men and all commodities, and these Princes haue been alwaies called Earles of Barcelone, without taking any royall title. The name of Cattlogne is drawne diuersly by writers: some deriue it from the auncient Castellans, which were vpon those marches neere to the Ausitanes: others from a captaine named Catharlot, or Cartharlon: others from the Gothes and Alains (people which inhabited there together) and make the word of Gottalania, since drawne to Catalania: others not from the Gothes, but from the Gattes, a people of Germanie, mingled with the Alains: and others will deriue it from the Catalonians, vpon the marches of Tolouse. The Christians inhabiting this countrey (after that vnfortunate yeare 714, when as the Moores made themselves masters of Spaine) solicited Charles Martel, (who then gouerned the French State, and had gotten many victories against the Moores) to be fauorable vnto them, and to helpe them to shake off these Infidels yoke, yea after that there was some forme of Estate erected by the Christians in Asturias and Nauarre; the which Martel graunted them, and when as his affaires in France gaue him leaue, he sent a Germane knight called Otter or Oger Catharlot, who was Gouverneur of Aquitaine, of which countrey Martel had seized after the death of Count Eude. This captaine, accompanied with some bands of Germanes and French, gathered together such of the countrey as were fit to beare armes, and tooke some frontier places from the Moores. Then died Charles Martel in the yeare 741, whose sonne Pepin obtained the crowne of France,

A France, through the counsell and fauour of Pope Zacharie, about the yeare 750. During all the raigne of king Pepin, the Cattelans maintained themselves in warre against the Moores, with the helpe of the French, without any great aduantage, or notable successe, that is recorded; for the histories of those times are rare. After Pepin Charlemaigne reigned, whose sonne Lewis came oftentimes into Spaine by Cattlogne, and there did some exploits of armes; as also Charlemaigne in person, both in Cattlogne, Nauarre, and Arragon: And for that the Cattelans were mingled still with the French, during these warres, the Romane tongue which they spake (as in a manner all the rest of the Spaniards) came to be corrupted among them, so as they made a diuers language to that which they vse in Castille, not much different to that they speake on this side the Pyrenees, in Aquitaine and Languedoc. The French made such warre in Cattlogne, as a Gouverneur of Barcelone, a Moore, called Zato, yeelded himselfe vassale and tributarie to the Emperour Charles: after whose death (for hee kept his promise, although he were a Mahumetist) Bernard was made Earle of Barcelone, counted by the authors for the first, carrying this title, who intituled himselfe also Earle, Duke, and Marquesse of Spaine, as it appears in some letters which are found of him in the monasteries of the country, in Ribagorfa, and at Saint Peters of Tauerna.

The Cattelans
language.

Bernard first
Earle of Barce-
lone, subiect to
the French.

Alphonso, second of that name, ninth King of Ouiedo, called the Chaste.

19 IN the Asturias of Ouiedo, the yeare 795, D. Alphonso was sole king, without companion, D. Bermond being dead. He was called the chaste, for he liued holily and chastly, An. 795.

without the companie of any woman, although he were married to a Ladie called Berthe; a liberal Prince to the poore, and greatly fearing God, above all a friend to Monks, and a great builder of Couents; yet notwithstanding all these things, he was wise and valiant. He had (as we haue said) one sister, called D. Ximena, who seeing them carelesse to marrie her, she contracted her selfe secretly to Don Sandias, Earle of Saldagne, who was of good yeares; for he was about 29 yeares old when as the king D. Froila their father died: of which marriage came a sonne called Bernard del Carpio. King D. Alphonso (who thought his sister should haue bene chaste like himselfe) was verie much discontented at this marriage, and hauing caused Don Sandias to come to the town of Leon, whither he had called the noblemen of his realme, he condemned him as a traitor, to end his daies in perpetuall prison, in the castle of Lune, hauing put out his eyes, he caused his sister to be put into a Monasterie of Nunnes, and yet he gaue order that the infant Bernard should be nourisht in Asturia as his owne sonne, who afterwards proued one of the wisest knights of his age, but not verie fortunate. They attribute to this king the building of the chiefe Church in Ouiedo, called S. Saluator; yet others ascribe it was the worke of king Sillo. But howsoeuer it were, D. Alphonso did augment it, and enrich it with diuers jewels, yea with reliques which had bene transported from Toledo, and other places, whereof this Church was the store-house: moreouer, with a crosse of gold, which they say had been made by two Angels, the which presented themselves vnto the king D. Alphonso in the habit of pilgrims.

A secret marriage secretly punished.

20 To this is added the finding out of the Sepulchre of the Apostle S. James, neere vnto Iria, by the Bishop of that place, called Theodemir, at the relation of two men, which the Historie of Compostella in Latine calls personatos, that is to say, masked, who said they had seene Angels and torches about the place where his bodie was found, in a coffin of marble, in a wood, in the yeare 797, whereat the Spaniards themselves do much wonder, seeing they find no mention in their Histories of S. James Sepulcher in Spaine, in all the time which past since his death vnto the raigne of this Alphonso: no nor in the time of Miron, the first Christian king of the Sueues in Galicia, who first erected the king of the Gothes that were Christians, nor yet since. It was reuealed at that time by such apparitions to Theodemir, who lieued it to be the verie bodie of S. James, and so perswaded the king D. Alphonso, who was wonderfull ioyfull thereof, and built a temple, endowing it with great reuenues, taking this manifestation for a singuler fauour of God. The Spaniards haue since made him their Patron and Protector of their Countrey, calling on him in all their necessities especially in the Inuention of S.

James Sepulchre.

the warre. Neighbour Princes were amazed at this relicke: for we read, that Charlemagne (in whose time D. Alphonso began to raigne) being aduertised of this inuention, posted thither, and afterwards obtained from Pope Leo the third, sitting at Rome, That the Episcopall Sea of Iria should be removed to Compostella, vnder the Metropolitan of Braga, from the which it was since exempt, as wee will shew hereafter. In king Alphonso time, and (as some thinke) when Charlemagne was in Spaine, there were two Councils held against Elipand Archbishop of Toledo, and Felix first Bishop of Vrgel, and their followers, infected with Nestorius heresie, who imagined a double person in Iesus Christ, as he consists of two natures, diuine and humane: for this cause Elipand is not in the catalogue of the Archbishops of Toledo: Felix had tried in vaine to draw vnto his error Odesinde widow to king Hillo.

Moore.

Halibatan fourth king of the Moors: warre betwixt him and his vncler.

An. 799.

21 Abizmen Hizen or Ixeta, Miraluminum, deceased in the yeare 794, hauing reigned seuen yeares and seuen moneths; to whom succeeded Halibatan his sonne, who either for state, or for feare and distrust, had an ordinarie gard of five thousand horsemen, part Christian renegado's, part Eunuches. In the yeare 799 Zuleima and Abdalla his vncler hearing of the death of Hizen, came out of Africk into Spaine (from whence they had bene chased) to trie if they might enter into Toledo, whereas Zuleima had reigned: they came to Valencia, and armed themselves with the forces of that towne, and so went to field, giuing them of Toledo vnderstand (whom they knew to be affected vnto them) of their coming, and designe: who acquainting other Moores therewith, they tooke armes for Zuleima, chasing all such out of the towne, as they thought opposite vnto them, and then they did aduertise Zuleima how that all went well for him; who preparing himselfe to goe to Toledo, was encountred by the armie of Halibatan his nephew, by the which he was defeated and slaine, this yeare of 799. Abdalla fled, but afterwards considering that he had no meanes to rayse his decayed fortunes, he came and yeelded himselfe to his nephewes mercie, who receiued him, and vsed him honourably. So Toledo payed the second time to be made a royall seat, by the defeat and death of Zuleima: yet the inhabitants finding themselves guiltie, would not trust Halibatan, but maintained themselves in their rebellion, for the space of nine yeares. Halibatan being vnable or vnwilling to trie his forces against so great and well fortified a citie, sought in the meane time to win them by all mild and friendly meanes. Among others, he employed about this reconciliation a Moore, who was a knight, and borne at Toledo, yet then resident at Huesca, and Gouvernour of those marches: who being come into the citie with letters from king Halibatan, wrought so wisely, as in a short time the Toledanes returned to the kings obedience, to whom there was promised assurance, and forgetfulness of all they had done; but there was nothing obserued: for this Hambroz, to abuse the Toledanes, said, That he would not remaine in the castle, for feare to be surprisid by the kings men, which arriued dayly, but caused another lodging to be assigned him, in a street called Moutichel, neere vnto S. Christophers Church, in the which he made a caue vnder the ground, to murder them that had rebelled against the king. In the meane time, Halibatan vnder colour to make warre against the Christians, and to succour the frontier, caused his forces to approach neere the towne, vnder the command of a sonne of his called Abderramen, the which by the means of Hambroz entred quietly into Toledo, and without any shew to doe harme. Abderramen lodged with Hambroz, where shewing a good countenance to the chiefe of the Toledanes, Moores, he inuited a great number of them to a stately feast which he had prepared for them. As these Moores came one after another, thinking to make good cheere, they were presently layd hold on, and beheaded, by some that were appointed to that purpose, and then cast into the vault. There had bene many dispatcht in this manner, when as one of the guests which was inuited, discovering some bloud, grew amazed, and suddainly slipt out, and gaue an alarme to the towne, crying out, that they murdered the citizens in Hambroz lodging. The Toledanes being terrified with these newes, and hauing no meanes to make resistance, and without any captaine to lead them, found no better expedient then to crie out for mercie, but it was in vaine: for then they pursued them openly, so as there was about 5000 slaine, to punish their offence committed against Halibatan; against whom, they of Cordoua being also rebelled, he caused 300 of them to be hanged vpon the riuer side: there was a caprine called Abdelcarin appointed for this execution, who a little before had subdued Calaoarra. Halibatan growne proud with this

Hambroz, the Moore betrays the Toledanes.

A cruell revenge vpon the Toledanes for their rebellion.

A this successe, sent his capitaines to annoy the Christians frontiers, who entred into Galicia in the yeare 812, where he was vnfortunat in many encounters, by the prouidence of king D. Alphonso. The like happened to Ores, Gouvernour of Merida, who was defeated neere vnto Benevent, in the territorie of Leon. The yeare after 813, another Moore called Alcama, Gouvernour of Badaids, layed siege to Zamorra, but he was forced to retire. Not content with this, two armies of Moores entred into D. Alphonso his country, in diuers places, against the which he opposed 2 armies; the one led by himselfe, the other by Bernard del Carpio his nephew, who was growne of good yeares, in both which he was victor; so as the Moores did forbear for a time to annoy the Christians, and fell to spoile one another: whereupon a great nobleman among them, called Mahomad, came out of the quarters of Merida, to seeke refuge of king D. Alphonso, for that he was violently pursued, and could find no safetie in all the Moores country. D. Alphonso entertained him, and assigned him rents to liue on in Galicia: but he shewed himselfe ingratefull & trecherous, raising a great armie by the intelligence he had with other Moores, to inuade the country of his benefactor: but they were readie in time to resist him, and gaue him battaile, where there died about 50000 Moores. Mahomad their Generall being taken, was beheaded as a traitor. At that time Marsil or Masile, successor to Ibnaballa, reigned at Saragosse, who was at the battell of Ronceaux, where the French were defeated. It is certaine, as Authors write, that this battaile was giuen in the time of D. Alphonso the chaff, but the yeare is doubtfull, yet they hold it was a little before the death of Charlemagne, who died about the yeare 815.

A Moore seekes refuge of D. Alphonso: his trecherie and punishment.

C 22 If that which the Spaniards write be true, it is most certaine, that among these Priaces ambition went before, and religion followed after. D. Alphonso hauing lined chastly, being sorrie that he had no children, and for that he had receiued great aid from the Emperour Charles, and it may be presumed, that so mightie a Prince was most necessarie to restore Spaine to her beautie, and the Christians to their former possession, or else for some other consideration, he had a determination to make him heire of his estates after his death: but the Nobilitie of Spaine hauing notice thereof, did not allow it, refusing to be vassalles to any foraine Prince: yet D. Alphonso had by his letters and embassages giuen great hope thereof vnto Charles, who affected it, and had appointed the realmes of Ouiedo and Leon for Bernard, sonne to his sonne Pepin, and did prepare himselfe to come vnto Alphonso, vnder colour of succouring him against the Moores, but he had newes from him, that he was forced by his Earles and Barons to recall it, and therefore he entreated him to forbear his coming: the which Charlemagne taking for an affront, resolved to force him by armes, to performe his promise: wherefore he raised a mightie armie of French, Germanes, and Italians, which were vnder his Empire, and sent it beyond the Pyrenees, led by his best capitaines: yea, some (who haue not duly considered the age of Charlemagne, who was then 72 yeares old) say, that he was there in person; whereof the Spaniards being aduertised, they made a league of all the Christian Potentates, of Galicia, Leon, Arragon, Nauarre, and others, and of some Princes of the Moores, to whom the government of the French in Spaine was suspected; among the which was Marsil of Saragosse. All these forces joyned together, stopt the passages, and forced the French to returne into their country, but with great disadvantage and disorder, through the straits of the mountaines, whereas the Spaniards hauing seized vpon the passages, the forward and battaile of the French were defeated, and their baggage taken, with such slaughter, as they write there were about 40000 men slaine that day: among the which was Roland, and all those whom fabulous writers call Peeres of France, with other great personages.

Ouedo.

Charlemagne made heire of Ouiedo, and afterwards relict.

League of Christian Princes and Spanish Moores against the French.

Defeat of the French at Ronceaux.

In this action, the valor and good conduct of D. Bernard of Carpio, nephew to D. Alphonso, was admirable, as also in his warres against the Moores, as the Spaniards write, who was for a long time held for the kings sonne, and he himselfe beleeued it: but being aduertised of his parents, and of the calamitie of the Earle of Saldagne his father, he made many petitions vnto the king, and vsed all the means he could to moue him to pardon the iniurie which he pretended had bene done him, and to free him after so many yeares imprisonment; the which he could not obtaine: wherefore being discontented, he retired from Court into his country of Saldagne, where he shewed himselfe as much as he could an enemy to king D. Alphonso.

R

D. Fortun,

D. Fortun, third King of Nauarre:

Nauarre.
An. 802.

23 D<sup>V</sup>ring the raigne of this king of Ouiedo and Leon, D. Fortun was the third king of Sobrarbre and Nauarre, who came vnto the Crowne in the yeare 802, after the decease of D. Garcia Inigo his father. He was not onely to make head against the Moores, but also against the French, who spoyle the countries of Nauarre and Arragon, as well as those of the Mahumetists: for souldiours hold nothing holie, but that which is barren, and yeelds no bootie. During the raigne of this king was that famous defeat at Roncevaux, where he was with his Nauarrois, and other confederates, for the Spanish partie, where the French hauing bene defeated and stripped of their baggage, they afterwards did all they could to annoy Spaine. This king was married to Theude, daughter to D. Galinde, by reason whereof he did inherite (as some say) the countrey of Arragon: yet this vnion of Arragon and Nauarre is not receiued by all Authors; but is referred to a later time, and there are memorials found of other Earles in that countrey, after D. Galinde.

Of this marriage came the infant D. Sancho Garces, successor in the realme of Sobrarbre and Nauarre, to D. Fortun his father, whom it may be this Theude had had to her second husband: for some Authors say, that he had bene formerly married to one of Charles his captaines, and of his blood, called Bernard, not he which gouerned Cattelogne. D. Fortun had great warres against the Arabian Moores, to whom, with the Arragonois, and other his allyes, he gaue battaile, at a place called Olcassa, or Olcast, in the which died D. Ximen Aznar Earle of Arragon, brother to D. Theude, the which some maintaine did happen vnder D. Sancho, sonne and successor to D. Fortun, who was vanquished and slaine by Musa Aben Cacin or Heazin, king of Saragosse. The Christians woon this battaile of Olcassa, by the valour of them of Roncal, who had for a testimonie thereof, the title and priuiledges of Gentry, which they enjoy at this day.

D. Sancho Garces, sixt King of Nauarre.

An. 815.

24 D<sup>V</sup> Fortun hauing raigned thirteene yeares died, and there succeeded him, in the yeare 815, his sonne D. Sancho Garces, who continued the warres against the Moores with good successe. There is mention made of a battaile he woon against them, in the yeare 821, nere vnto Ochauiere; in the which the inhabitants of the valley of Roncal behaued themselues so valiantly, as they deserued a new confirmation and enlargement of their priuiledges of Nobilitie. These people although they were subjects of Nauarre, yet they leuie an annuall tribute of the French, their neighbours, by an accord made in old time. It is a place vnder the iurisdiction of Sanguette, situated in the Pyrene mountains of Nauarre, confining vpon them of Val Breton, which are of France, from whom they exact three Cowes euerie yeare, on the third day of Iune, with certaine ceremonies obserued of old time. Some thinke this tribute grew by reason of the warres which this king had with the Gascoines and French, who being incensed with the Count of Roncevaux, did vssually invade the territories of Sobrarbre and Nauarre, who after they had bene vigorously repulsed by him and his successors, they were forced to make the abouementioned peace, and doe the homage.

Arragon.

25 In Arragon, D. Ximen Aznar, the sonne of D. Galinde, hauing commaunded with the title of Earle (a gallant knight, who died in the battaile of Olcassa, following the partie of D. Fortun Garces of Nauarre, or else in the seruice of D. Fortun his sonne, about the yeare 803) to him succeeded his vnclie, called D. Ximen Garces, notwithstanding that he had a brother, whose name was Endregot, whether it were by force, or otherwise, the Histories make no mention. This D. Ximen Garces liued little, he was wise and valiant, and was slaine

Diuerse Earles
of Arragon.

A slaine in an encounter against the Moores. After him D. Garcia Aznar was fift Earle of Arragon, who also did not long enjoy his estate, and was slaine fighting valiantly against the Moores in Spaine. D. Fortun his sonne did inherite the Earledome of Arragon, who imployed himselfe valiantly in the warres against the Moores: he died without any sonne, so as Arragon was then vnitd to Nauarre, by the meanes of D. Vrraca, daughter to D. Fortun, or as somewrite, of D. Endregot Galinde, who was married to D. Garcia Inigo, second of that name, king of Nauarre, sonne to Inigo Arista, the which was the first woman which did inherite this Countie of Arragon, and brought in a custome, that the women should succeed.

Succession of women in Ar-
ragon.

B 26 Another Bernard, of whom we haue made mention, who intituled himselfe Earle of Barcelone, Duke and Marquesse of Spaine, gouerned Cattelogne, about the yeare 796, for the French, after the death of Zato the Moore, being their vassale and tributarie. He had bene Gouvernor of Prouence and Languedoc vnder the Emperour Charlemaigne. In Cattelogne he made sharpe warres against the Moores, wherein he was assisted by a Spanish knight called D. Geoffrey, the hairie, which succeeded in the gouernment of Barcelone. This Geoffrey was Lord of the castle of Arria, in the territorie of Conflent, and Countie of Barcelone, with the helpe of which D. Bernard he tooke from the Moores all the countrey which lyes betwixt the two riuers of Nogueta and Lobregat: but after the death of Charlemaigne, lyes betwixt the two riuers of Nogueta and Lobregat: but after the death of Charlemaigne, a Gouvernor of Guienne, called Ayman, hauing rebelled against the Emperour, Lewis his sonne and successor, besides the hurt he did in that Prouince, entred into Cattelogne, and tooke townes and castles, being fauoured by Abderramen king of the Moores at Cordoua: and in the yeare 820, these rebellious French and the Moores hauing joyned their forces together, they came and besieged Barcelone.

Cattelogne.

C 27 This Abderramen, second of that name, had succeeded his father Halihatun, who died in the yeare 819, and of the Arabians 302, hauing raigned 24 yeares, who of many wiues, which Mahumet law doth allow, had left 19 sonnes and 21 daughters. This warre of Cattelogne was one of Abderramens first exploits, in the which Barcelone was taken in the yeare 820, but soone after recovered by the Christians.

Moores.

In the yeare 824 died Don Alphonso the chaff, hauing instituted for his successor D. Ramir, sonne to D. Bermond or Vermond the Deacon, rejecting D. Bernard of Carpio his sisters sonne, who was his lawfull heire. This Prince raigned 29 yeares, and was buried at Ouiedo, in S. Maries Church, which he had built. He was a great benefactor of the Clergies. Wee find a donation made by him to the Church of Compostella, of about a league of ground about S. Iaques sepulchre, but the date of these letters are of the yeare 835, which agrees not with that which Authors write of the death of this king.

Ouiedo.
An. 824.

Letters of donation subscrit.

D. Ramir, first of that name, and tenth King of Ouiedo.

E

28 D<sup>V</sup> Ramir was sonne to the king D. Vermond, called the Deacon, and adopted by D. Alphonso his vnclie, a generous and worthie Prince, and not inferior to any of his predecessors in vertue. In the beginning of his raigne he married a Ladie, called D. Vrraca, borne in old Castile, of which were borne two sonnes, D. Ordogno who raigned, and D. Garcia. This king did that which all other Princes abhorre, for he receiued his sonne to be a companion with him in the kingdome, and caused his brother D. Garcia to raigne with him, so as there were two courts and two kings in Ouiedo and Leon. The first warre which troubled this king was ciuile, by the rebellion of a nobleman of Asturia, called Nepotian, against whom D. Ramir assembled his armie, in the towne of Lugo, and being come to battaile, he vanquished him, and put his men to flight: himselfe being taken some few dayes after, had by the kings commaundement his eyes put out, and was put into a cloister of Monkes; an vsuall punishment in those dayes for traitors and rebels.

Offede.

Two brothers kings in one kingdome, and agree well; a rare example.

F

In this kings time, the fame of the miracles which S. Iaques did at Compostella, began to be spread ouer all Europe, so as many pilgrims came thither both by sea and land, from all parts of Christendome: but about the yeare 827, the coasts of Galicia were annoyed with Nor-

A rebell punished.

An. 827.

Norman pyrats defeated upon the banks of Gallicia.

An. 828.

Moore.

Christians defeated.

Moore defeated.

Apparition of
S. Iaqués, as the Spaniards say.

Ouiedo.

Tribute called vow payed to S.
Iaqués Church.

man pyrats, a people of the North, who since vnder Rollo and other captains, invaded France, and planted themselves in the Prouince, called by that name Normandie. These pyrats, moued with another zeale than to visit S. Iaqués, kept the sea, and spoiled the coast with a great number of ships. D. Ramir came and charged them at a place called Far, where he made a great slaughter: those which remained, recovered their ships, and came into the mouth of Guadalquivir, where having landed, they spoiled Seuile, and the countrey thereabouts, and then returned into their countrey. This king D. Ramir was troubled with another sedition: Alderred and Piniol, two Earles of his countrey, being risen in armes against him in the year 828, against whom he marcht with his armie, tooke these two rebels, slew Piniol, with his seven sonnes, confederates of his rebellion, and caused Alderred eyes to be put out, and call him into prison.

Abderramen Miralminin of Spaine, had continued long in peace with D. Alfonso king of Ouiedo and Leon: but some yeares after his decesse, he had a desire (for that he had had some good success against the Christians in Spaine, and also at the persuation of Abria, who reigned then in haz) to demand of king D. Ramir the tribute of a hundred virgines, which king Mairrat had promised to pay to his predecessors, kings of Clondoua: the which was denied, as vnjust and vnworthie, by a generall consent of the Prelates and Nobilitie of the countrey, assembled to this end in the towne of Leon; where by the same meanes there was a warre concluded against the Moores, to abate their pride. King D. Ramir having then called all the Nobilitie of his countries of Asturia, Leon, Gallicia, and other places vnder his obedience, and leuied great numbers of souldiours, he entered into the Moores countrey, by Rioje to Nogera and Aluenda, and came and encamped nere to Logroge, whither the Moores armie came soone after, where there was a cruell battaile, to the great losse of the Christians; so as without the approaching night it is thought, they had bin all defeated: the king rettyred to a place called Clauijo, where at this day there is a Bourg nere to Logroge. The night gaue the Christians means to retyre, and to rallie themselves, who by the will of God resumed courage in such sort, as the next day they presented themselves againe in battaile. The Moores contemning them whom they had vanquished the day before, came to charge them without any great order; but they found such resistance, as they were forced to leaue the field, and to flye; where they lost (as Histories report) about 60000 men, and as it is set downe in a Charter which is the Treasurie of S. Iaqués of Compostella, in the which mention is made of an apparition of the Apostle to king D. Ramir; the night after his men were defeated, who encouraged him to affront the enemy againe, promising him victorie, and that he himselfe would be in the battaile, as Patron and Protector of his kingdom: and they affirme, that the armies being joyned the next day, S. Iaqués appeared againe, mounted vpon a white horse, carrying a white standard, with a red Crosse, fighting and encouraging the Christians as he had promised. Such apparitions will be receiued according to euerie mans pietie and good instruction. There are yet at this day found heads of darts and of lances in the place whereas D. Ramir obtained this victorie: by fauor whereof, he tooke Calaorra from the Moores, with other places along the riuer of Ebro; but they returned soone vnder the dominion of the Moores, whose commaund was great at that time in Spaine.

After this victorie, D. Ramir being at Calaorra with his brother D. Garcia, the Queene D. Vrraca, and the infant D. Ordogno, being accompanied with the chiefe Prelates and Noblemen of the countrey, it was held fit to acknowledge the fauour and assistance, which they did beleeue S. Iaqués had done them. Wherefore this king being perswaded either by his dreames, or by his Priests, ordained, That all such as dwelt about Compostella should pay yearly a certaine measure of corne and wine to that Church, out of their reuenues, for the yow, for so this tribute was called; the which is payed at this day. Moreover, that after any victorie gotten against the Moores, when as they came to diuide the spoyle, S. Iaqués Church should hold the place of a knight, and haue a share. The letters graunted by king D. Ramir, beare date in the year 834, at which time we find by the Histories, that he was not liuing. It is called S. Iaqués yow, it was confirmed by Pope Celestin, then holding his See at Rome. Some haue written, That in this kings time the Order of the Knights of S. Iaqués began, but it was later, as we will shew.

In

In Cartellogne, the Christians being much oppressed by the Moores, vnder the Miralmin Abderramen the second, the Emperour Lewis the gentle sent an Abbot to comfort them: for he could fend them no souldiours (say the Spaniards.) This Abbot was called Elizachar, who encouraged the Christians in such sort, as Abderramen returning to the siege of Barcelone, accompanied with Cont Aymon, they found such resistance, as they were forced to abandon it, about the year 830. Bernard being much esteemed for his valour, he was called home by the Emperour Lewis, who made him his Chamberlaine, and graunted him then (as some say) the title of Earle of Barcelone, and for this cause is accounted the first Earle of the Cartelanes: but it appears elsewhere, that he had this title of Earle, yea of Duke and Marquesse long before, the which was nothing but Gouvernor of the Countrey, or Prouince.

D. Ximen Inigo, fift King of Sobrarbre and Nauarre.

TO D. Sancho Garces king of Sobrarbre and Nauarre (who died, as some report, in an encounter of the Moores, led by Musa Aben Casin, petty king of Sarragoffe) succeeded his sonne D. Ximen Inigo, in the year 832. Of the deeds and manners of this king the Histories make no mention, yea many Authors passe ouer these first kings of Sobrarbre, and begin the Historie of this Kingdome with D. Inigo Arista, who came afterwards to the Crowne. They hold, that D. Ximen is interred in the Couent of Saint Sauior of Leyre, with D. Nugna his wife.

D. Ordogno, eleuenth King of Ouiedo.

ORDOGNO, which is as much to say as Fortun, sonne to D. Ramir, came vnto the Crown of Ouiedo and Leon, in the yere 831, according to the common opinion. Being entered into the government of the State, he had warre with some people of the mountaines of Cantabria (which are not specified) whom he vanquished, and brought vnder his subjection. He married a Ladie called D. Monadona, or Munia Donna, that is to say, Donna Nugna, by whom he had five sonnes, D. Alfonso, who was king after him, D. Bermond, D. Nugno, D. Odoire, D. Fruela, and one daughter. He did enlarge and beautifie the buildings of the townes of Leon, Astorgo, Tuy, Amaya, and others.

They make mention of a miracle in his time, in the person of a Bishop of Compostella, successor to Theodorice, and second Prelate of that Church, named Ataulphe; who being accused of Apostasie, and that he had revolted from the Christian religion to that of the Moores, being called to Court to purge himselfe, he came to Ouiedo vpon a holie Thursday, when as they did bait a Bull with dogs, hauing an intent to expose the Bishop to the furie of this beast as soone as he should arriue. But the Bishop hauing said Masse (as the storie reports) attyred in his Episcopall robes, came boldly to the kings palace, and passing by the place where they did hunt this Bull, as he saw him comming towards him, he opened his armes to take him, relying in God and his owne innocencie: but the beast came quietly vnto him, and suffred him to take him by the hornes, who led him vnto the king: whereat the king and all the assistants were so amazed, as they did presently judge that he had beene wrongfully accused. But this holy man leauing his Church and flocke, rettyred himselfe into the deserts, there to liue with beasts, and became a Hermite. Of this Bulls hornes they afterwards made reliques in the Church of S. Sauior at Ouiedo. Sisenand succeeded in his Bishoprick, and was so vehement to pursue the punishment of such as had falsely accused Ataulphe, as he neuer ceased vntill he had gotten a graunt from the king, that all their kinsfolkes should be deliuered for slaues to the Church of Compostella, although they were not guiltie.

About the beginning of this kings raigne, there were great ciuile dissensions among the Moores. A nobleman among them, a Goth by nation, but a Moore by profession, called for this cause Musa Aben Casin, that is to say, Musa of the lineage of the Gothes, rebelled against Abderramen Miralminin. He reigned at Sarragoffe, & drew to his partie Huesca and Tafalla, and by his example he caused the of Toledo to take armes, being ill affected to Abderramen, by reason of the rigours which his father Habibatan had used against them. This Moore fortified with these townes, rayled a great armie, and caused a sonne of his called Aben Lope or Lath, to enter into Toledo, and then to overrun the countreies of Nauarre and Castellogne, and so passed the Pyrenes, into the territories of the French. At his returne he caused himselfe to be proclaimed King and Miralmumin of Spaine, and tooke a towne belonging to the king D. Ordogno, called Albayda, fortified it, and put a garrison into it: but his furie was stayed by D. Ordogno, who came & besieged Albayda, and then with part of his forces he went to encounter him, as he advanced to succour the besieged, fought and vanquished him, killing 12000 horse Moores, and an infinit number of foot, with Garcia sonne in law to Aben Lope; he himselfe escaped, being wounded in three places. The spoyle of this armie was great, and Albayda returned to the Christians: After which rout, Lope who had beene left Gouverneur at Toledo, made a league with D. Ordogno, the which he faithfully maintained both in warre, and all other things during his life. This Lope is numbered for the third king of Toledo, being a Moore. D. Ordogno did soone after assaile Ceyt, Gouverneur of Coria, and Museres or Micandi of Salamanca, Moores, whom he vanquished, and tooke their Townes and Governments.

R iij

of

Moores defeated.

Aben Lope king of Toledo.

An. 839.

The qualities of Abderramen 2.

About the yeare 839 Abderramen died, leaving by his wives 87 children, that is, 45 sonnes and 42 daughters, having held the realme of Spaine at Cordoua twentie yeares. It was in the 222 yeare of the Arabians. This Prince was full of state, and was much pleased to make great buildings: he caused the places and streets of Cordoua to be paved, and brought a great fountain thither through pipes of lead, whereof some markes are yet to be seene about the Cathedrall Church, which was then the Mosquee. He was politicke, and was somewhat inclined to justice: he reformed the vnjust law of the Gothes, by the which the brother did succeed the brother, although he had children: he suffered the Christians which were vnder his commaund to liue in great libertie, so as in the chiefe citie of Cordoua they had many Churches, as that of the Ajile, Zoilus, Fauslus, Iannarius, Martial, Cyprian, Genesius, and Eulalie. And in the suburbs, or neere vnto, there were eight Monasteries; that of S. Christopher, of the virgin Marie, called Cuteclair, S. Sauueur, Zoilus, Felix, Martin, Iustus, and Pasteur. He brought the making of silkes, with many other handie trades, into Cordoua: he caused money to be coyned with his name thereon.

Mahumet Miralmumin at Cordoua.

Mahumet's victory.

Castellogne.

D. Geoffrey Earle or Gouverneur of Barcelona.

Ouiedo.

His eldest sonne Mahumet succeeded him, who was the first Miralmumin in Spaine of that name, and the fifth king of Cordoua. Being seiled, he marcht with an armie into Nauarre, from whence he was repulled: wherefore he turned his forces against Toledo, which was in league with king D. Ordogno. Wherefore the Christians who desired to abate the power of the Moores, and to keepe them diuided all they could, came to succour the Toledanes, being led by one of the sonnes of king D. Ordogno: both armies met not farre from the citie; neere vnto the riuer of Guadacette, but Mahumet had the victorie: there were slaine in this battaile 13000 Moores of Toledo, and 8000 Christians; yet all this could not make him master of the towne. Mahumet being victor, he caused the heads of his enemies to be carried into diuers townes, to strike terror into those that would rebell; for it was the custome of that nation at the change of Princes to stirre vp new troubles. This warre continued three yeares, vnto the death of the king D. Ordogno.

33 Cont Bernard of Barcelona liued at this time, much fauored in the Court of the Emperour Lewis the Gentle, not without enuie, especially of such as had had the government of Prince Bernard the sonne of Pepin king of Italie, in his youth. He was accused to haue committed adulterie with the Empreffe Judith: whatsoeuer the cause were, D. Geoffrey of Ania succeeded him in the Countie of Barcelona, in the yeare 839.

In the yeare 841, king D. Ordogno being much afflicted with the Gout, and other infirmities, was withall oppressed with griefe for the rout of his men which he had sent to succour the Toledanes, whereupon he fell grievously sick and died, having gouerned the realme of Leon and Ouiedo tenne yeares. The letters and titles of the Church of S. Iaques of Compostella, giue longer liues to these kings: for there is one found of king D. Ordogno, of the yeare 854, and another of the yeare 862, yea of 874, wherefore there is no great certaintie of the time in the reignes of the kings of Ouiedo and Leon. These letters and titles differ about 33 yeares from the common opinion.

D. Alphonso

D. Alphonso, third of that name, twelfth King of Ouiedo.

34 Alphonso the Great, sonne to D. Ordogno, was but foureteeene yeares old, or ten, as some say, when he began to raigne: a prince endowd with all royall vertues, whose life and government was long. His entrie was disquieted by a knight of Galicia, called D. Froila Bermudes; who contemning the kings youth, did rise and seile vpon the Crowne. D. Alphonso being retired to Alaua, to preserve himselfe against this tyrant, as he was busie to raise an armie of his friends and subiects, he had newes, that D. Froila being come to Ouiedo, the chiefe towne of the whole realme, to be crowned there, he had beene slaine by the Senators, and Councillors, which had conspired against him; wherefore he came thither, was received, and recovered his realme in peace. Then was there gouernour in Alaua a knight, called Eylo, or Zeybon, brother to one Zenon, which some Authors say, had beene Lord of Biscaie. This Eylo, as soone as Alphonso was seiled in his realme of Ouiedo, rebelled against him, and drew from him all which the kings of Ouiedo held in that prouince. D. Alphonso (who was then at Leon) being aduertised of this disorder, marcht with such forces as he could gather readily together, towards Alaua, where his presence caused him to be generally obeyed. He tooke this gouernor and carried him to Ouiedo, where he ended his dayes in prison.

Anno 841 Ouiedo.

Tyrannie and usurpation instantly punished.

Mahumet, first Moore of that name, raigned then in Spaine; against whom the earle of Barcelona made sharpe warres, but with small successe. He sent an armie against the Christians, led by two captaines, Imundar and Alcama, the which came and lodged about Leon, as if they would besiege it, in the yeare 842. But king D. Alphonso succoured it; and forced the Moores to retire. In the end of Abderramen's reigne there had beene a great persecution against the Christians, which dwelt in the Moores' countreies; whereof their insolencies and rebellions was the cause. They had, as we haue said, libertie of their religion, and they were suffered to build Temples and Monasteries at their pleasures; their Priests and Monkes did freely vse their seuerall habits: They had Iudges and Rectors among them to administer iustice, vnder the authoritie of the Mahumerane kings: onely they were forbidden to enter into the Mosquee, and not to speake ill of their Prophet Mahumet. They payed tributes of their kings. Whereupon many Christians tooke occasion to murmure, and to make bitter complaints, the which did incense the Moores. Some Christians of more iudgement exhorted the rest to patience, foreseeing the mischief, but it was in vaine; yea Acassaf a Bishop, and Seruand an Earle, who were of these moderators, were condemned by a Councell, and are blamed by the Authors of Histories, who haue made no scruple to put in the number of Martyres those rebells which perished in this massacre, the which was great, and continued ten yeares, for an aduertisement to all others, not to rise against their priuice, to whom they are made subiect by the will of God, especially for their temporall goods.

Anno 842.

The libertie of Christians among the Moores in Spaine.

In the meane time the quarell betwixt this Miralmumin and them of Toledo, continued; and their obstinacie was such, as Mahumet, seeing they would not acknowledge him vpon any conditions, he sent a mightie armie against them, vnder the conduct of his brother, or as some hold, of his sonne, called Almondar, who spoiled, rased, and burnt all that was within the territorie of Toledo, and yet no man durst make head against him, his forces were so great. King D. Alphonso embracing this occasion of the Moores diuisions, being entred into league with the French and Nauarrois, he entred and spoiled their countrey. They hold that Bernard of Carpio was chiefe of this armie. Mahumet did about all things desire to subdue them of Toledo, the which was a great and strong citie, and therefore hard to be forced: Wherefore he resolved to reduce it to extremitie of victuals, by a long siege, and so force them to yeeld. And having raised a great armie in the yeare 848, he led it himselfe in person against the Toledanes, who issued out of the towne, resolving to fight with him, but it was to their losse and confusion, for they were forced to retire with shame; the towne was besieged, the bridge vpon the riuer of Tayo (the worke of king Hisem) was beaten downe (the Moores call bridges Alcantara) and all meanes of succours taken from the inhabitants. Wherefore they began

D. Alphonso spoyle the Moores' country.

Anno 848.

Toledo reduced
under the obedience of the Moors at Cordoua.

began somewhat to yeeld, and to talke of a composition, wherein they were heard and satisfified: so as Mahumet entred the citie with great ioy, hauing reduced so great a people vnder his obedience: From whence he sent some troups to spoile the Christians countrey, as far as the riuer of Duero; who were charged, repulst, and forced to leaue their bootie, by D. Bernard of Carpio, and others. Lope, who called himselfe king of Toledo, faued himselfe, and fled with his brethren, and Abdalla his sonne, to the king D. Alphonso, who receiued them courteously, and made such esteeme of these Moores, as he gaue them his sonne D. Ordoño to instruct in armes and ciuilitie. Abdalla made no long abroad there, for being thrust on with enuie against his vnclcs, he made his peace with king Mahumet, and retired to Cordoua, from whence he made great spoile vpon the Christians countrey: but he was incountred and defeated at a place called Cillorico, and forced to raise his siege from Pancoruo with shame. Afterwards he came to fight with two Zimaels, the one his vnclc, the other his brother, in the ter-ritorie of Toledo, whom he vanquished, and tooke prisoners: And as he was of a stirring spirit, and enemie of all rest, he drew vpon him both the Christians and Moores, by the surprise he made of Sarragosse, where he maintained himselfe, notwithstanding all the forces of Ma-humet, who sent Almundar his sonne, and Aboaly a capitaine, against him, with great forces.
And although that Abdalla were on the other side molested with the forces of D. Alphonso, (who during these warres had seene the monasterie of S. Facunde burnt, the which he afterwards caused to be built vp againe) yet his posteritie reigned at Sarragosse. Mahumet hauing disposed of this new conquest, returned to Cordoua, vnder whose commaund Toledo remained for some yeares.

After these happie exploits the Moores were content to rest a while, and to suffer the Christians to liue in peace, and D. Alphonso in the meane time gaue himselfe to works of pietie, according to the inclination and instruction of those times. He caused S. Jaques church to be new built of free stone, and inrich with pillars and other workes: imploying therein part of the spoile which he had taken from the Moores; for this church at that time was but of earth. He bestowed great almes of the poore, and widowes. He was solicited by Bernard of Carpio, to deliuer the earle D. Sandiæ, his father, out of prison, where he had remained so many yeares:
but (notwithstanding all the great seruises which he pretended to haue done) he could not preuaile. Wherefore he resolved to declare himselfe an enemie to D. Alphonso, retiring to Salamanca, where neere vnto it he built a fort, which he called Carpio, of his owne name, from whence he did much annoy the Asturians, and them of Leon. It was situated three leagues from Salamanca, vpon the riuer of Tormes.

D. Inigo Arista, sixt King of Sobrarbre and Nauarre.

Nauarre.
An. 940.

36 D. Inigo, surnamed Arista, came to the Crowne of Nauarre about the yere 840. Some say he was sonne to D. Ximenes aboue mentioned; others (among the which is Su-rites the Spaniard) affirme, that he was son to the earle of Bigorre, called Simon; and that he was chosen by the suffrages of the men of war, king of Sobrarbre, by reason of his vertues and valour: so little certaintie there is in antiquitie, especially of the beginning of races and families. The name of Arista was giuen him, by reason of his vehemencie and heat in war. The Spaniards call a courageous and hardie man Aristo. He was the first of the kings of Nauarre, that was annointed and crowned after the maner of our kings of France, the which was obserued in the other following kings, although some beleue, that this custome came onely into Na-uarre, after they had kings of the house of Champagne. The French, among other Christian nations, haue retained it of the ceremonies of the ancient law of the Iewes, by the aduice of their Bishops. He tooke for his Armes a Crosse argent in a field azure. During his reigne, and some yeres after, the Episcopall seat of Pampelone was in the royall abbey of S. Saluator of M Leyra, yet holding the title of Bishop of Pampelone, or of Iruña, by reason of the warre and spoyle which the Moores made. There is no great certaintie among writers of his deeds, the time of his death, nor of his funeralls, nor yet of his wiues familie, whom some call Oneca, which is to say, Iniga; others Theude: bringing the one from Pampelone, the other from Biscaye. It may be he had two so named.

The custome to annoint kings taken from the Iebrewes.

D. Geof.

Catlogne.

A D. Geoffrey of Arria was earle of Barcelona after the death of Bernard, about the yere 840, by the liberalitie and grant of the Emperour Lewis the Gentle. He was married to a French ladie, called D. Almiria, by whom he had a sonne called D. Wiffred, or Geoffrey the haire, who was the first proprietary earle after his father, but not immediate. Catlogne was then vnder the soueraintie of France; and there are priuiledges found, granted by king Charles the der the soueraintie of France, in the yere 844, whereby the inhabitants of Barcelona bauldy sonne to the Emperour Lewis, in the yere 844, whereby the inhabitants of Barcelona are made as free as the French, hauing libertie to administer iustice, and to liue according to the ancient lawes of the Gothes. This Count Geoffrey imployed all his meanes to make war against the Moores; he attempted the towne of Tortosa, but in vaine: yet hee tooke from them and from the tyrant and rebell Aymon, that which they had vsurped of his gouernment some yeares before. He was pursued by a Castellain knight, called D. Salomon, earle of Cerdaigne, who enuied him, and slandered him to the king his Soueraigne: wherefore being called to Court, as he was going vpon the way, he was slaine in Auvergne, in the yere 858, according vnto some.

Catlogne vn-
der the soueraintie of France.

Earle of Catlogne murdered.

During these yeres king D. Alphonso was much troubled with the war which D. Bernard of Carpio made against him, who gaue him diuers routs; so as he was forced to leaue the Lions skin, and to vse the Foxes, at the least there was great shew of deceit: for the king seeing that he could not suppress D. Bernard, he offered to releafe his father, who was now verie old, if he would deliuer into his hands his new fort of Carpio: the which Bernard, by a singular pie-tie, did willingly grant, and was ready to deliuer his fort into the kings hands, the which he did presently take. Those which went to the castle of Lune, to draw D. Sandiæ out of prison, found him dead, as they reported: wherefore Bernard holding himselfe abused, made great complaints vnto the king; but he was commaunded to depart out of the territories of Ouie-do and Leon, and the dependances thereof. Whereupon he retired into Nauarre, and then into France: yet some say, that he returned into Spaine, and there died, and that he was buried in the monasterie of Aguilar del Campo.

Custome of king
D. Alphonso.

Zeno brother to D. Eyo, or Zethon, whom we had confined into Ouiedo, in the beginning of the reigne of this Alphonso, who being made earle or gouernour of Biscaye, by the kings bounty, would rebell as his brother had done, forcing the king to send an armie against him, by the which he was vanquished, taken, and led to Ouiedo, where he ended his dayes in prison. This Zeno left two daughters, the one called Theude, was married (according vnto some) to D. Inigo Arista, king of Nauarre; and the other D. Iniga, to the infant D. Sarria, of whom we shall hereafter speake. This was in the yere 856.

Rebellion of the yere: nor of Biscaye.

All this time, and to the yere 859, there had bene a suspension of armes, betwixt king *D.
Alphonso* and the Moores; but that yere king Mahumet went to armes, and came and besieged the towne of Coimbra, belonging now to Portugal: but D. Alphonso forced him to raise his siege, and not content therewith, entred into the Moores countrey, wasted it, and returned with great spoyles, continuing euery yere to annoy them in such sort, as they were constrained to accept of a truce for three yeares, with the preiudice of their reputations, and great disadvantage in their iurisdiccions. Then there reigned in Sarragosse a Moore, called Aben Alfaie. The rest of Mahumet's reigne vnto his death, was spent in voluptuous lust and idlenesse.
In his time there was a great earthquake in Spaine, and a little before his death lightning entring into the Mosque, where he was, slew two Noblemen Moores, neere vnto him.

Moores.
Anno 859.

D. Garcia Inigues, third of that name, and se- uenth King of Nauarre.

F 37 About the yere 867, as some Authors write, died D. Inigo Arista, king of Nauarre, to whom succeeded D. Garcia Inigues, his sonne, the third of that name, who vniued the country of Arragon to Nauarre, by marrying with D. Vrraca, daughter to D. Fortun, the last earle, or of D. Enaregot Galinde, of the same house and familie of Arragon. He had two sons by this Ladie, D. Fortun, and D. Sancho Abaca; and one daughter, called D. Sanctina, or Sancha. They write this fable of D. Sancho, That the king going inconsiderately with his quene through

Nauarre and Arragon united.

through the mountaines of Nauarre, he was surpris'd by certaine Moores, and slaine, and the queene ouerthrowne, being thrust into the bellie with a Moores launce, at such time as she was great with this D. Sancho. Some houres after, a knight whom they called D. Sancho of Gueuara, passing that way, met with this pitifull spectacle, and saw that the child had thrust forth a hand by the mothers wound, and had laboured to come forth there: wherefore this knight lighting from his horse, made the wound greater, so as he drew forth this infant alive, without any harme: then he carried it to his house with good witnesss, where he caused it to be nourished according to his degree, vntill he grew great, and then he presented him to the Estates of the realme, and made him be acknowledged for their lawfull king. But, as we say, it is like to be a fable, and hath no great authoritie; yet they say, that the surname of Ladron, which is peculiar to the house of Gueuara, came for that this knight did secretly nourish the infant D. Sancho. D. Sanclina the daughter, was married to king Ordogno the second, sonne to Alphonso the great.

38 They hold opinion, That the lords of Biscaie had their beginning at this time in D. Suria, whose posteritie was famous for many years: for after that D. Zeno had bene vanquished, and led prisoner, as we have said, the Biscaines seeing themselves without a head, fell to murinies and feditions. Thither was sent D. Ordago, sonne to king D. Alphonso, whom they called Earle of Asturias, who began to overrun and spoyle the countrey. The townes and comminalties affembled to make head against him, chusing D. Suria for their capraime, who was defended from the blood royall of Scotland, by his mother; and had married a daughter of Count Zenos, called D. Iniga, but at that time deceased. The forces of either part came to fight, in a place called then Padura: The battell was sharpe and cruell; and for that the whole countrey did swim with blood, the place was from that time called Arrigoriaga, which in the countrey language signifies, a vermillion stone. The Biscaines, with the aid, and by the valour of D. Sancho Effiguiz, Lord of Durando (who ended his dayes in this battell) won it; which was in the yeare 870. After this victorie the Biscaines chose D. Suria for their Lord, as well for that he was sonne in law to their last Earle and gouernour Zeno (by his daughter, notwithstanding we doe not read that he had any children) as for the valour and good conduct they had seene in him in this warre. This D. Suria did presently after marie the daughter of D. Sancho Effiguiz, in whose right he got the Seigniorie of Durando, which was vniuer vnto Biscaie: whose posteritie did enioy those lands, vntill the time of D. Henrie the second of that name, king of Castille and Leon. The lineage of D. Suria, was called de Harro. Castille the old had also an Earle, called D. Diego Porcello.

39 Mahumet Miralimum of Cordoua, having liued some time in peace, by reason of the old had alio an Earle, called D. Diego Corcua.
Anno 874. the last truce made with the Christians, died in the year 874, leauing 54 children by his wiues, whereof 34 were males, and 20 females. He had held the kingdome 35 yeares, and his death was in the 257 year of the Arabians raigne. His sonne Almundir succeeded him, who liued but two yeares, hauing done nothing worthe of memorie against whom they of Cordoua rebelled, notwithstanding that he offered to free them of the tenth part of their tribute, which they paid. He left six sonnes, and seuen daughteis.

Such was the estate of Spain in the time of king D. Alphonso, who had to wife a Ladie of the bloud royall of France, called Ameline, but they changed her name to D. Ximena; by whom he had foure sonnes, D. Garcia, D. Ordogno, D. Fruela, who reigned, and D. Gonfalo the Archdeacon. This king in his later dayes gaue himselfe wholly to workes of pietie, building of churches and monasteries, indowing them with rents and great reuenewes, and adorning them with iewels, vessels of gold and siluer, and precious ornaments, according to the ceremonies brought in and maintained in the Church.

In the year 877 the church of S. Jaques was consecrated at the instance of this king, and by the authority of Pope John the eighth, where many Bishops were present. And it is to be noted, that in those dayes the citie of Ouiedo was full of Bishops without any flockes; for they did chuse Bishops of towne that were in the Moores possession, keeping an account of their successions; all which did live in Ouiedo, and therefore it was called the Towne of Bishops.

Quiedo the towne of Bishops
Quiedo made an Archbishopricke.

This king being verie desirous to aduance the Hierarchie of the Clergie, laboured to haue the Episcopall see of Ouidoe, and the Cathedrall church of S. Sauuour, made an Archbishopricke Metropolitane; and the first Archbishop thereof was D. Hermenegilde, who was Bishop thereof

ib. 6. The general kinship of the therof before: in which towne of Ouidoe there was a Councell celebrated. Whilest this prince was thus buſied in theſe workes of pietie, D. Garcia his eldeſt ſonne, by the bad aduice of D. Ximena his mother, rebelled againſt him: but the father cauſed him to be ſurprized in Zamora, and to be brought priſoner to the caſtle of Gordon. This towne of Zamora was called Sentica, or Sarabris, and had bene held, and in a manner ruined by the Moores, who called it Medina Zamorathi, that is to ſay, the citie of Lazul, or Turkiſh: for about it there are certaine mountaines hauing many veines of ſtones, which we call Lapis Lazuli, or azure ſtones.

The imprisonment of D. Garcia incensed the other brethren against the king their father, being alwaies animated by the counsell of the queen their mother, who loued not her husband. These princes, with D. Nuno Fernandes, father in law to D. Garcia, and other noblemen of this conspiracie, made warre against D. Alphonsq; the which continued two yeares, and in the end forced him to leave his Crowne and royaltie. These troubles gaue meenes to D. San-ria, now earle of Biscaia, to settle his estate. King D. Alphonsq being thus forced, resigned his Scepter to his sonne D. Garcia, in the year 886, having reigned 46 yeares. To D. Ordag-no, his second son, was assigned Galicia, with the title of a Royaltie. And in this manner these wicked children, by the instigation of an indiscreet, and ill affected mother, diuided the spoyle of their liuing father. You must obserue, that the yeares of the decess of these kings of Quiedo, are verie vncertaine, for if we shall beleue the letters of donation, and priuiledges, which are extant in the churches of Spaine, it will appeare that this king reigned in the year 899.
Galacia was great, and carried the title of a kingdom in those times among

The prouince of Alaua was great, and carried the title of a kingdom in those times among the Moores, who enjoyed a part thereof, residing in the vallie of Burunda, against whom the kings of Nauarre had continuall warre; and especially in the time of D. Garcia Inigues, mention is made by some writers, and also by the titles of the Church of Pampelone, of a battell fought in the vallie of Lunquera, betwixt Abderramen king of Cordoua, and the Christian kings, D. Ordogno, and this king D. Garcia, the which, was lost by the Christians: But the computation of times contradi&it it: of which famous battell there shall be more ample mention made in the life of D. Ordogno. The most approved Authors write, that D. Garcia Inigues died in the vallie of Ayuar, in a battell against the Moores, in the yere 883; whereof the inscription vpon his tombe makes mention, at S. Iohn de la Pegna, the Æra 923.

D. Garcia the first, and 13 King of Ouiedo.

40 D Garcia was the first of that name which reigned in Ouiedo. There is no mention Ouiedo.
 Garcia was a brave and generous deeds: it may be by reason of his impiemade in stories of his virtues and generous deeds; it may be reason of his impetu-ous, having dispossett his father D. Alphonso of his kingdom, who of a king became his sons lieutenant, if it be credible, that being desirous to advance the Christians affaires, he demanded forces of D. Garcia to invade the Moores, the which the sonne raigning granted him, relying in the bountie of his deposed father. And in this qualirie D. Alphonso did many exploits of armes, gaue routs, and did much harme to the Infidels. We read, that about the year 887 this deposed father died in the towne of Zamora, and was buried at Altorga, and some time after transported to Ouedo.

time after transported to Ouedo.

After the decease of D. Alphonso, the king D. Garcia led an armie against the Moores, and spoyled much of their country; against whom came a great captaine of that nation, called Ayola, so as there was a furious battell, but D. Garcia had the victorie. The Moores defeated, and their captaine prisoner, as they led him away he escaped, for want of good gard. D. Garcia having reigned three years, he died at Zamora, in the year 889, having no children.

41 At that time Abdalla was Miralumin, or Soueraigne King in Spaine over the Moors, who had succeded king Almundir his brother, in the year 876. In the first year of his reigne there was a surcease from armes, betwixt the Mahometists and the Christians, untill the yere 886, that D. Alphonso, no more king, but in qualitie of his sonnes lieutenant, began to annoy the Moores, and after his death D. Garcia his sonne, gaue the foresaid rout to Ayola, whom some call Ayaya. King Abdalla died in the year 889, according to the most approued, leaving 11 sonnes, and 12 daughters, having reigned 13 yeares.

D. For-

D. Fortun, second of that name, eighth King of Nauarre.

Nauarre.

42 THE Scepter of Nauarre, after the death of D. Garcia Inignes (although that some haue written of an Interregnum of many yeares, whilst that D. Sancho was yet vnknowne, and bred vp in the house of Guenara) came without all doubt to his eldest sonne D. Fortun the second of that name, in the yeare 885; after whose decease there could be no Interregnum, seeing he had a daughter married to D. Ordogno the second, of Ouiedo, who without doubt should haue succeeded her father: for the right of succession had euen then taken place, euen of women, about the election, which had been accustomed in all auncient time among those people. There is a testimonie of this king D. Fortun, in a Charter of donation which he made to the monasterie of Leyre, in the Ara 939, which comes to be the yeare 901. It is written in the remembrances of the house of S. Saneur of Leyre, That when as the king D. Garcia his father was slaine, he was at Cordoua. Whereby it appears, that the Moores which slew him, were not of the league with the kings of Cordoua, but some theues, or factious persons, as this nation had beene accustomed to liue in perpetuall diuision and quarels. D. Fortun being king of Nauarre, he was also earle of Arragon, by succession from his mother. There is not any notable thing written of this kings geits, but that he was verie deuout, and did cherish Monkes, and religious persons, to whom he gaue great gifts.

Barcelone.

43 In Cattelogne after the death of Cont Geoffrey, who was slaine in Auvergne, D. Salamon, earle of Cerdagne, who had beene his competitor, and enuied him, was made earle and gouernour. The Spaniards hold, that Cattelogne, and the countie of Barcelone, was then fallen to the Soueraignie of Prouence and Bourgongne, whereof Charles, sonne to the Emperour Lothaire, and nephew to Lewis the Gentle, was king; by whose grant this earle of Cerdagne did for his life-time inioy that title and dignitie, whilst that the son of D. Geoffrey (who carried the fathers name, and was afterwards surnamed the Hairie) was bred vp in Flanders, in a knights house, to whom king Charles had recommended him. About the yeare 864 kings Charles died, and Prouence came to the hands of the Emperour Lewis the second, his brother, who also died in the yeare 876, and the empire fell to Charles the Bauld, his vnkle, king of France, and by consequence Prouence and Cattelogne, which depended thereon: during whose empire D. Geoffrey the Hairie, being now great, came to Barcelone, whereas the countesse Almira, his mother, yet liued, by whom he was knowne, and made knowne to the chiefe men of Barcelone, who had been friends to his deceased father: who made no delay to conspire with D. Geoffrey, for the killing of the earle D. Salamon, the which they did presently effect in the place of Bercas in the yere 877: and by that meanes D. Geoffrey the Hairie was restored to his fathers dignitie. Whilst he was bred vp in the house of this Flemish knight, they say, he fell in loue with one of his daughters, with whom he contracted a secret marriage, the which notwithstanding came to the knowledge of the mother, who could well conceale it vntill a fit opportunitie. Finding himselfe settled in his estate and dignitie, at Barcelone, he sent for his wife, and confessed the marriage vnto his father in law, who was nothing displeased therewith; by whose meanes he obtained pardon for the murther which he had committed on the person of Cont Salamon, of the king of France, and Emperour Lewis the Stuttering, successor to Charles the Bauld, his father, by whom the Flemish knight was much fauoured. And the Spanish histories report, That the Emperour Lewis received good seruice from Geoffrey the Hairie, in the warres he had against the Normans, whither he led a goodly troupe of horse out of Barcelone, and shewed great proofes of his valour and conduct; so as he was greatly esteemed, and beloued. And as in a certaine defeat of the Normans he had beene wounded in diuers parts of his bodie, so as his Armes were all couered with blood; shewing himselfe in this estate before the Emperour Lewis, he besought him to giue him Armes, which he and his posteritie might lawfully carrie. The Emperour being glad of his demaund, stretching forth his foure fingers, he dipt them in the blood which ran from the earls wounds, and made foure markes vpon a golden shield which he carried, being plaine, without any deuice; and said vnto him, Earle, hereafter these shall be your Armes. For the which he most humbly thanked the Emperour:

44 D. Geoffrey the Hairie, first earle in proprietie of Barcelone.

A Emperour: so as euer since they haue carried foure bloudie strokes, which we call Guenales, in a field Or. This is the beginning of the Armes of the earles of Barcelone, and since kings of Arragon, although that their beginning was from Cattelogne.

The Armes of Barcelone and Arragon.

He did likewise serue king Charles the Grosse, who was Emperour after Lewis the third, in his warre against the Normans: but in his absence the Moores entred the territorie of Barcelone, and committed great spoyles. Whereof Cont Geoffrey being aduertised, he demaunded leaue, and besought the king to grant him men and money, to repulse the Infidels out of his gouernement: but not able to obtaine it, by reason of the weakenesse of his affaires, he had a better condition: For in consideration of his valour and good seruice, king Charles gaue the countie of Barcelone in proprietie to him and to his heires for euer, in the yeare 884, reseruing onely the soueraignie to the kings of France: the which continued vnto the time of Lewis the ninth. We will therefore place this earle for the first of them of Barcelone, for that he was a Proprietarie.

Cattelogne given in proprietie to Geoffrey the Hairie, under the soueraignie of France.

Returning to Barcelone with this grant, he brought with him many strange knights, with whose helpe he recovered all that which the Moores had vsurped vpon the territories of Barcelone, and Cattelogne. He is commended for his religion, for that he did build (to burie himselfe and his successors in) the monasterie of our Ladie of Ripol, where his eldest sonne Rodolphus made himselfe a Monke; who, they say, was borne in Flanders, before the marriage was published; and was Abbot of Ripol, and afterwards Bishop of Vrgell. Others say, That this monasterie was founded by D. Geoffrey of Arria, his father. He had other children by this Flemish ladie, which were D. Geoffrey, who died of poison, being but young; D. Mir, who succeeded him in the earldome; D. Sumer, or Seniofrid, who was earle of Vrgel; and one daughter. He was founder of the monasterie of Monferrat, and did many such like workes.

D. Ordogno, second of that name, and 14 King of Ouiedo and Leon.

45 TO D. Garcia his brother D. Ordogno had succeeded in the realme of Ouiedo, in the yeare 889. The bountie of this prince made the Spaniards thinke that his father D. Alphonso was risen againe, he did so well imitate his vertues in all the course of his life. His religion, after the manner of those times, is commended, for that hee caused Mondognedo to be made a Bishopricke, and did much good to churches. He was married first to D. Munia, whom others call D. Eluira, by whom hee had foure sonnes, D. Sancho, D. Alphonso, D. Ramir, D. Garcia, and one daughter, D. Ximena, whereof D. Alphonso and D. Ramir were kings of Ouiedo. For his second wife hee married D. Arragonde, or it may be, Radegonde of Gallicia, whom he did repudiat for certaine causes. Lastly, he tooke to wife the Infanta of Nauarre and Arragon, D. Sancha, or Sanctina, daughter to king D. Garcia Inigo, and of D. Vrraca.

The first exploits of Armes he did, were in Galicia, when as he was but a pettie king or gouernour, ouerrunning the Moores countrey confining vpon him, euen vnto Andalouisia, and carried backe great spoyles, with the which he retired safely to Visco, which is at this time in Portugal.

At the same time Abderramen, the third of that name, came to bee king of the Moores; hee was surnamed Almansor, and Ananzer Ledin Alla, which signifies, Defender of the Law of God. Some are of opinion, that he was the sonne of Mahomet, the sonne of Abdalla, to whom hee succeeded: against whom D. Ordogno raised an armie, and entring the territories of Toledo, came and besieged Talauera, which is now called de la Roine. Hee defeated the succours of Moores which Abderramen sent, tooke the Generall of this armie, and forced the place and sacked it. Wherewith Abderramen being much moued, meaning to reuenge it with assurance, hee demaunded succours from Almotaraph, king of Mauritania Tingitana, where the kingdomes of Fez and Marocco are at this present. And hauing by that meanes assembled a great armie of Moores, Moores. Abderramen Almansor, king of the Moores at Cordoua.

Moors defeated.
Anno 894.

Moore, Africans, and Spaniards, he spoiled the Christians country, as farre as the riuer G of Duero, and the towne of S. Stephen de Gomas, where there was an encounter, and the Moores vanquished; and the Generalls and Lieutenants of the two kings, Abderramen and Almotaraph, slaine; which incouraged D. Ordogno to proceed: so as in the year 894, hee entred the country called Estrema-dura, croising the riuers of Tayo and Guadiana, vnto Merida and Badaios, the territories of which townes he spoiled. The Moores inhabiting these townes, not daring to sallie forth, they purchased a truce of some monethes, for a great summe of money.

This losse tormented Abderramen, and inflamed him to reuenge; wherefore in the yere Anno 895. 895 he entred Galicia with a great power, where he committed infinit spoyle. In the end both armies being met, there was a bloudie battell, which continued almost a whole day, with vncertaintie which had the victorie. Abderramen being afterwards fortified with new succours from Affricke, he came againe to wast the country of king D. Ordogno, and entred by the prouince of Alaua, into the territories of the king of Nauarre, which should be at that time D. Sancho Abarca, or rather his brother D. Fortun the second, and not D. Garcia Inigues, their father, who they hold died in the year 885: And then there was a great battell giuen in the vallie of Ionquera, in the which many braue Christian knights were slaine. The Mahumetists being victors, many townes and forts of Nauarre fell into the Infidells hands. King Abderramen returned victor vnto Cordoua, leading with him many prisoners, and a rich bootie. In this troupe of prisoners were the Bishops of Salamanca and of Tuy. He of Tuy, called Hermogius, not able to endure the hardnesse of the prison, being old, laboured to get out, giuing for hostage of his ranfome a nephew of his, called Pelagius, a goodly young youth, about fourteene yeares old, who had bene bred vp religiously, and in the feare of God. Being come into the Moores hands, king Almanzor being thrust on with a detestable desire, would haue abused him at his pleasure, and haue persuaded him to follow Mahumets sect: the which this holy youth did vertuously resist. Wherefore the king being enraged, he caused him to be murdered with many torments, and to be cast into the riuer of Guadalquivir, where his bodie being found, it was buried by the Christians: Whose memorie, for his great vertues in so tender yeares, merits to liue for euer.

Battell of Ionquera lost by the Christians.

Pelagius a holy youth cruelly murdered.

Quiedo and Leon.
Anno 896.

King D. Ordogno desirous to reaire the losse which the Christians had receiued in the vallie of Ionquera, entred in the year 896, into the Moores country with great forces, where hee tooke and ruined many townes; and meeting no incounter, hee returned to Zamora. As for the religious deeds of this king, they make particular mention of the building of S. Maries church, in his owne royall Palace of Leon, which he made the Cathedrall church of that towne, and indowed it with reuenewes, and many iewels; inducing the other noblemen, by his example, to doe the like. He caused himselfe to be crowned in this new Temple with great solemnitie, being the first of those kings which intitled himselfe king of Quiedo and Leon: for vnto these times they hold, That these kings reared themselves onely kings of Quiedo, without any addition of Leon. Before the Cathedrall church of Leon, were those of Saint Peter and Saint Paule, without the circuit of the walls in those times, the which he did enlarge, and made the towne much bigger, enriching it with many buildings, exemptions, and priuiledges.

We haue said before, That there was a great error in the computation of the raignes of these kings of Quiedo, and great confusion in conferring them with those that haue reigned in Nauarre, and the other Potentates of Spaine: for the Authors doe ill agree with the Charters and titles of priuiledges, donations, and foundations, which are found in the true stories of Monasteries, and other churches of Spaine: especially it is vncertaine what kings of Nauarre were in the time of king D. Ordogno, nor when he married his last wife D. Sanctiua, daughter to king D. Garcia Inigues the second, whether in his life time, or during the raigne of D. Fortun, and D. Sancho Abarca, his children: the fact is cleere, but the time is doubtfull. Some Authors write, That this king D. Ordogno, made this league with D. Sancho Abarca, king of Nauarre; and that hauing ioyned their forces together, they invaded the country of Rioje, which the Moores held, and hauing foraged it, they returned with great spoyle, hauing found no resistance.

The worthie and memorable deeds of this king are blemished with the cruelties hee vsed against the earles of Castille.

A 47 The worthie and memorable deeds of this king are blemished with the cruelties hee vsed against the earles of Castille. We haue made mention of Cont D. Diego Porcello, or Lechon, in the Spanish tongue, who gouerned Castille in the time of king D. Alphonso the great: besides there is mention of other earles and gouernors of the country, the which for that it was great, and compassed in by the Moores country, had need of many heads and captains to defend the frontiers of Quiedo and Leon, vnder whose foueraigntie Castille was. Among others, we find D. Nugno Fernandes, who it is likely was father in law to D. Garcia, king of Quiedo, brother to this king D. Ordogno, D. Almondar le Blanc, D. Diego his sonne, D. Fernando Anzuers: all these commaunded there, and were great noblemen in the said country of Castille, about the year 889, which they hold to be the first of D. Ordogno, king of Quiedo and Leon. It is not verified vpon what subiect they fell in disgrace with this king, if it were not by reason of the practises of D. Nugno Fernandes, and D. Garcia, against king D. Alphonso the great; kings being alwayes iealous of their estates, and enemies to them that attempted against their Soueraigne Princes, the which in some is accompanied with an enuie of their glorie, whom (being their subiects) they know to be aduenturous, fit for great enterprises, and to execute them happily. So it may be D. Ordogno fearing that these earles (who had fought valiantly against the Moores, and well defended their prouinces; for the which they were beloued, and respected of the people) should grow too great, to the prejudice of his royall Maiestie, he meant to murder them. He therefore called them vpon a safeconduet to a place called Regular, vpon the riuer of Carrion, making shew, that he would treat secretly with them of matters of great importance. Whither being come, he caused them to be apprehended, and carried with good guards to Leon, where some dayes after, without any forme proceeding, he caused them to be murdered in the prison. D. Diego Porcello, as some thinke, was of this number. D. Nugno Bellides married his daughter D. Sulla, of whom were borne two sonnes, D. Nugno Nugnez, Razura, grandfather to the earle D. Fernand Gonfales, and the other was Iustus Gonfales, grandfather to the Lord of Lara.

Ennie and iacobine familiar passions in great men.

Earles and gouernors of Castille murdered.

D. Diego Porcello the Remune of the princes of Castille.

A year after this tyrannous action, the king D. Ordogno died, according to the common opinion, in the year of our saluation 897; but according to the letters and titles of donation of the abbeyes and churches of Spaine, he liued in the year 919, as Garibay saith, who hath made a diligent search: Of the authoritie and truth of which charters we may iustly doubt. This king reigned eight yeares, and was buried at Leon, in the new Cathedrall church of Saint Marte the great; the first of those kings which had bene interred at Leon.

D. Froila, second of that name, and 15 King of Quiedo and Leon.

E 48 After the death of D. Ordogno, the realme was held by his brother D. Froila, who vsurped it from his nephewes, D. Alphonso, and D. Ramir, sonnes to the deceased. He is not put in the catalogue of the kings of Quiedo, it may be by reason of the shortnesse of his raigne, or in detestation of his cruelties, which purchased him the surname of Cruell; or for some other considerations. He had married a ladie called D. Munina, or D. Nugna, by whom he had three sonnes, D. Alphonso, D. Ordogno, and D. Ramir; and by a concubine, a bastard called D. Fruela. Of this bastard issued D. Pelagius, called the Deacon, who married D. Aldonsa, grand child to D. Bermund the Goutie, whereof we will make mention. King D. Fruela was a tyrant, and therefore fearefull and suspicious, so as he vsed great crueltie against the noblest personages in Spaine, he put some to death, banished many, and afflicted euerie estate. Among the rest he put to death the children of a noble knight, called D. Olmunde, or Dimunde, banished D. Frominio their brother, who was Bishop of Leon, and committed many other such outrages; yet couered with the cloke of iustice, as tyrants doe vsually.

Genealogie of Quiedo and Leon.

Tyrants alwayes feareful, suspicious, and cruel.

49 The people of Castille incensed at the crueltie vsed against their earles by D. Ordogno, change of the rebelled against the Crowne of Quiedo and Leon, and made an Estate apart, chusing two Go-

*Judges chosen
in Castille.*

Gouernors or Iudges among them, whereof the one should haue charge of the war, and the other should take knowledge of ciuile causes. These were Nugno Razura, and Flauin Caluo his sonne in law. Nugno Razura was sonne to Nugno Bellides, a German knight, who they say was the first founder of the citie of Burgos, so called by him, of a German word, signifying a habitation of people. This knight comming into Spaine vpon deuotion, to visit S. Iaques sepulchre, was there married to D. Sulla, daughter to D. Diego Porcello, and had by her this D. Nugno Razura, a knight, who was wise, valiant, and much esteemed, by reason of his modestie. He had one sonne and one daughter by his wife, D. Gonfalo Nugnes, and D. Eluira Nugnes, or else D. Theresa Nugnes, surnamed Bella, either for that she was exceeding faire, or to seeme to be so: for the custome of the auncient was to giue their children pleasing names and surnames, thinking they should thereby purchase fauour with men; and that a goodly name gaue some marke or impression to the person conformable to that which it did signifie. This ladie D. Bella was married by her father, to Flauin Caluo, a knight of Castille, lord of Biuar, by whom descended by fiue degrees, Cid, Ruys, Diaz, who was a wise and valiant knight. By these two Castille was gouerned without opposition: for that the king D. Fruela being hated, and ill obeyed, by reason of his tyranie, and tormented with continuall distrust, being also growne a leaper, could not bring any armie against them. Wherefore this manner of gouernement was settled among the Castillians, and the countrey was dismembred from the Crowne of Ouiedo, for a time; and the riuer of Pisorga diuided Castille the old from the kingdome of Leon. D. Nugnes determined of ciuile causes with great equitie and iustice. Flauin Caluo managed matters of state, and warre.

Mention is made in certain priuiledges giuen by the first kings of Castille, to certain towns of that countrey, of a volume of the Castilian Lawes, according to the which iustice should be administred, called the booke of Iudges: the which was of great authoritie, vnto the time of king D. Alphonso the Wise, sonne to D. Fernand the third, that the Lawes of the seuen parties were brought in, according to the which this realme was afterwards gouerned.

*Ouiedo and
Leon.*

King D. Fruela, without rest among his subiects, without warre against the Moores and Infidels, without honour in any of his actions, and without health in his person, infected with leprosie, reigned onely foureteene monethes, and was interred at Leon, in the chiefe church, in the yeare 898, according to the common opinion: but there are letters in the treasure of Saint Iaques, of a donation, of twelue miles of ground to this church, made by this king, dated the 28 of Iune 924, which Garibay saith he hath seene.

THE

THE SEVENTH BOOKE OF the Historie of Spaine.

The Contents of the seuenth Booke.

- 1 D Sancho Abarca, second of that name, and ninth king of Navarre.
- 2 D Alphonso, fourth of that name, and 16 king of Ouiedo and Leon.
- 3 D Ramir, second of that name, and 17 king of Leon, leaving the title of Ouiedo.
- 4 D Gonfalo Nugnes, Iudge of Castille: his vertues.
- 5 D Fernand Gonfales, first earle proprietarie of Castille.
- 6 D Mir, second proprietarie earle of Barcelone.
- 7 D Ordogno, third of that name, and 18 king of Leon.
- 8 D Garcia Sanches, fourth of that name, and 10 king of Navarre.
- 9 D Seniofrid, third earle of Barcelone, sonne to D Mir.
- 10 D Sancho, first of that name, and 19 king of Leon, called the Fat.
- 11 Hali Haran, ninth Soueraigne king of the Arabians or Moores in Spaine.
- 12 D Ramir, third of that name, and 20 king of Leon.
- 13 D Garcia Fernandes, second proprietarie earle of Castille.
- 14 Hizen, second of that name, and 10 king of the Moores at Cordoue.
- 15 D Bermund, second of that name, 21 king of Leon, from whom the citie of Leon was taken by the Moores.
- 16 D Sancho, third of that name, and 11 king of Navarre.
- 17 D Borel, fourth proprietarie earle of Barcelone.
- 18 D Alphonso, fifth of that name, and 22 king of Leon.
- 19 D Sancho Garcia, third earle of Castille.
- 20 D Raymond Borel, fifth earle of Barcelone.
- 21 E Decay of the Moores power in Spaine, by their ciuile dissensions.
- 22 Zuleima and Mahumet, 11 and 12 kings of the Moores at Cordoue.
- 23 D Garcia, fifth of that name, and 12 king of Navarre.
- 24 D Sancho, fourth of that name, and 13 king of Navarre, surnamed the great, who inherited Castille by his wife.
- 25 Confusions and ciuile warres among the Moores in Spaine, among the which there reigned, Hali, Cacin, Hiaja, Abderramen, Mahomad, Hizen, Ioar, and Mahumet, who was the 20 and last Soueraigne king of the Moores at Cordoue.
- 26 D Bermund, third of that name, and 23 king of Leon.
- 27 D Garcia, fourth earle of Castille: and the union of the earldome to the house of Navarre.
- 28 D Berenger Borel, sixth earle of Barcelone.
- 29 F Union of Leon and Castille in D Fernand, sonne to the king D Sancho of Navarre, the fourth of that name.

The names of the Kings and Princes of Spaine, mentioned in this seuenth Booke.

OVIEDO and LEON.

Kings.

- 16 Alphonso 4.
- 17 Ramir 2.
- 18 Ordogno 3.
- 19 Sancho 1.
- 20 Ramir 3.
- 21 Bermund 2.
- 22 Alphonso 5.
- 23 Bermund 3.

NAVARRÉ.

Kings.

- 9 Sancho Abarca 2.
- 10 Garcia 4.
- 11 Sancho 1.
- 12 Garcia the trembling 5.
- 13 Sancho 4.

CASTILLE.

Iudge.

Gonsal Nugnes.

Earles.

- 1 Ferdinand Gonsales.
- 2 Garcia Fernandes.
- 3 Sancho Garcia.

4 *Garcia.

D. Nugnes married to King D. Sancho the Great, of Nauarre, who inherited the Earldome of Castille, and vnited it to Nauarre.

BARCELONE, or CAT-TELOGNE.

Earls.

- 1 Mir.
- 2 Seniofrid.
- 3 Borel.
- 4 Raymond Borel.
- 5 Berenger Borel.

MOORES.

- 9 Hali Hatan 2.
- 10 Hizen 2.
- 11 Zuleima.
- 12 Mahumet 2.
- 13 Hali.
- 14 Cacin.
- 15 Hajja.
- 16 Abderramen 4.
- 17 Mahumet 3.
- 18 Hizen 3.
- 19 Ioar.
- 20 Mahumet 4.

We haue apparent Arguments in this seuenth Booke, of the religious disposition in auncient Princes, in the resolution which two Kings of this age tooke, the one of Nauarre, the other of Leon, to leave their regall Scepters and become Monkes: A president which was not rare in that age, but was afterwards imitated by others. Whether this proceeded from zeale of Religion, grounded upon any certaine knowledge, or from busenesse, and want of courage, or from meere ignorance of their rankes and royall callings, they can best iudge, who know by good and holie instructions, what ordinarie occasions Kings, and other Soueraigne Magistrates, haue in their lawfull calling, to shew themselves, and to be, truly religious.

D. Sancho Abarca, second of that name, and ninth King of Nauarre.

Nauarre.

D. Fortun king of Nauarre, makes himselfe a Monke. An. 901.

After the death of King D. Garcia Inigues, his sonne D. Fortun being come to the Crowne in Nauarre and Arragon, about the yere 885, as we haue said in the former Booke, hauing reigned some years, being moued with deuotion, and seeing himselfe without children, and old, he became a Monke in the monasterie of S. Sauour at Leyre, the which they hold was in the yere 901, leaving the realme of Nauarre, and the earldome of Arragon, to D. Sancho Abarca, his brother, so called by reason of a certaine kind of breech which he ware: Who, they say, being come with the queene D. Toda his wife, to the said monasterie of Leyre, receiued the blessing of his brother D. Fortun, from whom also they receiued a Crowne, with many other precious jewels.

The king D. Sancho had by this wife a sonne called D. Garcia Sanchez, bearing his grandfather and fathers names together: some giue him three sonnes more, D. Ramir, D. Gonsal, and D. Ferdinand. He had fife daughters by her, whereof the eldest, called D. Vrraca Ximenes, was wife to D. Alphonso the fourth of that name, king of Ouiedo and Leon: the second, D. Maria, Countesse of Barcelone, being married to D. Seniofrid, the fift Earle: the third, D. Theresa, who was married to D. Ramir, king of Ouiedo, brother to D. Alphonso: the fourth, D. Sancha, Countesse of Castille, the second wife of D. Fernand Gonsales: and the youngest was D. Blanche Velaque, whose marriage is vncertaine. This was a generous and worthie king, and in continuall warres against the Moores reigning in Alaua, and vpon the confines of Nauarre, whose lands he did often ouerrun, razed many places, and built others: the particularities whereof are vncertaine, by reason of the negligence or defect of writers of those times: but in generall they hold, that he did subject vnto his Crowne and made tributarie all the people which were betwixt his confines and the mountaines of Oca, of either side, following the course of Ebro vnto Tudele, and from the mountaines to Huesca: yea, passing the Pyrenees, he conquered from the French that part of Gascoine where the Basques are, which is at the foot of the mountaines: but whilst he was thus busied, the Moores came and besieged Pampelone, thinking to take it before that the king D. Sancho should come to succour it; but it happened otherwise: for the besieged were not onely relieued, but the Moores chased away, and pursued farre into their country, with great losse of their men. In these warres the vertue and prowesse of them of Sobrarbre and Ribagorça was great, especially of a captaine called Centullo.

The auncient confines of Nauarre.

D. Alphonso, fourth of that name, and 16 King of Ouiedo and Leon.

By the death of king D. Fruela, the kingdome of Ouiedo and Leon came to the children of D. Ordogno, and Alphonso the fourth, called the Monke and the blind, reigned: who hauing held the Crowne little aboue fife yeares, and had had a sonne by D. Vrraca Ximenes his wife, which he called D. Ordogno, afterwards surnamed the bad, had a desire to become a Monke, and for want of courage to passe his life in idlenesse, leauing the charge which God had giuen him, to rule and gouerne the Christian people preferred in Spaine: wherefore he gaue his brother D. Ramir to vnderstand thereof, who was then resident at Viseo, one of the frontiers of the Moores countrey, persuaading him to come vnto him, meaning to resigne the Scepter of Ouiedo and Leon. These newes were not a little pleasing vnto D. Ramir, who presently came to Zamora, where king D. Alphonso remained, and was there seated by him in the royall throne. D. Alphonso retyred himselfe into a Monasterie called Dominus Sanctus, at this day Sahagun, vpon the riuer Cea, a house built by king D. Alphonso the great, the third of that name.

Ouiedo and Leon.

D. Alphonso leaves his Crowne to become a Monke.

D. Ramir the second, and 17 King of Ouiedo and Leon.

Thus D. Ramir became king beyond his expectation, in the yere 904, of Ouiedo and Leon. From that time the royall title was attributed to the citie of Leon, suppressing Ouiedo, for that it was the greatest towne, and best peopled of all this kings Estare. D. Ramir had by his wife D. Theresa, daughter to king D. Sancho Abarca of Nauarre, three sonnes, D. Bermundo, D. Ordogno, and D. Sancho; and one daughter D. Eluira, who was professed a Nunne in the Monasterie of S. Sauour, in the citie of Leon, built by the king her father for her sake. The warres betwixt the Christians and the Moores, which had lyeu long dead, were now reuiued at the comming of this king, for the which he prepared himselfe. D. Alphonso (soone

Leon. An. 904. Ouiedo suppress in the kings titles.

D. Alphonso repents that he became a Monke.

D. Alphonso besieged and taken by his brother.

D. Ramir puts out his brothers and his nephews eyes.

Castille.

The commendable and fatherly care of a Prince.

D. Ferdinand the first Earle of Castille.

(soone wearie of his Monkish life, into the which he had rashly entred) repenting himselfe, that he had resigned his kingdome, meant to recouer it by armes, seizing vpon the towne of Leon, where he fortified himselfe with his confederates. D. Ramir hauing leuied a great armie, with a designe to imploy it against the Infidels, was forced to turne head against his owne subjects, and came to the siege of Leon, the which continued two yeares: in the end D. Alphonso being vnfurnished of all necessities, as well as of judgement, yeelded to his brothers discretion, who kept him prisoner.

The children of king Froila, by reason of the warres betwixt the two brethren, did rise in Asturia, and the eldest, whose name was Alphonso, caused himselfe to be called King: the rest, with most part of the Asturians, did honour and reuerence him as their king. The confederates of this Alphonso, sonne to Froila, desirous to surprise king D. Ramir, gaue him to vnderstand, That if hee came with a small traine, they would turne to him: but D. Ramir considering wisely what was most profitable and safe, would not goe without great forces, with the which he vanquished the Asturians, and tooke the children of king Froila, the which he sent prisoners to Leon, with his brother D. Alphonso, whereas soone after he caused all their eyes to be put out, then (as if he had repented him of this rigour) he drew them out of prison, and confined them into the Monasterie of S. Iulien, not farre from the citie of Leon, the which he caused to be built for them, and there entreated them honourably, during their liues; where they were buried, with D. Vrraca Ximena, wife to king Alphonso.

These diuisions did the more assure the revolt of Castille, and the new Estate of that countrey, vnder Iudges elected, whereof the two first being dead in the time of D. Alphonso the Monke, D. Gonfalo Nugnes had succeeded in the gouernment of Castille. This knight was bred vp in all vertue, ciuilitie, and good behauiour, by the care of D. Nugno Razura his father, who being wise and vertuous, was carefull to giue him good masters, in all commendable exercises, worthie of a child issued from a noble familie: and moreover, had made all the best families of the countrey partakers of this happinesse, causing the gentlemens sonnes of Castille to be bred vp with his sonne in the same discipline; so as in a short time the Court of Castille was furnished with as many gallant young gentlemen as any countrey in the world. Thereof grew a great loue and respect of the noblemen and knights, both fathers and sonnes, vnto their Gouernour, proceeding from the bond they had, to haue receiued by his meanes so good education and instruction; a benefit, which to speake truth doth exceed all the gifts and fauours a Prince can doe vnto his subjects. Stories are defectiue in relating the particular acts of these Earles or Iudges of Castille, although it be most certaine, that they wanted no subject of warre to defend themselves as well against the Moores, as against them of Leon and Ouedo. Their residence and iudiciall seat was at Bourgos, and in another towne of Castille the old, called in respect of them Vijuefes. D. Gonfalo Nugnes had to wife D. Ximena, daughter to Cont D. Nugno Fernandes, who was slaine in prison, with the rest, by king D. Ordogno, and of them was borne the Earle D. Fernand Gonfales, first proprietarie of Castille, one of the discreetest and best accomplished knights of his age; who succeeded his deceased father, about the yeare 910, who for his interment caused the Monasterie of Arlansa to be built, as the Monkes of that place report, who shew many markes and resemblances of this Earle or Gouernour D. Gonfalo, and of his wife D. Ximena, but ill agreeing with the computation of times, and the truth of the Histories. D. Fernand Gonfales being established Earle and Iudge of Castille, during the time that king D. Ramir was at strife with his brother, and the children of king D. Fruela, he gouerned the estate of that Prouince in such sort, as peace and abundance lodged there, and the people held themselves most happie to haue such a Commaunder. He did wonderfully affect religion, according to the time, and hauing no better instruction from the Pastors in those dayes, then it is to be presumed, he gaue himselfe superfluously to the works of pietie of that age, which was wholly imployed to build Churches, and to giue reuenues, for the entertainment of Priests and Monkes, and of their ceremonies. He had a particular deuotion to S. Peter and S. Emylian, whom the Castillians had chosen for their Patron and Protector of their countrey, as they of the kingdome of Leon did to S. Iagues. The Monasterie of S. Peter of Cardegna was his worke. He was iust of his word, faithfull in his promises, and endowed with manie other other good gifts, which purchased him the fauour and loue of all men, and aduanced him to the dignitie of soueraigne Earle of Castille. He married twice: his first wife was D. Vrraca, by whom he had one daughter of that name: after whose decease, he tooke to wife D. Sancho, Infanta of Nauarre, daughter to king D. Sancho Abasca: he had many sons, but it is vncertaine by which of these two wives they were borne, there remaining in a manner no other memorie of them, but the inscriptions of their tombes obserued by writers, at S. Peters of Cardegna: the names of his sons are, D. Gonfalo Fernandes, D. Sancho Fernandes, D. Garcia Fernandes, who was Earle after the father, it may be by the death of the two elder, D. Pedro, who had two sons, as it appeares by the tombes at S. Peter of Cardegna, D. Gonfalo Nugnes, and D. Fernando Gonfales, and for the last D. Baldwin. Now this Earle D. Fernand Gonfales began to carrie himselfe as a companion in armes, and no more subject to the kings of Leon: yet king D. Ramir hauing

(after that he had subdued his rebellious kinsmen) led his armie into the territories of Toledo, taken the towne of Madril from the Moores, of whom (as we haue said) Abderramen was Miralumin and king at Cordoua, and razed the walls thereof, the Moores being desirous to be reuenged of the Christians for this affront, being entred with a great armie into the territorie of Castille, which was neere vnto them, and there done exceeding great harme, the Earle D. Fernand Gonfales was forced to entreat K. Ramir to joyne his forces with them of Castille, and to oppose them against the common enemy: the which he did, and hauing encountered the Moores neere to the towne of Osme, these two Princes gaue them battaile, and woon it, with great slaughter of the Infidels. Aben-Aya reigned at Saragosse, vnder Abderramen Almanfor, whereof some refusing to submit themselves to the Christians yoke, and rebelling against Aben-Aya, were forced to obedience by the Kings and Earles armie, who were no sooner retyred into their countries, but Abderramen incited at the revolt of Aben-Aya, ran vpon him with all his power: but the Moore, who had not yeelded vnto the Christians, but to auoid the present danger, submitted himselfe presently to the Miralumin, and returned to his seruice and obedience as before: then both together, with a mightie armie, entred the country of K. D. Ramir, spoyling it as farre as the towne of Simancas, whereas the Christians armie presented it selfe in battaile, the which was one of the most memorable that hath beene in Spaine, betwixt the Christians and the Mahumetists, where the Moores were defeated, and so great a number of them slaine, as many Authors affirme, they exceeded 80000. Aben-Aya was prisoner, and Abderramen forced to saue himselfe by flight with twentie horses onely. They hold, that it was in the yeare of our Lord 914, but there are letters of priuiledge and donation, for which they call vow, made by Cont D. Fernand Gonfales, in the Monasterie of S. Emylian, for this & other victories dated in the yeare 934, where it appeares, that king D. Ramir was alone in this first battell, without the Castillians, and that he hauing put to rout a part of the Moores armie, the rest which retyred by Castille, were encountered by this Earle and his armie, who wholly defeated them; and then was the vow to S. Emylian accomplished, which seemes had beene made in the beginning of this warre, by all the Christian Princes reigning in Spaine, for there is a confirmation thereof made by D. Garcia Sanchez, king of Nauarre. Euerie familie in Castille payed vnto the said Monasterie, by reason of this vow, some sheepe, some oxen, corne, oates, wine, oyle, fish, waxe, cheefe, flax, yron, lead, and other things contained in their letters, from the riuier of Arga, which is in Nauarre, vnto that of Carrion, and from the mountaine of Araboya vnto the Biscane sea; whereby it appeares, that that yeare 934 the country of Guisafcoa was vnto the countie of Castille, being withdrawne from the realme of Nauarre, to the which it was afterwards annexed againe. The yeare of this battaile of Simancas, the Sunne was darkened for the space of an houre, and the starres were seene glistering, and as it were mouing in the firmament.

King D. Ramir after this victorie retyred into his countrey, carrying with him Aben-Aya, and a great number of other prisoners, with rich spoyle; but soone after he found himselfe ingaged in a new warre by the practises of some knights of Leon, ill affected vnto the king, or ill rewarded by him: whatfoeuer the subject were, they conspired with a captain of the Moores, called Accipha, who entring into the countrey by the riuier of Tormes, spoyled all the territories of Salamanca and Ledesma: Garibay calls these knights

Genealogie of castille.

Moores defeated.

Battaile of Simancas, and the great victorie of the Christians.

An. 914.

Guisafcoa a member of the realme of Nauarre.

Leon.

D. Alphonso repents that he became a Monke.

D. Alphonso besieged and taken by his brother.

D. Ramir puts out his brothers and his nephews eyes.

Castille.

The commendable and fatherly care of a Prince.

D. Fernand & S. Emylian, first parts of Castille.

(soone wearie of his Monkish life, into the which he had rashly entred) repenting himselfe, that he had resigned his kingdome, meant to recouer it by armes, seizing vpon the towne of Leon, where he fortified himselfe with his confederates. D. Ramir hauing leuied a great armie, with a designe to imploy it against the Infidels, was forced to turne head against his owne subjects, and came to the siege of Leon, the which continued two yeares: in the end D. Alphonso being vn furnished of all necessaries, as well as of judgement, yeelded to his brothers discretion, who kept him prisoner.

The children of king Froila, by reason of the warres betwixt the two brethren, did rise in Asturia, and the eldest, whose name was Alphonso, caused himselfe to be called King: the rest, with most part of the Asturians, did honour and reuerence him as their king. The confederates of this Alphonso, sonne to Froila, desirous to surprise king D. Ramir, gaue him to vnderstand, That if hee came with a small traine, they would turne to him: but D. Ramir considering wisely what was most profitable and safe, would not goe without great forces, with the which he vanquished the Asturians, and tooke the children of king Froila, the which he sent prisoners to Leon, with his brother D. Alphonso, whereas soone after he caused all their eyes to be put out, then (as if he had repented him of this rigour) he drew them out of prison, and confined them into the Monasterie of S. Iulien, not farre from the citie of Leon, the which he caused to be built for them, and there entreated them honourably, during their liues; where they were buried, with D. Vrraca Ximena, wife to king Alphonso.

4 These diuisions did the more assure the reuolt of Castille, and the new Estate of that country, vnder Iudges elected, whereof the two first being dead in the time of D. Alphonso the Monke, D. Gonfalo Nugnes had succeeded in the gouernment of Castille. This knight was bred vp in all vertue, ciuilitie, and good behauiour, by the care of D. Xugno Racura his father, who being wise and vertuous, was carefull to giue him good masters, in all commendable exercises, worthie of a child issued from a noble familie: and moreover, had made all the best families of the country partakers of this happinesse, causing the gentlemen's sonnes of Castille to be bred vp with his sonne in the same discipline; so as in a short time the Court of Castille was furnished with as many gallant young gentlemen as any country in the world. Thereof grew a great loue and respect of the noblemen and knights, both fathers and sonnes, vnto their Gouernour, proceeding from the bond they had, to haue received by his meanes so good education and instruction; a benefite, which to speake truth doth exceed all the gifts and fauours a Prince can doe vnto his subjects. Stories are defective in relating the particular acts of these Earles or Iudges of Castille, although it be most certaine, that they wanted no subject of warre to defend themselves as well against the Moores, as against them of Leon and Ouiedo. Their residence and iudiciall seat was at Bourgos, and in another towne of Castille the old, called in respect of them Viuufes. D. Gonfalo Nugnes had to wife D. Ximena, daughter to Cont D. Xugno Fernandes, who was slaine in prison, with the rest, by king D. Ordogno, and of them was borne the Earle D. Fernand Gonfales, first proprietor of Castille, one of the discreetest and best accomplished knights of his age, who succeeded his deceased father, about the yeare 910, who for his interment caused the Monasterie of Arlansa to be built, as the Monkes of that place report, who shew many markes and testimonies of this Earle or Gouernour D. Gonfalo, and of his wife D. Ximena, but ill agreeing with the computation of times, and the truth of the Histories. D. Fernand Gonfales being established Earle and Iudge of Castille, during the time that king D. Ramir was at strife with his brother, and the children of king D. Fruela, he gouerned the estate of that Prouince in such sort, as peace and abundance lodged there, and the people held themselves most happie to haue such a Commander. He did wonderfully affect religion, according to the time, and hauing no better instruction from the Pastors in those dayes, then it is to be presumed, he gaue himselfe superfluously to the works of pietie of that age, which was wholly imployed to build Churches, and to giue reuenues, for the entertainment of Priests and Monkes, and of their ceremonies. He had a particular deuotion to S. Peter and S. Emylian, whom the Castilians had chosen for their Patron and Protector of their country, as they of the kingdome of Leon did flye to S. Iaques. The Monasterie of S. Peter of Cardegna was his worke. He was just of his word, faithfull in his promises, and endowed with manie other

other good gifts, which purchased him the fauour and loue of all men, and aduanced him to the dignitie of soueraigne Earle of Castille. He married twice: his first wife was D. Vrraca, by whom he had one daughter of that name: after whose decease, he tooke to wife D. Sancha, Infanta of Nauarre, daughter to king D. Sancho Abarea: he had many sons, but it is vncertaine by which of these 2 wiues they were borne, there remaining in a manner no other memorie of them, but the inscriptions of their tombes obserued by writers, at S. Peters of Cardegna: the names of his sons are, D. Gonfalo Fernandes, D. Sancho Fernandes, D. Garcia Fernandes, who was Earle after the father, it may be by the death of the two elder, D. Pedro, who had two sons, as it appeares by the tombes at S. Peter of Cardegna, D. Gonfalo Nugnes, and D. Fernando Gonfales, and for the last D. Baldwin. Now this Earle D. Fernand Gonfales began to carrie himselfe as a companion in armes, and no more subject to the kings of Leon: yet king D. Ramir hauing (after that he had subdued his rebellious kinsmen) led his armie into the territories of Toledo, (taken the towne of Madril from the Moores, of whom (as we haue said) Abderramen was Miralumin and king at Cordoua, and razed the walls thereof, the Moores being desirous to be reuenged of the Christians for this affront, being entred with a great armie into the territorie of Castille, which was neere vnto them, and there done exceeding great harme, the Earle D. Fernand Gonfales was forced to entreat K. Ramir to ioine his forces with them of Castille, and to oppose them against the common enemy: the which he did, and hauing encountered the Moores neere to the towne of Osme, these two Princes gaue them battaile, and woon it, with great slaughter of the Infidels. Aben-Aya reigned at Saragosse, vnder Abderramen Almanfor, and was assailed by the victorious Christian armie, and forced to come to composition with king D. Ramir, by the which he made himselfe his vassale, and all his subjects, in the yere 912: whereof some refusing to submit themselves to the Christians yoke, and rebelling against Aben-Aya, were forced to obedience by the Kings and Earles armie, who were no sooner retyred into their countries, but Abderramen incensed at the reuolt of Aben-Aya, ran vpon him with all his power: but the Moore, who had not yeelded vnto the Christians, but to avoid the present danger, submitted himselfe presently to the Miralumin, and returned to his seruice and obedience as before: then both together, with a mightie armie, entred the country of K. D. Ramir, spoyling it as farre as the towne of Simancas, whereas the Christians armie presented selfe in battaile, the which was one of the most memorable that hath beene in Spaine, betwixt the Christians and the Mahumetists, where the Moores were defeated, and so great a number of them slaine, as many Authors affirme, they exceeded 80000. Aben-Aya was prisoner, and Abderramen forced to saue himselfe by flight with twentie horses onely. They hold, that it was in the yeare of our Lord 914, but there are letters of priuiledge and donation, which they call vow, made by Cont D. Fernand Gonfales, in the Monasterie of S. Emylian, for this & other victories dated in the yeare 934, where it appeares, that king D. Ramir was alone in this first battell, without the Castilians, and that he hauing put to rout a part of the Moores armie, the rest which retyred by Castille, were encountered by this Earle and his armie, who wholly defeated them; and then was the vow to S. Emylian accomplished, which seemes had bene made in the beginning of this warre, by all the Christian Princes raigning in Spaine, for there is a confirmation thereof made by D. Garcia Sanchez, king of Nauarre. Euerie familie in Castille payed vnto the said Monasterie, by reason of this vow, some sheepe, some oxen, come, oates, wine, oyle, fish, waxe, cheefe, flax, yron, lead, and other things contained in their letters, from the riuier of Arga, which is in Nauarre, vnto that of Carrion, and from the mountaine of Araboya vnto the Biscane sea; whereby it appeares, that that yeare 934 the country of Guipuscoa was vnited to the countie of Castille, being withdrawne from the realme of Nauarre, to the which it was afterwards annexed againe. The yeare of this battaile of Simancas, the Sunne was darkened for the space of an houre, and the starres were scene glistering, and as it were mouing in the firmament.

King D. Ramir after this victorie retyred into his country, carrying with him Aben-Aya, and a great number of other prisoners, with rich spoyle; but soone after he found himselfe engaged in a new warre by the practises of some knights of Leon, ill affected vnto the king, or ill rewarded by him: whatsoeuer the subject were, they conspired with a captain of the Moores, called Acipha, who entring into the country by the riuier of Tormes, spoyled all the territories of Salamanca and Ledesma: Garibay calls these knights

Genealogie of Castille.

Moores defeated.

Battaile of Simancas, and the great victorie of the Christians.

An. 914.

Guipuscoa a member of the realme of Nauarre.

God is not pleased with rebellion, no
though the Trince be a tyrant.

An. 915.
Moore.

Nauarre.

warre betwixt
Nauarre and Castille, for iniurie done to the embassadors
of Castille.

D. Sancho A-barca king of Nauarre slaine
by the Castilians.

The worthie
memorie of D.
Sancho Abarca.

Leon.

An. 923.

Moore's defeated.

which had conspired against their king, D. Fernand Gonzales, D. Diego Nugner, and D. Ro- drigo, who did great harme with their owne forces, in the Asturias: but king D. Ramir (al- though it may be he had giuen subiect of these rebellions, by his austeritie, or ingratitude) surmounted them: being often scene, that God doth most commonly fauor and support the royall Majestie against rebellious subiects, how just soeuer their cause be; referring to himselfe the immediate punishment of tyrants. Wherefore the Moores were not onely repulsed, but also these knights were taken and brought to Leon, and to the castle of Gor- don, from whence notwithstanding the king freed them within few dayes after, without any other punishment, than their promises and oathes, to continue loyall and faithfull. So as hauing been too rigorous against his owne blood, he was too mild and remisse to these, who had conspired with the Mahumetists, enemies of the Christian religion. These things past in the yeare 915.

King Abderramen grieved, that the warre against the Christians succeeded not well for the good of his Estate, he began to persecute the Christians which liued vnder his commaund, yet some attribute this persecution to his sonne and successor Halihatun.

The generall Historie of Spaine makes mention of a warre betwixt D. Sancho Abarca of Nauarre, and D. Fernand Gonzales, Earle of Castille, grounded vpon the reparation of many domages done by the Nauarrois, passing and repassing through the countrey of Castille, vnder colour of making warre against the Moores: with whom the king D. Sancho made a peace, to the prejudice of the Castilians and others their neighbors; the which did much dis- content them. Wherefore the Earle D. Fernand demanded restitution of the spoyle and exceffe which had bene committed in his countrey: but his messengers were sent backe with injurious words and disgrace; by reason whereof they came to armes, and there was a sharpe encounter of two armies, in a place called Era de Gollanda, where there was much blood spilt. The two Princes D. Sancho and D. Fernandes encountering during the fight, they ran one at another with such animositie, as both horse and men were ouerthrowne to the ground. The king D. Sancho was found dead with the charge of a lance, and D. Fernandes sore wounded. This misfortune being knowne in the Nauarrois armie, daunted their coura- ges, so as the Castilians woon the field. The same generall Historie reports, that an Earle of Tolouse being come with a great armie to succour the king D. Sancho, being desirous to re- uenge the death of his friend and allie, and hauing joyned with the remainders of the forces of Nauarre, he was againe fought withall, vanquished, and slaine by D. Fernand, who deliue- red the bodies of these Princes thus slaine to their subiects to burie them. Of the time of this defeat, or of the manner of D. San. Abarcas death, there is no great certaintie in that which is related in this generall Historie, yet they conjecture it was about the yeare 920. It is with- out all question, that he was a valiant and courageous Prince, and so famous, that even at this day there is not so poore a woman in the kingdome of Nauarre, nor any other person (al- though he be ignorant of the name of other kings) which knowes not that of D. Sancho A- barca; all which speake and make an honourable mention of him, as of a wife and vertuous Prince. He did enlarge the limits of Nauarre, conquering much on euerie side from the Moores, euen along the riuer of Ebro, whereof a castle neere vnto Sarragosse doth beare witnesse, which carries his name vnto this day. There are many other markes found of him in Spaine: the castle of Ses, and that of Arrafate (since called Mondragon) in Guipuscoa, (but ruined at this day) are his workes. They hold, that he did people the towne of Logrog- no in Rioje, and walled it about. There is ample mention made of him in a Charter of pri- uiledge and donation, of the places of S. Vincent and Ledena, to the Monasterie of S. Salua- tor de Leyre, dated in the yeare 919, whereby many things which are written doubtfully of this king, are made plaine and confirmed: among others, it appears thereby, that he was sonne to D. Garcia Inigues, brother to D. Fortun, and husband to D. Toda.

About this time, king D. Ramir desirous to enlarge his kingdome, and to diminish the power of the Moores in Spaine, led a mightie armie into the countrey of Toledo, so as in the yeare 923 he besieged Talauera, called at this present, La Roina: and as the Moores came to succour it, he gaue them battaile, where he slew twelue thousand, and tooke seuen thou- sand prisoners. This was the last exploit of warre which this king did. A little before he had married his sonne D. Ordogno to D. Yrraca, daughter to the Earle of Castille, D. Fer- nand and Gonzales, and by this marriage he confirmed a peace, and renewed the accords made with the Castilians. The rest of his dayes, which were but short, he employed in religious works, according to those times, and as he was persuaded by the Pastors and Bishops. This king cau- sed the Monasterie of S. Sauueur of Leon to be built, there to lodge his daughter D. Eluira. The religious deeds of D. Ra- mir of Leon.

Moreover, he founded a Monasterie to S. Andrew; one of S. Christopher, vpon the riuer Ceaz; one of the virgin Marie vpon Duero; one of S. Michel called Destriana, in the valley of Or- ne: in which things he was diligent and prodigall, and alwaies assisted by D. Theresa the queene his wife. He died in the yeare 924 of his naturall death at Leon, where he was buried in S. Sauueurs Church. An. 924.

In this kings raigne, Cont Geoffrey the hairie died at Barcelone, hauing enjoyed the Principalltie of Cartellogne (since the renounciation made vnto him of those lands in pro- prietie, by Charles the Grosse, Emperour and King of France) thirtie yeares, and lyes at S. Pa- blo. After him, his sonne D. Mir was Earle, in the yeare 914, of whom we read no memo- rable thing. He married somewhat late, and begatt three children, the first was called D. Se- niofrid, who was Earle of Barcelone after his father, the second D. Oliban, he was surnamed Cheurette, by reason of a bodily infirmite, whereunto he was subiect; for when he would speake, he must of force scrape the earth, before he could pronounce a word, he had such an impediment in his speech: he had for his portion the Countie of Cerdagne and Besalu, after the decease of his father. The third called D. Mir, was Earle and Bishop of Girone. All his children were young at the decease of the Earle their father, who made D. Seniofrid, Earle of Vrgel, his brother, executor, to order his childrens portions: he ruled Cartellogne fiftene yeares, and lyes in the Monasterie of Ripol. Cartellogne.

D. Ordogno the third, and 18 King of Leon.

7 T O D. Ramir of Leon succeeded D. Ordogno his second sonne, in the yeare 924, but the titles and letters of Monasteries and Churches of Spaine, as of S. Iaqués of Compo- stella, of S. Emylian of Cogolla, of S. Felix of Oca, of priuiledges, donations, and confirma- tions granted vnto them by king D. Ramir, and other noblemen of his time, shew, that he was yet liuing in the yeare 934: but there is little certaintie in the computation of these kings raignes, nor in the charters which are produced by men of our time. This Prince D. Or- dogno is commended by the Spaniards to haue bene mild and courteous, so as he was great- ly beloued of his subiects. He had some crosses in the beginning of his raigne, by the flatter- ers and corrupters of young Princes (an ordinarie plague in Courts) who debauched his younger brother D. Sancho, and persuaded him to rebell against him, who fled into Nauarre, to be assisted with the forces of that kingdome to execute his designe. Flatterers make D. Sancho re- bell against the king his brother.

E D. Garcia Sanches, fourth of that name, and tenth King of Nauarre.

8 T Here are some errors which are remarkable in this place in stories; that is, who raig- ned at that time in Nauarre: for some hold, that the young Prince D. Sancho had re- course vnto king D. Sancho Abarca, his grandfather by the mothers side: others say, it was to his sonne Garcia Sanches, the which is more probable, the most diligent Authors affirming, that the king D. Sancho Abarca died during the raigne of D. Ramir, father to this king D. Or- dogno, about the yeare 920, hauing raigned twentie yeares or little lesse ouer his subiects, and valiantly repulsed the Infidell Moores, gouerning in Alaua, and elsewhere in his coun- tie of Arragon. Wherefore without all doubt Prince D. Sancho, brother to D. Ordogno of Leon, had recourse vnto him, and by his meanes was also fauoured by Cont D. Fernand of Castille, the warres being pacified betwixt the Castilians and the Nauarrois: of which na- tions hauing raised a great armie, these three Princes entred the territories of king D. Or- dogno, and marcht as farre as the royall citie of Leon: but king D. Ordogno had so wisely prou- Nauarre.

*D. Ordogno king of Leon puts a way his wife
D. Vrraca.*

provided for his affaires, as they were forced to returne, and to abandon their enterprise, reaping nothing for their paine, but the hatred of the king of Leon; the which did so incense him, as he put away his wife D. Vrraca, daughter to the Earle D. Fernand Gonzales, and married a Ladie called D. Eluira, by whom he had a sonne, called D. Bermund, which came to the Crowne of Leon. By reason of these troubles, the Gallegos, or they of Galicia rebelled against king D. Ordogno; but he soone reduced them to their obedience by armes: and being encouraged by this happie successe, he entred into the Moores country, and passed the riuers of Duero and Minio, waisting the countrey with fire and sword, euen vnto Lisbon, finding not any one to make head against him, so as he returned safe with his armie, laden with great spoyle; and without any great stay being incensed with the iniurie which he had received from Fernand Earle of Castille, who had fauored and succoured D. Sancho his brother, who was rebelled, marcht with his forces towards Castille, with an intent to doe him all the harme he could.

Castille.

The wisdome and dexteritie of D. Fernand was such, as of an enemie he made him a friend, so as he returned into his countrey well satisfied, and after that time they joynd their forces together to annoy the Moores: whose king Abderramen residing at Cordoua, desirous to reuenge the outrages which the Christians and their king D. Ordogno had done in the territories of Lisbon, and others of those marches, hauing also a new subject by the taking of his castle of Carranfo, by the Earle D. Fernand, he rayed a mightie armie of Moores, in the which they say was about 80000 fighting men: and hauing giuen charge thereof to a Moorish knight much esteemed, whom they called Alhagib Almanzor, he sent him into the territories of Castille, the which did much trouble D. Fernand, for that all his forces of Castille were small to oppose against so mightie a power as that of the Moores, wherefore he demanded succours, and obtained them from king D. Ordogno; yet Castille was ouerrun by the Moores armie, from S. Steuen of Gormas vnto Burgos. In the end, D. Fernand did so pursue them, as hee forced them to fight, neere vnto a place called Dozio, where the Moores were defeated, with great slaughter of their men. The Spaniards report, That D. Fernand was foretold of this defeat of the Moores by a holie hermit, dwelling neere to Lara, called Pelagius, and that the armies being farre one from the other, D. Fernand being encamped in that place, he had a desire to hunt, and hauing rowzed a Boare, he pursued him to the hermits cell, where he shut him vp. There was a Chappell and an Altar dedicated to S. Peter, for the reuerence whereof the Earle would doe no harme vnto this beast. Whilest he stayed there, the hermit arriued, who entreated the Earle to lodge that night with him and his religious, being late, the which he did. In the morning the hermit Pelagius revealed vnto the Earle, that he should be victor ouer this great armie of Moores, exhorting him to take courage, and to trust in God, and aboue all to remember the poore Friets, when he had gotten this victorie. So the Earle returned to his armie so full of hope, as no counsell could dissuade him from the Moores armie, being great and mightie, with a handfull of men, and he had the victorie, as we haue said. Returning to Burgos, he remembered the religious, whom he made partakers of the spoyle, and in time built a Monasterie for them to S. Peter, L vpon the riuier of Arlançe, and gaue it good reuenues, where this Earle and his successors were afterwards buried. The Moores hauing leuied new troupes, returned into Castille, and were againe vanquished by the Castillians and Nauarrois, about the year 927, and neere vnto the towne of S. Steuens, vpon the riuier of Duero.

*Monasterie of Peter of Arlançe, built by Fernand
infantes.*

Leon.

An. 929.

The king D. Ordogno hauing rayed a new armie a little before, to invade the Moores, he was surprised with sickness in the towne of Zamora, where he died the fift yere of his raigne, and of our redemption 929, which opinion is not verie certaine.

In which yere they hold, that D. Mir Earle of Barcelona also died, and to him succceeded his sonne Senioffid, according to his will and testament.

D. Sancho the first, and 19 King of Leon.

Leon.

10 TO D. Ordogno there succeeded in the realme of Leon D. Sancho his brother, who was surnamed the fat, for that he was exceeding corpulent; wherefore it seems he

A he was more carefull to pamper his bodie, then to attempt any great actions: and for that in those dayes the Arabians had the same to be verie expert in the art of Phisicke, and that the towne of Cordoua was full of such people, especially the Court of king Abderramen, he entertained friendship with this king, and went to Cordoua, that he might haue aduice and helpe for his indisposition; wherein Abderramen shewed himselfe courteous and faithfull, receiuing him with all the honour fit for such a king, and furnishing him with the best Phisitians of his Court, by whose diligence and iudgement he was freed from the infirmities which had long troubled him.

*Arabian Phisitians in great
request.*

Whilest that D. Sancho was in the Phisitians hands at Cordoua, the Leonis conspired against him, and did aduance to the royall throne D. Ordogno, surnamed the bad, sonne to D. Alphonso the Monke, whereunto they were sollicitated by D. Fernand Gonzales, Earle of Castille, whose daughter D. Vrraca, who had beene rejected by D. Ordogno last deceased, they caused this other Ordogno to marrie: but D. Sancho being aduertised of these newes at Cordoua, he entreated king Abderramen to continue him his fauour and friendship, and as he had beene the meanes for the recouerie of his bodily health, so he would also assist him to maintaine his estate and dignitie: Whereunto the king did verie kindly consent, and gaue him great troupes of his nation and sect, with the which he marched towards his countrey, the which he recovered without any great difficultie, for that the conspirators of the countrey could not of themselves resist so great forces. And as for the Earle D. Fernand, he had worke ynough in his owne countrey, whereas a nobleman, called D. Bela de Nagera, had put all in trouble and sedition during his absence, in laying the plot against the king D. Sancho, with them of Leon; who being vnprovided of force and counsell, retired with D. Ordogno into the Asturias, to liue there in the mountaines and places of strength: but D. Ordogno not finding himselfe safe ynough in those parts, he fled into Castille, to his father in law, who obserued in that, and other actions of his, a notable cowardise: whereat he was so incensed, as he tooke his daughter Vrraca from him, and chased him out of his countrey. So D. Ordogno not knowing whither to flye, went vnto the Moores, but he was slaine neere vnto Cordoua.

Rebellion in the kingdom of Leon.

*D. Bela de Nagera troubles
the estate of Castille.*

This partie of the Moores had beene embraced with better successe, a little before, by D. Bela de Nagera, who had rebelled against the Earle D. Fernand, and was expelled by him; who it may be perswaded the expedition which was made into Castille, in the yere 931, by king Abderramen, vnder the commaund of Alhagib Almanzor, who had already (to his losse) tryed the force of the Christians, as we haue said: against whom, D. Fernand hauing fortified himselfe with the succours of the Biscaines, and of their Lord D. Lope Diaz, who was grandchild to D. Suris, and sonne to D. Inigo, surnamed Esguerra, which signifieth deafe in the countrey language, and with other friends his neighbors, he presented himselfe in bataille neere to Hazignas, where they fought three seuerall daies, with great obstinacie on either side: but in the end the Moores were vanquished, and lost more men than they had done in the former battles. The Spanish writers make mention here of another apparition of S. Iaqués, fighting for the Christians against the Infidels, to whom they attribute the honor of this victorie.

An. 931.

Moores defeated.

E The king D. Sancho being restored, he married D. Theresa, and hauing punished some confederats of this rebellion, he made a generall assemblie of noblemen, both of his subjects and allies, at Leon. D. Fernand Gonzales could not well excuse himselfe, wherefore he went well accompanied, and was notwithstanding verie honourably entertained by the king. They report, That among other exquisite things which D. Fernand brought out of Castille, to make shew of in that Court, he had a goodly horse, and one of the best Goshawkes that could be seene, whereof the king was wonderfully desirous, causing some to entreat the Earle to sell them to him, and that he should aske what price he pleased. The Earle answered, That he would willingly giue them vnto the king, but he would not sell them: but the king would not receiue them of gift, but made such meanes by his friends to buy them, as in the end there was a price set, which was to be payed at a certaine time, vpon condition, That if the king failed at the day of payment, the summe agreed vpon should be doubled, to the benefit of the creditor: of which accord there were letters drawne and signed. The rest of the time which D. Fernand remained in the king D. Sancho his Court, was spent in pleasure.

Leon.

A costly bargaine made betwixt Princes in Court, and entertained by force.

T

In

In the end of the Assembly, there was a particular treatie of the marriage of D. Fernand, a widower, with D. Sancha the Infanta of Nauarre, daughter to D. Sancho Abasca, and sister to D. Garcia, then reigning in Nauarre, and Arragon. This marriage was proposed by the Queene D. Theresa, mother to the king D. Sancho Gordo, and sister to D. Sancha; not for any loue she bare to the Earle of Castille, but to intrap him in the snares which she had prepared for him, in hatred and reuenge of the death of king Sancho Abasca her father, whom he had slaine in warre, as we haue said before. The Earle consented to this marriage, and tooke his leaue of the King and Queene, and of the Noblemen of the Court, and went into Castille, to prepare himselfe for his future marriage: but he found, that during his absence the Nauarrois had spoyled his countrey, and done manie acts of hostilitie against his subjects; whereof he complained first by embassages and messages, and demanded restitution of that which had beene taken, but it was in vaine: Wherefore being a Prince full of courage, he went presently to armes, and entred into the territories of Nauarre, where he encountered an armie of Nauarrois, and defeated it, and so righted himselfe.

Warre betwixt
Castille and Nauarre.

Nauarre.

D. Fernand
Earle of Castille surprised in Na-uarre, and detained prisoner.

D. Fernand of Castille deliue-
red out of prison.

One of his subjects to their Prince.

Castille.

Nauarrois defeated, and the king D. Garcia
Sanches taken prisoner.

The treatie of marriage was still continued, by the meanes of the Queene mother of Leon, sister to D. Sancha, Infanta of Nauarre, who had plotted with the king D. Garcia Sanches, her brother, to entrap the Earle vnder this colour of marriage, and to be reuenged of him at their pleasures. There was such sending on either part, as in the end the Earle was perswaded to goe into Nauarre to conclude this marriage, and hauing agreed with D. Garcia, king of Nauarre, That their enterview should be at a place called Circugna, either of them accompanied with five knights onely. The Earle being arriued, the king came with five and thirtie horsemen: wherefore the Earle seeing himselfe thus surprised, thought to saue himselfe in an hermitage neere adioyning, but the holinesse of the place could not defend him, but he was besieged, and forced to yeeld, vpon condition they should not put him to death. Being taken, he was shut vp in a fort called Chasteau Vieil, or the old castle, and but hardly entreated. A while after, an Italian knight of Lumbardie, going in pilgrimage to Saint Jaques of Compostella, that way, and hearing that the Earle D. Fernand was detained prisoner there, he was verie desirous to see him, for that he had heard so much fame of his vertues and valour, and at length found meanes to speake with him. At his departure from thence, this knight went to the Infanta D. Sancha, who was both faire and louelie, whose heart he did so mollifie with good words, as she began to loue, and to desire D. Fernands libertie and companie. This Ladie moued with this affection, wrought in such sort, as one night she deliuered him out of prison, hauing plighted their faithes, and promised marriage one vnto the other, without the priuie of the king D. Garcia Sanches, and together tooke their way to Castille, where they had scarce entred the limits, but they met with great troupes of souldiours. These were the Earles subjects, who vpon the newes of his imprisonment had assembled themselves together in armes, and hauing made an Image like vnto their Lord, they had all taken a solemne oath before it, That not any one of them should returne vnto his house, vntill the Earle were deliuered, and that whosoever should doe otherwise, should bee held for a traitor. Being thus resolved, they came into Nauarre, when as they had this happie encounter of the Earle D. Fernand, and the Countesse D. Sancha his spouse, whom they receiued with all the honour and signes of joy, that the place and their furniture would permit.

The king D. Garcia Sanches being aduertised of his sisters flight, and the Earles deliuerie, was wonderfully incensed; he leuied an armie, and entred into the territories of Castille, whereas the Earle came to encounter him with a great power, and gaue him battaile, in the which the Nauarrois were defeated, and the king D. Garcia taken prisoner, being overthrowne with the blow of a lance, by the Earle himselfe, who had sought for him, and encountered him in the fight. So he was led to Burgos, and there remained thirteene moneths in safe keeping. Then at the entreatie of the Countesse D. Sancha he was set at libertie, and sent into his countrey honourably attended. Yet for all this, the quarrels betwixt Castille and Nauarre were not ended: for a while after, the Earle D. Fernand being gone to Leon,

the

A the king of Nauarre came againe with an armie, by the mountaines of Oca and Bureua, and ran as farre as Burgos, doing what he could to perswade the Countesse D. Sancha to goe away with him, but she would giue no care to him; wherefore he returned with a great bootie, hauing much spoyled the countrey. The Earle at his returne being informed of all which the king of Nauarre had attempted, complained first by embassages, and demanded reparation of damages which his subjects had endured, and hauing no reason done him, nor any good answer made, he tooke the course of armes, and led an armie into Nauarre, where he gaue battaile vnto his enemies on the plaines of Valpierre, neere to Nagera and Brion, where the Nauarrois were manie in number, and well appointed. Those of Castille were in great danger, yet the equitie of their quarrell gaue them force and courage, so as they remained victors, and the Earle had full satisfaction of the wrongs and injuries which the king of Nauarre had done him. Such were the occasions, progresse, and end of the quarrels, betwixt Nauarre and Castille, according to the Spanilh Chronicles, to the yeare of our Lord 934. After this, the countrey of Castille was in peace for a time, and the Earle D. Fernand had no other care, but to gouerne his subjects well, vnder good lawes, when as in Leon there was great trecherie practised against him, by the king D. Sancho, who was sorrie that the designes of Nauarre had not succeeded as he desired.

Another defeat
of Nauarrois.

An. 934.

This king made an Assembly of all the Earles and Noblemen, and appointed his Court in the citie of Leon, whither the Earle of Castille was also called: who although hee were sufficiently informed, whence all the wrongs came that were done him, and of the little good they wight him in that Court, yet could he find no meanes to excuse himselfe, and (which was worse) there were verie few of his friends. Being come to the gates of the citie, he might easily perceiue that he was not welcome, for that no man came to meet him, as they had done at other times; wherefore he entred into the citie like a priuate man, and of meane estate. Comming to kisse the kings hands, he was receiued with a frowning countenance, and sower speeches, telling him, that he detained the Earle-dome of Castille from him: Whereupon the Earle seeking to satisfie the king with good reasons, hee was not heard, but put in sure guard, and kept in the citie of Leon, in the year 936.

The Earle of Castille kept prisoner in Leon.

An. 936.

The newes of his restraint did much trouble all Castille, but especially the Countesse, whom the good and well affected knights of Castille sought by all meanes they could to comfort, promising all their meanes for the Earles deliuerie. This Ladie being of a noble courage, and confirmed by the loyaltie she found in his subjects, put her selfe presently vpon the way, being accompanied by the chiefe of the nobilitie of the countrey, and going by secret and vnknowne passages, shee came neere vnto the citie of Leon; where shee left her troupes in ambush, and taking the habit of a pilgrime, pretending to goe and visit the sepulchre of S. Jaques, shee entred into the citie, being accompanied onely with two men. The king being presently aduertised of the Countesses arriuall, he came vnto her, and desirous to doe her honour, being his aunt, he suffered her to see her husband who was prisoner, and to remaine that night with him, and commaunded for her sake, that they should take off his yrons, wherewith he was bound. These two louers passed that little time which was allowed them to be together, in comforting one another, and in praying vnto God; and hauing concluded betwixt themselves what was to be done, this vertuous Princeesse D. Sancha gaue an example to all her sex, of what power conjugall loue is in a generous heart: for the attyred her husband so handsomely in her pilgrimes weed, as the keepers of the prison being deceiued therewith, let him goe, thinking it had beene shee. The Countesse in the meane time remained prisoner: so as before they could discouer the fraud, D. Fernand had meanes to get out of the towne, and to come vnto his knights, which lay in ambush, by whom hee was conducted into his countrey. This fact of the Countesse being reported vnto the king, he was so farre from blaming her, as admiring the force of so holie a loue, he deliuered her, honoured her, and sent her home to her husband, with a traine fit for her calling, although he were verie sorrie that the Earle had so escaped.

A rare example of conjugall
loue.

Vertue is re-uenced euen of enemies.

T ij

The

The king D. Sancho was still a debtor to the Earle of Castille, not only for the price of his horse and hawk, but also for the multiplication thereof, the day of payment being long before expired: wherefore the Earle sent to demand his money of the king: and hauing neither payment, nor good wordes, he began to spoyle the territories of Leon: whereupon the king commaunded his Treasurers to verifie this debt, and to seeke for meanes to discharge it. The summe was so often doubled and multiplied, from day to day, after the terme prefixed; as they reported vnto the king, That all the wealth of the kingdome of Leon would not be sufficient to pay that which was due vnto the Earle of Castille: wherefore after manie consultations and messages sent on either part, the king D. Sancho and the Earle D. Fernand fell to an agreement, That the king to be freed of this excessive summe of money, did remit vnto the Earle D. Fernand the lands and feignories of Castille, to enjoy them absolutely, without any reseruatiō of fealtie, homage, nor vassallage to the Crowne of Leon, but freely and as Soueraignes, he, and his in perpetuities, whereof letters were passed in the yeare 939. This was the meanes, as the Historie of Spaine report, of the Soueraigntie of Castille, and separation thereof from the realme of Leon and Oniedo, the which countrey from an Earledome became a royaltie, and in the end the mightiest of all that Continent, as we see it in our time. The Earle D. Fernand did at that time hold in the Prouince of Rioje, the lands of Cerezo and Granon, and by many letters of donation graunted by him to the Churches and Couents of his countrey, he is intituled Lord of Alaua: whereby we must note, that the countrey of Alaua was in his time of a larger circuit then it is now: for the kings of Nauarre held much of it, and did also tearme themselves Lords: so did the Moores, disperfed ouer all Spaine, and holding great Scigniories, townes, and forts there, vnder their king Abderramen, being resident at Cordoua.

Castille exempt from all sub-ditiō by a subtil
bargaine.
An. 939.

Moores.

This Arabian king, for his last exploit of warre, had sent an armie of Moores into the territories of Leon, which layed siege before the citie, from whence notwithstanding they were forced to retyre, by the vertue and good gouernment of those that were within it, as well fouldiors as citizens. Soone after this king died, the which, according vnto some, was about the yeare nine hundred thirtie nine, and of the Arabians raigned three hundred twentie two, hauing raigned fiftie yeares in Spaine. Hee was a louer of learning, so as in his time, Philosophie, Phisicke, and all other Arts, did flourish at Cordoua.

Hali Hatan
9 Soueraigne
King of the Moores in Spaine.

Leon.
Sedition in Galicia.

11 Hali Hatan his sonne succeeded him, to whom king D. Sancho sent a great embassage, to treat a peace betwixt the two kingdomes, whereof D. Velasco, Bishop of Leon, was the chiefe, who had charge to demand the bodie of the infant Pelagius, slaine by king Abderramen, to make a relicke thereof.

During this time, there arose a great tumult and sedition in Gallicia, vpon certaine priuate mens quarrells, who slew one another cruelly, without any respect vnto the king nor iustice: Wherefore the king D. Sancho was forced to lead an armie thither, with the which he did punish some of the mutines, and did force some of the rest to leaue the countrey. They passed the riuer of Duero, and yet retyred into a countrey which did belong vnto the iurisdiction of Leon, in that quarter, the which was gouerned by an Earle, or Gouernor, called D. Gonsales, vnder the king D. Sancho. This bad vassale, in stead of supporting the kings iustice against these mutines, tooke armes in their fauour, and was so rash as to oppose himselfe against the kings forces, which pursued them into his gouernment: but remembering his owne follie in time, he had recourse to the kings clemencie, who pardoned him, making him onely to confesse his fault, and to take a new oath of fealtie: yet this trecherous and ingratfull wretch, smothering in his breast the venome of treason, within few dayes after poysoned his king and naturall Prince with an apple which he gaue him. The king, who distrust nothing, did presently bite of M it, but his heart being suddainly infected with the poyson, he began to shake, and to shew other signes that he was stricken with death: wherefore he made hast to returne to Leon, but he died vpon the way, in the twelfth yeare of his raigne, and of our redemption 941, and lyes at S. Sauours in Leon. He had by his wife D. Theresa one sonne, called D. Ramir,

Notable disloyal-tie.

A D. Ramir, who succeeded him in the realme of Leon. They find it written, That a little before his death there were great flames of fire seene rise out of the Ocean, the which being carried vp into Spaine, burnt a great countrey, and manie villages, as farre as Zamora.

In the meane time the Earle of Vrgel gouerned in Barcelone and Cattelogne, as tutor to his nephewes, sonnes vnto the Earle D. Mir, the last deceased, being vnder age, whereof the eldest, to whom the Earledome belonged, was called D. Sancho, as his tutor was. Of this Earle of Vrgel issued two sonnes, D. Borel, who was the first Earle of Barcelone, and D. Armingand Bishop of Vrgel, who was reputed a Saint. The State of B Barcelone and Cattelogne was gouerned by him in qualitie of tutor, for the space of twentie yeares.

The religion of Spaine in those times was wholly reduced to the seeking out of Martyrs bones, and other relickes. The building of Monasteries, gifts, and foundations, were held most meritorious, as well for the liuing as for the dead. The inuocation of Saints deceased, whose victories, peace, and other prosperities, well knowne to the world, were then in credit. Most of the Bishops and Pastors were either verie prophane, or exceeding superstitious and ignorant.

Religion in Spaine in those times.

In the raigne of D. Ramir, Ordogno the third, and Sancho the first, there had bene Bishops of Compostella, after Sisenand the fourth, Gundesin, who was much vnlike vnto his predecessor in holiness of life, whose health was obtained by the prayers which his mother (a verie deuout woman) made continually (as the Spaniards say) before S. Iaques Sepulchre, which the Angelicall voices (heard at the Bishops decease) did witnesse; after whom, Hermigild was chosen, a verie prophane man: then came Sisenand, as bad as the other.
You may coniecture, that the other Bishopricks were no better furnished then that of Compostella. These kings made foundations, and gaue infinite priuiledges to Abbots and other Clergie men, for the redemption of their soules, and of their predecessors, as their letters aboue mentioned containe.

The Bishops of Spaine in those dayes.

D. Garcia Sanchez, king of Nauarre, did also confirme the vow of S. Emylian in his country, by letters dated in the yeare nine hundred thirtie foure. The Bishops did the D like for their parts. Galinde Bishop of Pampelone, for the great deuotion which he had vnto the Couent of S. Sauour of Leyra (where sometimes had bene the Episcopall seat of Pampelone) gaue vnto the Abbot and religious of that place all the titles of the Archpre-biterie of the valley of Onfella, by an Instrument dated nine hundred thirtie eight. The king D. Garcia, and D. Theresa his wife, gaue Villar de la Tour, neere vnto Nagera, with all the territorie and iurisdiction, to the same Monasterie, in the yeare nine hundred fortie three. Moreouer, by other letters, dated in the yeare nine hundred fortie foure, D. Garcia, and the Queene his wife, and D. Galinde the Bishop, (who is there called by the King, his lord and master) confirme the donation of part of the titles belonging to the Bishop, of the places aboue mentioned: And besides, there is another donation made of all that the king E of Nauarre should conquer from the Moores, Infidels, and Barbarians.

D. Ramir, the third of that name, and twentieth

King of Leon.

12 IN the yeare nine hundred fortie one, D. Ramir was setled king at Leon: at whose comming the Norman pyrats did much annoy the coast of Gallicia. This king being verie young, he was gouerned by the Queene D. Theresa his mother, and by D. Eluira, F sister to the deceased king his father, being a religious woman. The peace which had bene treated with Hali Hatan, was confirmed by the mediation of the Bishop D. Velasco, who was at Cordoua, at the death of D. Sancho, and had brought with him the bodie of the infant Pelagius, the which was layed in a Monasterie built to that end by the deceased king.

Monasterie of
S. Pelagius.

T iij

The

The Normanes which came into Galicia, being led by a captaine called Gundred, spoyled all along the sea shore; and entring into the maine land, they burnt townes, villages, and castles, spoyling and putting all to the sword they encountered, holding as it werethe possession of Galicia for the space of two whole yeares, the which the king D. Ramir had no meanes to resist, by reason of his nonage: yet in the end he was perswaded to send some troupes of souldiours, vnder the commaund of an Earle called D. Gonfalo Sanchez, who watched his opportunitie so well, as he defeated the Normanes, slew their captaine Gundred, and burnt their shippes. D. Sisenand second Bishop of Compostella, had bene slaine by these pyrates: he was a turbulent man, and an vnworthie Prelate, of whom Histories report, that for his vices, prodigalitie, and lewd life, the king D. Sancho the fat had caused him to be put in prison; in whose place Rodofinde was chosen, a holie man and of good fame, a Monke of the Order of S. Benet: but after the death of D. Sancho, Sisenand being gotten out of prison, he came with force to enter his Bishopricke, being resolu'd to kill Rodofinde: the which he had effected, if this holie man had not willingly quit the place, returning to his Monasterie, where he ended the rest of his dayes. Afterwards, Sisenand pursuing the Normanes, being more fit to commaund souldiours then to gouerne the Church of Christ, hee was slaine with an arrow neere vnto Fomellos. Such were the Bishops for the most part in those times. The Estate of Leon was by this meanes peaceable, both within it selfe, and in regard of enemies abroad, hauing peace with the Moores.

King Hali Hatan being loth that the beginning of his raigne should passe without some famous exploit, being also sollicit for D. Bela of Nagera, a knight of Alaua, who (as we haue said) had bene expelled by D. Fernand, Earle of Castille, and was rettyred to the Moores Court at Cordoua, hee raysed a mightie armie, the which hee sent to ruine the Earle of Castille (against whom he had a spleene, for the former warres) and tooke from him Sepuluedas, S. Estienne of Gormas, and other places, about the yeare 942, the which the Earle of Castille could not suddainely preuent, whereat he was so much discontented, as within few dayes after he died in Burgos, to the great griefe of all the people of Castille, and was interred in the Monasterie of Arlanfa, which he founded. There is some reason to doubt of the yeare of his death, for that there is found in the Instruments and Titles of donation made by him, to the Monasterie of S. Emylian, of the towne of Saint Marie de Pezuegos, dated in the yeare 944; to the Church of S. Martin of Granon, the yeare 945; of certaine houses in the towne of Salines; of the Church of S. Stephen of Sabredo, dated 947, to the same Monasterie: of the Church of S. John Baptist of Ciguri, vpon the riuer of Tiron, the which runnes into the riuer Ebro, neere vnto the towne of Haro: where it is expressly said, that the Earle D. Fernand and D. Sancho his wife make this donation to the Abbot and religious of the said Monasterie, and to their successors, for the loue of the glorious Confessor S. Emylian, that at the dreadfull day of judgement they might deferue to heare that comfortable voice of the Lord, Come ye blessed of my father, &c. In these letters D. Ferdinand did intitle himselfe Earle of Castille, of Alaua, and of Nagera.

There are registers and memorials found also in the Monasterie of S. Emylian, making mention of the Earle D. Fernand and of D. Vrraca his first wife, of the yeare 964, the which without doubt is false and counterfeit, as in truth there is no great certaintie in any thing which the Monkes produce of their priuiledges, donations, exemptions, and other graunts of auncient kings. It is to be scene vpon the tombe of D. Sancho, Countesse of Castille, in the great Chappell of S. Peter of Arlanfa, that she died that yeare 964: and in the Era 1002, to Count Fernand Gonfals succeeded his third sonne D. Garcia Fernandes, the first of that name in the Earledome of Castille, and other places aboue mentioned, in the yeare, according to the common opinion, 942.

13 The Moores being masters of the field in Castille, there being no forces together to withstand them, being puffed vp with successe, they entred the territories of Leon, breaking the peace which they had with the king D. Ramir, without any subiect, and came and besieged the towne of Zamora, the which they tooke, and ruined. Vntill that time, which was about the yeare 950, the Christians dwelling vnder the gouernment of the Arabian Moores, whom

Sisenand bishop of Compostella, was slaine
by them.

Castille.

An. 942.

Donations, pri-uiledges, and other titles of Monasteries
vnder sainte.

Moores.

Zamora taken
and ruined.
An. 950.

whom they called for that respect Musarabes, had remained in great tranquillitie and peace, without forcing them in their religion in any sort whatsoeuer: Moreouer, they had iustly administred, paying the pensions and tributes which were imposed vpon them, whereby they were assured from all violence. But Hali Hatan being come to the Crowne, he was so zealous in his religion, and conceived so great a hatred against that of the Christians, as he published an edict, by the which all Christians dwelling vnder his iurisdiction, were commanded to abiure the religion of Iesus Christ, and causing themselves to be circumcised, to imbrace that of Mahomet, vpon paine of death. Then did the spirit of God quicken in the hearts of many, the fire which had bene smothered by the humane traditions; and instructing them inwardly (seeing that ordinarie meanes failed, or were corrupted) made it appeare vnto the world, that the true religion hath no better meanes of propagation, than persecution: for loue and charitie surmount nature, making the dull quick-witted, causing them which were in a manner dumbe to speake, and giuing force and courage to the simple and weak. Many Christians of all sexes and ages, did virtuously confesse the saluation we haue in Iesus Christ, by his onely merit and satisfaction, before the Inquisitors and Iudges, which were sent by this barbarous king. The names of which holie martyrs are worthe of memorie, to be a president to all the faithfull; but we haue too few of them. In the citie of Cordoua there were put to death, for the testimonie of Christs truth, Aurelius, Gregorius, and Felix, with their wiues, Natalia, Crescencia, and Liliofa. In the territorie of Rioje, Vitor, borne at Cerezo (who had long defended his fellow citizens from the violence of the Moores) was beheaded. At Bosca, neere to Nagera, Nunilla and Alloaia, two holy sisters, suffered death: Yet by the letters and priuiledges of the kings of Nauarre, giuen to S. Saniour in Leyre (where they say they were buried) it seemes their death was long before this persecution. In Arragon, in the towne of Iaca, the holie virgine Eurosa suffered: and many others in diuers parts of Spaine, where the Moores commaunded. Thus were the Christians afflicted both in peace and warre, by armes, and by vniust proceedings.

The Authors of the Spanish Historie make no mention, that the king D. Ramir had any great care to suppress the insolencie of these Arabian Infidels, nor to be reuenged for their breach of peace, and the ruine and euerion of such a towne as Zamora was: but they onely say, That about the yeare 955, being of full age, he married with a ladie called D. Vrraca, by whom it is not found that he had any children: and abandoning himselfe to a voluptuous life, he contemned all good counsell: so as the earles and noblemen of Galicia, seeing his follie, and discontented with his vices, they scorned him, and would no more acknowledge him for their king. Whereupon they did chuse D. Bermund, sonne to the last king D. Ordogno, and intituled him King of Galicia: which title and countrey he enioyed ten yeares, notwithstanding all the attempts of D. Ramir, who made warre there two whole yeares, with great losse of his best men.

D. Garcia Fernandes new Earle of Castille, resisted the Moores valiantly, and being also inuited by the basenesse of king D. Ramir, and it may be by the remembrance of the injuries done by the king D. Sancho to the Earle D. Ramir, and the wrongs done by him also vnto the Earle D. Fernand his father, he entred the territories of Leon, and withdrew some places from him, so as falling to an accord, the riuer of Carrion was made the bounds betwixt the Estates of Leon and Castille. They hold, That this earle D. Garcia Fernandes, did build in Curuas Rubias, the monasterie of S. Cosme and Damian, and indowed it with great priuiledges, lands and possessions: retaining such a right of patronage, That if any gentlewoman of his familie should want meanes to marie them according to their estates, or would liue vnmarrid, they should be provided for, and entertained: leauing to the religious which serue in the monasterie, a competent pension to nourish them. This earle did augment the number of horsemen in Castille to six hundred, which at his fathers death were but two hundred. He married twice to French ladies, but vnfortunatly: his first wife was called D. Argentina, daughter to a French earle, with whom hee fell in loue, when as in the compaignie of her father and mother, hee past through Castille, in pilgrimage to S. Iaques of Compostella, and demanded her of her father: but she proued vnchaste, abandoning her selfe to a French knight, who came from S. Iaques, and carried her away into France, the earle being sicke in bed, six yeares after their marriage. The Spaniards report, That being cured, and much incensed at the

A cruell edict
made by Hali Hatan against the Christians
his subiects.

Martyrs under
the Moores.

The vices of princes causes
offension.

Galicia made
a kingdom.

Castille.

Basenesse of king Ramir occasion of new tumults.

A marriage for loue vnfortunat

the wrong this knight had done him, he went out of Castille, and left the gouernement of his countries to Gilperez of Bauardillo, and Fernand Peres, two of his vassalls; and went into France in a disguised habit, where as this knight dwelt, and enjoyed D. Argentina: where he wrought in such sort, as he woon the fauour of his daughter, called D. Sancha, or according vnto some, D. Ogna, with whom he laid a plot (vpon promise that he should take her to wife) That one night he should giue him entrance into her fathers house to reuenge his wrongs: Where as the earle slue those two adulterers in their bed, and so returned into Castille, carrying with him D. Sancha, or Ogna, his new spouse, whom he married in the citie of Bourgos. The name of this second wife is diuersly set downe by Spanish writers; some call her Sancha, others Ogna: the inscriptions of S. Peter of Arlanca, name her Abba. D. Garcia Fernandes the earle, had one sonne by her, called D. Garcia Roldanis, who died young, as it appeares by the inscriptions of the said monasterie. Moreouer, he had another sonne, called D. Sancha Garcia, who was earle. In the inscriptions of Saint Peter of Cardegná (where he was buried with her husband) it is said, that she was neece to the Emperour Henrie: and is in all places called Abba, or Ogna. Besides these two sonnes, shee had one daughter called D. Praca, who was profest in the monasterie of S. Cosme and Damian, about Arlanca. During the time the earle was in France to seeke meane to be reuenged, and to get his new wife, the Moores entred into Castille, and spoiled all the countrey euen vnto Bourgos: and they write, That in the way they forced the monasterie of Saint Peter of Cardegná, and slue the Abbot and three hundred Monkes; some Authors write but two hundred, and that the destruction of this monasterie was some yeare before. But this place was reedified by the earle D. Garcia Fernandes, and enriched with rents and jewels more then before. This happened during the time that D. Ramir king of Leon made warre against his rebellious subjects in Galicia.

Generall of Castille.

A great slaughter of Monkes made by the Moores.

Moores.
Anno 956.

Moores drawne into Galicia by the faction of a Bishop.

14 About the yeare 956 died that cruell enemie of the Christian Religion, Hali Hatan, king of the Arabians at Cordoua, the sixteenth yeare of his raigne, and 339 of the Arabians: to whom succeeded Hizen his sonne, the second of that name, called by others Izica. The forces of this king of the Moores, were drawne into Galicia, by the factions of a Bishop of Compostella, who had bene depofed for his vices. The zeale of their ambition was such, as they made no conscience to expose Christians to the crueltie of Arabian Mahumetists. It is written in the Spanish Histories, that D. Bermond raigning in Galicia, by an accord made with D. Ramir king of Leon, and making his ordinarie residence in the towne of S. Iaques, there came to the Episcopall dignitie of that place, D. Pelagius, Bishop of Lugo, sonne to Cont Roderigo Velasques: who shewing himselfe a prophane man, and disposing of Ecclesiasticall dignities to vnworthie men, deserued to be expelled, by the king D. Bermond, who advanced in his place a Monke of Saint Benoist, called D. Pedro of Monforio, of a reasonable good life. Cont Roderigo and his followers being incensed at this disgrace done vnto his sonne, called the Moores into Galicia, to be reuenged of the king D. Bermond. King Hizen was verie young at the decess of his father Hali Hatan; wherefore a nobleman among the Moores, valiant, and verie famous, called Mahomad Ibne, Aben Hamur, and by surname Alhabib Almanfor, tooke vpon him the gouernement of the realme of Cordoua, and of all Spaine vnder the Moores iurisdiction, the which he held fise and twentie yeares: and they report, that during his life, they entred two and fiftie times into the Christians countrey; and that he was of such credit among the Moores, as all was done by his aduice and counsell, Hizen hauing nothing but the bare name. Considering the name and surname of this great captaine, it is to be presumed he had bene sent out of Affricke, by Manfor, Miralumin of Maroc, then raigning, to gouerne Spaine during the minoritie of the king of Cordoua: for Alhabib Almanfor, is interpreted, Captaine, or protector and defender of his king Manfor: Almanfor signifies victorious. The proper name of the Miralumin was Baharabo. The Moores in Spaine drew great succours from Affricke, in manner of a Croisadoe, and vnder the title of religion. The first passage of the Moores into the Christians countrey, in the raigne of this king, was in the yeare 963, at the instance of Roderigo Velasques, into Galicia, where he committed infinit spoyle, and ruined part of S. Iaques church. But the plague being in his campe, he was forced to retire, and could not wholly ruine the countrey, as he had intended.

The

A The king D. Bermond, and the noblemen of Galicia, after the Moores retreat, repaired the spoyle which they had made, as well as they could. In the meane time the king D. Ramir died without children, in the yeare 965: so as the kingdome of Leon came to the king D. Bermond. D. Ramir was interred at Destriana, a monasterie of a royall foundation, and a long time after transported to Astorga. S. Iaques church being repaired, and newly consecrated, D. Pedro of Monforio, the Bishop, died; and in his place D. Pelagius Diaz was chosen, a lewd man, and a contemner of all religion; wherefore he was iustly expelled, and Pimare his brother advanced in his stead, who for his vices deserued by a iust judgement of God, to be drowned in the riuer of Minio. There was another substituted to him of as bad a life, the which was put in prison by the king D. Bermond. Thus was the church of S. Iaques still furnished with bad Pastors.

Prophane Bishop
at Compostella.

D. Bermond, second of that name, 21 King of Leon, called the Goutie.

15 On Bermond, or Veremond, or Bermund, sonne to king D. Ordono the third, vnited the two realms of Leon and Galicia, being receiued after the death of D. Ramir, without any difficultie. Anno 965.

C In the beginning of his raigne, or thereabouts, Alcorrex was famous: hee was the first Moore (of whom any mention is made) that was called King of Seuille, since the Monarchie of the Arabians in Spaine: who spoiled all that part of Galicia which now belongs to Portugal, and lyes betwixt the riuers of Duero and Minio; and passing on he wasted all the countrey vnto S. Iaques, the which he sacked, and ruined. His armie was infected with the plague, as that of Almanfor, or Mahomad Ibne, Aben Hamur, had bene; who returned into the territories of Leon, and that knight of Alaua, aboue mentioned, marching with him, accompanied with a band of Christians his friends and partisans, he defeated the king D. Bermond in battell, at the riuer of Eftolle, beyond Duero, and besieged the citie of Leon, from whence he was forced to raise his siege, by reason of the waters and Winter. In the Spring he returned to this siege, into the which the king had put an earle, called Don Guillen Gonfales, gouernour of Galicia, who did his best indeuor to defend it: for being sicke in his bed, he caused himselfe to be carried in a litter, to the place where as the Moores made their greatest attempt, and defended it three dayes: but in the end, not able to resist so great a power, the towne was taken, D. Guillen, and many other braue men, were slaine, and the sacke giuen to the souldiers. D. Bermond had bene careful to retire the bodies of kings his predecessors, and especially the reliques and other jewels of the temple, the which he caused to be transported to Ouiedo. This calamitie happened in the yeare 968, the which fell also vpon Astorga, Valence de Campo, Sahagun, Gordon, Albe, Lune, and other townes which were ruined. Then the Moores entring Castille, they tooke and sacked the townes of Osma, Berlanga, Atienza, and other places, whereof some were ruined and some made tributarie. And with this successe they returned with their victorious armie to Cordoua, with great spoyle, and (which was most lamentable) a great number of poore Christian slaues of all sexes and ages: and to increase their miseries; and to aggravate their guilt, they were for the most part so carelesse of God and all religion, as they betrayed their brethren and companions vnto the Moores, without respect of blood, countrey, profession, or honour.

Leon the capital
citie of the Christians, taken
by the Arabians

Disfession of Christians gives an entrie to the Infidels.

Castille.

F In Castille there was a knight called D. Ruy Velasques, lord of Villaren, whose sister D. Sancha was married to D. Gonfal Iuste, sonne to that Iuste Gonfales who was issued from a daughter of D. Diego Porcellos, and who enjoyed the Seignories of Salas and of Lara. D. Gonfal Iuste, and D. Sancha his wife, had seuen sonnes, whom they commonly called the children of Lara, or of Salas, bred up in all vertue, by a discrete knight, called Nugna Salido, who was valiant and hardie; all which were made knights in one day, by the earle D. Garcia Fernandes, vnto whom they were allied: It happened, that D. Ruy de Velasques, their vnckle by the mothers side, married a ladie borne in Bureua, the chiefe towne of which countrey is Birbieca: her name was D. Lambra, allied also to the earle D. Garcia Fernandes: he was young, indiscreet, proud, and high minded. Whose marriage was celebrated with great pompe in the citie of Burgos, whi-

Disposition of a woman inclined to revenge.

A notable treason and impietie of a Christian knight, against his owne blood
and religion.

A Mahometist
more courteous
to a stranger, than D. Roy de Velasques a Christian, to his own blood.

The lamentable death of the seuen brethren of Lara.

Humanitie of king Hizen to his prisoner.

whither came many knights from Castille, Leon, Nauarre, and other places, and among others, D. Gonfal Iuste, and his wife D. Sancho, with their seuen sonnes assited. During the solemnitie of this marriage, which continued five weekes, the younger brother of the seuen had some vnkind speeches with D. Aluaro Sanchez, cousin to D. Lambra the Bride, who were for that time reconciled by the meanes of the earle D. Garcia, and of D. Gonfal Iuste, father to one of the contendants. But the new married wife was so incensed for this breach with her cousin, as she conceiued a deadly hatred against all the house of Lara. The marriage being ended, D. Sancho went with her seuen sonnes, to accompanie the married couple to their house at Barbaddillo, whereas D. Lambra espying one day the younger brother (which had the quarrell with her cousin) in an orchard, bathing a Goshawke, she commaunded a grooms to call a filthie Cucumber at him, to doe him a despight: wherewith the knight, and his brethren, who were present, being moued, they pursued this grooms in such a rage, as thinking to saue himselfe by the fauour of his ladie, he was slaine nere vnto her, who could not saue him.

At the same time neither D. Ruy Velasques, nor D. Gonfals Iuste, were with their wiues, for they did accompanie the earle D. Garcia, who presently after this marriage, went to visit his countrey, and the sorts of Castille: but when as they were returned to Barbaddillo, they vnderstood (to their great griefe) of this outrage. Euerie one retires to his own house; D. Lambra mad with rage & impatiencie, wept, & exclaimed continually, saying vnto her husband, That if he did not revenge this affront done vnto her selfe, she should neuer liue contented. And such was the importunitie of this woman to her indiscreet & ill aduised husband, as, to satisfie her, he resolved to commit an act, vnworthie not onely of a Christian knight, but of any one that carried but the shape of a man: For he had secret intelligence with Almanzor, Constable of Cordoua, vtterly to ruine this familie of Lara. Making shew therefore to haue some businesse of importance with this Moore, and his king Hizen, he intreated his brother in law D. Gonfals Iuste, to goe to Cordoua, with letters which he gaue him; whereunto he offered himselfe willingly. In the meane time the traitor Velasques had written to Hizen and Almanzor, That they should put him to death; & moreover, that if he sent any one with a good troupe into Castille, he would deliuer the seuen sonnes vnto him, which were the most redoubred knights, and the greatest enemies to the Arabians, that the earle of Castille had in his Court. D. Gonfals Iuste being arriued at Cordoua, and hauing presented his letters vnto the king, he was presently put in prison: for the king being wise, although an Infidell, would not altogether countenance so great a treason. Wherefore he kept this embassadour aliuie; yet he sent presently towards the countrey of Almenar (where these brethren should be deliuered vnto him) a capitaine with a great troupe of souldiers, where (as they write) D. Ruy de Velasques gaue such order, as the seuen brethren fell into an ambush of Moores, being accompanied onely with two hundred horse, which made resistance: but the enemies were so many, as one of the brethren called Fernand Gonfals, and all the two hundred, with Nugno Salido, were slaine vpon the place: the other six escaped, and hauing drawne together three hundred horse more, and returned to the combat, they were againe defeated, and taken by the Moores, who cut off their heads, and sent them all to Cordoua, as well those of the seuen brethren, as that of their Gouverneur Nugno Salido.

The king was verie glad to see himselfe freed from such redoubred enemies; and to assist the father, who was prisoner, he caused these heads to be shewed vnto him: who knew them, and was so opprest with griefe, as he fell downe dead vpon the place. Being taken vp, and reuiuied, he made such pitifull lamentations, as euen the barbarous king himselfe was much moued, and thought euen then to set him at libertie, detesting the wickednesse of that traitorous Christian D. Ruy de Velasques.

They say, That whilst D. Gonfals Iuste was detained in prison, but not verie straitly, being often visited by noblemen and ladies, that were Moores, there grew so great familiaritie betwixt him & one of the chief ladies of the kings house, which, some say, was his sister, as he got her with child: which perceiuing, about the time of his deliuerie, they tooke good order for the infant, when it should be borne. It was a sonne, whom they called Mudarra Gonfals, who reuenged the treason of D. Ruy Velasques, committed against his father and brethren. D. Gonfals Iuste returned to Salas, with gifts from the Moorish king. As for the bodies of the dead, they were interred, but no man knowes where; for there is some question about it, betwixt the the Monkes of S. Peter of Arlanza, and those of S. Emilian of Cogolla, the which we cannot deside, either of them maintaining to haue in their churches and conuents, the tombes of these seuen brethren, their father, and Gouverneur, without any great prooffe of their assertions, as in other things. Such was the disposition and affection of men of that age, who called themselves Christians. They hold, that these things happened in the year 969; some say it was some yeares before. But euerie one to reuenge his priuate quarels, did hazard the publick: and not able to oppresse their enemies by open force, they vsed vnlawfull and damnable meanes, to wrong one another, making way for the Moores, or rather inuited them, to inuade the Christians countrey.

In the year 975 a great armie of Moores, both Spaniards and Affricanes, led by that famous capitaine Alhabib Almanzor, inuaded the countrey betwixt Duero and Minio; and from thence into Galicia: so as the rowne and church of S. Iaques was taken by them, sacked and ruined. Yet the Spaniards say, That the Apostles sepulchre could not be violated, being certified with a great light which came out of it: but they onely tooke the little bells in the steeple, and carried them away with the rest of the prey to Cordoua, where they made them serue for lampes to their great Mosque. In the meane time (as Authors write) the Moores armie was so afflicted with the plague, and bloudie flux, as being forced to disperse themselves, they were cut in peeces by D. Bermonds troups, which he had sent to follow them in their retreat: So God by his power did supplie the defects of indiscreet and cowardly Christian Princes.

The king D. Bermond, as the Spanish Histories write, was wise, but withall had great defects. He was light of beleefe, and soone incensed; and withall, so much giuen to his delights and pleasures, as he had both bodie and mind corrupted. He did incestuously entertaine two sisters for his concubines, before he married; by the one of which he had a sonne called D. Ordognos; by the other a daughter named D. Eluira. After which he married D. Velasquita, whom he put away, after that he had had a daughter by her, called D. Christina. To his second wife he married a ladie called D. Eluira, by whom he had D. Alphonso, who was king after him, and one daughter called D. Theresa, who was profest a Nunne, and was borne before her brother D. Alphonso. He became full of the gout, by reason of his excesse, so as he was lame of his limmes, and therefore was called the Goutie.

Velasques corrupt both mind
and bodie.

D. Sancho Garces, third of that name, and eleuenth King of Nauarre.

There is no great certaintie of the exploits of the kings of Nauarre in these times, either through the negligence of Historians, or the losse of their writings. They coniecture, that the king D. Sancho Garces liued vnto the year 969; and that he was interred in the monasterie of S. Saniour of Leyre: to whom succceeded his sonne D. Sancho Garces; whom he had by D. Theresa, by whom he had also D. Ramir his second sonne, who gouerned the prouince called Vicaria. He had daughters, D. Vrraca, Ermesilda, and Eximena. The king had to wife a ladie called D. Vrraca Fernandes, by whom he had three sonnes, D. Garcia, D. Gonfals, and D. Ramir.

This king D. Sancho Garces, the third of that name, raigning; the king D. Bermond seeing the great miseries which fell daily vpon the Christians, by reason of their diuisions, whereof the Infidell Moores made their profit, he sought by all meanes possible to make a good vnion betwixt Leon, Nauarre, and Castille: the which tooke good effect, for all the Princes and Lords of these Estates, shewing themselves readie, and desirous to be reuenged of the wrong which the Moores had done in Galicia, Castille, and elsewhere, they vnited their forces, and came to encounter the Moores, with a goodly armie (theirs being not lesse) at a place called Calacanafor, an Arabian word, which signifies yoake: where there was a memorable battell, and great effusion of blood, especially of the Moores: and yet the fight hauing continued a whole day, the victorie seemed doubtfull. But Alhabib the Arabian hauing gathered his forces together, and viewed his great losse, he dislodged in the night, with so great griefe, as he died within few dayes after, at a place called Begalcoraxo, or Borgecorex. The Christians at the

Battell memorable at Calacanafor.

breake of day, seeing their enemies dislodged, sacked their campe; and by the conduct of G of D. Garcia Fernandes, earle of Castille, who was the chiefe Commander in this warre (for the king D. Bernard, although he caused himselfe to be carried in the armie, was vnable, by reason of his gout) pursued the Moores, whereof they made a great slaughter, putting all the rest to flight in great confusion. This Alhabib the Arabian, was without doubt a great soldier; and, they say, that for griefe of this losse he would neither eat nor drinke, and so aduanced his owne death. The Moores carried him to Medina-Celi, then called Zelim, where they buried him. He left one sonne, called Abdemiclic Abundafin, who had accompanied him in all his warres, and was in like manner a braue and valiant knight; who had the same charge of Capitaine generall, as his father: and being desirous to reuenge this losse, led an armie the same year towards Leon, the which he ruined, euen to the verie foundations. D. Garcia Fernandes, earle of Castille, gathered together all the forces he could in Leon and Castille, fought with him, and put him to rout: so as after that time the Moores came into the dominions of Christian Princes with more respect. After which things, the two Princes restored the noblemen, gentlemen, and others, to their possessions and rights which belonged vnto them, and sought to giue euery man contentment, in regard of priuat quarels, that by these occasions the Mahumetists might not attempt against their Estates. These spoyles which the Moores had made in the countries of Leon and Castille, were the cause of a great dearth, the land being vnto peopled both of men and cattell, so as it lay wast: And withall there was a great drought, the wrath of God hauing shut vp heauen for many dayes, without sending any raigne in that region. And for that in those dayes they held no crime so capital, as to lay hands vpon Clergie men, the Spaniards did beleue, that these calamities had fallen vpon them, besides the warres, for that the king D. Bernard had caused D. Gudesteo, Archbishop of Ouedo, to be put in prison, or giuen him in gard to D. Ximeno, Bishop of Astorga, vpon some slanderous accusations, wherewith this Prelate was charged, and too lightly beleueed by the king, who was much subiect to that vice of credulitie. And thereupon they say, That God had reuealed to certaine religious men, that he was resolved to send the plague for a third scourge, by reason of the vnjust imprisonment of this Bishop. Whereof the king D. Bernard being aduertised, he was verie sorrowfull for his offence, and repenting, demanded pardon. Wherefore vpon the Bishops deliuerie the wrath of God was appeased, and it began to raine. From that time the king gaue himselfe to all workes of pietie, and did, as well as he could, repara the ruines which had bene made by the Moores throughout his kingdome; especially of the church of Saint Jaques. He gaue many gifts, and did almes deeds, yet with the aduice of the Prelates of those times. As for iustice, he had alwayes a care thereof; and, as they say, restored the auncient lawes of the kings of Gothes, and the decrees of the Church, commanding that iustice should be done to euery one throughout his realme accordingly. His death, according to the common opinion, was in the year 982, at a place called Berizo, otherwise the good towne of Beresto; where he was interred, and three and twentie yeares after taken vp, to be laid in the church of Saint Iohn Baptist at Leon. Among his children we haue made mention of one daughter, D. Christina; she was married to a nobleman, or Prince of the bloud L royall, called D. Ordogno, who was blind; by whom she had three sonnes, D. Alphonso, D. Ordogno, D. Pelagius; and one daughter, D. Aldonsa. This Aldonsa married D. Pelagius the Deacon, sonne to the Infanta D. Fruela, bastard to Fruela the second king of Leon: of which marriage issued D. Pedro Ordognes, D. Pelagius, D. Nugno, and D. Theresa, who was ladie of Carrion, where she caused the church of Saint Pelaio, or Pelagius, to be built.

In Cattelogne the State was quiet, during the minority of the earle D. Seniofrid, vnder the gouernement of the earle of Vrgel, of the same name: from which earle issued D. Borel and D. Armingol, or Ermengaud, Bishop of Vrgel, reputed a Saint. His regencie continued two and twentie yeares, which ended in the year 950. When as hee resigned the gouernement of the Estate to his nephew, the earle D. Seniofrid, who was married to D. Maria, Infanta of Nauarre, daughter to D. Sancho Abarca, by whom hee had not any children; and dying about the year 967, he left for his successor his cousin D. Borel, sonne to the earle of Vrgel, for that his brother D. Oliban was vnfit to gouerne such an Estate, by reason of many imperfections; besides that of his speech, as the Spaniards write: Yet this D. Oliban did rise in Armes against his cousen, and was the cause of great diuisions and factions in the country:

Death of Alhabib Almanfor.

Anno 982.

Genealogie of Leon.

Barcelone.

A trey: by reason whereof the Arabians watching still their opportunitie to annoy the Christians, entred the territories of Barcelone, where they committed infinit spoyles. This D. Lo- rel remained earle in the end, and is numbred the fourth proprietarie of Cattelogne. He had one sonne, called D. Raymond Borel, who was borne in the year 970, of the countesse Leo- on, his first wife, and was earle after him. To his second wife he married Amperude, and degarde, his first wife, and was earle after him. To his second wife he married Amperude, and by her had D. Ermengaud, or Armingol, who was earle of Vrgel, and one daughter, named Borella, or, as some say, Engelrade, who was profest a Nunne. He defended his countrey valiantly against the incursions and furie of the Arabians, but with no great successe. He cauted forts to be made where need required, to stop their incursions, and assure his countrey.
D. Oliban, his cousen, resigned his interest, for that he would not fauour the Infidels by a ciuile warre, and giue them meanes to inuade Cattelogne, contenting himselfe with a pri-uate life. He was father to D. Bernard, surnamed Brisefer, or Breake-yrone, who was earle of Besalu, of D. Geoffrey earle of Cerdagne, and of a third sonne, called D. Oliban, who was Bishop of Vic d'Olana, and had bene Abbot of Ripol, a monasterie reedified in the year 976, by the earle D. Borel: In the which year the Nunnnes of Monserat were transported to the Monasterie of Mon-luby, nere vnto the castle of the Port, built by the same earle;
and in Monserat were placed the Monkes of Saint Benost: to which place the earle
D. Borel gaue great lands and possessions, which he bought from priuate men. D. Oliban his cousen, was also founder of the monasterie of Saint Benost de Bages, in the Baronie of Pinos. About the year 979, D. Garcia Fernandes gaue the towne and church of Ezguerra to Saint Michael de Pedroso; and a little before, D. Sancho, king of Nauarre, had gi-uen to the house of Saint Emilian, for the health (as he said) of his soule, the place of Villar de Monte; and to the Monasterie of Saint Sauitor de Leyre, the towne of Arpados, and other spoyles of his sonne D. Ramir, who died before him. These Princes sought to win Paradise by their workes.

Genealogie of Cattelogne.

Foundations of monasteries by the Princes of Spaine, in those times.

D. Alphonso, fift of that name, and 22

King of Leon.

D

18 A fter king D. Bernard, D. Alphonso his sonne did inherite, being the fift of that Leon.
name, and two and twentieth in order of the kings of Leon, in the year 982, be- Anno 982.
ing onely foureteeen yeares old. His father had giuen him, to breed vp, to the earle of Gal-licia, called D. Melendo Gonsales, and to his wife D. Maïor, whose daughter, D. Eluira, he married, when he came to age: of whom descended D. Bernard, who succeeded his father in the realme of Leon, and D. Sancho promised after the decess of the king D. Alphonso, vnto D. Garcia, earle of Castille; but he dying, she was wife to D. Fernand the Great, the first which carried that title of king of Castille, sonne to D. Sancho the elder, king of Nauarre. In the time of this king D. Alphonso, Zephirus, Bishop of Astorga liued, who writ some Histories of Spaine.

We haue heretofore made mention of the loues of Gonsal Iuste, being prisoner at Cor-dona, with a Princeesse, a Moore; the which proceeded so farre, as when he was set at li-berie by king Hizen, she was with child, and was brought in bed of a sonne, named Mu- darra Gonsales. Those that haue written the Histories of Spaine, say, That he was nourished and instructed in the citie of Cordoua, by the diligence of his mother (whom they make sister to king Hizen) in all things befitting a Prince; so as hee was much beloued by the king his vnle, by whom he was armed a knight, at the age of tenne yeares, and became valiant and redoubted, as much as any of his time.

F

When he came to yeares to iudge of honour, his mother told him who was his father, and by what meanes shee had bene familiar with him; and especially the death of his seuen brethren of Lara, by the treason of D. Ruys Pelagius, and the damnable appetite of reuenge of D. Lambra his wife. Wherefore this young nobleman, had a wonderfull desire to see and know D. Gonsal Iuste, his father. Hauing therefore not onely obtained leaue, but also an honourable

V

nourable traine of noblemen and knights from the king, he came to Salas, where the father and the sonne had meanes to know and aduow one another, to their great joy and content: and soone after Mudarra, hauing left the law of Mahomet, was baptizd, and made a Christian. Then he came in companie with his father to Burgos, to kisse the hands of the earle D. Garcia, and to watch an opportunitie to kill his vncl D. Ruiz Velasques, and to reuenge the death of his seuen brethren, the which he did execute in time, as D. Ruiz went from Burgos to his house of Barbadillo: and finally, hee found meanes to get D. Lambra into his power, whom he caused to be hungvp, and then burnt her bodie: but it was after the death of D. Garcia, earle of Castille, to whom shee was allied. And for that he was verie like to the youngest of the seuen sonnes of D. Sancho his mother in law, H shee did loue him as deere as if she had beene his owne mother.

O'f offences p-misled.

Posteritie of Mudarra Gonsales, from whence are descended the Ma-
riques of Lara.

Rebellio of the son against the father.

Defeat of the Castilians, and death of their earle.

An. 990.

A disonest desire of a counsell of Castille,
and her impatie
against her son.

Custom to make the women drinke first in Spaine.

The Monkes of Saint Peter of Arlanfa shewa tombe in their church, without any inscription, the which, they say, is the tombe of that knight D. Mudarra: of whom they make this Genealogie, or descent; which is, That he had one sonne, named D. Ordogno de Lara, from whom issued D. Diego Ordogno de Lara, who did fight a combat at Zamora, against D. Arias Gonzales: from D. Diego Ordogno descended D. Pedro de Lara, and from him the earle D. Almaric of Lara, whom others call Malrique, or Manrique, who was lord of Molina des Comtes: and from him, they say, are descended, the Manriques of Lara in Castille. This earle D. Almaric, or Manrique de Lara, had one daughter, called D. Malfada Manrique, who was the first queene of Portugal, wife to D. Alphonso Henrie, king of Portugal, of whom we will speake hereafter.

About the yeare 982, whenas king D. Alphonso came to the Crowne of Leon, there were great alterations in Castille; for that D. Sancho Garcia, sonne and heire to the earle D. Garcia Fernandes, rebelled against his father, and put Castille into factions. Whereupon the Moores failed not to enter the countrey of Castille, destroyed the citie of Auila, tooke Saint Estienne de Gormas, and Crugna in the bishopricke of Osma, lue, spoiled, and burnt all where they past.

D. Garcia Fernandes being gone to field with those souldiers of Castille whom hee thought to be best affected vnto him, being but few, in comparison of the Moores, hee did hazard a battell; in which fighting valiantly, hee was eniured by a multitude of his enemies, where his men were cut in peeces, and hee himselfe taken aliue by the Moores, but so sore wounded, as he died within few houres after. His bodie was afterwards redeemed for a great summe of money, and buried in the monasterie of Saint Peter of Cardegna, reedified by him seuentene yeares before. This happened about the yeare nine hundred fourescore and ten, or according to the inscription of his tombe, nine hundred fourescore and fiue. Then D. Sancho his sonne, surnamed Garcia, was earle, without any contradiction; and, except this disodience against his father, he was a good Prince, and loued his subiects.

19. Whosoeuer was mother to D. Sancho, either Abba, Ogna, or Sancha daughter to the knight which was slaine by D. Garcia, or else allied to the Emperour Henrie, there is a tragicall act reported of her in the Histories of Spaine: That, being widow to her husband D. Garcia Fernandes, shee fell in loue with a Prince of the Moores, whom shee had heard was verie sufficient in Venus sports: so as shee had a secret treatie with him, to marie him; promising (to the end they might with more ease effect their designe) to make away her sonne, by poyson, vpon the first opportunitie: But God would haue this wickednesse discovered to the earle D. Sancho, the day before it should bee put in execution. Wherefore being verie carefull of all things, as the mother and the sonne dined together on the day appointed; the earle calling for drinke, they brought him a cup full of wine, mingled with poyson: Then dissembling what hee knew, he intreated his mother to drinke first, as if hee would doe her honour; but shee refusing it, hee still persisted, and in the end forced her to drinke this poyson, whereof shee died. The generall Chronicle sayes, That thereof grew a custome in Castille, to make the women drinke first, the which is obserued at this day in Biscaie, and other parts in Spaine, by way of ciuilitie.

This

A This accident was the cause which made the earle D. Sancho to build the conuent of Saint Santour of Ogna, where he placed Nunnes, and made a daughter of his, called D. Tygrida, Abbess; thinking thereby to expiate his offence, for that he had hastened his mothers death. Since there were Monks put in this monasterie, and the women were transported elsewhere, by the king D. Sancho the elder, sonne in law to this earle D. Sancho Garcia, and husband to D. Nuega: for the earle had by his wife D. Vrraca, one sonne, who was called D. Garcia, who was earle of Castille after him; and three daughters, D. Nuega, who was queene of Nauarre, D. Theresa, queene of Leon, wife to D. Bermond the third, and last of that name, these two sisters were elder than the Infant D. Garcia; and the third was the about named D. Tygrida, Abbess of this monasterie of S. Saviour.

Genealogie of
Castille.

Cateloigne.

Barcelone laid and ruined by
the Moores.

Earle of Barce-
lone slaine by the Moores.

Castille.

The exploits & conquies of Sancho, earle of Castille, vnto the
Moores.

20. Whilest these things past in Castille, the Moores entred Cattelogne with a great power, about the yeare 986, and gaue a great rout to the earle D. Borel, who thought to repulse them neere to Moncada and Matabous: After which they besieged Barcelona, and took it by force, with all the pitifull spectacles of crueltie, couetousnesse, and infamie, that are vied in the like case; doing the like in many other places. Then laden with spoyles, and drawing after them an infinit number of poore Christian slaues, they returned into their countrey. The earle, who was retired into the mountaines, hauing gathered together all the horse and foot he could, returned to Barcelona, tooke it againe, and recovered all the places which the Moores had taken. Cattelogne was againe invaded by the Moores which held Tortosa, Lerida, Fraga, and other places, being joynd with them of the Isle of Majorca, who once againe defeated the earle D. Borel: and thinking to saue himselfe with about threescore horse, he was pursued; and being forced to shut himselfe vp in the castle of Gautha, neere to Galdes, he was forced, and slaine there, with all those that were in his companie, in the yeare 993, hauing beene earle of Barcelona six and twentie yeares, where his sonne D. Raymond Borel succeeded him. We find, that Lothaire king of France (vnder the soueraigntie of which kingdome the earledome of Barcelona was at that time) granted a great priuiledge to the monasterie of S. Cucufat, in the vallies neere to Barcelona, given at Compiagne, in the yeare 987.

But returning to D. Sancho Garcia, earle of Castille, he being loath to leaue his fathers death vreuenged, confirmed the league which his predecessor had made with Leon and Nauarre, and in the yeare 992 entred into the Moores countrey, by the realme of Toledo, with a great armie, ruining and spoyling all where he past, as the enemies had done in Leon and Castille: passing on into diuers other iurisdiccions, where he had good opportunitie to ruine, burne, kill, and carrie away what he pleased, for that the Arabians were then full of factions for the soueraigntie. There was no head, order, nor councill, to oppose against the violence of this incensed earle, so as hee ranfomed many townes, and drew great summes of money from them, as well to spare their countrey, as to redeeme prisoners. He tooke the towne of Sepulueda, which was then a frontier for the Moores towards the strait of Sumosierra. Hee granted many priuiledges to the inhabitants thereof, restoring them to their ancient iurisdiccions. Hee recovered the townes of Pennasiel, Maderuelo, Montorio, Gormas, Osma, and Saint Esteua; which places had beene lost after the battell where his father D. Garcia was slaine. The earle did all these braue exploits against the Moores: but some hold, and not without reason, that they were before the death of the countesse his mother; who at the returne of this voyage (which was in the yeare 992) had newes what this about mentioned Prince of the Moores could doe with women: of whom she grew so far in loue, as she forgot all pietie, and honour, and in the end lost her life. His name is not written by any Author. If the earle did much annoy the Moores by open warre, hee did no lesse by secret practises, entertaining factions among them, to trouble their estate, and make them more easie to be spoiled.

21. There were great seditions among the Arabians after the death of Abdemic Abun-dafin, Captaine generall, or Constable to king Hixen: for hauing beene substituted in the place of his brother, called Abderramen, and shewing himselfe too seuer and proud in his commands, his place seeming also to be of too great authoritie, he was slaine by the souldiers: which bred great quarels and factions. D. Sancho, earle of Castille, and D. Alphonso, king

V ij

The declining
of the Moores Monarchie in Spaine, by their divisions.

king of Leon, sought by all meanes possible to entertaine these diuisions, sometimes fauouring one partie, sometimes another: so as from that time the Arabians power began greatly to decline in Spaine, as it had beene already dismembred in the East, by their discord and furious desire of raigne, the which we will hereafter relate in a more convenient place. The Estate of Miralumin Hizen was wonderfully troubled in those times, by many which desired either to raigne, or to haue the greatest charges in the kingdome of Cordoua, namely, the dignitie of Alhabib: among the which there was a Moore, called Zuleima, stronger than the rest, by the support and fauour hee had from D. Sancho, earle of Castille: He tooke and shut vp Hizen, after that he had raigned three and thirtie yeares, foure monethes, in the 379 yeare of the Arabians, and made himselfe king of Cordoua, in the yeare of our redemption 989. He was an African, or Barbarian, and was much fauoured from beyond the seas. In his raigne was the last rout giuen to the Cartellans, and their earle forced, and slaine, as we haue said. But he did not long enjoy this Estate of Cordoua; for another nobleman of great power, called Mahumad Almedhi, or Almohadi, of the linage of Aben Humeia, rose vp against him, and deprived him of his kingdome in Spaine, in the yeare of our Lord 993, which he had maintained foure yeares, with great toyle and difficultie.

Zuleima 11
king of the Moores at Cor-
doua.

Mahumad the third, the 12
king at Cordoua.

Abdalla king of Toledo.

In his time there raigned a Moore at Toledo, called Abdalla, who was solicited in such sort by D. Alphonso king of Leon, as they contracted together, and did sweare a perpetuall offensive and defensive league betwixt them: the which was so strongly confirmed, as D. Alphonso gaue his sister D. Theresa, a Christian, in marriage to Abdalla, an Infidell king, and sent her to him to Toledo, notwithstanding that she did contradict it all she could. They say, That this Moore being readie to consummate the marriage, he was admonished by the Ladie, that it was not lawfull to doe it, seeing they were of two diuers religions; and that for so prophane a contempt, he might assure himselfe God would punish him grieuously, if he refused to proceed. But notwithstanding all her allegations, the Moore would not forbear to accomplish his desire; but he was presently surprised with such a terrour and amazement, as if death had approached. Wherefore repenting himselfe, he sent backe D. Theresa to Leon, to the king her brother, with great store of treasure, and rich jewels, for that he would not touch her. This princeesse liued long in Leon, in the habit of a religious woman, and in the end put her selfe into the monasterie of Saint Pelagius, where she died, and was interred.

Marriage betwixt a Christian and an Infidell approved of God.

In the meane time Mahumad the third, or Mahumet, of the race of Aben Humeia, surnamed Almohadi, setled himselfe in the realme of Cordoua, and was Miralumin of the Arabians in Spaine; who shewed himselfe so cruell in the beginning, against the inhabitants of Cordoua, partisans to Zuleima his predecessor, of the linage of Aben Alameci, that many of them fled out of the citie, and liued in banishment. By reason of this diuision, many other noblemen, Moores, seised vpon places and prouinces in Spaine, of the iurisdiction of the Miralamins of Cordoua: as Abdalla did, who (as we haue said) had seised vpon the citie of Toledo, & restored the royall seat there, where he was the fourth king: since which time it continued a royaltie, and returned no more vnder the soueraigntie of the kings of Cordoua. In some Authors we find a tale of a Gentlewoman called Galiens, daughter to Galafrey, king of Toledo, who by her beautie drew Charlemaine out of France to Toledo, where he did fight with a knight called Bramante, that would haue married her: and, they say, that Charles being victor, he led faire Galiens into France. But there is no great probability, that this happened to Charlemaine. It may be that since there was a Galiens, daughter to some Gouernour of Toledo, called Galafrey, famous for some like act: For we find in the citie of Toledo, a place called Galiens Palace, where as now the Monasterie of S. Foy is; and in like manner at Bourdeaux in Guienne. Which shewes, that some ladie of fame came out of Spaine into France, but conducted by some other Charles than he that was king and Emperor, surnamed the Great Zuleima being expelled by Mahumet, fled from towne to towne, being accompanied by many Moors and Barbarians, who conspired against him, in fauour of a consen of his called Marwan, whom they would chuse for their captaine: but being ready to kill him, Zuleima being aduertised, and prepared, slue them which pretended to murder him: As for his coulen

Fable of *Ga-
liens*.

roan,

A roan, he saued his life, but he kept him in a strait prison. Being enuironed with so many miseries, chased from Cordoua, a vagabond, and not safe among his owne followers, he had recourse vnto D. Sancho, earle of Castille, crauing succours from him, to recouer his Estates. Wherewith the earle was verie well pleased, and led a great power of Christians into the Moores country; and with him D. Raymond, earle of Barcelone, as some write. Mahumet did also make great leues of souldiers, whereof the Alhabib, or Generall, was Albaharin Almaharin, who did reside at Medina Zelim, or Celi; and had commaundement to come and joyne with the armie, with all the forces he could make. Their forces being joyned of either side, there was a fierce and bloudie battell, betwixt Zuleima and Mahumet; whereas Zuleima (who had the forces of Castille with him) was victor, haining slaine five and thirtie thousand of his enemies vpon the place: and pursuing his victorie, he chased Mahumet, and those which remained, as farre as Cordoua. And whilst that Zuleimas men and the Christians were busie at the spoyle of the suburbs, the Alhabib Albaharin abandoned his king, and tooke his way to Medina Celi, with those that would follow him. It was then a great sort and rampart of the Moores Estate, against Castille, Arragon, and Nauarre. Mahumet seeing himselfe defeated, and abandoned, was so faint-hearted, as he shut himselfe vp into the fort of Cordoua, resolving to deliuer king Hizen, who was a prisoner there: chusing rather to see Hizen raigne than Zuleima. The people of Cordoua hearing speake of their true king Hizen, made so great an exclamation of joy, as Mahumet thinking himselfe lost, and fearing to die, fled and hid himselfe in a Moors house, who was borne at Toledo, and verie confident vnto him, with whom that night he fled to Toledo. Wherefore Zuleima entred into Cordoua, and raigned againe, Mahumet hauing beene king but one yeare, which was in the yeare of Christ 994, and of the Moores 377. A memorable date, for that this yeare the seuen Princes Electors in Germanie were instituted at the instance of the Emperour Otho, and Pope Gregorie the sixth.

Cruell warres
betwixt the Moores.

Anno 994.
Institution of the Princes Electors in Germanie.

King Zuleima being reestablished in Cordoua, he sent backe D. Sancho, earle of Castille, and his men, well satisfied, rewarding euerie one according to his degree. Yet he was not receiued, nor obeyed, throughout all the townes of his iurisdiction, but some maintained Hizens partie, who was prisoner at Cordoua. Mahumet Almohadi being come to Toledo, Abdalla raigned there, but not verie quietly in the beginning; but the hatred the Toledanes did beare to the kings of Cordoua, made his way the more easie. Neither of these two tyrants raigned long; for Albaharin the Alhabib, who liued at Medina Celi, hearing that Zuleima was much troubled to subdue the people of the iurisdiction of Cordoua, which were rebelled against him, he made a leue of souldiers, both Moores and Christians, and came to Mahumet Almohadi, at Toledo, who had beene newly made king of that citie; but the manner how is not specified in Histories. There hauing raised a great armie, they tooke their way to Cordoua, to deliuer king Hizen, who was prisoner. Whereof Zuleima being aduertised, he resolved to defend himselfe, calling all his friends and vassals together, whereof most of them excused themselves, shewing that they were naturally bound vnto king Hizen, for whose deliuerie they knew Mahumet had taken arms, with Albaharin, and some Christian captaines which were in their armie, whereof two are called Bermondo, and Argomento. Notwithstanding this refusal, Zuleima relying vpon the forces of Barbarie, who assured him that they would neuer forsake him, sallied out of Cordoua, and came and affronted the enemy, nine leagues from the citie, at a place called Hacantalbasar; where his first charge was so furious, as he put the foremost of the enemies squadrons to rout, and slue so many, as hee thought all had beene defeated, and Mahumet dead: but the Christians which were in Mahumets armie, rallied their disordered battell, and charged Zuleimas men with such violence, as they made them quit the field, with great slaughter of the Barbarian Africans. Zuleima saued himselfe with a small troupe in the fort of Casra. They write, that in this battell there died thirtie thousand Moors, and nine thousand Christians; among which were D. Arnoul, Bishop of Ausa, Etius Bishop of Barcelone, and Orbo of Girone, who carried armes for the Moores quarels: by the losse whereof Zuleima left the realme of Cordoua the second time, where hee had raigned a yeare. This was in the yeare 995. Hizen was restored to his royall Estate by the victors, the people

Battell betwixt
the Moores.

Hizen a prisoner restored to realme of Cor-
doua.

of Cordoua being affected to him, and did murine to haue him: and Mahumet was the more inclined to him, for that he was seled at Toledo. The victor prepared to besiege Casra, to expell Zuleima, and to spoyle the treasure that was within it: but foreseeing the danger, he dislodged, and carried away with him what he could.

The castle being abandoned, was taken by them of Cordoua, and that which remained spoiled, and the souldiers which were found in it, slaine: The bootie which was taken in this castle, was carried to the great Mosque at Cordoua, and there consecrated. This done, Albaharim the Alhabib, led the armie against some places in Andolousia, which continued in their rebellion since the former diuisions; he besieged Alnerie, which was defended by Afla, a Moore of a great house, and battered it twentie dayes: the which in the end was forced, and Afla, with some of his children, drowned. The like happened to the townes of Iaen, Bacsa, and Ariona, the which were kept for king Hizen. In this manner did the Moores make warre, being diuided into two factions, whereof the one held the partie of Hizen, and of the Moores in Spaine, and the other of the Barbarians, and Moores of Africk, of whom Zuleima was the chiefe in Spaine.

Mahumet Almohadi reigned at Toledo after Abdalla verie little; for the Historians make present mention of his sonne Obeidalla, sixt king of Toledo: against whom king Hizen seeing himselfe now settled in his kingdome, sent his lieutenant with a great armie, to reduce them of Toledo vnder his obedience: who made a sallie vpon them of Cordoua, where there was a cruell combate: but the end was shamefull for the Toledanes, who lost their king Obeidalla there, and many of their men. Yet were they not daunted, neither did they abate any thing of their rebellious contumacie against Hizen, and the Estate of Cordoua, whom they did hate extremely: For presently after their defeat, and the death of their king Obeidalla, they chose another of the same linage of Aben Humeya, called Haïram, the seuenth king in number, who left the Scepter of Toledo to his descendants, vntill it was conquered by the Christians. This past about the year 1008, when as king Hizen, thinking himselfe to be in more quiet and securitie then euer, he found himselfe plunged in greater troubles then before: for the Moores were so greedie of commaund, as those which had any authoritie or power, would make head against whom soeuer that would commaund them. The which was no wonder, for that in the citie of Cordoua, and the iurisdiction thereof, there were infinit families descending from kings of the Moores, issuing from the race of Aben Humeya: which grew by reason of their pluralitie of wiues, which their sect allowed; which was the cause of seditions and reuolts, for the desire of rule.

During these ciuile warres, the Cattelans and Barcelonians had bene in peace, and free from the Moores inuasions, and had rather sought to annoy them, or inuade them, either alone, or joyntly with the Castillans. D. Raymond Borel, the earle, who had succeeded his father, did burie, in a manner at the entrie of his principallitie, his cousin D. Oliban Cabrica, earle of Cerdagne and Belsu, at our Ladie of Ripon, in the year 994: whose Estates were diuided among his children D. Bernard Brisefer, and D. Geoffrey. This new earle had fortified Barcelona, and repaired all the spoiles which the Moores had made during the warre against D. Borel his father; joyning the Monasterie of Montjuhy to the walls of Barcelona, and called it S. Peter of the virgines, to gratifie D. Borella his sister, whom some call Engelrade, Abbess of that place. There is no mention made of him in Histories, but that he had one sonne called D. Berenger Borel, in the year 995, who succeeded him after his death.

D. Garcia, called the Trembling, fift of that name, and 12. King of Nauarre.

Nauarre. 23] IN the same yere of the deace of the earle D. Borel, which was 993, died (according to the common opinion of writers) D. Sancho the 3. sonne to D. Garcia Sanchez, king of Nauarre; but it is most vncertaine: for the computation of the liues and reignes of these first kings of Nauarre, Leon, and other Princes and Potentates of Spaine, is so diuers and confused in their writings, as no man can judge rightly of them. D. Sancho gaue for the

soules

A soules health of his sonne D. Ramir, to the Monasterie of S. Emylian, the towne of Cardegnas, with all the appurtenances. Afterwards D. Garcia his sonne, surnamed the trembling, succeeded him in the kingdome of Nauarre, and the Countie of Arragon. This surname was given him, for that when he entered the combate, he did tremble, not for feare, but by a natural custom: the which did afterwards turne into force and valour, being a little heat. In a certain priuiledge and donation made in the year 996, of the towne of Herreiro, granted by this king D. Garcia to the Monasterie of S. Emylian of Cogolla, mention is made of D. Sancho and D. Garcia his nephewes, who were sonnes to D. Ramir, his brother, whom they called king of Arragon: it may be it was onely in title; he died in the life time of D. Sancho their father, and by his death Gonsale their other brother is said also to haue reigned in Arragon with D. Ramir, Queene mother to these three Princes, and not the children of D. Ramir, the which is a stronger argument, that they were but titles. To which place of S. Emylian, this king D. Garcia and D. Ximena his wife make another donation of the water, which comes from the valley of Alanon, to water their fields and orchards one day and a night in the weekes; to which titles D. Ximena is alwaies set: for it was alwaies a custome of the Princes in Spaine, for honours sake, to name their mothers and wiues, in all letters of donation and priuiledges which they graunt; for they soule (say they) and that of their father, and they make this donation to S. Emylian, whom they call their Patron, as they had bene taught. Without doubt their deuotion in those times to S. Emylian had bene verie great, who was called on as an Aduocate and Patron by the Christians in Spaine, from Burgos vnto the Ocean: of the which there are two Monasteries, the one called the higher, the other the lower.

D. Garcia the trembling married D. Ximena, and yet there is great diuersitie among Authors touching the name of this Ladie, by whom he had D. Sancho, who was king after him. He recommended his education and bringing vp to D. Sancho, Abbot of Saint Saluator of Leyre, who was afterwards Bishop of Pampelone. The qualities of this king are little knowne, for want of auncient records, whereof they commend one, the which is questionable, whether it be a vertue or a vice, that he could neuer refuse any thing that was demanded of him: but they chiefly merit to be held liberall, when as they giue, with judgement, measurably to men of merit, otherwise they are reamed prodigall, ignorant, carelesse, and contempters of the chiefe point of their charge, which is, to distribute rewards and punishments equally. There is no mention made of his warres and enterprises. He reigned, as they esteeme, seuen yeares, and so he died in the thousand yere of our Saujour. His bodie, as some hold, was buried at S. Iohn de la Pegna; others say, at S. Saluator at Leyre, which place was more famous, and of greater authoritie.

Rewards and punishments maintaine all Estates.

D. Sancho, the fourth of that name, and thirteenth

King of Nauarre.

E 24] D. Sancho succeeded his father D. Garcia the trembling in his Estates, accounted the thirteenth king of Nauarre; a vertuous and valiant Prince, and famous for his great exploits; during whose raigne, the Historie, and especially the computation of times, begins to be more plaine and certaine, than in the time of his predecessors.

25] In the year 1001 of our redemption, and the 384 of the Arabians Empire, and 287 Moores. of their entrie into Spaine, Zuleima being abandoned by the Castillans, he had recourse to the king of Sarragosse and Carrace, with whose aid he recovered Cordoua, and made himselfe king againe, Hizen being fled into Africke; one of whose captaines, called Hali Hatan, holding Orichela, called Hali Governor of Ceuta, and caused him to passe with some forces into Spaine, in hope to raigne there. These two did besiege and take Cordoua, and Zuleima in it, whom Hali slue with his owne hands: but it was not long before Hali Hatan did rise againe Hali, whom he troubled much for the space of two yeares, and after some battailes won and lost on either side, he caused him to be secretly slaine in a bath, in the towne of Iauon, by some of his Eunuches, whom he had corrupted, in whose place, the noblemen and knights

Hali 13. king of Cordoua.

Confusion and ciuile warres among the Moores.

knights of the Moores which were at Iahen, chose his brother Cacín, who kept at Seuille, in the yeare 1003, and 386 of the Arabians raigne. Manie African Moores of Barbarie, (some sent for, some voluntaries, to seeke their aduentures) passed daily into Spaine, by reason of these conspiracies and ciuile dissensions; of which, Cacín the new king had manie which followed his partie, as his deceased brother had. Being come to Iahen, he caused a diligent search to be made for those trecherous Eunuches which had slaine the king, but they could find no more but two, whom he put to death, and then it behooded him to defend himselfe: for Hali Hatan seeing that he could not raigne, procured him great enemies, that is, Abderramen Almorada, of the blood royall of Aben Humeia, who gouerned in Murcia, sending messagers with all kinds of persuations, and other meanes, to induce the pettie Arabian kings, which held Sarragosse, Valence, Tortosa, and other townes and forts in Spaine, to joyne with him, to resist (said he) the Barbarian Moores which came to inuade Spaine: wherefore Abderramen was created King and Miralumin by them, but hee neuer held the chiefe towne of Cordoua. Having raysed an armie of all those of his faction, he besieged and tooke the towne of Iahen, cutting the Moores in peeces, which held it against him, and from thence went to other places, which hee seized on, and in a short time became Lord of a great countrey; the which Hali Hatan and another capitaine of his traine, called Almundar, Aben Alsie, did verie much enuie, and as they had helped to raise him to that height, so they sought all meanes possible to pull him downe, and not onely to deprive him of his estates, but also of his life, saying, That it was not reasonable any other than themselves should reape the fruits of their labours, and the conquests gotten with the price of their bloods. For the effecting whereof, they filled the kings Court and campe with quarrells and discontents, among the commanders and captaines, watching some fit opportunitie to execute their malicious designe. King Abderramen pursuing his good fortune, came to besiege Grenado, the which at that time was reasonably great, and well peopled, and commanded by a pettie king, a Moore, called Bedei, Aben Abus. There these two conspirators, Hali Hatan and Almundar (making shew to imploy themselves faithfully in any thing that might annoy the besieged) had secret conference with some Moores of the towne, and layed a plot, That they should make a sallie vpon Abderramens armie, the which they would saucour in such sort, as most of his best men and hee himselfe should either bee taken or slaine; and having instructed them where they should charge, and of the situation of the kings lodging (which was vpon the side of a hill, called Senesta, two leagues from Grenado) they held themselves readie, attending the alarme; the which being giuen verie hot, and at a fit time to strike terror, they joyned with the Grenadines, where they made a great slaughter of Abderramens men, he himselfe being in like manner slaine, and the rest of the armie disperfed and put to flight, abandoning their Engines of batterrie, and all their baggage, the which was spoyled, and carried into Grenado, with great joy. This treason was practised by these two captaines through enuie, together with a distrust of king Abderramens good successe; wherefore after this goodly exploit, they resolved to send part of the bootie, with manie heads of the chiefe of the Moores, slaine in this surpris, to king Cacín, in signe of triumph; the which was verie pleasing to this king, who was then at Cordoua, and making vse of this good fortune, he went to field, to reduce vnder his obedience manie townes and forts which had reuolted to king Abderramen, when as hee was aduanced to that dignitie; the which he did to manie; but he wanted force and time to finish it: for having raigned scarce three yeares, he died in the yeare 1007. The Moores of Barbarie, which had for a time followed the partie of the kings of Cordoua, were then in great authoritie in the citie, and therefore had the meanes and credit to chuse Haya, the sonne of Mahumet, for king: the which did much discontent the ancient Moores borne in the countrey, who sought some good opportunitie to be rid of these Berberuzes (as the Spaniards called them) by killing or chasing them out of the towne, to the end that the gouernment thereof might returne into their hands, as before. A fit occasion was offered: for the new king Haya, who before his election to be king was resident at Malaga, having a desire to haue that towne at his deuotion, for that it had not obeyed the precedent kings of Cordoua, since their troubles and feditions, Enuie and trecherie among the Arabians.

A tions, went forth of Cordoua, leading with him great troupes of souldiours, especially of that race of Moores which came out of Barbarie. Comming to Malaga, he was received without any contradiction: but whilest hee was busie there, the inhabitants of Cordoua, who had intelligence with Buz of Grenado, drew certaine troupes, which hee had sent, into their towne, being led by two of his captaines, Hayan and Mogid, by whose helpe they cut the throats of about a thousand African Moores, who were left for the gard of the citie. At this bruite, king *Haya*s lieutenant was so amazed, as he got out of the towne, with all the ministers of justice, and fled to Malaga, to carrie these troublesome newes to the king his master; who within few dayes was slaine by a Moore, called Ismael, hauing raigned onely three moneths and some dayes. Abderramen the fourth of that name was aduanced in his place: he was king but a moneth and seuentene dayes, and we doe not read, whither he died, or were expelled his kingdome. After him followed Mahumet, great Miralumin of Cordoua, who raigned not long, for that being rich in treasure, by his good husbandrie, before he came to be king, it was a cause to shorten his life; by the trecherie of his household seruants, who conspired to murder him for his treasure, wherefore they poysoned him, hauing held the kingdome a yeare and foure moneths: He died in the yeare one thousand and nine, and of the Arabians raigne three hundred ninetie two. He left this place to Hizen the third of that name, who liued long at Seuille, being desirous to raigne, the which he now obtained. In the meane time a Moore, who called himselfe king of Ceuta, passing the strait, came to Malaga, where he tooke the fort of the towne. He was called Esfariz, and brought with him a great number of the Moores of Africke: with whom Buz, who tearmed himselfe king of Grenado, joyned at Malaga, and called himselfe his vassall, doing him homage. Being thus fortified with the Moores of Spaine, he came to Carmona, the which he tooke: then passing on by Alcaladel Rio, he burnt the suburbs of Triana, and seized vpon Seuille. Many other tyrants did rise in diuers places, so as all Spaine, vnder the Moores jurisdiction, was full of seditions, and ciuill warres, and the estate of Cordoua was spoyled by him that could get it: but the kings of Toledo made their profit more than any other, who meddling not with other mens quarrells, kept themselves quiet, and assured with their owne limits. After the death of Obeidalla (as we haue said) Hayan raigned, of the lineage of Aben Humeia, who dying left the scepter to his sonne, called Hizen, who raigned in the time of this other Hizen, king of Cordoua, and was the eight king of Toledo.

King Hizen of Cordoua was of as small continuance as his late predecessors; for the Moores his subjects expelled him, in hatred of the robberies and extortions committed by his Alhabib, or Constable, who from a base place was aduanced to that dignitie: so having held the kingdome twentie moneths and some dayes, he gaue place to Almondar, follicie, in the yeare one thousand and eleuen. Almondar, who was of the lineage of Aben Humeia, put himselfe forward (being desirous to raigne) in this sedition and popular tumult, and hauing gathered some of his friends and kinsfolkes together, he came vnto the castle of the citie, entreating them to receiue him, seeing they would not haue king Hizen: Whereupon being aduertised by some one well affected, that he offered himselfe in an vnseasonable time, the people being in armes, and incensed against a king, wherefore hee should doe wisely to retire, and to keepe himselfe from murdering in this tumult: but being mad with ambition, he persisted in his demand, adding therunto, that he did not care, so as they created him king that day, if they slue him the next. Which words were so odious vnto all that heard them, as without any further delay, or giuing him that fading contentment to see himselfe king that day, they slew him vpon the place, presuming by the words which he had vttered, that he would be an vnprofitable and bad king: such was the reward of his furious desire to raigne. This being done, they did forbear to kill Hizen, and being resolved not to haue him for their king, they let him vnderstand, That if he would saue his life, he should quit the fort, and retire where he pleased: whereunto he obeyed, and retired himselfe, with some of his friends, into another strong house of his, joyning vnto the citie, of a contrarie humor to Almondar: but the Moores of Cordoua not thinking themselves secure, he being so nere them, and being resolved not to endure any more kings

The furious and vnrestrained ambition of Almondar.

Year 19 king at Cordoua.

Hali Cacin residing at Seuille.

Mahumet the 20. and last king at Cordoua.

kings of the linage of Aben Humeya, they besieged him in this house, tooke him, and imprisoned him in Cordoua, from whence he escaped, and fled to Sarragosse, where he liued in a priuate estate. Then a Moore of great power, called Joar of Algazur, seeing the citie without a king, embracing this occasion, with the helpe of his friends which did affect him, tooke vpon him the title and royall authoritie at Cordoua: but on the other side, one Hali Cacin, or Aben Cacin, residing at Seuille, a man of a great house, and mightie, seized vpon the towne of Seuille, where he did remaine with the Moores of his faction, and enjoyed the soueraigntie fiftene yeares; yet taking no other title vpon him, but as Iudge and Gouverneur; but he prepared the way for his successours to make it a royall feat. Joar reigned but two yeares, and Mahumet his sonne succeeded him, being the twentieth and last king of the Moores at Cordoua, and in whom the maiestie of the Miralmumins of Spaine (which had beene great) was extinct: from the which grew so many pettie kings, as there was scarce any good towne in Spaine but had a particular king, which made strict alliances among themselves for the preservation of their estates, and maintained themselves vntill the coming of the Almorauides, Moores, which came out of Africke, as we will shew. This king Mahumet, desiring rather to hold that little of the estate of Cordoua, which remained, than to seeke after that which was drawne away, enjoyed it in peace thirtene yeares; the which fell out, according to the common opinion, about the year 1027, and of the Arabians 415: So as the royall seat of the Miralmumins of Spaine (accounting from Abderramen the first, who did begin it) had continued in the citie of Cordoua 269 yeares. The Moores affaires in Spaine being in this confusion, the Christians neglected this fit opportunitie, to recouer all Spaine, and to root out the sect of Mahumet: but they had their infirmities in like manner. D. Sancho king of Nauarre made some attempts, but as it seemes ill pursued, being not mentioned in the Histories.

Leon.

An. 1006.

D. Alphonso 5 king of Leon, a lover of iustice.

D. Alphonso king of Leon, made an enterprize against them that gouerned in Lusitania, and besieged the towne of Viseo, but as he went inconsiderately about it, to view the place, being vnarmed, hee was shot with an arrow from the towne, whereof hee died soone after: this was in the year 1006, as the Spanish Histories report: But the letters and titles of Chapters and Couents say, he liued vnto the year 1028. A little before his death, he had receiued into his countrey the children of D. Bela of Nagera, a knight who as we haue said, had beene chased out of Castille, by the Earle D. Fernand Gonfalez: which were D. Roderigo, D. Diego, and D. Inigo Bela, who would neuer be reconciled vnto D. Sancho Earle of Castille, their Lord: wherefore hauing liued a wandering and vagabond life for a time among the Moores, and elsewhere, in the end they came into Leon, whereas the king D. Alphonso receiued them, honoured them, and gaue them lands and reuenues, in the quarter of Somocas. This Prince was carefull to administer iustice to his subjects; and therefore did reuiue and restore the ancient lawes of the Gothes, and did correct and moderate them with new decrees fit for the time, and all by the aduise of the generall estates, assembled at Ouedo, in the year 1003. He repaired the ruines of the Citie of Leon, and there built a Church to Saint Iohn Baptist, whither he caused the body of D. Bermond his father, and many others, to be brought, and there interred. In his time liued Athilan, Bishop of Leon, and Florian, a great Preacher in Galicia, both held for Saints in Spaine. They write, that Florian meaning to trie if his Sermons were pleasing to God, put burning coales into his mouth, and had no harme.

Nauarre.
D. Sancho Emperour of Spaine.

Genealogie of Nauarre.

As for D. Sancho fourth king of Nauarre, he was surnamed the Great, chiefly for his great dominions, and for his great exploits, both in peace and warre; by reason whereof he intituled himselfe king of Spaine, the which the Gothes with all their greatnesse and power durst not doe. He married D. Nugna, eldest daughter to D. Sancho Garcia, Earle of Castille; yet the Histories of Arragon call her otherwise, & say the king had a former wife, which was, D. Caya, Ladie of Ayuar, the which was rather a concubine, than a lawfull wife, of whom D. Ramir, first king of Arragon was borne. By this Ladie D. Nugna, he did inherit the Earldome of Castille, and by her had D. Garcia king of Nauarre, after him D. Fernand, first king of Castille, and D. Gonfalo king of Sobrarbre, and Ribagorfa. He was either in person, or sent to all the warres betwixt the Christians, and the Moores, whose estate was much shaken in his time, by reason of the diuisions of that mutinous nation; and this king was more fortunate abroad, than in his owne house.

The

The Histories which treat of his deedes, say, That being absent in some warre against the Moores, his sonne D. Garcia demanded a goodly horse of his mother, out of the kings stable, the which he loued aboue all the rest, and had straitly commanded his wife not to suffer any one to ride him: yet shee desiring to please her eldest sonne, graunted him; but being afterwards dissuaded by a knight, called, Pedro de Sese, or as some write Fernand of Ordognana, master of the kings horse, shee would haue auoided it, considering the charge the king had giuen her: whereat D. Garcia being too much incensed for a matter of no moment, began to imagine that there was some dishonest familiaritie betwixt this Master of the Horse and his mother; whither that he believed it, or did maliciously inuent it, forgetting God, and all filiall respect, he resolved to accuse them of adulterie: and hauing conferred this designe with his brother D. Fernand (who was of a better disposition) he would haue forced him to serue as a witness, or assistant in this wickednesse, the which he refused, and did often dissuade D. Garcia from so vile an enterprize, but it was in vaine. In the end D. Fernand's youth was vanquished by the importunitie, or rather feare of his elder brother, promising not to reueale the fraud and lye, which he had discouered vnto him. The king being returned to his castle of Nagera, this peruerse sonne D. Garcia failed not to accuse his mother: whereat the king was wonderfully amazed, for that he had neuer scene any cause to suspect his wife of any dishonestie, neither would he lightly belieue that which his sonne had said, but examining this businesse carefully, he sought by all means to discouer the truth: yet he caused the Queene to be put in prison in the castle of Nagera; then taking D. Fernand his second sonne apart, he examined him vpon this fact, who answered the king doubtfully, the which increased his suspicion more than before: wherefore the king called an assemblie of noblemen, and of his Council, to whom he propounded this pitifull case, demanding their aduice. They answered, that the Queene must purge her selfe by contrary proofes, according vnto the Lawes, or according to the custome which was then in vse, shee should finde a knight to defend her cause by armes, else she must suffer the punishment due to such an offence, which was to be burnt. The poore Ladie attending this sentence, made her continuall prayers vnto God, to make her innocencie knowne, who heard her prayers: for after some daies, no man daring to present himselfe to defend this princeesse honor, D. Ramir the kings bastard son offered himselfe to enter combat for the Queene; against any that would maintaine the accusation which was layed against her. As they prepared themselves to the combat, there was a religious man of good fame, and much respected in Nauarre, who doubting of this fraude, or otherwise aduertised by the prouidence of God, came vnto D. Garcia and D. Fernand the kings sons, whom he perswaded with such liuelie reasons, as they were toucht in conscience, and began to apprehend the foulness of their offence, to haue sought her death who was the cause of their being, against all truth, and for a matter of so small moment; wherefore casting themselves at this holy mans feet, they confessed their fault, demanding pardon of God, and intreating him to finde some means that this pursute might cease, the Queenes innocencie knowne, and that they might be restored to the kings fauour. The religious man hauing comforted them, went vnto the king, to whom he declared what he had done, and what he vnderstood from his sonnes, intreating him to pardon their offence, whom youth and choler had thus transported. The king being joyfull of the innocencie of his wife, deliuered her out of prison, and meaning that the fauour which they pretended to recouer, should depend wholly of their mother, he sent them vnto her: but she shewing her selfe a true mother, did forget the cause she had to dislike her ill aduised sonnes, and pardoning them with a motherlie affection, shee restored them to the kings fauour: In this action, D. Ramir shewed himselfe both vertuous and valiant, wherein hee purchased the more honour, by this circumstance, That hee being sonne of an other woman, would defend the reputation of his mother in law against her owne children: in recompence whereof, the king D. Sancho, assigning portions for his children in his life time, gaue after his death the Earldome of Arragon to D. Ramir with the title of king. By this diuision of portions made by the king D. Sancho, and D. Nugna, D. Fernand was also graced with a royall title, in the succession of Castille, which fell vnto her by the violent death of her brother D. Garcia, as we will shew: Nauarre remayning to D. Garcia the elder brother, and the ancient realme of Sobrarbre to D. Gonfalo; meaning

Notable treason of a sonne against his mother.

Queene of Nagera accused of Adulterie.

The vertue of D. Ramir the bastard condemning the lawfull children of Nauarre.

Queene of Nagera innocencie iustified.

Affection of a mother.

to honour all his children with the names and titles of Kings, which was the cause of great divisions among these brethren, which haply had ceased, if one of them had bene made foueraigne King over the rest, the which had maintained the Christians estate in Spaine better vnited, and of more force to repulse the Moores. The time of this action of adulterie is vncertaine.

Religious deeds of D. Sancho the great.

The king D. Sancho was a very deuout and religious Prince, after the manner of those times: for besides the confirmation of gifts which he and his wife gaue to S. Emylian, of the towne of Ventose (annexed to this place by D. Garcia his father and others) he made a vow, to giue vnto the Coucat of S. Saluator of Leyre, the tenth of bread and wine, and the herbage of such places as he should take from the Moores: and with this hope, in the year 1015, he raised an armie to inuade the Infidels by the frontier of Funes: at which place of Funes he gaue to the same Monastrie a field of Vines which he had of the inhabitants, for that he had slaine tenne Moores in the time of peace, for the which they ought a thousand solz, for a fine, which were so many crownes, or thereabouts. More, in Falles he gaue a possession, house, vine, and other apputenances: and in Nagera, the houses, vines, and fields of king Antrago, but what he was, we haue no certaine knowledge. These things he gaue to the Church of S. Saluator of Leyre. It is not knowne what was the successe of D. Sancho's warre against the Moores, but that by conjecture it was good, for that in that time there is a confirmation made by him, of nobilitie, and exemptions graunted by his predecessors to the inhabitants of Roncal. The zeale of this religious Prince was such, as he called a Councell at S. Saluator de Leyre, in the year 1022, but the chiefe decree was, a confirmation of priuiledges graunted to this Monastrie by his grandfather D. Sancho, and D. Vrraca his grandmother, and D. Garcia and D. Ximena his father and mother, which confirmation was signed by the king and all his children. The year after 1023, there was another Councell held in Pampelone, where the Bishoprick was transferred to S. Saluator of Leyre, where it continued some time. There enquire was made of the auncient limits of the iurisdiction of the Bishopricke of Pampelone. This was the subject of Councels in those dayes. Then was D. Sancho the elder (who had bene schoolemaster to the king) Bishop of Pampelone, and Abbot of S. Saluator, but he could not see this alteration, for that he died this year: but his successor carrying the same name, surnamed the younger, saw it in the year 1026, being the seventh Bishop of that Church, being vacertaine to what Archbishop it was then subject. In our time it is so that of Saragosse.

Councels in Nauarre.

An. 1023.

Castille.

An. 1028.

The auncient way from France to S.
Jaques.

This year 1026 was borne that great captaine, a Castilian, called Roderigo Dias of Biuar, who was afterwards called Cid Ruy Dias, the Camper, of whom mention shall be made. In the year 1028 they hold (and it is verified by titles and auncient records) That D. Sancho Garcia Earle of Castille died, hauing ruled nine and thirtie yeares, and was buried in the Monastrie of S. Saluator of Oña, founded by him. He was an vnfortunate Prince in his house, by reason of the miserable death of his mother; otherwise he was wise and valiant, and a great louer of his nobilitie, to whom he gaue great priuiledges and exemptions, yea, he dispensed with them from going to the warre without pay and entertainment, and that they should not be taxed for any imposition which should be leuied vpon the publike. And as he was verie deuout, after the manner of those times, he made manie reparations and orders, to make the wayes more easie for them that went in pilgrimage to S. Jaques of Compostella: for in the beginning, the ordinarie and most vsuall way was by the Prouinces of Guipuscoa and Biscaye to the mountaine cuntry, then to the Asturies of Sentillana, then to Ouiedo, from whence they entred into Galicia; and since the way being mountainous, although it were short, being left, by reason of the difficult and hard passages, they came from France by Nauarre into Alaua, and then through the Asturies; a longer, but a farre more easie voyage than the other: but the Earle D. Sancho caused a way to be made euen, from Nauarre by Rioje and Burea, to the citie of Burgos, the which is frequented at this day, to the great ease of such as make this voyage to S. Jaques. They call this the French way. This Earle gaue Quintanilla to the Monastrie of S. Emylian, and did many other works for the redemption of his soule, as appeares by the letters and titles of that age.

D. Ber-

D. Bermond, third of that name, 23.
King of Leon.

ON Bermond, sonne to D. Alphonso succeeded his father in the Realme of Leon, in the year 1028. being but a young Prince at his first entry to the Crown, he began to follow the religious steps of his father, causing churches, monasteries, & other buildings which had bene ruined by the Arabians in the former wars, to be repaired. And moreover, was very carefull to maintaine good orders among his subiects, and to do them iustice, punishing the disordered with great severity. An argument that he had good and vertuous men in his Court, and of his Councell, who honored both themselves and their Prince, in the due execution of their charges, and discharging of their consciences: so as it followed, that all the subjects governed themselves by their kings example: yea the Noblemen and Knights of his Court. The beginning of which reigne could not but be held most happie. Hee married with D. Theresa, second daughter to D. Sancho, last earle of Castile, by whom he had one son, called D. Alphonso by his grandfathers name, who died before his father.

Rem.

A religious king and lover
of iustice.

27 By the same treatie of marriage with the yongest daughter of Castile, after the decease of D. Sancho Earle of Castile, by the aduice of the country, there was a marriage propounded, betwixt D. Garcia successor to the sayd earle, and D. Sancho sister to the K. D. Bermond. Both parties being agreed, D. Garcia went to Leon, to consummate this marriage, being accompanied by D. Sancho k. of Nauarre his brother-in-law, who had married D. Nugna the eldest daughter of Castile. The Court being full of Noblemen and Ladies to honor this marriage, which should be performed with state; and the Earle D. Garcia hauing no other thoughts but to court his mistris; there came vnto him the 3 brethren of Bela about mentioned, who were banished out of Castile, & fled into Leon: D. Roderigo, D. Diego, and D. Inigo, who making a shew to desire the Earles fauor, came to kisse his hand, offering him all seruite & homage, as his naturall vassals, craving pardon for that was past: to whom D. Garcia being courteous, gaue good reception; and presuming they had nothing hidden in their hearts, but what their countenances shewed, and their tongues vttered, he assured himselfe of them, going without any guard, like a priuate man that had no quarrell: so as these traitours found oportunitie to murder him, in reuenge that the Earle his father had banished them out of Castile, and confiscated their goods: so the innocent suffered for the offendor, if we may call it an offence to do iustice vpon rebels. He that gaue him the first blow with his sword, was D. Ruy, or Roderigo his god-father. Such excesses did the Christians then commit. The murderers did then escape, but afterwards they fell into the hands of D. Sancho King of Nauarre, who tooke a worthy reuenge. There was great heauinesse in Court for this wretched murder: but D. Sancho lamented more than all the rest, to see her selfe a widow before she was a wife: who seeing her spouse interred at S. John Baptist in Leon, intreated them that they would burne her aliue with him. By the death of D. Garcia, the Earle dome of Castile fell to the k. of Nauarre D. Sancho, who had married D. Nugna the eldest sister of D. Garcia, and tooke peaceable possession thereof in the same year 1028.

D. Garcia k.
Earle of Castile

D. Garcia
Earle of Castile
murdered by the three brethren of Bela.

Castile united
to Nauarre.

28 After the death of D. Raymond Borel Earle of Barcelone, which was in the year, 1017. D. Berenger his son governed this principality, as proprietarie, vnder the Soueraignie of France, being the sixt in number, and was surnamed Borel, as his father: but of a contrary disposition to his father: for by his idleness, he gaue entry to all vices into his Court: war and all exercises of chivalrie were contemned by him, which bred him great troubles. We find that this Earle had three sonnes, the first called D. Raymond Berenger succeeded him: the second, D. Guillen or Guillaume Berenger, was Earle of Manrese, and the third sonne, Don Sancho Berenger Prior of the Monastrie of

Genealogie of Barcelone.
S. Be.

Saint Benoist of Bages: Who after the decease of D. Guillen the 2. brother, which died A without children, left his habit, and succeeded him in the Conty of Manrese, & died also without children. In the year 1020. D. Bernard Brisefer, cousin to the Earle Berenger, riding through Prouence, was drowned in the riuer of Roine: And for that hee was a braue Knight, the Moores hauing notice of his death, grew so hardie and courageous, as they did ouer-runne the countrey of Cattelogne, entring by Cerdagne: but they were repulsed and chased, by D. Geoffrey Earle of that place, brother to D. Berenger. This D. Geoffrey was founder of the Monasterie of Saint Martin of Canigo, and mention is made of fise sonnes issued from him. D. Raymond Geoffrey, who was Earle of Cerdagne and Befalu, after the father: D. Geoffrey Guinar, Archbishop of Narbon: D. Berenger Geoffrey, Bishop of Giron: D. Guillen Geoffrey, Bishop of Virgel: and the last D. Geoffrey, Earle of Bergada: Hauing sogoodly an issue, he dyed in the yere 1025. and was interred at Saint Martin of Canigo, which hee had built. His eldest sonne and heire in the Countie of Cerdagne, did little enioy it, for hee dyed two yeares after, leaving two sonnes, D. Guillen Raymond Earle, and D. Henry.

The Moores by another Inuasion into the territories of Cattelogne, ruined the Monasterie of Ripol; but by the care of D. Oliban, sonne to D. Oliban Cabrisa, they were repulsed, and the Monasterie repayed and fortified by him, in the yeare 1035. in which yeare the Earle D. Berenger Borel dyed, hauing gouerned fise and thirty yeares without any fyne, beeing scarce forty yeares old, and was buried at Ripol.

Nauarre and Castile.

After the death of D. Garcia Earle of Castile, and the perception of the succession by D. Sancho the Great, king of Nauarre, in the name of D. Nugna his wife, beeing C eldest sister to the deceased, the first woman which succeeded in Castile, there grew a warre betwixt him and D. Bermond king of Leon, who had married the Earles other sister, called D. Theresa: in the which the King of Leon lost the countrey which lyes from the riuer of Cea, vnto the auncient limits of Castile: but by the mediation of some Noblemen, and good Councillers, these two Princes were reconciled and concluded a peace, by the which there was a marriage contracted betwixt D. Fernand, second sonne to the king of Nauarre, and D. Sancho sister to the king D. Bermond, who had beene promised to D. Garcia, Earle of Castile. By this Treatie the lands which the King of Nauarre had taken from the King of Leon, should bee giuen to Fernand: and it was sayd, that the Earledome of Castile assigned to him, should haue the title of a D Kingdome, when hee should beginne to enioy it. Thus they were good friends, and maintained peace betwixt these two Estates of Leon and Castile, till after the death of the King D. Sancho the Great: Who about the yeare 1033. restored the towne of Palence, vpon an opinion which he had to haue beene miraculously cured, (hauing put his arme out of ioynt, striking at a wild Boare) in the ruines of this towne, which was sometimes destroyed by the Moores, and at a place where as Saint Antolins church had beene. To this place he restored the auncient Episcopall seate, and gaue great gifts vnto it. The Bishops of Palence, call themselves Earles of Pernia since that time. Hee gaue much to other Monasteries, as it was the custome of those times: and that for the deuotion hee had to the Reliques of Ouiedo, he went thither as a pilgrim, but he was slain E by the way, as we haue sayd, and was buried at Ouiedo, & afterwards transported to Ogna, in the yeare 1034. After his decease, his children tooke possession of the Realmes assigned vnto them by their father and mother: D. Garcia of Nauarre, D. Fernand of Castile, D. Gonçalo of Sobrarbre and Ribagorça, and D. Ramir of Arragon.

Death of D. Sancho king of Nauarre. An. 1034.

Thus a great Estate (by reason whereof D. Sancho had called himselfe Emperour of Spaine, and was surnamed the Great) was dismembred, to the great preiudice of Christendome. Beeing dead, his brother in lawe D. Bermond, would not obserue the conditions concluded by the Treatie of marriage betwixt his sister and D. Fernand the new King of Castile, seeking to take from him the Land which did confine vpon the Riuer of Cea, conquered and ouercome by D. Sancho the Great, the which he afterwards left vnto D. Fernand, and to his wife, his sister, in making of the marriage. F D. Fernand hearing that hee prepared and addressed himselfe to Armes, with an intent and resolution to annoy and trouble him, hee also, on the contrarie, put himselfe in defence

A defence, beeing supported by his brother D. Garcia King of Nauarre, with great troupes of souldiers, the which he ledde himselfe in person, to a place called Llantada. The two armies encountred neere to the Riuer of Carrion, where there was a furious battaile, with great slaughter of either side: But D. Bermond lost his life, beeing runne thorough with a Lance, by whose death (for that hee had no lawfull children) the succession of Leon and Ouiedo, fell to D. Fernand, husband to D. Sancho, sister to the deceased. This was in the yeare 1037.

D. Bermond king of Leon, beates the peace, is defeated and slain.

that the two Estates of Leon and Castile were ynted. D. Bermond was interred at Leon with his wife D. Theresa, who was dead before.

Prison of Leon and Castile.

The end of the seventh Booke.

X 2

THE

THE EIGHTH BOOKE of the Historie of Spaine.

The Contents.

- 1 D. Ferdinand, first king of Castile.
- 2 D. Raymond Berenger, 7. Earle of Barcelona.
- 3 D. Ramir, first king of Arragon.
- 4 D. Garcia, 14. king of Navarre, the sixth of that name.
- 5 D. Sancho, fift of that name, and fiftenth king of Navarre.
- 6 Division of the Estates of D. Fernand the first king of Castile, among his children, giving B Castile to D. Sancho, to D. Alphonso that of Leon, and to D. Garcia, Galicia, with the like title.
- 7 D. Sancho Ramires, king of Arragon, 2. and the inuasion of Navarre by him, wherefore he was numbred for the 16. king of Navarre, and the sixth of that name.
- 8 Estate of the Arabians in the East, their divisions and quarrels, from whence sprung 4. mightie Monarchies.
- 9 D. Alphonso the sixth, called the Brave, king of Castile, Leon, and Galicia, uniting these three Estates.
- 10 Exploits of Cid Ruis Diaz, a valiant Captaine of Castile.
- 11 D. Raymond, eighth Earle of Barcelona.
- 12 Vsurpations of the King of Castile, upon Navarre.
- 13 Conquest of the cittie and kingdome of Toledo, from the Moores. Re-establishment of the Archbishops seat and primacie of Spaine, and other things belonging to the dignitie of that Cittie.
- 14 D. Raymond Arnoul, ninth Earle of Barcelona.
- 15 The royall Seate restored to Cordoua, by Ali-Aben-Axa a Moore, who united all the Princes and Potentates of that Sect in Spaine, under the Empire of the Almorauides: his rebellion and death.
- 16 Passage of Ioseph Aben-Tefin, Miralmumin, or king of Maroc in Spaine: reduction of all the Moores of Spaine under one Empire.
- 17 Henry of Lorraine, or of Besançon, Earle of Linbourg, the Stemme of the royall family of Portugall.
- 18 Spaine furnished with French Prelates.
- 19 D. Pedro first of that name, 17. king of Navarre, and third of Arragon.
- 20 Ali-Aben-Tefin-Miralmumin, or king of the Arabiens Almorauides.

This eighth Booke contains the beginning of the Realmes of Castile and Arragon, erected by D. SANCHE 4. king of Nauarre, and the continuance of their Princes, and other Potentates of Spaine, as followeth:

LEON. Kings.

- 24 D. Fernand 1.
- D. Alphonso 6.

NAVARRRE. Kings.

- 14 D. Garcia 6.
- 15 D. Sancho 5.
- 16 D. Sancho Ramir 6.
- 17 D. Pedro the first 1.

CATTELOGNE. Kings.

- 7 D. Raymond Berenger.
- 8 D. Raymond.
- 9 D. Raymond Arnoul.

CASTILE. Kings.

- 1 The same 2.
- 2 D. Sancho 2.
- 3 The same 1.

ARRAGON. Kings.

- 1 D. Ramir the first 1.

The same 4.

The same 1.

PORTVGAL. Earles.

- 1 D. Henry of Lorraine, or of Besançon, first Earle under the Soueraignie of Leon.

D. Fer-

D. Fernand, 2. of that name, first king of Castile, and 24. of Leon.

D. Fernand had reigned 2. yeares in Castile, when as the quarrell grew betwixt him, and D. Bermond king of Leon, whereof followed the defeate of Llantada, and the death of the king D. Bermond: after which the two breethren, D. Garcia king of Nauarre, and D. Fernand of Castile, led their victorious armie before the city of Leon, where the remainders were that had escaped from the battaile. The Leonois would haue made some resistance against D. Fernand heire to the Crowne: but fearing they should not be able to hold out long, they receiued him: and beeing crowned in Saint Mary de la Regle, the Cathedral church of Leon, in the yeare 1037. he reigned in peace. Thus these two Estates of Leon and Castile were vnited, about an hundred yeares after they had bene diuided, in the time of D. Fernand Gonçales: and they came into the masculine line of the house of Nauarre, in D. Fernand, the second sonne, by the hereditarie right of women: that is, Castile by his mother D. Nuzga, and Leon, in the right of his wife D. Sancha, for want of heires males of the direct line in these two houses. Before he came to these great successions, during the life of the king D. Sancho his father, he had had by his wife D. Sancha, presumptiue heire of Leon, one daughter called D. Yrraca, then a sonne D. Sancho, and after him another daughter named D. Eluira, beeing King of Castile, she bare him D. Alphonso, in the yeare, 1035: and for the last of all their children D. Garcia: All which were well instructed and bred vp like kings children according to their sexe.

The first royall act which D. Fernand did, was to dispose of Iustice, fortifying by his authoritie the ancient lawes of the Goths, with some necessarie additions or reformations: he was much renowned, not onely for that respect, but also for his Religion, and valour in warre, whereof he shewed good prooffe against the Moores, who inuaded his dominions in the yeare 1038, by the frontiers of Galicia, and the countrey which is properly called Extremadura, the which lyes vpon the banks of Durio, whence it takes the name, not that which they thinke at this day lyes betwixt Tayo and Guadiana where the good woad grows. D. Fernand did not onely repulse them, but also pursued them vnto Merida and Badajos, then entering into the countrey, which is now called Portugall, hee tooke from them the townes of Cea, Gana, Viseo, Lamego, the castle of Saint Martin, Tarança, and in the end after a long and difficult sege, the city of Coimbra, where his armie was in great distresse for victuals; whereof they were releued (as the Spanish Histories say) by certaine religious men of that countrie, who had secretly gathered together (if it be credible) great store of victuals, wherewith they did furnish the campe. The Spanish Authors write, that the king D. Fernand had (at the taking of Viseo) gotten the Moore, which had slaine the king D. Alphonso his father in law, whose eyes he caused to be put out, and both his hands, and one of his feet to be cut off, wherein he rather shewed a base, then a generous disposition. In that war he layed the bounds of his countrey beyond the riuer of Mondego, which is in the midst of Portugall: and leauing for Gouvernour of Coimbra, (beeing the greatest towne in all the countrey) a Knight called D. Sisenand: hee returned into his countrey, and went to visit S. Iagues Sepulcher, offering part of the spoiles which hee had taken in the warre, as to the Patron and Protector of Spaine, according to the manner of the Religion in his time. After which he continued eight yeares without any warres against the Moores, who hauing dismembred their monarchie of Cordoua, which had so long maintained the name and glorie of the Arabians in Spaine, to the great ruine of the Christians, did now busie themselves to make pettie Royalties: whereof the most famous in those times were Seuille and Toledo; that of Seuille extended his Iurisdiccions vnto the countrey called Algarbe, beyond Guadiana, 1037.

Succession of the Estates of Castile and Leon by women.

Which is the countrey of Ex-tremadura.

Revenge worthy of royal mind.

X 3

2 Other

2 Other Moores neighbours to Catallogne, having entred the Contie of Barce- A lone, in the time of D. Berenger Borel, were stayed by his son and successor D. Raimond Berenger, whom they called the Elder, for that he had a sonne of the same name, who succeeded him. This Earle was of a small stature; but in this little bodie there lodged a great courage, vnlike therein vnto his father, hauing no delight but in action and arms. By his iudgement and valour, the Moores were dispossessed of the Castell of Manresa, of the Townes of Cerucra, Segarra, Tagarra, Verdun, Tous, Lacuença of Odena, and of many other places: and subiected some of the Moores vnto him, and made them Tributaries. With this Warlike vertue, he was wise for the well gouerning of a quiet estate, louing Iustice, beeing religious, honourable, and liberall to his Nobility, the dignitie of which Estate he did much augment. Hee was twice married: his first B wife, called Radalmurs, brought him two sonnes, the one called D. Pedro Raymond, who was much hated of his father, for some reasons which we will hereafter shew: The seconds name was D. Berenger Raymond, who slue his brother; and for that hee was exceeding proud, he lost his Estate. To his second wife he had D. Almedia, or Almadis, a wife Ladie and vertuous, by whome he had D. Raymond Berenger, who was Earle after him, surnamed (for that his haire was white and thicke) flaxen haire.

D. Ramir, first King of Arragon.

3. T He Arragonois their neighbours, began at that time to haue Kings, the coun- C trie hauing that title giuen it, in fauour of D. Ramir, a Bastard of Nauarre, in the yearre, 1304, the Countrey hauing continued with the title of an Earledome about 250. yearres, by which meanes it was diuided from Nauarre. This title of a King was confirmed to D. Ramir, by Pope Benedict the ninth, and the Armes of these first Kings of Arragon, weare a Crosse argent in a field azure. D. Ramir did soone after seaze (I know not by what right) of the Realme of Sobrarbre, and Ribagorça, by the death of D. Gonzalo his brother, who had beene made King by the will of D. Sancho their father, he beeing slaine passing the bridge of Montclus, by a household seruant of his, called Raymonet, and left no children. This succession did more rightly belong to D. Garcia, the lawfull sonne of D. Sancho, and brother by father and mother to D. Gonzalo. What D foeuer they say, that D. Ramir was a Prince indowed with great vertues, yet would hee haue dispossessed his brother D. Garcia, who was at Rome, of the kingdome of Nauarre, where their father died. For the effecting whereof, hee demaunded succours from the Moores, which held Tudella, Saragosse, and Huesca, and besieged the towne of Talla, but D. Garcia arriuing at that instant, had meanes to make D. Ramir to raise his siege with dishonour and losse. He had to wife D. Ermisenda, daughter to the Earle of Bigorre, by whom he had D. Sancho Ramires, who was King of Arragon after him, D. Garcia, Bishop of Iacca, D. Sancho Countesse of Tholoufa, D. Theresa Countesse of Prouence, wife to the Earle Guillen Bertrand, and one Bastard sonne, called D. Sancho, Lord of Ayuar and Xauierre. The time of this Kings Raigne, or the maner of his death, E whether it were in warre, or by sicknesse, is doubtfull amongst Authors, the common opinion is, that he died about the yearre 1063, being at the sege of the Castell of Grados, or Iraos, of a wound which he receiued, beeing in armes against the Moores of the Country: for that leauing the protection of Arragon, they had put themselues vnder that of Castille, and that he is interred at S. Iohn de la Pegna.

D. Garcia

D. Garcia Sanches 6. of that name, and 14.
King of Nauarre.

4. A S for D. Garcia heire of the Realme of Nauarre, he came to the crowne as his Nother brethren in the yeere 1034, the Queene D. Nugna his mother, yet lying: he was surnamed Sanches of Nagera, for that he was bred vp there, & made his ordinary residence there vntil hee died; and was buried there. The portions giuen by D. Sancho the Great, their father, were very preiudicial vnto him, for that as the elder, the fo- uerainty of all those Estates did belong vnto him, of all which D. Garcia had nothing but the crowne of Nauarre, the country which is from Bureua and Ogna, running from the country of Frias, conteyning seuen iurisdiccions, in ancient time called Castillia the old, and moreouer Alaua, Nagera and a part of Biscay. In the beginning D. Garcia was in reasonable good termes with his brother D. Fernand King of Castille, and did assist him as we haue sayd, in the warres he had against D. Bernand, to settle him in the Realme of Leon: but afterward there grew diuisions betwixt them, as also betwixt him and D. Ramir, so as during his life they were neuer reconciled. Hee was married whilest hee was Infant of Nauarre, to a French Lady called Estienne; of the house of Foix, as the Spaniards say, yet is it doubtfull, for there is no mention in those times of any Earles of Foix, it may bee shee was of the house of Carcaffone, or Beziers, from whence the Earles of Foix did afterwards descend. By this wife hee had four sonnes: D. Sancho Garcia, who was King after his father: D. Ramir Lord of Calorra, Torrefilla, de los Cameros, Riuafrasca, Lea, Villoria, Trebejan and others: D. Fernand the third Lord of Iubera, Lagienilla and other places; and D. Raymond the fourth Lord of Murillo, Agon and Agoncillo, and foure daughters, D. Ermisenda or Ermisenda, who was Lady of Villa Mediana and Matres: D. Ximena Lady of Corcerous and Hornos. The third D. Mayor of Ianguas, & D. Vrraca, or according vnto some Oguenda, Lady of Aluerite, Lardero & Mucrones, such was the issue of D. Garcia Sanches of Nagera: During whose raigne the Spaniards set vp the inuention of the image of the Virgin Mary of the royal Monastery, in the towne of Nagera; in honour of whom, D. Garcia, and his wife D. Estaphana, or Estienne caused the Conuent of the order of Saint Benet to be built: and moreouer the King did institute the order of the knights of the Lilly, for that in the same picture there was a pot of white Lillies, and would haue the Knights carry vpon their cloakes, Lillies imbroidred with the needle. This was the deuise of the Knights of the order of Nauarre, wherewith the Kings children, and many Knights of Nauarre and strangers were honoured, the which continued in this house of Nauarre.

The King D. Garcia did greatly honour his nobility, and did confirme in the yeere 1043, the preuiledges of the gentlemen in the Valley of Roncal, in testimony of their perpetuall fidelity to the Kings of Nauarre their Princes, who had done him great seruices against the Moores his neighbors. He tooke Calorra from them, in the yeere 1044, a more fortunate warre, out of doubt, then that which hee had against D. Fernand King of Castille his brother, a fatall man to all his kinsfolkes and allies. Enuy which torments man, by reason of an others prosperity, bread a hatred in D. Garcia, against his brother D. Fernand, the which was augmented by some dispute that was betwixt them for the towne of Nagera in Rioje, whereas D. Garcia kept his Court, and the Lands of Bureua, which D. Fernand maintayned did belong vnto the crowne of Castille. The first and most vnworthy effect, whereby this hatred was discovered, was a treason plotted against D. Fernand in the towne of Nagera; for being come in brotherly loue to visit D. Garcia, who was sicke in bed, hee was aduertised that by his commandement they ment to stay him, and in truth hee had beene put in prison if hee had not escaped: this did so incense them one against an other, as falling to armes, it was one of their deaths.

This treacherous part was long dissembled by D. Fernand, attending some opportunity

The bounds of the realme of Nauarre vnder
D. Garcia
Sanches.

Genealogie of
Nauarre.

Knights of the Lilly in Na-
uarre.

An. 1044.

Quarrels betwixt the Kings of Cas-till and Na-
uarre.

D. Garcia
practise against his brother.

nity of reuenge, notwithstanding any excuse D. Garcia could make, seeing his designe A had failed. Thus the King of Nauarre liued in continuall hatred with his brethren. D. Ramir, and D. Fernand, as hee had purchased by his bad disposition, the dislike of his father and mother: a Prince in truth vnworthie to make warre against the Moores, for the advancement of the Christian religion: against whom (notwithstanding that hee was in bad termes with his brethren) hee sent an army, and tooke from them the towne of Funes, in the yeere of our Lord 1045. For the recovery of his health, hee had sent messengers to all the famous Bishops and Abbots of Spaine, that by their prayers to God hee might be cured: with this deuotion hee caused himselfe to be carried to the Monastery of Saint Sauneur of Leyre, where hee did beleue that by the prayers of those religious men, his health was restored; in recompence where- B of, he gaue to that house the Conuent of Centurifontes, and many other things: all this did nothing abate the spleene hee had against his brother D. Fernand, who would not be surprized.

Castille.

Being returned into his country, dissembling the wrong which had beene done him, he made warre against the Moores, vpon the frontiers of Castille, where he tooke the townes of Goruas, Vado del Rey, Aquilera, Berlanga, and other places, passing vnto Tarrassone and then hee returned by Medina Celi, ruining the forts, and watch-towers which the Moores had built in those countries; the which he did with lesse difficulty, for that the Moores estate was in great confusion, by reason of the seditions and tiranies which were practised amongst them. They write that this Prince did also that yeere C (which was 1047) chase the Moores out of the mountaines, of Ora and Ouan. Some time after, continuing the warre against the Mahumetists, hee past the mountaines with his army into the realme of Toledo, he spoiled the country about Talamanca and Vzeda, whereas the riuer of Henares passeth to Alcalá, and Guadálajara: he entred the territory of Madrid, and made such a general spoile of townes and people, as the King of Toledo, a Moore called Aly Maymon, was aduised to pacifie him by presents, yea to promise him tribute: the which hee did, sending home D. Fernand rich with gold and siluer, and of all other spoiles, into his countries of Leon and Castille.

Moore.

This King Aly Maymon was the ninth of those which had rained at Toledo of the royall race of Aben Humeya, sonne to King Hizen, and grand-child to Hayran. Hee had one sonne amongst others, carrying his grand-fathers name Hizen, and one daughter D called Casilda, who was a Christian, as you shall heare. At that time there dwelt many Musarabes in Toledo, who God left not vnfurnished of Pastors, among the which Ar-chiques the Arch-deacon is famous, who encouraged the Christians of that city, and instructed them in the grounds of their faith: arts and liberal sciences were in like manner maintained and honored among the Arabians, and in those daies their liued many learned men of that nation, whereof the most renowned were Haly Albuacem, and Aly Aben Ragel, very learned in Astrology. The occasion which drew the Princesse Casilda to the Christian religion, is thus related by the authors of the Spanish History. She fel (say they) very sick of a bloody flux, for whose recovery her father had in vaine im- E ployed the skill of all the Arabian Physitians, and others that were expert in that faculty: but in the end shee had a reuelation, that if shee did wash her selfe in the waters of Saint Vincent's Lake, which is in the territory of Bureua, nere vnto Briuesca, she should be cured: the which shee presently declared to the King her father, who was very well pleased: and hauing written to the King D. Fernand, hee sent this Virgin well attended vnto him, and presently set many Christian slaues, at liberty, vpon this occasion D. Fernand entertained her with great honor, & caused her to be furnished with all things necessary. Being bathed in those waters she recovered her health, wherevpon the Spaniards say, she would returne no more to Toledo, but caused her selfe to be baptized and built an Oratory with a little chamber vpon the Lake, where shee made her aboad, and there spent the remainder of her daies, in prayers and other religious exercises, and was there buried after her decease.

Cast de a Prince of the Moores baptizd.

But the same author said, that being at Toledo, before she came into Castille she was full of charity and compassion to Christian captiues, to whom she gaue great almes, which

A which was a signe that there were in her some good seeds of better instruction, the which by the recovery of her health was confirmed. There was also an other Prince of the Moores called Alay Maymon (nor he which was King of Toledo) against whom D. Garcia King of Nauarre had a sharpe incounter, at Ricorbaesca, where the Moore was vanquished and slaine.

These Christian Kings, ambitious and treacherous one against an other, not sparing their owne blood, thought to expiate all their offences, in building of Churches, and in dowing them with great reuenues, in enuy one of an other, with this opinion, D. Garcia gaue many gifts, and granted many preuiledges to the Church of Saint Mary the Royal of Nagera, which hee had caused to be built, for his funerall: declaring that these B gifts were for the health of his soule, of his fathers, of the Queene his wiues, and of his children, with the approbation of the chiefe noblemen of his Realme: which donations and preuiledges, hee thought should continue vnto the end of the world, vpon a penalitie, to him that should breake them, of a thousand tallents, to be applied to the Monasterie. In these termes they are exprest in the letters which are found in the said Monasterie, dated in the yeere of our Lord 1052. and seene by Garibay.

Nauarre.

Donations to churches.

By the like perswasion, D. Fernand King of Castille built the Church of Saint Isidore in the city of Leon. And to make that place of more authority, hee resolved to get his body, which hee thought was yet in the city of Seule, where hee had beene Bishop,

Castille.

C for this cause hee proclaimed warre, against Almuncama, called by others Benabet, Aben Amet, who at that time was King there, wasting and spoyleing his country, on this side the riuer of Guadiana, towards Portugal, where hee tooke the towne of Montmaior, and pursuing his enemy, hee sent him to the like conditions, as hee had done Aly Maymon, King of Toledo, and besides hee made him to deliuer Saint Isidore's bodie, or some thing in stead thereof, the which was receiued by D. Auito Bishop of Leon, and D. Oydogno Bishop of Astorga, which relieke hee caused to be carried to Leon. This King D. Fernand, at the suite of his subiects of the Kingdome of Leon, caused the towne of Zamora to be new built, which had remayned a heape of stones, since the raigne of D. Ramir the third. D. Garcia King of Nauarre did in like manner build the towne of D. Peralta, and other workes. And to returne to the hatred which continued betwixt these two brethren, it burst forth in the yeere 1054. so as the King D. Fernand being faine sicke at Burgos, he required D. Garcia in the like manner: for D. Garcia being come vnto him, to visit him, and to take from him all suspicion that hee had attempted against him, hee was seized on and caried prisoner vnto Cea.

Exploits of D. Fernand against the Moores.

1054.

Detention of D. Garcia King of Nauarre in Castille.

D. Garcia, wrought in such sort with good words and money, as his gard suffred him to escape, and so being full of wrath and indignation, he returned into Nauarre, where hee leuied a mighty army of his subiects, of Gascons and of Moores, allies or mercenaries, the which he led by the mountaines of Oca, vnto Atapuerca within foure leagues of Burgos: whereof the King D. Fernand being aduertised, hee had raysted great troupes E in Castille, Leon and Asturia to resist him. Yet before they came to ioyne in bataille, hee did solicit the King D. Garcia, by many messengers to retire, intreating him to forget all things past, and that from thenceforth hee would remaine his good brother and friend: but D. Garcia was so incensed, as he would not giue eare to any good counsell, wherefore both armies aduancing, there was a furious bataille, in the which there was much Christian blood spilt: but D. Garcia was so vnfortunate as he was incountered in the charge, by two Knights of Nauarre, who being discontented with him, had retired to D. Fernands army; these two ranne vpon him and slue him; wherevpon the Nauarrois army was soone put to reute, and defeated. The King D. Fernand did greue at D. Garcias death, and deliuered his bodie to his people to bury it, leauing to pursue any but the Moores, who were come to this warre. Such was the end of D. Garcia King of Nauarre, in the yeere 1054. hauing raigned twenty yeeres. His bodie was interred at Saint Mary the royal in Nagera. Hee intituled himselfe King of Pampelone, Nagera, Alaua, Oca, Bureua, of Castille the Old, and of Biscay, where in truth he held most part of the country.

Nauarre.

VVarrs betwixt Nauarre and Castille.

Death of D. Garcia Sanchez King of Nauarre.

In

In witnesse whereof there are letters found, conteyning, that in the yeere 1053. D. A Nugno Sanches Earle of Durango, and D. Legunzia his wife, indowed a church of Saint Augustine, the which is now called Saint Augustine of Echaurri, nere vnto the place whereas long after the towne of Helorrio was built, which letters were confirmed by the King D. Garcia, as rainging in that country.

Castille.

Usurpations of
the King of Castille upon
Nauarre.

After this victory the King D. Fernand seized vpon all Castille the Old, of the territory of Bureia, of Mont Oca, and of part of Rioje, vnto the waters of the floud Oja, which fall from the mountaine of Eucimi, where now stands Saint Dominique de la Calçada, and fals into Ebro at the towne Haro. In confirmation of the Monkes good husbandry, mention is made, of a controuersie betwixt the deceased King D. Garcia King of Nauarre and Saint Dominique, called of Silos, who was a religious man, botne at Cagnas, in Rioje, and of a sheapherd became a Monke; hee was bred vp in the Monastery of Saint Emilian of Cogolla, where hee tooke the habit of the order of Saint Benedict, and liued there so religiously as he was made Abbot: but for that he was a stout protector of the rights of the Abbay, and of their exemptions, he fell in disgrace with the King, who expelled him out of all his dominions: the which hee afterwards repented.

This good father went into Castille, where D. Fernand receiued him courteously, and gaue him commission for the restoring of the Monastery of Saint Sebastian of Silos, in the valley of Toblatello, the which had bene destroyed by the Moores. In those times there beganne to bee great fame of the valour of D. Roderigo Diaz, called by the Arabians, Cid Ruis Diaz, against whom he made long and sharpe warres, beeing a new knight desirous of honour, and ready for all vertuous exercises. After that D. Fernand had subiected vnder his obedience, the territories of Rioje and Mont Oca, which had bene held by the Kings of Nauarre, the Moores made many roades ther, being their neighbours, and did daylie carry away great spoiles, whereof they were often stript by Cid Ruis Diaz; and amongst others mention is made of a route which he gaue them vpon Mont Oca, where he tooke fine of their commanders or petty Kings, the which hee afterwards deliuered vpon ransome, and promise of a yeerely tribute. This Cid Ruis had a quarrel with D. Gomes Lord of Gormes, the which had bene conquered by D. Fernand from the Moores, few yeeres before, so as entring into Combate, D. Gomes was slaine; hee left one daughter called D. Ximena Gomes, who made great and continual complaints for the death of her father: but soone after shee her selfe intreated the King, to make a marriage betwixt her and Cid, the which he did, and so this Lady was comforted. Hee purchased this name of Cid, which in the Arabian tongue signifies Lord, in the towne of Zamore, when as the messengers of these five petty Kings, aboue mentioned, bringing the tribute contracted with them, presented it in the presence of the King D. Fernand, they called him Cid Ruis Diaz: wherefore the King would haue this braue Knight carry this title still, who by his right name was called Roderigo Diaz de Bivar.

Cid a title gi-uen to Roderi-go Diaz.Race of Cid
Ruis Diaz.

The towne of Calaoarra beeing taken by the Moores, and recovered againe by the King D. Fernand, there grew some controuersie betwixt him and D. Ramir King of Arragon, for that place; for the deciding whereof either should bring a knight to the combate, vpon condition that the victor should purchase the right to his party. For D. Fernand Cid Ruis Diaz was armed, and for the King of Arragon came a knight called Martin Gomez, the author (as they say) of the house and family of Luna in Arragon; Who beeing vanquished and slaine vpon the place, Calaoarra remained in the iurisdiction of Castille. The race of this knight D. Roderigo Diaz, descended of Flauin, whom others call Layn Caluo, Iudge of Castille, sonne in law to Nugno Nugnes Rasura, who had by his daughter D. Eluira Nugnes Bella, or Theresa Bella, as some say, foure sonnes, Fernand, Bermond, Layn and Diego, surnamed Laynes. Of Fernand the eldest was borne, Layn Fernandez, of him Nugno Laynes, who begat Diego Laynes, father to Cid Ruis Diaz: whose mother was called D. Theresa Nugnes, daughter to D. Roderigo Aluarez Earle and Gouvernor of the Asturies, by others called D. Nagna Aluarez, & Amays. Of Cid Ruis, and of D. Ximena Gomes aboue named was borne D. Diego Roderi-

A Rodriguez, who died in his fathers life time, in the warres against the Moores. And moreover they had two daughters D. Eluira, and D. Sol, whereof mention shall be made in the relation of the affaires of Castille and Nauarre.

D. Sancho Garcia the fifth of that name, and the fifteenth King of Nauarre.

B 5. D. Sancho Garcia, succeeded D. Garcia Sanchez his father in the realme of Nauarre, who could not stoppe the course of D. Fernand's conquests, hauing after the battaile of Atapuerca, taken from him a good part of the country which his father enioyed: wherefore he made a league with his vnkle D. Ramir King of Arragon, against D. Fernand King of Castille: By this alliance the Spanish authors say, that these Kings gaue diuers townes and forts in pawne one to another, and that the King of Nauarre did quit to him of Arragon, and to his for euer, the townes of Sanguessa, Lerda and Ondues. This King had to wife a Ladie called D. Plaisance, by whom hee had children, but there is no certaine mention made of them. Hee was of little valour, and therefore D. Fernand of Castille his vnkle, had meanes to restraime him in his Realme of Nauarre, at his pleasure, were it either right or wrong.

C In the meane time the King D. Fernand, to purge and expiat these outrages, gaue bountifullly to the Cathedral churches, colledges, parishes and monasteries of his realme, and to others without it; for they say hee gaue euery yeere to the Abbay of Clugny, a thousand peeces of gold, out his treasury and infinite almes deeds to the poore in particular. The tribute which hee demanded of the King of Toledo, was denied him a little before his death: but hee went in person against him, forced him to acknowledge him for his Lord, and to doe him homage, and in like manner the other Moores, who after his example had rebelled: and they hold that hee also led his army along the riuer of Ebro, by the confines of Cattelogne to Valence, where D. Fernand having taken great spoiles from the Moores, which reigned in those Marches, hee returned victorious into his country. His residence was for the most part at Leon, for certaine reasons.

And although that homebred examples did warne him to keepe his Estates vnited in one bodie, to haue the more power and authority, to withstand the attempts of all enemies, yet hee was resolu'd to assigne his children their portions in his lifetime: To D. Sancho hee appointed the realme of Castille, vnto the riuer of Pisuerga, towards Leon; and towards Nauarre limited by the riuer of Ebro, as hee had augmented it on that side, with the preiudice of his Nephew D. Sancho Garcia: To D. Alphonso his second sonne, he assigned the Kingdome of Leon in the Asturies, and E Tramiera, vnto the riuer Deua, which passeth by Ouiedo: and moreover hee gaue him part of Campos, and the towne of Astorga, and other lands in Galicia with the towne of Zebrero: To D. Garcia the youngest the realme of Galicia, withall that hee had conquered in Portugall. Hee did also indowe his two daughters, assigning to D. Yrraca the eldest the city of Zamora, and to D. Eluira the yongest, the city of Toro: but this diuision was not allowed, nor kept by his sonne D. Sancho, after his death, the which many say, was in the yeere of our Lord 1059.

A remarkable yeere by the credit which was giuen to the Cardinals of Rome, by the diligence of Pope Nicholas the second, a Sauoyard borne, who hauing called a councell at Saint Jean de Latran in Rome, provided that from thence forth the Pope should not be chosen but by the suffrages of the Cardinals, grounding this decree vpon the corruptions, troubles and seditions, which grew ordinarily vpon the election of Popes; holding it lesse dangerous to haue these indirect courses practised by few, then by the whole Clergy, or the people of Rome. This Decree is inserted in the three and twenty distinction, and begins. In nomine domini &c.

The

The writers of the Spanish History are not very certaine of the time of D. Fernand's death; for those which seeme most exact, prolong his life vnto the yeere of our Lord 1067. The place where he died is also very doubtfull: but all agree that he was interred at Saint Isidore of Leon, dying full of contrition and repentance for his sinnes, as they hold his body for a holy relike, in the Kings chappel in that church. By this computation he should haue reigned two and thirty yeeres in Castille, and thirty or thereabouts in Leon. Wee finde no other thing touching the affaires of this King with foraine Princes, but only a contention betwixt his Ambassadors, and those of the Emperor Henry, at the councill of Florence, vnder Victor the second, the Emperor pretending that the Kings of Spaine should acknowledge his Maiesty and doe him homage as to their soueraine: but this question was decided by the councill, where it was sayd, B that seeing the Kings of Spaine had defended and conquered their Realmes by armes, without any aide from the Emperors, they were free and exempt from al acknowledge-ment or subiection to the Empire: whereof wee may read the glosse, vpon the Chap. Adrianus Papa, Distinc. 63. the like preiudice haue the Kings of France, the State of Venice, the Kings of England, and some others.

The Kings of Spaine doe not acknowledge the Empire.

Cattlogne.

D. Raymond Berenger the elder, Earle of Barcelona, a wise and valiant Knight, of whom we haue made mention, defended his country by his armes and wisdom, and enlarged his limits to the preiudice of the Moores, by the fauour of the other Christian Potentates of Spaine, which made warre against them, and the diuisions which were among these Arabian Mahumetists. At that time was Seneschall in Cattlogne (which was a dignity equal to that of the Constable or Marshalls in France) one called Raymond Myron. In his time D. Guillen the fat was Earle of Besalu, sonne to Bernard Brisefer, who dying in the yeere 1052. D. Bernard Guillen his second sonne succeeded him: at the same time was Earle of Cerdagne, D. Guillen Raymond, son to Count Raymond Grefry, who held it long, and had two sonnes, D. Guillen Iordain, who was Earle after him, and D. Bernard Guillen, who was also Earle of Cerdagne: and to make cleere the alliances of this house of Cattlogne, we finde that D. Almodis, wife to Count Raymond Berenger, was issued from the house of the Earles of Carcaffone, being strongly allied, especially with the Lords of Bearne and Narbone, and the Earles of Tolouse, Bigorre and other great houses of France. From the same house of Carcaffone, was issued Emengarde, married to the Vicont of Besiers, both which in the yeere of our Lord 1068. yeelded vnto Raymond Berenger Earle of Barcelona, all the interest and right which they might pretend vnto the Earldomes of Carcaffone, Tolouse, Cominges, Rodes and Minerue: by meanes whereof, this house of Barcelona, had great Siegneuries, and pretensions in France, and from that time did enioy the towne of Carcaffone: about which time the towne of Perpignan was built.

D. Sancho Fernandes the second of that name, and the second King of Castille.

E

Castille.
An. 1067.

6. IN the yeere of our redemption 1067. the realmes of Castille, Leon and Galicia, were diuided betwixt the children of D. Fernand deceased, and Castille fell to D. Sancho Fernandes, furnished the valiant. Leon to Alphonso Fernandes the second, whom they called the Braue: and Galicia to D. Garcia, with that which hee had conquered in Portugal. Adding vnto these D. Sancho Garcia, who held the Kingdome of Nauarre, and D. Sancho Ramires, reigning in Arragon, wee finde that at one instant there were reigning in Spaine, three grand-children to D. Sancho the Great, King of Nauarre. The Kings of Nauarre and Arragon last named, made a league against D. Sancho King of Castille, but their quarrels and exploits are obscure and vncertaine, at the least they did him no great harme. Whilst that D. Sancho, the mother of D. Fernand: F three children liued, they continued in reasonable good termes, for hee remained at Leon her owne inheritance, so as Sancho durst not attempt any thing against D. Alphonso,

A Alphonso, to whom it was assigned, hee being dead, which was the second yeere of D. Sancho Fernandes King of Castille, they fought all occasions to spoile one another. D. Garcia King of Galicia began first, taking from his sister D. Vrraca, Lady of Zamora a part of her territorie, the which hee vsurped. D. Sancho King of Castille, who demanded no better subiect, embraced his sisters quarrel; and for her cause refused to make warre in Galicia; but the Noblemen and Knights of his counceel, were not of opinion, that hee should goe to armes, for a matter which might bee reconciled by some milder course. Amongst those which did contradi& the Kings ambitious desire, were D. Garcia de Cabra, and Cid Ruiz Diaz, saying, that if, contrary to their aduice, hee were resolved to inuade Galicia, hee should first provide to bee in good termes with D. Alphonso King of Leon, that hee might haue free passage for his army through his country, and to conduct his victuals and munition from Castille into Galicia. To this end the two Kings had two enteruewes at Sahagun, where in the beginning D. Alphonso seemed intractable: yet in the end hee yeelded to giue his brother D. Sancho passage; and whatsoeuer hee demanded: wherefore in the yeere 1071. warre was begunne against the King D. Garcia who had recourse vnto his brother. D. Alphonso of Leon, to bee aided by him; but hee excused himselfe, saying that hee would remaine indifferent, and not deale, for the one nor the other: so as D. Sancho entering Galicia with great forces, after many encounters hee became master thereof, dispossessed his brother of all his country, and tooke him prisoner. So the raigne of this King ended the C fourth yeere after his coming to it: yet some authors say, that this was done, after D. Sancho had dispossessed his brother D. Alphonso of the Kingdome of Leon, and forced him to become a Monke, and to take vpon him the habit of Saint Benet: the which they report after this manner: D. Sancho being discontented with the diuision of portions which D. Fernand had made betwixt him and his brethren, thinking that they had done him wrong to take from him the souerainety of these Kingdomes, being the eldest. As soone as D. Sancho, their mother was dead, hee set vpon his brother D. Alphonso King of Leon, and at his first entry wonne a battaile at a place called Plantaca: but the Leonois rallied againe together, they gaue an other battaile to D. Sancho; and defeated him vpon the river of Carrion neere to Gulpejora, whereas the King D. Alphonso commanded that they should not pursue the Castillians.

Vrraca betwixt the three brethern
sonnes to D. Fernand, King of Ca-
stille.

D. Garcia
King of Galicia dispossessed.

D. Alphonso
King of Leon,
dispossessed by
his brother.

Then was Cid Ruiz Diaz, in D. Sancho's army, as his vassall, who excusing this losse with good reasons, and comforting his King, hee reuiued his courage: so as hauing gathered his troupes together, he came and charged the Leonois the morning following, being heauy with sleepe, hauing made good cheere for their victory gotten the day before, and not doubting any enemy, putting them all in disorder, and to a shamefull flight, hauing slaine and taken many; then hee pursued this aduantage in such manner, as hee besieged the King D. Alphonso in Saint Maries Church of Carrion, where he thought to saue himselfe, and carried him away prisoner to Burgos.

A while after at the sute and instance of D. Vrraca, sister to these Kings, and of E D. Pedro Ansures, hee was set at liberty vpon condition: that hee should goe into the Monasterie of Sahagun; and take vpon him the habit of Saint Benet: but hee staid not long there, being forced to enter into it: for by the aduice of the same D. Pedro Ansures, hee left Sahagun, and went to Toledo, to King Almon or Almeon, a Moore, who receiued him verie courteously; and intreated him honourably, whilst hee remained with him, hauing taking an oath of fidelitie of him.

Hospitality of King Almeon,
a Moore,

Hee lodged him in a faire great house; heere vnto his Palace, which they imagine was in that place where as now the Monasterie of religious women of the conception doth stand, to the end that hee might there enioy the company of the Christian Musarabes, which dwelt in that city.

Y Thether came three Knights, sent from his sister Vrraca, to keepe him company. D. Pedro, D. Gonçal and D. Fernand Ansures, brethren, of the country of Leon, who brought with them many other Christians, the which were entertained by the King Almeon: During this exile D. Alphonso gaue himselfe to hunting and country country sports: and taking great delight in a certaine place of the territory of Toledo, A where there were the ruines of old buildings, the King D. Almenon to gratefie him, gaue him leaue to build them vp againe, and to plant it with Christians, the which is at this day called Bribuega, yet D. Alphonso grew to bee suspected of the Moores, who feared that hee sought meanes to seize vpon the citie of Toledo, wherevpon Almenon was perswaded to kill him, notwithstanding hee would not violate the lawes of Hospitality, although hee were a Mahumetiste, but was content onely to take a new oath of him.

Whilest that the King D. Alphonso past his timethus in exile, D. Sancho his brother, made himselfe maister of the citie, and of all the Kingdome of Leon, where hee caused himselfe to bee crowned King. Hee beeing thus dispossessed, they say hee went against D. Garcia King of Galicia, to intreat him after the same manner. The diuision which was then in Galicia, betwixt the King and a great part of his Nobility, made the enterprise more easie; for D. Garcia beeing growne a tyrant, spoiling and treating his subjects vnworthely, hee gouerned himselfe after the appetit of a slaue more then was fit. This woman (who some say, was a slaue infranchised) put the Nobilitie and gentrie, in fauour or disgrace with the King (most commonly by false reportes) as hee pleased, which was the cause of many inconueniences: So as in the end growing insupportable, certaine knights slue her in the Kings presence.

Vpon this occasion the Nobilitie was diuided, and the Realme full of troubles and factions, some following the Kings party who would reuenge this murder, and others supporting the murderers. The affaires beeing in this Estate, the King D. Sancho entered Galicia with a mighty army, against whom D. Garcia finding himselfe too weak, hee abandoned his country, and had recourse vnto the Moores, demanding aide of them for the recovery thereof, promising to make them strars of that which hee should get from D. Sancho his brother: but the Moores answered him wisely, that hee who had not the heart to defend his owne, should not bee able to inuade an other: yet the Moore beeing liberall and courteous, gaue him rich presents, and sent him backe, refusing to ingage himselfe in that action. D. Garcia hauing gathered some men together, but not sufficient to effect any matter of importance, doubtfull what course to take, hee fell to spoile his owne country, and making his retreat into Portugal, where hee had recovered some places, hee did mightily annoy D. *Sancho*s garisons, but it continued not long: for D. Sancho hauing raised an army, came against D. Garcia, fought with him, defeated him, and tooke him prisoner, neere vnto Saint Iren, and sent him to the castle of Lune, with a good gard, from whence hee departed not vntill his death, the which happened in the time of D. Alphonso his Nephew about the yeere of our Lord 1081. who commanded hee should bee buried with irons on his feete, at Leon, in the Church of Saint Isidore: by this meanes the King D. Sancho remained Lord and Maister of all Galicia, and other lands of that partage. By this it appeeres there is difference in the time, and in the meanes of their dispossessing. All this did not satisfie D. *Sancho*s ambition, for hee would in like manner stripp his sisters, D. Vrraca and D. Eluira, of the lands and places which they held, by their fathers will, and laied siege to the towne of Zamora.

The inhabitants much affected to their Princeesse, doing their indeauors for the defending of her rights, had with her consent chosen for their captaine a knight, called D. Arias Gonçales who had nourished her, vnder whose conduct they made many gallant sallies vpon the besiegers, with losse of either side. Whilest that D. Sancho was busie at this vaine attempt, a desperat knight of Castille, called Vellides Asaulphe, or Delphos, went out of the city with a resolution to kill the King, and found such an opportunity, as hee strooke him dead with a boarpeare, without any let, and then retired himselfe to the place from whence hee came, notwithstanding that hee was pursued by Cid Ruiz Diaz and others. Thus the valour and conquests of D. Sancho King of Castille (which could not bee restrained by two great Kings) were made vaine, when as hee would attempt against a woman: an argument of the vanity

D. Garcia King of Galicia made a prey to his enemy, by reason of his tyrannies.

D. Sancho's ambition stayed by the judgment of God.

A vanity of humane enterprises, and that there is a greater power which controules them. This death happened in the yeere of our Lord 1073: hauing reigned in Castille about fixe yeeres and nine monthes: by reason whereof the army disbanded, euery one returning to his home, except the Castillans, who would needes continue the siege before Zamora for a time. The Kings body was carried to the Monastery of Saint Saluador of Oña. The inscription which is in that Monastery shewes that hee died fixe yeeres later, but there is an error, for that Garibay affirms, that hee had seene ancient writings, witnessing that D. Alphonso his brother reigned then in Castille.

If the Castilian brethren were at discord, they of Nauarre had as little charity amongst them: for betwixt D. Sancho Garcia, and D. Raymond, there was enuy and secret hatred, the which burst out in time: for D. Raymond holding some strong places, and some in his brothers gouernment, and hauing by his bounty drawne many vnto him, who were discontented with the present Estate of the realme, he rebelled, meaning to defend these places hee held: but the King D. Sancho, and the Nobility of Nauarre did easily expell him. But there fell out a new trouble for the Nauarrois, to demand reason of the Kings of Castille, who detained from him the territory of Bureau, Castille the old, and other places.

D. Raymond beeing thus expelled, had no recourse to any Christian Princes his neighbours, who (as hee doubted) would detest his attempts, but hee fled vnto the Moores, the enemies of our faith, and making warre with them against his brother, there was a battaile giuen neere to Rueda, or Penalen, in the which D. Sancho was slaine: this was about the yeere of our Lord 1076. hauing reigned two and twenty yeeres: he had by his wife D. Plaisance, amongst other children, D. Ramir Sanchez, and two D. Garcias: D. Ramir being very young, vpon the newes of his fathers death, put himselfe vnder the protection of D. Sancho Ramires, King of Arragon, whom also the Noblemen and Knights of Nauarre called to raigne ouer them, by reason of the minority of their King to oppose him against the enterprises of the bad. D. Raymond, who pursued his designe to make himselfe King of Nauarre, and had already seized vpon Pampelone, and vsurped the title of King there, but hee was vertuously repulst, so as beeing deceived of his ambitious hopes, not knowing what to resolute, hee retired to the King of Saragosse, a Moore, where hee past his banished life, and by the bounty of this Pagan, enioyed certaine Lands and places, which descended afterwards to a Niece of his called Marquise, wife to Aznar Lopez, a Knight, who made a donation of Saint Maria Maior, to the Collegiall Church of Saragosse, in the time of D. Alphonso King of Nauarre, called the Warrior: the two Garcias bretheren, sonnes to the deceased King of Nauarre, fled into Castille, to the King D. Alphonso, the mightiest Prince at that time in Spaine.

Nauarre. The Brethren of Nauarre at discord,

D. Sancho King of Nauarre slaine. An. 1076.

D. Raymond of Nauarre retires to the Moores.

E D. Sancho Ramires the second King of Arragon, and chosen sixteenth King of Nauarre.

7. D. Sancho Ramires had reigned some yeeres in Arragon, when as hee was called to the crowne of Nauarre. Hee had married a Lady, daughter to the Earle of Virgel, called D. Felicia, by whom hee had three sonnes. D. Pedro who succeeded in his Kingdome. D. Alphonso who reigned after his brother, and D. Ramir, a religious man in the Monastery of Saint Ponce of Tomeres, neere to Besiers, and afterwards King by the decease of his brother D. Alphonso, who left no children. Hee had also one bastard, called D. Garcia who was bishop of Iacca. In this Prince the two realms of Nauarre and Arragon were vniued, 42. yeeres after the separation thereof: he was warlike and polittique, and withall very zealous in the Romaine religion: for hee changed the ceremonies of the Gothes, which the Christians vsed, and brought in those of the Romish church, it may be by the counsell held at Iacca, vnder this King, when as the Bishoprike

An. 1073.

Genealogie of Arragon and Nauarre.

of Arragon was first established there: to enrich which feat, besides the tithes, there A were certaine portions appointed out of the conquests which they should get from the Moores of Sarragosse and Tudele: and in steed of the ciuill Lawes of the Gothes, hee brought in the common law of the Empire into his iurisdiction. There is a volume extant of particular lawes, giuen by this King to them of Iacca, which is inserted amongst the customes of Nauarre at this daie: but the chiefe acts of religion done by him, and other Princes in his time, were to indow churches, for the Monasteries, Col-ledges and Bishopricks of Spaine, haue thousands of preuiledges, donations and exemptions granted vnto them.

Catallogne.

A council at Barcelone.The Countesse
Almodia of Barcelone possessed by her
sonne in 1170.

Arabians.

Seditions, re-uoltes and insurractions amongst the Arabian Princes.

There is mention made of a counsell assembled in the towne of Parcelone at the pursute of D. Raymond Berenger, the elder, and at the request of D. Almodia his wife, B whereas Cardinal Hugues, Legatto Pope Alexander the second, or Gregory the seuenh did precede, for the certaine time is not set down, but it is only said, that it was celebrated about the yeere 1071. there it was decreed that Clergy men should liue chastly, for that (as the History saies) many of them were married, according to the introducon of King Viriza the Goth: and after the example of the Arragonois, the seruice of the Musarabes was left, and the Romaine of Saint Gregory receiued in Catallogne.
In the same council they treated of secular affaires, as of the gouernment of the country of Catallogne, of the Earles house, of the Estate of the Nobles, of their names and titles, distinguished by this Earle, into Viconts, Barons and Vauassours: and such like.
During the assembly of this council D. Pedro Raymond, eldest sonne vnto the Earle D. C Raymond Berenger, poisoned D. Almodia his mother in law, fearing that shee should labour to deprive him of his fathers succession to aduance her owne children: where-vpon hee was iustly disinherited: thus the wicked reaped what hee feared. In the same country died D. Armingol Earle of Vrgel, in the yeere of our Lord 1075. to whom his sonne succeeded, carrying the same name: and the yeere following 1076. died the Earle D. Raymond Berenger, the elder, hauing gouerned in the county of Barcelone longer then any of his Predecessors, that is one and fortie yeeres. Hee diuided his Earldome betwixt his two sonnes, D. Raymond Berenger, and D. Berenger Raymond, so the great hindrance of the commonweale, giuing moreover vnto D. Raymond Berenger the Earldome of Carcaffone. By this Earle D. Raymond the customary lawes were ordained, taken out of the volume of the old Gothique lawes, amended and reformed.

8. The diuisions of the Moores in Spaine, aboue mentioned, doe admonish vs to speake some-thing of the turbulent Estate of the Arabians in the East, and in like manner of them of Maroc, which was the cause of a great alteration in Spaine. Returning then to the Caliphe Marwan, who was in armes against Salin, the sonne of Asmulin, who had seized vpon the Regions of Persia and Syria: wee say that by the defeat of Marwan, and his death, Egypt was also conquered by Salin: so as all that which the Arabians held in the East, did obey Asmulin and Casaban his companion and councellor.

They beeing dead, Abubalan surnamed Muamat, was Caliphe of Persia and Syria, E and Salin the sonne of Asmulin kept Egypt to himselfe, and gaue the beginning to a soueraigne feat in that country, the which hee established at Caire, cauting himselfe to be called Caliphe. Against Abubalan, did rise many enemies in Syria and Arabia, of the faction of Marwan, whom they did beleue was yet liuing, so as there died great numbers of that nation, in diuers encounters.

After the death of Abubalan, his brother Abdala succeeded in the Easterne Empire of Sarrazins or Arabians, but an other of the same name aspiring to that dignity, flue him, and held the throne about the yeere 756. at which time there were great troups of Turkes begonne to disperse themselves ouer all Armenia, the which did ouerrunne and spoile the Sarrazins country, who incountred them in diuers sharpe and bloudie batailles. After this Abdala, who reigned about some twentie yeeres, his F sonne Mada Amadi was Caliphe, who held the Royall seate nine yeeres, and Moysé his sonne succeeded him, who liued but two yeeres, and left the place and dignity to

A to Aaron Caliphe, who they write was very iust and charitable to Christians, and had sought the friendship of Charles the Great, King of France, of Alphonso the Chast raigning in Spaine, and of other Christian Princes of his time, to whom hee sent Ambasadors and presents, and they to him.

Hauing reigned three and twenty yeers, he left, after his death, the dignity of Caliphe in question betwixt his two children, Muamat and Abdala, who after great effusion of blood, agreed to raigne with equall title and authority. Muamat transported the seat of his Empire to Bagadat, a towne built by him, neere vnto old Babylon, and would reside no more at Damas. At that time the Empire of the Arrabians and Sarrazins was diuided into foure great Potentats, wherof that of the East and of Bag-
B dat, retained the title of Caliphe, which signifies King or ruler. That of Egypt called himselfe Sultan, which is as much to say, as Emperour. At Cairon, a great and mighty towne, built within the country of Affricke, in the time of Oaxen, some fise and twenty leagues distant from Tunis, reigned an other Caliphe, and at Maroc (which Estate was come to them of the family of Aben Alabeci) reigned a Miralmumin, from which great Potentats did afterwards grow, the Kingdomes of Fez, Alger, Tunes and others. After Mahumad reigned Impracl, who left the Empire of the East to his sonne Mamum, who held it with great reputation: but after him the Sarrazins power began to decline in the East, by their continuall seditions and ciuill dissensions, whereby the Turkes had meanes to settle a Monarchie, the which beganne about the yeere

Foure great Potentats of Mahumet
sett in Egypt and Affricke.

C of Christ one thousand, being called by Mahumet Prince or Gouernor of Persia, who made warre against the Caliphe of Bagadat, in which they serued him: but falling afterwards to quarrel with him, they defeated him, and seized vpon Persia, where they did choose for their first King, their General Tangrolipix, and fence partly by force, and partly by an accord, they delt so with the Sarrazins, as their power declining, the name and Empire of the Turkes hath continued to firme and mighty, vnto our daies.
The Miralmumins of Maroc, being farre from these tempests of the East, maintained their dignity in their race, and nation, but not without the like furies and inraged appetites of rule: so as hauing beene held many yeeres by them of the lineage of Aben Alabeci, they were set vpon and subdued by an other race of Princes Moores, called D Almorauides, wherof Isaph Aben-Tefin was the chiefe, who made himselfe Monarke in Affricke, ouer all the Kings and Potentats which did raigne there, about the yeere 1068. and extended his power into Spaine, as we will shew.

D. Alphonso the sixth of that name, the third King of Castille, and fise and twen- tith of Leon.

E

9. D. Sancho Fernandes, King of Castille, being slaine as we haue sayd, by the treason of Velldes Dolphos, or Ataulphe: D. Vrraca did presently aduertise her brother D. Alphonso, who remained at Toledo vnder the protection of King Almenon. This Moore hauing many spies amongst the Christians, had already intelligence of the murther, and obseruing the actions of D. Alphonso, hee was resoluéd to stay him, if hee should offer to depart without his priuity and leaue. D. Alphonso was wonderfully peruaded by D. Pedro d'Ansures (who walking about the towne had by chance met the messenger which brought him the newes of the death of the King his brother) so depart as secretly as he could, fearing some trechery in the Moorish King, but D. Al-F phonso did otherwise, wherein he wrought wisely for himselfe, for he doubted that the King Almenon hauing aduice of what had past, did watch him at the passage: wherefore comming freely vnto him, hee read D. Vrracas letters in his presence, demanding his aduice, leaue and aide, to goe and take possession of the Realme of Castille. King Almenon was much pleased, in that hee did not distrust him, imbraced him lovingly

Griefe of the bounty of King
Alphonso 6.
King of Cas-
tile and Leon.

lously, reioyced with him at the change of his estate, suffered him to depart at his pleasure, and furnished him with money and other things necessary to honour his voyage, and to assure his affaires, telling him freely what his intent was, to stay him prisoner if hee had shewed himselfe so ingrate, as to distrust him who had honored him, and entertained him so lovingly during his exile: and before his departure hee caused him to renew the oth, neuer to bee contrary to him, nor to his sonne Hizen. Whilest that D. Alphonso prepared himselfe to come into Castile, to enioy his new Kingdom, the siege of Zamora continued: for the Knights of Castile and the Prelats, hauing performed the funerals of the deceased King, in the Monastery of Ogna, were returned before the city, vnder the conduct of D. Diego Ordognes, Earle of Lara, beeing much incensed, that the murthrer of the King had laued himself within their walles: wherefore they were resolu'd to batter it all they could.

The law of defying a town.

Combat of one Knight against
many.

They write that D. Diego Ordognes desired the citie, according to the Lawes of duels or combats, amongst the which it was decreed, that any knight that would defende a chiefe towne, was bound to fight against fise knights, one after another, changinge every time his armes and horse, and taking (if hee pleased) bread dipped thrice in wine or water: wherefore D. Diego submitting himselfe to the rigour of this Lawe, offered to fight against fise knights, whereof hee slue three, the which were sonnes to D. Arias Gonçales: D. Pedro, D. Diego and D. Roderigo Arias; and that then the Iudges appointed, made the combats to cease, not declaring who was victor, notwithstanding that the Earle D. Ordognes, offered to end it, and to fight against those two which remained: some say, that D. Roderigo beeing wounded to the death, strooke at his aduersarie with all his force, thinking to part him in two, but the sword falling vpon the horse-neck cut the reines; and hurt him verie sore; wherewith the horse beeing moued, carried the knight out of the lists, the which was not lawfull for him that would haue the honour of the combat. Heerevpon the King D. Alphonso came to the campe before Zamora, where hee was receiued without any contradiction for King of Castile, Leon, the Asturias and Galicia, and of those Lands which the King D. Fernand his father had taken from the crowne of Nauarre. They say that the Castilians, before they would acknowledge him for their King, would haue him purge himselfe by oth, that hee was not acquainted, nor consenting vnto the death of D. Sancho his brother: which oth was required of him by Cid Ruis Diaz, onely, amongst all the Castilians, in the churches of Saint Gadee of Burgos, a place appointed for that businesse.

Ancient and religious cus-tome, to purge themselves by oth.

This manner of purging themselves by oth, of grieuous crimes imposed, but not proued, was vsuall in Spaine in those times, with great ceremonies, and religious terror in many churches and places consecrated, where there were great assemblies of people of all sorts, whereof did follow many horrible Iudgements of God, of those that were periured, the contempt of Religion, how impure soeuer, being detestable and abominable before God. The King D. Alphonso was about thirtie yeeres old, when he beganne to raigne, and was surnamed the Braue, for that he was valiant, and did effect great enterprises.

Genealogie of Castile and
Leon.

Wee finde that hee married sixe wiues, and had the companie of two friends, nobly descended, by whom hee had many children. The first of his wiues was called Infanta a Spaniard: The second was D. Constance: The third D. Maria, daughter to the King of Seuille, called Almuncamuz or Benabet, Aben Amet, a Moore: whom hee married after that hee had taken the citie of Toledo, and was before called Caida or Zaida, of whom was borne the Infant D. Sancho, whom the Moores slue in the war. Of D. Constance was borne D. Vrraca, heire to the King her father: the which was twice married, once to Count Raymond of the house of Bourgongne, and of the bloud royall of France: brother to Guy Archbishop of Viennne, and afterwards Pope, called Calixtus, from whom issued D. Sancho, and D. Alphonso Raymond, who was King of Castile. And for her second husband shee married D. Alphonso, King of Nauarre and Arragon: The fourth wife of D. Alphonso the Braue, was D. Bertha of Tuscan: The fifth D. Isabella, a Spaniard, of whom was borne D. Sancho, wife to D. Roderigo, and

A and D. Eluira married to Roger first King of Naples and Sicilie. And the sixth and last wife was D. Beatrix, a French woman: Besides all these lawfull wiues hee had the companie of D. Ximena Nuges de Gusman, by whom he had two daughters: the first whereof D. Eluira was married to an Earle of Tholoufa and S. Giles, called Raymond, who had by her three sonnes, D. Bertrand, D. Willyam, and D. Alphonso Jordain, who were all Earles of Tholoufa. The second called D. Theresia, who had to husband D. Henry, of the Bloud of the Princes of Lorraine, borne at Befançon, the stemme of the Kings of Portugall. For of this marriage issued D. Alphonso Henriquez, first king of Portugal. These three Knights, Raymond of Tholoufa, Raymond of Bourgongne, and Henry of Lorraine, did serue the King D. Alphonso the Braue, happily and valiantly in his warres against the Moores: in requitall whereof, hee gaue them Estates, honours, and his daughters in marriage. Wee finde that he had another friend also of a Noble House, whose name is buried in forgetfulness. Of all this generation and allyance there shalbe often mention made in the discourse of this Historie. This king D. Alphonso was a worthy Prince, vertuous, a louer of iustice, and of his people, religious and zealous to the Sea of Rome, after the manner of his ancestors, so as he was most esteemed of all the Christian Princes of his time.

Henry of Lorraine the 8. m. of the house of Portugall.

Disposition of
D. Alphonso
King of Castile
and Leon.

Moores.

He shewed himselfe a friend and thankfull to king Almenon of Toledo the Moore, whose countrey was inuaded by them that held the towne of Cordoua: for hee ledde a great armie to his ayde: yet this Moore seeing what great forces D. Alphonso had with him, and seeing him lodged at Olias, two leagues from the Towne, grew iealous that he would breake the league, but he shewed by the effects that he was of a noble and generous disposition: for with him he pursued them of Cordoua, and plagued them in such sort, as for a long time they would not aduenture to make warre against Toledo.

The Moores of Seuille and Cordoua, Tributaries to the king of Castile, by a Treatie made with the king D. Fernand, did protract the time to send the tribute. Whereupon the king D. Alphonso sent D. Roderigo Diaz, called Cid, who being come into Andaloufia, found all in armes and combustion: the Moores of Grenado and their turbulent king Almundasar, hauing begun warre against Almuncamuz, King of Seuille, with the helpe and fauour of some Christians, whereof Fortun Sanchez, whom they held to be sonne-in-law to D. Garcia king of Nauarre, and D. Lopes Sanches his brother, with D. Garcia Ordognes, and a knight of Castile, whose name was D. Diego Perez, were the chiefe: to whom Cid sent to let them vnderstand, that Almuncamuz king of Seuille was vassall to his king, and therefore intreated them to forbear, and not to presse him by armes, but they did not regard it: wherefore Cid embraced the quarrell in such sort, as with the troups he had brought out of Castile, and the Moores which hee had found fit to carrie armes, he gaue a great and bloudie defeate to the Granadins, and their allies, and tooke D. Garcia Ordognes, D. Lopes Sanches, and D. Diego Perez, about mentioned prisoners, whom notwithstanding he deliuered within three dayes after vpon this consideration: the king of Seuille hauing much honored and thanked Cid Ruis Diaz: he payed him what he ought vnto the king of Castile, quit him the whole prey, and moreover presented him with great gifts. Here did Cid purchase the name of Campeador: But for that all the Moores, which ought tribute in Andaloufia, had not payed, the king D. Alphonso went in person to force them, leauing Cid in Castile sicke. In the meane time the Moores of Medina Zelin, or Celi, began to ouer-run the lands of Saint Stephen of Gormas, where they did much harme; against whom Cid, who was somewhat recovered, assembled the forces of Castile, and chased them out of the confines: and as he was of a great courage, and an irreconcilable enemy to the Moores, not respecting which of them he annoyed, hee past on, and entred the countrie neere vnto Toledo, where he put all to fire and sword, and led away about 7000. prisoners of all sexes and ages. This action did so discontent the king D. Alphonso, by reason of the league hee had with king Almenon, as without respect of this knights valour, nor the great seruices which he had done vnto the crowne of Castile, thrust on moreover by the counsell of some which enuid the others vertue, and did aggravate his offence, gaue him commandement to depart his countrie within few dayes: Whereupon Cid departed, hauing left Christian knights in pay with the Moores.

Exploits of Cid Ruis Diaz
in Andaloufia

Excess of Cid
Ruis Diaz, or his vassal
out of Castile.

left his wife and children at Saint Peter of Cardegna: but he was followed by about 300. horse, and a great number of foot, who loved him in particular: and with this troupe began to make violent warres against the Moores. He entred their countrie by Atiença, and wonne Castreion by an ambush which hee layd for the Moores, whilst that Aluaro Ianes Minaya his cousin, did ouer-runne the countrie vnto Alcalá de Henares, from whence he returned to Castreion with great spoiles. And for that Castreion was vpon the frontiers of king D. Alphonso, and for some other respects, Cid abandoned it, and went vnto Hariza, Cetiua, and Alcocer, and striking great terror in all the countrey of Calarajub, Teruil and Tierar, hee surprised Alcocer in Arragon.

At that time the towne of Valencia did belong to the king of Toledo, and was gouerned for king Almenon by a More, called Abubacar, to whom the Inhabitants of Calarajub, and the countrey thereabouts, made their daily complaints of the wrongs and losses they received by Cid, demanding ayde from him: whereupon Abubacar sent them two Captaines, called Faris and Galuc with good troupes; but that could not defend them: for Cid ioyning with them, defeated them, and put them to a shamefull flight, carrying great spoyle to Alcocer, which was his retreat; from whence he sent to king D. Alphonso, by his cousin D. Aluaro Ianes Minaya, thirty horses, with as many swordes tyed to the saddles. This did somewhat pacifie the King, who did willingly see Aluaro Ianes, but for all this he did not call Cid from banishment: yet he suffered all men freely to go to the warres with Cid against the Moores, except Toledo. Cid desirous to make warre, and wanting meanes, hee tooke money vpon the castle of Alcocer, and crossing to Xalon and Monreal, he stayed there some dayes.

11 About this time D. Raymond Ber nger the elder, Earle of Barcelone, being deceased, his sonne D. Raymond called Flaxen-head, succeeded him, in the year 1076. When as neere to Cattelogne, D. Armengol, Earle of Vrgel, wonne from the Mores, Sanahuya, Guizona, Balager, and other places of that countrie.

The same year dyed Almundus king of Seuille, leauing his Realme to his sonne of the same name, who reigned also at Cordoua, and in a manner ouer all Andalusia: so the discord betwixt these Arabians made Cordoua (which had bene lately Princeesse ouer other cities) to be subiect and slaueto Seuille. Cid hauing taken some good order for his affaires, and assembled good troupes of souldiers, hee began to torment the Mores of the streight of Sarragossa, & pressed them in such sort, as Almundus king of Sarragossa, made a treatie with him greatly to his honor, and receiued him into his citie, by whose meanes he drew many Christian Knights, which did willingly receiue pay of these Moores, when they were in armes one against another, that they might helpe to defeat them. Thither D. Aluaro Ianes came vnto him with a good number of souldiers, being desirous to march vnder the command of so valiant a Captaine as Cid was; who vnderstanding of the good reception which the king had made vnto D. Aluaro, and how he had receiued his presents, was wonderfull glad. This year died Almenon king of Toledo; for whose quarrell Cid had bene banished out of Castile: A Prince who had gouerned the kingdome long, and with whom the king D. Alphonso entertained true and firme friendship whilst he liued, and with his sonne and successor Hizen, who reigned onely one year, and died in the year, 1078. after whom a brother of his called Hiaya A'cadurbile, obtained the Crowne of Toledo: a Prince of a bad disposition and cruell, numbred the 11. king of that citie, and the last of the Arabians or Moores.

12 During these things, the king D. Alphonso (discontented, that the Nauarrois had called D. Sancho Ramires, king of Arragon to raigne ouer them, rather then him, who had a better title, being coulin germaine to the king D. Sancho Garcia deceased, by the lawfull line, whereas the king of Arragon descended from a bastard:) seized vpon the towne of Nagera, and of all that iurisdiction, which was in the Prouince of Rioje, of which he made Gouvernor D. Garcia de Cabra, called Crespo de Granon, and intituled himselfe king of Nagera. The people of Guipulcoa, Biscaia, and Alaua, who were neighbors vnto it, hearing of this exploit, and considering the greatnesse of D. Alphonso, they thought good to leane vnto him, and to leaue the kings of Nauarre, who were of lesse power

A power: thus his iurisdiction increased, so as hee commanded from the towne of Saint Iagues, vnto Calaoorra. In this felicity he began to restore and re-people many townes of his countrie, destroyed in former warres, as Salamanca, Auila, Legouia, Medina del campo, Olmedo, Coca and Cuellar.

D. Sancho Ramires king of Arragon, hauing no good title to the Realme of Nauarre, for that D. Ramir Sanchez, sonne to the deceased king was yet living: and by the same reason the king D. Alphonso hauing no good reason to pretend it, they agreed together, to the preiudice of the pupill: by which accord Pampelone, with all the appurtenances (except Nagera and the other countrie whereof D. Alphonso was seized) remained to the king of Arragon, but vpon condition, that he should acknowledge himselfe vassall in that respect to the king of Castile. This king had made warre against the Moores, whilst he was king of Arragon onely, and before he had obtained the kingdome of Nauarre, he had chased them out of the mountaines of Arragon, Sobrarbro and Ribagorça, and moreover had made warre against Abderramen king of Huesca, and taken the towne of Barbastro, at which seege Armingo Earle of Vrgel his father in law dyed. Hauing made his profit of the Realme of Nauarre, and in good termes with D. Alphonso, he continued his enterprises and conquests against that sect, and tooke from them the castell of Mugnonas about Secastilla in Ribagorça: then hee seized of Cobin and Pitilla, and had a great and cruell battaile neere vnto Sarragossa, and tooke from them Bolea, a place of great strength: to supply the charges of which warre, this king was sometimes forced to vie the reuenues of the Clergie, his treasure beeing not able to furnish so great a charge: but the bishops of his countrie, who affected nothing more then to enrich their order and estate, opposed themselves against him, and afflicted him in such sort, as putting him in a vaine feare, that he was damned for this cause, they made him do penance, and to confesse publicly in the church of Roda, before S. Vincent's altar, in the presence, and at the poursute of D. Raymond Dalmace, Bishop of that place, and D. Garcia the kings owne brother, Bishop of Iacca, that he had grievously offended. Thus these good fathers insulted ouer their Soueraigne: This fell out about the year, 1083: at which time D. Ramir sonne to D. Sancho Garcia, moued with great deuotion, gaue a new, and confirmed that which he had giuen to the monastier of Saint Mary of Nagera, which were the places of Torresilla, Cameros, Treuxan, Ribafresca, Lea, Villoria, and S. Pelagius of Cerezo, S. Peter of Torresilla, Saint Mary of Veraça, and other places and churches, making the Monkes and Abbot of that place where he is interred, his heires generall. The King D. Sancho Ramires did in the year 1083. winne the castell of Graos, the which he presented to the Monastier of Saint Victorian, to free himselfe of a certaine vow made by D. Ramir his father, and also for a satisfaction to the Clergie: but some write that soone after hee received a great overthrow about Roda, where they say, that the king D. Alphonso carrying a secret spleene, for that the King of Arragon did enioy the Realme of Nauarre, gaue secret ayde and fauour to the Moores, and was the cause of this defeate of Christians.

E Almundus King of Sarragossa being dead, he had left two sonnes, Zuleima who was king of Sarragossa, and Aben Alay in Denia, who being at dissention, sel to armes: either of them drawing Christian Noblemen and Knights to his part. Cid Ruiz Diaz was for Zuleima. D. Pedro of Arragon eldest sonne to the king D. Sancho Ramires, and Count Raymond of Barcelone fauoured Aben Alphare. Being in armes, and ouer-running the countrie, Cid comming from Huesca and Montaban, incounited the troupes of the Earle of Barcelone, with the king of Denia, whom he defeated, taking Count Raymond prisoner, who was soone after freely set at libertie by Cid, yet the Earle of Barcelone ioynd againe with the king of Denia, who came to beseege the castell of Almenar, whilst that Cid was at the seege of Escarpe: but he comming vpon them which were before Almenar, he put them againe to route, and returned victor to Sarragossa: after which he spoiled the countries of Mançon, Onda, and Burriana, notwithstanding that the Arragonois fought to hinder him, being their allies. On the other side, a More of Andalusia, called Almufalas, tooke from Adofir, another Moore, the castell of Grados, for the recouerie whereof, the king D. Alphonso went to armes, and beseeged

Nauarre and Arragon.

The Kings of Castile and Arragon spoile the heire of Nauarre of his Kingdome.

conquests of the king of Arragon vpon the Moores.

King made to do penance by the Bishops of his country.

An. 1083.

Princes of Spaine betray their fellow Christians.

Moores.

Faour and Countie of Cid

Castile.

Victories of D. Alphonso King, after vpon the realm of Nauarre.

Townes yielded to D. Alphonso.

Gouernor put into Toledo.

Family of Toledo in Castill.
Primacie restored to Toledo.

Riches of the church of Toledo.

Debate for the primacie
of Spaine.

Moors.

tion) would grant those articles aboue-mentioned to the Moores, especially to leaue A the great Molquee for the exercise of their superstition. By the conquest of this great citie, there came into the King of Castile power, without any resistance, the townes of Magueda, Escalona, Illescas, Canales, Olmos, Talauera, Coria Consuegra, Mora, Buytrago, Hita, Medina Celi, Atiença, Berlanga, Guadalajara; and by this meanes were also assured the townes of Salamanca, Auila, Segobia, Olma, Sepulueda, Coca, Cuellar, Roa and Olmedo, the citie of Toledo seruing as a rampar and fort, to all that lies betwixt it, Atiença, and Medina Celi, and by consequence to Palença, Coria, and citiy Roderigues: so as all that was within that circuit began to bee repaired and re-edified, the inhabitants beeing freed from their great feare of the Moores.

The first worke which the king D. Alphonso did after the taking of Toledo, was to re- payre the castell, forts, and bridges, giuing the gouernement thereof to Cid Ruiz Diaz, with a garrison of a thousand Gentlemen Castillans. The house and family of them of Toledo, which is famous in Spaine, is deriued from a Grecian knight, called Peter Paleologue, who came to serue D. Alphonso, at the siege of this city: but there are appa- rent arguments, that the name of the family of Toledo is more ancient: for there is a tombe to be seene in the royall Monasterie of Ogná, of a knight called D. Gutierre Rode- rigues of Toledo, who had bene Chamberlaine to D. Sancho Earle of Castile, who died in the yeare 990. of this D. Peter, they say, issued a sonne called D. Illian Peres, of him D. Peter Illian; of D. Peter, D. Esseuan Illian, whose image is to be seene on hori- backe in the church of that citie. Don Esseuan begat Don Ican Esseuanes, from whom C issued Don Gonsalo Iaine of Toledo, who lyes buried in Saint Romaines church, built in the highest part of the citie, by D. Esseuan Illian. D. Vrraca, the King D. Alphonso's sister beeing deceased this yeare 1083. Zamora whereof she was Ladie, was re-united to the crowne of Castile.

As king D. Alphonso desired nothing more, then to order things belonging to reli- gion, and the seruice of God: in a great assembly of Noblemen and Prelates, made to that end, restored the Primacie and Archiepiscopall seate of Spaine, to the church of Toledo, as it had bene in the time of the Gothes: and there was chosen for Archbishop a reuerent religious man, of the Order of S. Bennet called Friar Bernard, a French-man borne, who had bene sent some yeares before into Spaine, by Hugo Abbot of Clugny, at the request of D. Alphonso, for the reformation of the Mona- sterie of Sahagun, which at that time was the chiefe of all the Monasteries of Spaine: this Friar Bernard was found so sufficient for his learning and integritie of life, as he was held worthy to be preferred before all the Bishops and Abbots of the countrie, to the primacie of Spaine; which sea beginning by this King D. Alphonso, was so enriched by all the kings and chiefe Noble-men of Spaine, as besides the primacie and head Chan- cerie of Castile which it hath gotten, we may now say, that next vnto the Pope, hee is the richest Prelate in Christendome. Since that time the church of Toledo hath bene in great credit and authoritie among all those of Europe, and is serued with an incre- dible number of Clerkes: for besides the Archbishop, 14 dignities, 40. Chanoins with Prebends, and 50. Portionists, and other extraordinarie Chanoins, there are so many Priests, Chaplaines, Clerkes, Chantres, and other Officers that haue fee, as they ex- ceed 600. being very rich moreouer in Jewels and plate. The first Arch-bishop of To- ledo is called Eugenius the Martyr, from whom to Friar Bartholomew Carranza of Mi- randa, who was in our time; they number 76. The Archbishops of Farragone and Bra- ga, contend with him of Toledo for the primacie, neither will the Archbishops of S. Ja- yans & Sarragossa, acknowledge him for primate; which quarrell heaue vnto theselues.

To returne to our Historie, after that king Hiaja Alcadurbile had lost Toledo, he went into the territorie of Valencia, the which was held by Abubacar, terming himselfe king of that place, being but Gouernor some yeares before, vnder the kings of Toledo. This Abubacar was discreet and wise, and had gouerned that towne vprightly many yeares: who to assure his vsurped estate, had giuen his daughter in marriage to Amet Aben-Hut king of Sarragossa, successor to Zuleima. About the taking of Toledo or soone after, he died, leauing two of his sons for successors, who fell to so great discord, and by reason of them

A them, the people, as Abocca Aben-Lope Captaine of the fort, foreseeing the ruine of these two young Princes, & fearing that these diuisions would make them fall into the hands of the kings of Castile, was readie to abandon the place, and to retire to Morue- tro, and other lands in that quarter; which were his: but beeing better aduised by a Se- cretarie a Moore, called Mahomad Aben-Hay, hee stayed still to see what would bee the end of these factions of Valencia: some were of opinion rather then to yeeld vnto their aduersaries, to giue themselues vnto the king of Sarragossa; others to him that had bene king of Toledo; to whose father Almenon they had bene subiect. These troubles made work for Hiaja Alcadurbile, who lost neither time nor oportunitie, but came be- fore Valencia with such Mores as he could keep together, with whom soone after those

B ioyned which king D. Alphonso sent him, according to the treatie, vnder the condu& of Aluaro Ianes Minaya. Being thus camped, and rather solliciting the towne by good words and promises, then attempting it by armes, in the end they were receiued, and King Hiaja acknowledged for their lawfull Prince, to whom Abocca Aben-Lope, the captaine of the Fort, yeelded vp the keyes, and purchasing by that present the Kings fa- uour, and assured his estate and life: for king Hiaja hated him, for that he had bene al- waies of the faction of Abubacar his rebell: notwithstanding knowing him to bee wise, and a man of good seruice, hauing also performed so good an office, as to yeeld him vp the fort, he receiued him into grace, and honored him, leauing him in the same charge.

C At the same time Hamet Aben-Hut king of Sarragossa died, to whom succeeded Ioseph Aben-Hut. King Hiaja liued in such continuall distrust, as he would neuer giue leaue to Aluaro Ianes Minaya and his souldiers to returne home into Castile: for the intertain- ing wherof, this king was forced to ouer-charge his subiects with insupportable taxa- tions. There was a Captaine of the Moores in the towne of Xatiua, called Aben-Macor, who would not present himselfe before King Hiaja, being notwithstanding in all other things obedient vnto him, but the king not satisfied therewith, would haue him: where- fore he led an army of Moores and Castillans before Xatiua, and battered it in vaine: for besides that the beleaged defended themselues valiantly, they called vnto their suc- cours the king of Denia their neighbor, who seized vpon the place, and kept it in de- spite of king Hiaja, who was forced to retire, hauing lost, by ouer-pressing it, that which D he might haue enjoyed with a litle patience.

Whilst that D. Alphonso disposed of the affairs of his new conquest, & that the Mores more diuided then euer, not able to discern the miseries which pursued them, conti- nued their spoiles; and to stir vp new troubles among themselues, D. Sancho Ramires king of Nauarre and Arragon, being loth to liue idle, and to let slip such good occasions to inlarge his dominions, and to aduance the Christians power in Spaine. Hee won a bat- tell of the Moores, nere vnto a place called Pietra Pisada, took from them the towne of Arguedas, and defeated them in another battell nere to Tudela: and fought with them the third time about Morella; which incounters fell out happily for the Christians, in the yeare 1084. And the yere after, seeing that he had made great conquests in the cham- pion countrie, he gaue to his eldest son the realm of Sobratbre and Ribagorça, with the title of King, and a while after the Queene D. Felicia died, who was interred at S. Iean de la Pegna.

The estate of Barcelona, after the death of Cont Raymond Berenger the elder, was in great combustion by the emulation of his two sons D. Berenger Raymond, and D. Raymond Berenger, called Flaxen head, wherof the eldest held a part of the countrie of Catelogne: but D. Raymond Berenger the yonger commanded the greatest part. So as the Moores were not molested in their estates by them; but D. Raymond Berenger followed the partie of the Morish king of Denia, against him of Sarragossa, who enuied the o- thers estate, as we haue sayd. Yet some hold opinion, that it was D. Raymond Berenger the elder, their father, who carried armes against the King of Sarragossa: and that on the other side, D. Raymond Flaxen head, was his friend and ally. Only Armingol Earle of Vr- gel, did vertuously make war against the Mores, vpon the frontiers of Catelogne. D. Raymond Flaxen head had married a most vertuous Lady, called D. Almodia, daughter to Robert Guichard duke of Pouillia, by whom hee had D. Raymond Arnould which suc- ceeded him.

Seditious and trecheries among the Moores of Spaine.

Nauarre and
Arragon.

Ann. 1084.

Barcelona.

Parricide betwixt the Princes of Castelle.

The Spanish Authors shew a great argument of this Ladies holinesse and religion, A for that in her husbands life time, she built the Monasterie of Val de Mary, of the Order of Saint Benet, in the Vicountie of Cabrera, and another of Saint Daniel, of the same Order neare vnto Gironne, where she professed her selfe, and liued a Nunne, after the decease of the king, her husband: in whose life time, some people of the Countie of Gerdagne, reuiued the Artian heresie, for the prevention whereof D. Guillem Ierdain, Earle of that place, was much troubled. The ambition of raigne was such betwixt the two Earles of Barcelona, as the eldest slue the youngest by treason, watching him as he went from Ostarlit to Gironne: this D. Raymond Flaxen-head, hauing reigned onely six years; a religious, mild, courteous, and bountifull Prince, and of a goodly presence, and therefore lamented of all men. This fratricide seeking to dissemble his treason, did weep much before the world, but he could not so well disguise his offence, but the truth was knowne.

Wherefore the Carrelans reiected him, and in the yeare 1082. chose Don Raymond Arnould, the son of the deceased, for their Earle, chasing away D. Berenger Raymond, who thinking by trecherie to take away another mans, lost his own patrimonie: and beeing poore and dishonored, and moreouer, by a iust iudgement of God, hauing lost his speech, he died in Ierusalem, whither he went in pilgrimage. During the infancy of this young Count Raymond Arnould, some tyrants of Prouence & Langue- doc did inuade the territories of Carcaffone, giuing the Earle of Barcelona to vnderstand, that they would hold it in fee of him, and do him homage, and restore it vnto him, when hee should come of age. This Earle Raymond Arnould was a great personage, C as wee shall heare hereafter.

Castile.

Returning to Toledo, after that the king D. Alphonso had giuen order for all things that were necessarie for the gard of that cittie, he returned to Leon, leauing Cid Ruiz Diaz for Governour: and for the ecclesiasticall and ciuill gouernement, Queene Constance his wife, falsely called by some Beatrice, with the Archbishop D. Bernard and others: during the kings absence, this Prelate beeing very zealous in his religion, and discontented that the Moores remaining in Toledo, did enioy the Mosquee maior, a rare and stately building, among all them of Spaine, layed a plot with the Queene to deprive them of it, and without any respect to the promise and oath made by the king, he seized thereon, and forbad the Moores the vse and entrie into this temple, the which D he did consecrate the Cathedrall church the fifth of October, 1086. All this was done suddenly, and without the kings priuitie: the Queene and Archbishop knowing well, that it would much displease him, but their hope was, that what had beene done would not be easily vndone, by reason of the respect the king carried to Prelates, and to the Christian religion; for the honouring whereof they had vndertaken it, the which succeeded according to their conceits: for the king beeing returned, and seeing that of force they would make him periured, being somewhat discontented with the Queene and D. Bernard, in the end he was pacified with such perswasions, that it was an vnworthie thing, that in an Archiepiscopall cittie, and the first in dignitie in Spaine, that infidels should enioy the greatest and most stately Temple, there to exercise their impieties and blasphemies, to the great dishonour of the king, and the name of Christians: and the griefe of pastors and holy Ministers of the Church. Wherefore it was expedient he should aduow the fact; the which was not done rashly, but with great zeale, and by diuine inspiration. Herunto, they say, were added the supplications of the Moores, That it would please the king to suffer things as they were, and not to discontent the people: and that for their parts they would willingly exercise their religion in a place of lesse shew. For the Moores spake an Alfagui of their lawe, whose image is to bee scene cut in stone, in the great chappell of that church.

Gothique seruice changed
in Spaine.

The seruice called Gothique or Isidorian, for that Isidorus had brought it in, and afterwards called Musarabic, for the Christians liuing among the Moores had maintained it, was in vse, vntill that time as well at Toledo, as in Castile and Leon: but the King Don Alphonso desiring to shew himselfe in all things an affectionate sonne to the Romish sea, would haue it changed, and in stead thereof the Gregorian Seruice receiued,

A received, so called of the author Gregory; for which effect hee caused a Bull to be sent from the Pope then raigning, commanding that the seruice of Rome should be from thenceforth celebrated in all the Churches of Spaine, as they did in France, by reason whereof, it is called by some Spaniards, Gallican. This done, the Archbishop new chosen, went to Rome, where he entred, when as Urban the 2. entred his Popedom, and there tooke his oath, receiued the Archbishops cloake, and was confirmed Primace of Spaine, and not onely of Spaine, but of Gothique France, as the limits of the Primacie of Toledo had bene in the time of the king of the Gothes: in witnesse whereof the Spaniards write, that (to shew his rights and prerogatiues) at his returne from Rome, he called a Councell at Tholoufa, where the Archbishop of Narbone did assist, with B other bishops of those countries, suffragans, and subject to the Iurisdiction of the Prelates of Toledo.

The Metropol-itane of Languedoc vnder
the Primace of Toledo.

Councell at Tholoufa.

During his absence, Richard Abbot of Saint Victor of Marseilles, was Legate in Spaine (being sent some yeares before by Gregory the 7. Predecessour to Urban the 2.) who tooke great paines to bring in the new Gregorian or Romish seruice, and to abolish the Musarabic: for which consideration, and to put in execution that which had beene decreed, the Arch-bishop Bernard, at his returne called a nationall Councell at Toledo, whereas the Clergie, Knights, and people of Toledo, Castile, Leon, Asturia, Galicia, and Portugal were assembled, or their Deputies in great numbers. D. Bernard presiding the King beeing present, there grew great controuersies among them, C the Spaniards refusing to leaue their ancient manner, to receiue a new seruice, so as not able to be satisfied by any allegations and reasons, they came to a furious and brutish manner of triall, by combat, which was much vsed in those times: there were two knights brought to field, the one for the king, and others who desired alteration of the seruice, the other for the knights and commons, which would keepe the Musarabic: for these came San Ruiz, of the family of Matanza, who vanquished him which fought for the Romane seruice, whose name is vknown. Yet the importunitie of the King, queene, Archbishop, and others of that partie was such, as the businesse was referred to another kind of triall, which was by fire: wherefore hauing brought two bookes, the one containing the seruice after the Romane vse; the other, the ancient and Musarabic, they D were both cast into a great fire, whereof the Romane booke leapt presently out (as they say) and the other lay still, and was nothing burnt.

Controuersies for Ecclesiasti-
call matters decided by armes.

Triall by fire in Clergie matters.

Wherefore they did coniecture, that either of them was pleasing vnto God: and for this cause it was ordained, That they should retaine the ancient manner of seruice in fixe parishes of Toledo, and that in the great Cathedral church and others the new Gregorian seruice was brought in; and likewise in all the rest of Don Alphonso's Kingdome, the which was granted more by force, to please the king, and to obey the Pope, (who confirmed and allowed it,) then for any good will. Yet the Musarabic Office continued long after, in many Monasteries of Spaine: and in the same great church of Toledo, euen at this day they sing Masse all after the Musarabic, euery E day in a Chappell called Corpus Domini.

The fixe Parishes of that Cittie, where as this seruice was maintained, had beene held by the Christians Musarabes, whilst that the Moores did raigne there, which are Saint Iust, Saint Luke, Saint Anselin, Saint Marke, Saint Eulalia, and Saint Sebastian. That the Musarabic seruice aunciently vsed were that which they hold at this day, and that it was not reformed and corrected, I will not doubt: for in matters of Religion, it is most certaine, that all things haue beene fitted to the time, and so the dispositions of those which liued from age to age, especially in that which concerned the ecclesiasticall discipline. The day of the reception of this Romish seruice, is quoted by the Spaniards the one and twentieth of May, in the yeare 1091, at the third hower.

F Matters concerning Religion beeing ordered at Toledo, Don Alphonso gaue many honourable titles, dignities, and priuiledges to the Cittie, to their great aduantage. For first of all, by reason of this conquest intitling himselfe Emperour of Spaine, hee would haue Toledo called and denominated the Imperiall and Monarchicke city, a name which hath remained and continued vnto this day. And to giue the Christians occasion

Toledo called the Imperiall city.

occasion to come and dwell there, (for the greatest part of the inhabitants were Mores) A he granted rights and priuiledges to the cittizens, as follow, beeing drawne out of the letters which are in their Registers.

Priuiledges granted to the city of Toledo.

1 First, he ordained for a priuiledge to that cittie, that all controuerfies amongst the cittizens should be iudged there, according to the lawes and ordonances written in the booke called Of Iudges, appointing a Councell of fixe of the most sufficient men amongst them, to assist the Iudge: all which together should take knowledge of the peoples causes, exempting the Castilians, who might decline from that seate, and desire to be sent before their ordinarie Iudges. According to which booke of Iudges, all the inhabitants of Toledo, and that iurisdiction should be iudged in matters of crime: expressly exempting the wiues and children of offenders, (not culpable) from the pains, and fines due for all offences, namely, for high treason, or practises against the city.

2 That the inhabitants of Toledo might appeale from all other Iudges, & demand to be sent to the Iustice of Toledo, declaring all decrees against it to be void.

3 That the Inhabitants of Toledo should not be apprehended, nor put in prison for murder, vnlesse it were wilful, if they put in caution, or that the truth were apparent: and whereas they could not giue caution, they should not be put in any other prison, then the Dalfada.

4 All controuerfies betwixt Christians and Iewes, or Moores, should be decided by the Christian lawes, and before a Christian Iudge.

5 Exemptions, granted vnto Church-men seruing God, of the tenth peny in all their inheritances.

6 Exemption of all taxes granted to souldiers, and to all such as had beene prisoners amongst the Moores.

7 All inhabitants of Toledo, as well Christians as Musarabes, should equally enioy all royall grants.

8 The widowes of souldiers deceased, should enioy the honors, and priuiledges of their husbands, and the children of their fathers, yea the sons should haue their arms & horses.

9 The laborers and trimmers of vines should pay vnto the king for all tribute and seruice, the tenth peny, or portion of their corne and wine, and not bound to any other charges either in peace or war, except it were to succor the city of Toledo, beeing assailed by foes, in which case they should be bound to assist it with all their meanes.

10 The like exemptions were granted to the inhabitants of Toledo, for all lands, which they should hold in any other iurisdiction of the kings of Castile.

11 Liberty granted to the inhabitants of the said city, to build milles vpon the river of Tajo, against their lands and possessions, and to sell them, exchange them, and otherwise dispose of them at their pleasures.

12 No Iew nor Moore should haue commandement ouer Christians in the city of Toledo.

13 That the city of Toledo might neuer be alienated from the Crowne, nor giuen vpon any title whatsoever, to man, woman, or child.

14 No man, that had not his ordinarie residence in the sayd city, might enioy any inheritance within the wals thereof, which inhabitants might enter into their lands and possessions, from whence they had beene chased by the Moores, in such townes and places as should be recovered from them.

15 The common treasure of the city should be employed, especially, in the building and reparations of the wals, and the fortifications thereof.

These were the priuiledges granted by the king D. Alphonso the 6. to the city of Toledo, the which were afterwards confirmed by D. Alphonso the 9. an 101 yeares after, so as by meanes thereof, it was in a short time peopled with Christians, which came thither from all parts of Spaine, and other countries: and the kings of Spaine haue bin alwaies very carefull to honor this city. D. Alphonso leauing the city of Toledo in this estate, in the gard of Cid Ruis Diaz, he went to Leon, with the Archbish. D. Bernard, where there was a councell called, in the presence of Regnier the Popes Nuntio; where among other things it was decreed, that the Scribes and Notaries should no more vse the ancient

Gothique characters, which were abolished in Spaine.

A ancient Gothique characters, intinted (as they say) by Rislas their Bishop, otherwise called Toledains: but those letters which are now vsed in Castile, were at that time not put in practise: About that time died D. Theresa, the kings sister, wife to the Earle D. Garcia de Cebra, and soon after Queene Beatrice the 2. wife of D. Alphonso beeing deceased, he took to wife a Princeesse Moore, daughter to Almuntamuz Aben-Amet, King of Seuille, called Caida, or Zaida, the which was christened and called Mary. He recelued for her dourie the townes of Cuenca, Huete, Ocagna, Vcles, Mota, Volera, Consuegra, Alarcos, Caracuel, and other places. By her the king had one son, named D. Santis, who died before the father, and the mother liued not long after him.

*Marriage of
D. Alphonso
the 6. King of Castile with a
Moore.*

This alliance caused great familiarity betwixt the king D. Alphonso, & the Moores, both B in Spaine and Affricke, the which notwithstanding turned to the Moores ruine, and especially of his father-in-law Almuntamuz Aben-Amet, K. of Seuille: for to do him a pleasure, and to satisfie his ambition, and desire to be soueraign Lord ouer all the Moores in Spaine, King D. Alphonso, who was in great credit with all the Princes and Potentates that were neighbours to Aben Tefin, who was of the house and family of the Almorauides, to ayde and assist his father-in-law in this enterprife, and to send him succours of Moores and Africans, the which he obtained to the preiudice of them both, as we shall heare. But it is fit to vnderstand, first what these Almorauides were: Wherefore leauing a little the affaires of Spaine, we will returne to that which we haue handled of the succession of Mahumet. The which (as we haue sayd) beeing fallen to two of his daughters succession.*

Arabians.

*Mahumet's

C Fatima and Zeineb, of Fatima descended the house and family of Aben Aben, and of Zeineb, that of Aben Humeja. These two races were in perpetuall dissention for the Soueraigntie of the Arabians, both in Asia, Affricke, and Europe, whereupon grew many alterations: so as in the end the Arabians of Affricke being diuided from them of Asia, the Crowne of Affricke continued in the race of Aben Alabey, for the space of 310. yeeres, but as this nation was neuer faithfull within it selfe, and could not subsist without tumult and treasons: about the year 1068. there rose vp a noble family among them, called the Almorauides, or Lumpunus, which descended not from Mahumet; the which took the scepter from the race of Aben Alabey, and stazed vpon the soueraigntie, and regall power ouer the Moores in Affricke: 450. yeares after that Mahumet had made himselfe

D Lord and Emperour ouer that nation: The first of this race which was chosen and declared king, and great Miralmumin, was Abu Texifen, to whom Ioseph Aben Tefin aboue-named his sonne succeeded, who forced the others to quit the Scepter, and transferred it into his family, where it continued 79. yeares: the second yeare of his raigne, Ambassadors came vnto him from king D. Alphonso, for the cause aboue-mentioned: so as within three yeares after, all the Moores of Spaine were vnited to them of Affricke, as they had beene long before. Ioseph Aben Texifen the Miralmumin, considering, that if he sent forces into Spaine, it must needs increase the Moores estate and reputation: he sent a Captaine of great esteeme, called Ali Aben-Axa, his Alguazil-maior, or Lieutenant in the countrie of Maroc, who with a great power of men of this race of the

*Moores of Affricke drawne into Spaine
by D. Alphonso
the 6. King of Castile and
Leon.*

E Almorauides, and other Africans, came and landed in Andaloufia, and ioyned with the king of Seuille: but they stayed not long together, for being growne into some controuerfie, it drew them into sedition and armes: so as their forces being diuided, and ioyning in battaile in the open field, Almuntamuz Aben-Amet King of Seuille, lost his life; and this new-come Moore not onely leazed vpon his lands and Segneuries without any difficulty, but also made all the other Moores of Spain subiect vnto him, saying, that they had rather keep the Arabians Camels, then the Swine of the Christian Spaniards. Ali Aben-Axa was so fortunate in his proceedings, as he grew exceeding proud, not respecting his king any more: but rebelling openly against him, hee seized the royall seate at Cordoua, and caused himself to be called Miralmumin of Spaine: by means whereof all the treaties of peace which had bin contracted betwixt the Moores and Christians F of Spaine, were then broken: and moreover, this new king of the Moores, thought to recover the countries which had bin held by the Moores, namely those, which D. Alphonso had had in dowry with Q. Caida his last wife: so as the king D. Alphonso thinking to enioy an assured peace, hee found himselfe suddenly engaged in great and dangerous

*Moores in Spaine vnited
under Ali A.
ben-Axa.*

warres: for Ali entering into the Realme of Toledo, he spoyled the countie at his pleasure, having gotten two great victories, and put two mightie armies of D. Alphonso to bloudie routes: so as the lands of D. Caidas downe, with others, came into his power, the which was the more easie to effect, for that they were in a manner all inhabited by Moors. Yet in a third expedition, whereas D. Alphonso went in person with all the flower of his kingdomes, the conquerors furie was stayed, so as he was forced for feare (seeing this great preparation made against him) to keepe himselfe within Cordoua, and to abandon his countie to the spoile, not daring to defend it, and in the end came to a composition and treaty of peace with D. Alphonso, by the which he made himselfe his vassall and tributarie, giving him rich presents, and great sums of money, wherewith the King and his armie beeing enriched, they returned victoriously into Castile. From thence king D. Alphonso hauing gotten new courage, led his armie to subdue Sarragossa, and did so presse it, as the Inhabitants did offer to hold it in fee of him, and to do him homage, the which he refused, demanding the city: but whilest he was busie at this enterprize, beheld there arriues in Spaine a great cloude of African Moores, which stricke a greater terror in Spaine then had beene in many ages. It was Ioseph Aben Tefis the Miralumin, who incensed at the trecherie of Ali, was come out of Affricke with a greater armie of Moores, then had bin seene in long time, to take reuenge of his trecherie.

Ioseph Aben Tefis king of Maroc, subdued all the Moores in Spaine vnder his Empire

An. 1089.

16 The presence of this king stayed the siege of Sarragossa, brake the accord made betwixt Alphonso and Ali, and was the cause of many great alterations. Hee besieged and forced Ali in the city of Seuille, and as a traytour, cut off his head: he seized vpon Cordoua, in the which was a sonne of Abenacmus, and in a short time hee brought all Andalusia vnder his obedience, and in a manner all the Noblemen and townes which the Moores held in Spaine: he drew vnto his seruice some Earles and Noblemen Christians, with many souldiers; whome gaue, or their disordered passions, commanded more then religion. One of these Earles was called D. Ordoines de Lara: So the Moores of Spaine ioyned with them of Affricke, vnder one Miralumin in the yeare, 1089. hauing bene diuided 334. yeares, they of Affricke beeing subiect to the race of Aben-Alabey, vnto this king, and these of Spaine obeying the family of Aben-Humys from Abderramen the first: This king stayed some time in Spaine, to dispose of his new conquests, not respecting any more the friendship of king D. Alphonso, who first had inuited him to come into Spaine, and then he returned into Affricke, where hee had setled his imperiall seate at Maroc or Marrox. Then began there a difficult war betwixt these two Potentates in Spaine: by reason whereof King D. Alphonso sought the friendship and succors of other Christian Princes: vpon which occasion there came many valiant Knights into Spaine, to winne honor by armes, and moued also with zeale of religion; among the which were three Princes, whereof mention hath beene made in the beginning of this raigne: that is, Raymond son to William, brother to the Earle of Bourgonne; Henry of Lorraine or of Befançon, and his vnkle or cousin Raymond of Thoulousa, and of S. Giles: with these and other braue souldiers, as well Spaniards, as of other nations, D. Alphonso made head against this Arabian king: so as he stoppt his course, and ouer-run his country newly conquered, taking great spoiles, and carrying away many prisoners, without any opposition.

Portugall.

Henry of Lorraine first Earle of Portugall.

Portugall held in fee of the Crown of Leon

17 At that time D. Alphonso (for the good seruices hee had receiued from these three personages, and to bind them the more to defend the Christians estate in Spaine) gaue them his daughters in marriage to Henry of Lorraine, whom some call Earle of Limbourg, D. Theresa his bastard, to whom bearing a priuate affection, hee gaue the countie of Portugall, which he had conquered from the Moores, with the hereditarie title of an Earle, for him and his heires lawfully begotten, and withall making him a promise to adde vnto his Seigneuries whatsoeuer he should conquer from the Moores in those parts, with the same right of hereditarie succession. These goodly gifts did the king D. Alphonso bestow vpon D. Henry, vpon condition, that they should acknowledge the kings of Leon for their Soueraigne Lords, and hold them in fee of them, do them homage, and present themselves at the kings court at Leon, whensoeuer they should

A should call there vassals, and serue them against their enemies: Moreouer they should furnish three hundred horse, with some other duties. This was the beginning of the Siegneury of Portugall, and of the royall posterity of the possessors of that country. To Raymond Earle of Tolouise and Saint Gyles, King D. Alphonso gaue D. Eluira an other of his bastards; and to Count Raymond of Bourgonne D. Yraia his lawfull daughter, with the Government of Galicia; & the title of an Earle, which was the ordinary title of great dignities in Spaine, in those times.

D. Sancho Ramirez, King of Nauarre and Arragon, did all hee could to annoy the Moores, vpon his borders: from whom hee tooke about the yeere of our Lord 1089. the towne of Montçon, yet with great difficulty, by reason of the fort, and the obstinate defence of the garrison. The same yeere the preuiledges of Nobility, with all exemptions, were confirmed to them of the valley of Roncal, as a testimony that they had bene alwaies valiant and faithfull to their Kings.

Nauarre and Arragon.

In the yeere 1091. hee forced Abderramen the Moore, King of Huesca, to pay him tribute: he sent succors to his cousin D. Alphonso of Castille, in the warre which hee made vpon the marches of Toledo; and hauing a designe to besiege Sarragossa in time, hee beganne a fort neere to the riuer of Ebro, six leagues from Sarragossa, the which he called Castellar: he wonne afterwards from the Moores, Olalla, Almena, ra and Naua, and he peopled Luna; from whence is descended the family of Luna; and to coope vp the King of Huesca, hee fortified the castles of Marcuello, Loarre and Alguear, vpon the Marches of Sobrarbre, and subiected all that is betwixt it and Montarragon, within a league of Huesca: wherefore King Abderramen seeing himselfe restrained daily more and more, hee had recourse vnto D. Alphonso King of Castille, offering to pay him a greater tribute, then hee did to him of Nauarre, if hee would take him into his protection: wherevnto D. Alphonso gaue eare, beeing glad to make himselfe great by what meanes soeuer, of such power is ambition in the hearts of men, who sparing not the King D. Sancho his cousin, hee had wrested from him the Siegneury of Guipulcoa, which had euer bene vnto the crowne of Nauarre, and had made Earle and Gouernor, in his name, D. Lopes Diaz of Haro, Lord of Biscay. This manner of proceeding did much displease D. Sancho Ramirez, who for this cause hauing

An. 1091.

Fort of Castellar built.

D sent some troupes of souldiers, to the frontiers of Alaua, to entertaine the Castilians, he went to the siege of Huesca, being resolved to take it at what price soeuer: hee was accompanied by his sonnes D. Pedro, King of Sobrarbre, and D. Alphonso, with the forces of Nauarre and Arragon: but as he proceeded in this siege, with to great vehemency, it happened that going to vew the weakest places, with his captaines, he was shot with a Moorish arrow vnder the arme-hole, as he lifted vp his arme, to shew some one that was neere him, a place where he thought fit to make his battery. The blow was mortall, the which D. Sancho feeling he retired to his tent, dissembling his paine as much as hee could: being there, hee caused D. Pedro and D. Alphonso his children to sweare, not to depart from the siege, vntill they had taken the towne, and soone after hee died, as they drew the arrowe out of the wound.

D. Sancho Ramirez King of Arragon, liued at the siege of Huesca.

Hee was a valiant Prince, and had happily enlarged his dominions by conquests against the Moores; but his neighbors Christians were not very faithfull, euen D. Alphonso King of Castille. Hee loued iustice and Government: the towne of Estella was begunne by him, the which at this day is one of the three cities of Nauarre, and the second in dignity. He affected religion much, according to the practise of that age; for besides many donations made by him to churches and monasteries, and the re-edifying of them that were ruined, hee made D. Ramir his youngest sonne a religious man of the order of Saint Benet, in the monastery of Saint Ponce of Tomierres. D. Pedro his eldest sonne succeeded him, in the realme of Nauarre and Arragon, in the yeere of our Lord 1094. about this time many monasteries of France, obtained exemption from the jurisdiction of Bishops, the Monkes being desirous to enioy greater liberty, & their Abbots to adorne themselves with crosses and miters like Bishops.

About that time D. Theresa, countesse of Portugall, had a sonne by Henry of Lorraine, or of Befançon at a place called Guymanes: his name was D. Alphonso, as the King of Sigüenza and in the end Bishop of Saint Jaques: Peter also of Agen, second Arch-deacon of Toledo, and since bishop of Segobia: Raymond of Agen, who succeeded in the Bishopricke of Oñna, and in the end to the same D. Bernard in his dignity of Toledo: an other Peter who was Bishop of Palence, and Ierosme of Perigueux, whom hee made Bishop of Valencia, arriuing in that city soone after that D. Roderigo Diaz de Bivar had conquered it; to whom he was an assistant to order clergy matters. Hee carried with him also one Bernard, who was bishop of Zamora: and besides a Limosin called Bourdin, who was Arch-deacon of Toledo, and afterwards Bishop of Coimbra, and successiue Arch-bishop of Braga: but this Bourdin became a Judas to the church of Rome, and would haue made himselfe Pope, against Calixtus the second, which caused a great scisme.

An. 1094. Portugall.

All this feed the Archbishop of Toledo brought out of France into Spaine, at his returne from Rome, & furnished Spaine with these Prelats, in recompence of the vow which he did not performe to goe to the holy war: and moreover he re-built churches and other apparent places in the rowtie of Tarragone, with the money which was prepared for his voyage, and there established; Berenger Archbishop, hauing beene Bishop of Vic: Ausone, leauing the temporality of that towne to Raymond Arnould Earle of Barcelona.

Barcelona.

This Princee was left young at the death of his father, who had beene cruelly murdered by his owne brother, desirous to rule alone in Cartelogne. He was much troubled with diuisions and factions betwixt the Noblemen of the country, and was spoiled of Carcaffone and other Lands which he had in France, by tyrants, as it happens often during the minority of the Prince or Lord. His mother the Contesse Almodia, a widow, gaue ouer al government, and professed herselfe a Nunne in the conuent of Saint Daniel of Gironne: so as hee remained in the hands of Armingal Earle of Vrgel, the Earle of Cerdagne, and some other of his blond, who beeing imploied against the Moores, got for themselves, and did not much attend the good of their pupil, yet did he grow both in vertue and valour. Cont Armingal died in the yeere of our Lord 1092, and D. Guillen lordain of Cerdagne, went to the warre: of Syria with Godfrey of Bourillon, where beeing dead and soone after his brother D. Bernard Guillen his successor, leauing no heires of their bodie, the Earle D. Raymond Arnould, as neere allied did inherit the Earledome, whom God did so fauour, as that Bernard of Aton who had usurped Carcaffone, was growne so hatefull to them of the country, as they chased him away, and deliuered the towne to D. Raymond Arnould their naturall Lord. So he not onely recouered that which they had taken from him, but also augmented his Estates and Siegneuries with the towne of Farragone, and the country of Cordagne. We haue sayd before, that he was in a certaine incounter against Cid Ruiz Diaz, during the warres betwixt Valencia and Denia, and that hee was repulled and vanquished by him: but became afterwards good friends, after that Cid had taken Valencia about the yeere of our Lord 1096.

God the Father, victor of pagans.

Castille.

To returne to which conquest, we will say that Cid did presently send to King D. Alphonso his Lord, a hundred goodly horses richly furnished, with other great presents, who being in Palenza, receiued them with great contentment. He sent other presents to D. Ximena his wife, whom with his two daughters, D. Eluira, and D. Sol, he caused to come to Valencia with the leaue of King D. Alphonso. The Almorauides of Affrike staid not long before they past the seas, to defend their new conquest in Spaine, and came into the country of Valencia with a great power, but they were repulled by Cid with great losse and dishonour; of the spoiles of which victories Cid sent two hundred horses vnto the King, richly furnished, and at euery saddle did hang a sword of great value. The King D. Alphonso was at that time at Villedolit in Castille, who receiued this present gratiouly: There beganne the treaty of marriage for the daughters of Cid, with D. Diego and D. Fernand Gonzales, sonnes to D. Gonzale Lord of Carrion, for the effecting whereof, the King, Cid and the parties came to Requena, whether the King brought the two young Noblemen, to whom Cid promised his daughters; and afterwards the marriages were celebrated at Valencia with great pompe. But in the end

Marriage of the daughters of Cid Ruiz Diaz.

A end of this feast there happened an accident, which did much trouble these two houses, so inconstant and short are humane pleasures; and the counsels and iudgements of God inscrutable. There was a Lyon bred vp in Cids house, the which by the negligence of the Governour, or otherwile, getting loose, came into the hall; where there was a great assembly of Noblemen and Ladies, with the married coples, and strooke a great terror among them, where as about all others the two Gonzales, newly married shewed themselves quite hearted cowards, wher as they were, ashamed, seeing themselves losse of them by their father in law, and by the other knights there present. From that time they conceived a mortal hatred against Cid, thinking that this Lyon had beene loose by his commandment, to try them and feare them, for as they refused to be reuenged upon the first occasion. This was no vaine argument of their baseness, seeing a Lyon vpon the sodaine (although that an unexpected accident, might amaze the most hardy, being an ordinary thing in nature to be moued at sodaine things) for soone after they gaue a more ample testimony of their want of courage, in a battle against the Moores, who were come against Valencia, where they carried themselves basely, yet by the wisdom and valour of Cid these Infidels were vanquished. After al this, these two base Knights would carry their wiues home to their houses, but hauing their hearts full of poison, and fearing they should not be able to hurt their father in law, they reuenged themselves inhumanly vpon their innocent wiues, and intreated them so il before they came to Carrion, as they left them for dead vpon the way at a place called Robledos de Corps, neere to Berlanga, where these poore Ladies beeing cherished by the good people of the country, they had meanes to aduertise Cid their father of their misery. The messenger whom they sent, was incountered by Cids men, going to the King D. Alphonso with foure score horses, and other rich presents, of the spoiles of the last victory obtained against the Moores. Complaint was made by them vnto the King, of this villanous act committed by the sonnes of the Lord of Carrion against their wiues: wherevpon the King assembled the Noblemen and Knights of the country of Toledo, and kept a court (whereas Cid appeered, hauing retired his daughters to Valencia) and Iudges were appointed to doe right vnto the parties, vpon so great a controuersie, among the which D. Raymond of Bourgonne, the Kings sonne in law was one: Their sentence was that their question should bee decided by armes, betwixt Knights chosen of either part; such was the Iustice in those daies among Nobles, a custome which is not lost amongst Christians at this day. The campe where they should fight was chosen in the towne of Carrion, where as there appeered Pedro Bermudes, Martin Antolines and Nugno Gustor, Knights for Cid, who vanquished, the two sonnes of Carrion, with their vncle a partisa of their villany, called Suero Gonzales who were proclaimed infamous and traitors, and degraded of al honor and title of nobility. These two Ladies were afterwards happily married into the house of Nauarre, that is D. Eluira to D. Ramirez, sonne to the King, D. Sancho Garcia, and D. Sol, to the sonne of D. Pedro, then reigning in Nauarre and Arragon, called also D. Pedro, who died before his father. After these last marriages, Cid growne old, did nothing that was memorabile. He settled the Estate of Valencia as well as he could, with the aide of the Princes of Nauarre and Arragon his allies. And the better to assure it, he chased away diuers families of the Moores, which were suspected vnto him. A capitaine of the Moores, who was also a Doctor of the law of Mahumet, called Alfaraxi, a great friend to Cid, tooke vpon him the Christian religion, being held a man of great valour and iudgement. The authors place the death of Cid Ruiz Diaz of Bivar in the yeere 1098. the towne of Valencia beeing anoyed by the Moores, which held their campe about it; yet notwithstanding they say that the widow accompanied with D. Ierosme the Bishop, went out of the towne, conducting her husbands body, to bury it at Saint Pedro de Cerdagne, where it was laied: the Monkes of that place at this day shew many iewells and other things which they say had beene given by that great capitaine to their Monastery. After his death, the Christians which were at Valencia fearing they should not bee able to resist the forces of the Moores Almorauides, abandoned the towne, which came into the Infidels power againe, and so continued 140. yeeres.

Consuelto of Cids sonnes in law.

Reparation of crimes by combat.

Alfaraxi a great Doctor of the Mahumetists baptiz'd.

Death of Cid Ruiz of Bivar.

D. Pedro

This order was augmented since by Saint Bernard, who entring into it about the two and twentieth yeere of his age, did so well, as in lesse then 36. yeeres, hee created 16. Abbaies of his Order. These were the exercises of religion in those daies, to the which the great deuotion of Princes and people, did moue all Kingdomes, States, Prouinces, Townes and in a manner all priuate families.

Castille.

An. 1100.

Moors.

In the yeere 1100. died D. Raymond of Bourgonne, Earle of Galicia, sonne in law to King D. Alphonso the Braue, leauing one sonne by D. Vrraca his wife, called D. Alphonso Raymond, who was bred vp by the Earle D. Pedro Traua, and came afterwards to raigne in Castille and Leon.

Christians defeated by the Moors and D. Sancho heire of Castille slaine.

20. The same yeere their died at Maroc, Ioseph Aben-Tefin, or Texifien, Miralumin, or Emperor of the Arabians in Affrike and Spaine, hauing reigned 32. yeeres; to whom Ali Aben-Tefin, his son succeeded. This new King Ali, desirous to win honor by armes past, soon after his comming to the crowne, into Spaine, with a great power of Almo-past, and hauing made some stay in Andalusia, to ioyne the Moores of Spaine vnto his army, hee entred the territory of Toledo, where the King D. Alphonso made then his residence, being old & full of infirmities, & therefore vnsit to make head against this Barbarian, who was yong and full of ambition to enlarge the country conquered by his father, yet hauing called his Nobility together in time, if they had bene well led, he commanded D. Sancho his sonne to sally forth against this army of Moores, being a Prince of a great courage and too desirous to fight, being accompanied by D. Garcia de Cabra, and other Earles and Noblemen of Castille, who hauing incourented the enemy nere vnto Voles, they gaue them battaile, but they were defeated, and put all to rout. The Infant D. Sancho, the Earle D. Garcia, and other great personages were slaine vpon the place, so as the Moores had meanes to ouer-run and spoile the country at their pleasures: they tooke many places and forts, which the King could not preat, nor make any resistance; who was exceeding heavy and sorrowfull for the losse of this battaile, but especially for the death of his sonne and onely heire. Hee did much blame many captaines which had escaped that day, for that they had so rashly ioynd in battaile; but this was no meanes to cure the disease. This route was the more vnseasonable, for that his sonne in law Raymond of Tolouse and Saint Gyles, a valiant Commander in the warre, by whom hee might haue bene much eased was then absent in Syria, where hee died a while after leauing three sonnes, Bertrand, William and Alphonso Iordain, which were all Earles of Tolouse, although with great difficulties and troubles. The heat and furie of these Arabian Almorauides, was cooled and staied by some other good successe of the Nauarrois, Arragonois, and Cattelans, against the Moores their neighbours, which gaue the Castillians some time to breath, and to recouer new forces.

Nauarre.

An. 1101.

Barcelone.

Majorca taken by the Cattelans.

Infamous counterfeite of the Geneuois.

D. Pedro King of Nauarre after the taking of Huefca, had made continuall warres against the Infidels which lay neere vnto him, and had taken Pertusa from them. After which he went to beseege the city of Barbastro, which after a long contestation of either side, was yeilded, with the castle of Villila, and other forts of that country in the yeere 1101. He presently restored the Episcopall Sea to that city, as it had bene, whereof D. Ponce was Bishop, who was of Rode.

On the other side the Earle of Barcelone, growne both in courage and possessions, hauing with him the Earle of Vrgel his cousin, made an enterprise vpon the Island of Majorca, which was held by the Moores. Being assisted by some gallies of Pisa and Genoua, they past their army into the Island, and beganne to batter the forts, and to assault the Moores which inhabited it. D. Armingol Earle of Vrgel was slaine there in a sally, leauing a son of his owne name to be his successor, yet Cid Raymond did batter and assault the city of Majorca with such fury, as it was taken in the yeere 1102. and for that hee had newes that the Moores, to diuert the conquest of those Islands were come to beseege Barcelone, hee returned into Cattelogne, leauing the Island to the Geneuois, to reduce the rest vnder the power of the Christians, but moued (as the Cattelans say) with a trecherous & villanous couetousnesse, they sold both the town and the whole Island to the Moores, for a sum of money, whereof, they say, grew the irreconcilable hatred

A hatred betwixt the Cattelans and Geneuois. The Moores which had beseege Barcelone, were forced to abandon it with shame and great losse of their mea. Some authors of the Spanish History write, that this Earle D. Raymond Arnould, went into Germany in a disguised habit, and did fight a combat for the Empreffe Mathilda, wife to Henry accused of adultery: and that hauing vanquished her accuser, and deliuered the Lady, hee returned to Barcelone; without discouering himselfe: yet this fact being knowen and verified, the Emperor rewarded him with the county of Prouence, which did then belong to the Empire. About that time, which was in the yeere 1102, died in Castille the wife of Cid Ruy Diaz, daughter to D. Gomes Earle of Goimas, who was buried with her husband, at Saint Peter of Cardegnajneere vnto Burgos. The King of France giuen to the house of Barce-lone by the Emper or Henry the fifth.

Castille.

Portugal.

Knights of the Temple at Jerusalem.

Temple the beginning of the Al-bras orders in Christendom.

Castille.

A just punishment of a rash men.

B Castille in the meane time made head against the Moores without hazarding, of much, so as after great spoiles of either side, that realme had some rest.

The affaires standing vpon these termes, D. Henry Earle of Portugal, son in law to the King D. Alphonso, had a desire to goe into the Euant, to see the Land where our Saniour and so many holy Prophets and Apostels had liued, and thrust on also with an emulation of the fame of his tbusin or vncler D. Raymond of Tolouse and Saint Gyles, and of so many Noble men and Barons of France and Germany, which had run to that warre. He parted in the yeere 1103. hauing with the helpe and aduice of D. Bernard Archbishop of Toledo, restored the cities of Coimbra, Braga, Viseo, Lamego and Porto, to their Episcopall Seas, of which townes Coimbra was the chiefe for the temporal, and for the spirituall Braga was made Metropolitaine; as it had bene in the Gothies time. His way was by Germany and Hongary, with many other Noblemen of France and Germany, whose voyage was long and painful. There is nothing spoken of him, but that he returned with many reliques, and among others an arme of Saint Luke the Euangelist, as they did beleeue: whereof Alexis Comnen Emperor of Constantinople (a secret enemy to the Westerne Princes, and to all their enterprises, & who mocked at all their deuotions) made him a worthy present; which relike Count Henry carried into Portugal, and placed it with great reuerence in the chiefe church at Braga.

It was at such time as the Knights of the Temple of Jerusalem were first instituted, by one Hugues de Paganis, and Ioffrey of Saint Adelman, hauing vowed to keepe the waies safe from the port of Iassa (in old time called Ioppa) vnto the Temple; to whom and to their companions (which soon increased to a good number) was a place assigned for their dwelling nere the Temple, whereof they tooke the name of Templers; afterwards mingling Knight-hood with Monacal rules, they instituted an order, the which which confirmed by the Pope; they tooke vpon them a white habit, with a red crosse, and in succession of time got so great possessions throughout all Christendome, as Kings and Popes themselves did enuy them: so as vnder the colour of many crimes, whether true or false, they were condemned and rooted out at the counsell of Vienne, by Pope Clement the fifth, their order hauing continued 200. yeeres. Whose spoiles were diuided betwixt the Pope, King Philip of France, the Hospitaliers of Saint Iohn of Ierusalem and others. These Templers were the beginning of all the millitary orders, which haue bene since made in Christendome. Returning to D. Alphonso King of Castille his subiects seeing him without any heires male, by the death of D. Sancho, & that he was now old and broken, they tooke counsell to perswad him to marry the Countesse D. Vrraca, widow to Raymond Earle of Bourgonne to D. Gomes Earle of Campdespina, the greatest Nobleman next vnto the King in Castille, for the effecting whereof, the Noblemen of Castille assembled at Magan, a Bourough of Toledo, or according vnto others at Masquerique: the difficulty was that knowing the King to bee of a high and great spirit, there was not any one that durst presume to deliuer the message; wherefore they resolved to giue this charge to a physition which was a Iewe, called Cidello, who was very familiar with the King, the which (being a rash man) hee accepted, to his owne ruine: for hauing found a fit opportunitie as hee thought, to speake vnto the King of this marriage, hee had no sooner touched that subiect, but he was repulst with bitter words, and chased out of the Court, with charge neuer to returne againe vpon paine of death,

*D. Vrraca
heire of Ca-stille and Leon married to D.
Alphonso of Nauarre.
An. 1104.*

*Death of D.
Alphonso the sixth King of Castille.*

Conversion of Moyse a Jew.

yet this made the King to thinke, that it was fit to marry his daughter, and therefore hee made choise of D. Alphonso Infant of Nauarre and Arragon brother to the King D. Pedro for his sonne in law, the which hee did by the aduice of D. Bernard Archbishop of Toledo, which marriage was accomplished according vnto some, in the life time of the King D. Pedro, others say it was after his decease, D. Alphonso hauing already succeeded him to the crowne of Nauarre and Arragon in the yeece 1104. for that the King D. Pedro sonne, of the same name, was dead without children, and D. Isabel his daughter was also dead a virgin. This King D. Pedro and his children were buried at S. Jeau de la Peggana, the last of the Kings which were interred there. He had reigned in Nauarre and Arragon ten yeeeres and three monthes.

As for King D. Alphonso, he liued vnto the yeece 1208. being afflicted with great infirmities, with the which he languished to the age of 73. whereof hee reigned foure and thirty yeeeres and eight monthes, after the decease of his brother D. Sancho, his body is interred in the Monastery of Sahagun, D. Alphonso his son in law succeeded him, in the right of D. Vrraca (the only lawfull daughter of the deceased) in all his realmes of Castille, Leon, Toledo and other Siegneuries. A little before his death, one Moyse a Jew, very learned in the tongues, in Philosophy and the holy Scriptures, was baptized, and the King D. Alphonso was his god-father, wherefore hee was called Pedro Alphonso. His conversion was profitable to many Lewes and Moores, whom by disputing and writing hee brought to leaue their sects, and to imbrace the name and profession of Christians. At the same time florished Damianke de la Calçada, whose practise was to retire the pilgrimes which went to Saint Iaques, and to direct them in their way. At the place of whose abode there was since a city built of that name: he caused a Chapel to bee built there in honour of the Virgin Mary, and a little from thence, fise yeeeres before his death, he made his sepulcher: for at that time they buried not any in holic ground. Now it is a Cathedral Church.

The end of the eight Booke.

The Contents of the ninth Booke.

1. Vnion of the realmes of Castille, Leon, Nauarre and Arragon, vnder the King D. Alphonso the 7. of that name in Leon, and 2. in Castille, and the first in Nauarre and Arragon.
2. Seege and taking of the city of Sarragosse from the Moores, the which was afterwards the chiefe of the realme of Arragon.
3. The Countie of Prouence annexed to the house of Barcelona by hereditary succession.
4. D. Alphonso Henriques 2. Earle of Portugal, and the bad government of the Countesse D. Theresa his Mother.
5. The licentious life of the Queene D. Vrraca heire of Castille her diuorce from King D. Alphonso her husband, and the miseries which happened in Castille.
6. Conspiracy of the Nobility and States of Castille and Leon, against the Queene D. Vrraca, and the establishing of her sonne D. Alphonso.
7. Raymond in the royall dignity, accounted the 8. of that name, and the 27. King of Leon, and 5. of Castille.
8. Disordered and prodigious testament of D. Alphonso the 7. King of Nauarre and Arragon.
9. Vsurpations of townes and Lands in Nauarre by King Alphonso Raymond of Castille.
10. D. Garcia Ramir the 19. King of Nauarre and 7. of that name.
11. D. Frere Ramir the 5. King of Arragon and 2. of that name.
12. Kings of Nauarre and Arragon, forced to acknowledge the souerainty of Castille.
13. Vnion of Cattellogne to the crowne of Arragon, by the marriage of the Earle of Barcelona: D. Raymond Berenger, with D. Petronille.
14. Accord betwixt D. Raymond Betenger, Prince Regent of Arragon with the Templers and Hospitalers, vpon the testament of King D. Alphonso.
15. The Earle of Portugal takes the title of King.
16. Change of the State in Affrike, and the new raigne of the Almohades.
17. Taking of Lisbon, and other townes from the Moores, by the new King D. Alphonso Henriques.
18. D. Sancho the 20. King of Nauarre 7. of that name.
19. Change of Religion among the Moores in Spaine, and persecution of Christians by the new sectaries.
20. D. Sancho the 6. King of Castille 3. of that name.
21. D. Fernand the 2. of that name 28. King of Leon.
22. Institution of the Order of the Knights of Calatrava.

Thu

This ninth booke contains the rest of the Kings of Nauarre, Arragon, Leon and Castille, and the erection of the Earldome of Portugal to a Kingdome by D. Alphonso Henriques as followeth.

NAVARRRE. ARRAGON. LEON. CASTILLE.
 18. Alphonso Emperour. 1---4. the same. 1---26. the same. 7---4. the same. 2.
 19. D. Garcia Ramir. 7. 5. D. Fr. Ramir. 2. 27. D. Alphon. Ra. 8---5. the same. 3.
 20. D. Sancho. 7. D. Petronille and 28. D. Fernand 2. 6. D. Sancho. 3.
 D. Raymond Berenger unites Arragon and Catselogne.

PORTUGAL.
 D. Alphonso Henriques. 2. Earle, and the first which tooke upon him the title of King.

D. Alphonso the eighteenth King of Nauarre. Emperor of Spaine.

Nauarre, Arragon, Leon and Castille.
 An. 1108.

1. *Al*l the Christian Kingdomes of Spaine were vnited in one body, in the yeare 1108, by the succession of Leon, Castille, Toledo and other conquests, fallne to D. Prraca, wife to D. Alphonso King of Nauarre and Arragon, intituled Emperor of Spaine by a better right then his Predecessors: notwithstanding that some Chronicles will not haue him put in the ranke and number of the Kings of Castille and Leon, for that it was D. Prraca his wife, and not hee which was heire of the sayd realmes D. Pedro Ansures during the Kings absence, who was in Nauarre and Arragon, gouerned, and was Viceroy in Castille; in which time the Moores went to field, and did great harme vnto the Christians, taking the towne of Coria, with other places. D. Alphonso King of Nauarre, entred with an army into Castille, leading with him D. Prraca his wife, but there needed not any force, for all obeyed him, both the townes, forts and Noblemen of the country, whom hee gouerned with all mildnesse, humanity and iustice, and repulsed the inuasions of the Moores on the frontiers of his wiues dominions: but hee made sharper warre against them vpon the confines of Nauarre and Arragon: in Castille hee repaired Vilhorade; in Rioje Berlanga; and vpon the riuer of Duero, Almasan and Soria. The surname of warrior was giuen him by reason of his deeds of armes, and the battailes wherein he was during his raigne: The Histories report that he did fight 39. times in a pitch field, & was victor in them all except in the two last battailes, which were fought nere vnto Fraga. Having gotten footing in Castille, he began to forecass what might happen, if his wife should die without children by him; wherefore he put good honors and captaines of his countries of Nauar & Arragon in al the strong places of Castille, that if he were forced to quithese realms of Castille, Leon, Toledo & their depēdances, he might keep those people in some awe, and

D. Alphonso
 secies to al-
 fur. is m. l. f.
 of Castille.

A and leaue it with his honor and aduantage: the which did somewhat estrange the Noblemen of Castile. Heknew also, that his wife D. Prraca was proud, ingrate, inconstant, and not very continent, and therefore with good aduice he armed himselfe for all euent. This woman vpon a light occasion, conceived a great hatred against the Earle D. Pedro Ansures, Lord of Vailledolit, who had nourished her, and had kept her Estates after the death of the king her father, onely for that in his letters written to the king her husband, & her, aduising them to come and take possession of her inheritance, he had intitled her husband King of Castile. Whereupon she sought to take Vailledolit, and other lands from him, but the King did presently restore them: and to the end he should be the more secure, against the rage of this woman, hee sent him into Arragon, with D. Elo his wife, giuing him the gouernement of the young Earle of Virgel his Cousin.

The bad qualities of D. Prraca Queen
 of Castile.

The first expedition which he made against the Moores, was about the yeare, 1110. vpon the frontiers of Nauarre and Arragon, where he tooke from them the towne of Exea, in which warre he was assisted by many voluntarie Noblemen and Gentlemen of France, beeing desirous to winne honor by bearing armes against the Mahumetists. Runaio along the riuer of Ebro; he tooke Tihaut, Borja, Magallon, and other places of those marches: so as the happy successe of this enterprife gaue him courage to effect that which his predecessors Kings of Nauarre had long before designed; which was, to reduce the cittie of Sarragossa vnder his obedience, the which as he made thw C to beseege, spoiling the countrie round about it King Abuflen came with a great power, and presented him bataille, neare vnto Valtierra, where the Moore was vanquished, and slaine vpon the place. By meanes of this victorie, King D. Alphonso took Morrella, and resolued to beseege Sarragossa, wherefore he put a strong garrison into the fort of Castella, of old souldiers, called at that time in Spaine Almograbes, who were continually entertained vpon the Moores frontiers. This seegewas long and dangerous, for the Moores defended this cittie contragiously, beeing great, full of men, and well fortified.

Expedition against the Ma-
 humetists.
 An. 1110.

Moores defeated by D. Alphonso.

Sarragossa
 beseege.

In the armie of king D. Alphonso, there were many Noblemen of France, which had vowed to carrie armes against the Infidels, among the which were Gaston Lord of Berne, the Earle of Cominges, and Rotron Earle of Perche, by whom the Towne of Tudele, seated vpon Ebro, betwixt Sarragossa and Caloorra, was taken by surprize. The Moores which were there in garrison, did much annoy the campe; for that they spoiled their victuallers and merchants, and cut off their victuals: whereupon D. Alphonso sent Count Rotron with good troupes of foot, and fixe hundred horse. The Earle kept himselfe close in certaine valleys, couered with woods, neere vnto the towne, and sent forth some men into the open plaines, to get some spoile, and to driue away their cattell; who being discouered by the Moores of the fort, they sallied forth with all their forces, to the end that not any one of these runners should escape. Whilest they were in skirmish, the Earle came out of his ambush, and cut off their retreat to E the towne, the which he found ill garded, so as he seized thereon without any difficultie. The king D. Alphonso to reward the Earle of Perche for this prize, which was of so great importance, for that seegewas where he was, gaue him this place of Tudele, the which was afterwards annexed to the crowne of Nauarre. The Moores amazed at this losse, began to faint in many places: so as Moricajo, and other neighbour townes, were made subiect to D. Alphonso within few dayes. The Sarragossians were much assisted by the Moores, which commanded at Lerida and Fraga, as well for the danger which did threaten them, as for their conformity in Religion.

Noblemen of France in the campe before Sarragossa.

Tudele taken by the Earle of Perche.

During this seegewas, the king D. Alphonso beeing in the cittie of Barbastro, there came vnto his Court Count Bertrand of Tholoufa, sonne to Count Raymond, and D. Eluira bastard daughter to the deceased King D. Alphonso the 6. This young Prince had bin disposessed of all his Estate by the Earle of Poitiers, who beeing graciously interrayned and honored by king D. Alphonso, to the end he might bee ayded by him, to recoouer his Estate, he made himselfe his vassall, acknowledging him for his Soueraigne Lord of all he did, or should possesse (according to the Spanish Histories.) The King receiued Almudebar taken from the Moors.

Sarragossa taken.

Episcopal seat restored to Sarragossa.

Dignitie of chief Justice in Arragon.

received him into his protection, & gaue him good hope, it was about the yeare 1116. A yet this did little auail Cont Bertrand: for the continuall warre which D. Alphonso had against the Moores, would not suffer him to attend the affaires of Tholoufa, besides William Earle of Poictiers was the kings friend, and came himselfe in person to the war against the Moores in Spaine, and was at the sege of Sarragossa, with the Earles of Perche, Cominges and Bigorre, the Lord of Bearn, the Vicount of Lauedan, Bishop of Elcar, and many other Noblemen and Knights of France, whereas also were all the Noblemen of Nauarre and Arragon, both Ecclesiasticall and secular; among the which those of greatest mark, were Diego Lope Ladron, Ximen Fortunes de Leet, Simon Fortunes de mont Castel, Pedro Momesio, Lope Ximenes Torelia, Lope Sancho of Ogabre, Pedro Ximenes Iustice of Arragon, Jean Galindio d'Antilia, Lope Fortunes of Albcro, Pedro Myr Entenza, Raymond Peres d'Erillo, N. of Almoravid, and with them many of Castile and other places of Spaine. About the yeare 1118. Almudebar, a strong place and well furnished, was taken by the French, the which strucke such a terror into the Moors thereabouts, as they abandoned Sarrignena, Salce, Robres, Zeura, and Gurrea, the which were seized on by the Arragonois, whilst that the French with the other forces did batter Sarragossa, with all violence, the which the Moores defended valiantly, the king D. Alphonso being then gone into Castile. The Spaniards write, that the French seeing this sege to grow tedious, and being out of hope to take the citie, they retired in a manner all home to their houses, except the chiefe Commanders, to whome D. Alphonso brought new supplies, about Iuly this yeare 1118. The beseged beginning to doubt that they should not be able to keepe the citie long, they employed all their money, meanes, and credit, intreating the Moores that were neere and farre off, to succour them in their great necessitie. Who sending a capitaine vnto them called Temin, with men and victuals: he was incountred and defeated neere vnto Daroca, by the king D. Alphonso, and the Earle of Prouence, who (according vnto Surites, the Writer of the Historie of Arragon,) was there with sixe hundred horse, contrarie to that which the Spaniards say: so as the Moores despayring of all succours, beganne to parle, and to treat of conditions to yeld. Some notwithstanding to do more honor to the Clergie of those times, say, that D. William Gaston, Bishop of Pampelone, generall of the souldiers of Nauarre, behaued himselfe so in his quarter, as hauing made a great and spacious breach, he entred the towne by force, the Moores making wonderfull resistance, with their king Almosauen, who was slaine among the ruines. This great citie was taken in December, in the aforesayd yeare 1118. where the king D. Alphonso entring, he lodged in the pallace of the kings of the Moores, called Açuda, nere vnto the Port of Toledo, beginning to settle the estate thereof, to make it the Capitall citie of all the Realmes which he enioyed, or that he might conquer hereafter, intituling himselfe king of Sarragossa. His chiefe care was to settle the Clergie, and to enrich that Order, which had serued him much in the sege of the towne: wherefore the Mosque Maior was then consecrated for a cathedrall Church, vnder the name of S. Sauueur, and one Pedro de Libana, was chosen Bishop, confirmed by Pope Gelasius then reigning. They found many Christians Musarabes in Sarragossa, who had liued there among the Arabians, with great liberty of their Religion, the which they did exercise in a very ancient church, called Nostre Dame del Pilar: we read in the Histories of Arragon, and in the writings of Ierom Surita, that the Lords of Bearne, and the earls of Perche did long enioy very great priuiledges in the citie of Sarragossa, by the grant of D. Alphonso. This king and Emperour of Spaine granted great liberties and priuiledges to this citie, to prouoke strangers to come and dwell there, namely, the priuiledge of gentrie, and the lawes and Iustice of Arragon: and in time of factions and seditions to chuse for their Councell certaine Syndics, Protectors of the people.

As for the dignitie called Iustice of Arragon, which was vied in the time of D. Pedro Ximenes, it is a Magistrat, the gardien and protector of the publike libertie, against the violence of great men, yea to suppress the exceffe and tyrannies of Kings, with souveraigne iurisdiction, instituted in the infancie and beginning of principalities and Christian Estates in Spaine, after the inuasion of the Moores, when as the kings, not by succession

A succession of blood and birth, but by their valour and vertues were chosen, to be ready and faithfull Governours of the affaires, as well of warre, as of Iustice, according vnto certaine simple lawes, and as then militarie, propounded vnder the title of the court or law of Sobrarbre. This Magistrate was first called Iustice maior, entertained and augmented both in dignitie and authoritie from time to time by good kings. There were great gifts and fees giuen also by this great king vnto the Earle of Bigorre, in recompence of the good offices he had done him in this warre. These things thus done, hee went and layed sege before Tarrassone; the which made no great resistance, seeing that the neighbour places were come into the power of the Christians. Being yeldd, it receiued the ancient Episcopall seate, and one D. Michel was chosen Bishop.

B This towne which in former times had belonged to the Crowne of Nauarre, by this last conquest was annexed to that of Arragon.

Tarrassone taken from the Moors.

D. Alphonso continuing his conquests, tooke the places and forts which were along the riuer of Xalon, and in the end tooke the towne of Calatajub, into the which he put a great garrison; as a place which fronted vpon the Moores on the mountaines of Cuenca, Molina, Valencia, and Castile, he cleansed that which remained of the Moorish faction vpon the riuer of Xiloca vnto Daroca: he repayred and peopled Montreal, whereas this deuout king instituted an Order of Knights in imitation of the Templers of Ierusalem, which was called S. Saluator, assigning them rents and reuenues, to the end they should employ themselves courageously to roote out the Infidels in Spaine, as he had propounded. King D. Alphonso did these great exploits vnto the yeare, 1120

Order of knights as S. Sauuour.

Catalogne or Barcelone.

at which time the Moores were dispossessed of all which doth now belong to Arragon. But in Cattelogne there yet remained the king of Lerida and Fraga called Aben Gama, whose forces were not to be contemned: and the which were as a thorne in the foot of the Estates of Arragon, but mote to Raymond Arnould Earle of Barcelone, who was a good and a valiant Knight; and who had receiued no small blessings from God: hauing by vnexpected meanes recovered the lands which were vlsurped from him during his minority, and augmented his Estates by new successions. of the Earledome of Cerdagne, of the towne of Tarragone, and euen newly of the Countie of Belsu, by the decaile of D. Bernard Guillen, by reason of which prosperities he intituled himselfe

D Marquis of Spaine, Earle of Cerdagne, Belsu, and afterwards of Prouence and Aïmillan, by the death of Gilbert his father-in law, who had no other heire then D. Doulee, wife to D. Raymond. It is likely, that by this meanes he got the Countie of Prouence, whereof (as a fee of the Empire) he was inuested by the Emperour Henry the 5. as we haue sayd. As for those lands which he held in Languedoc, as Carcasone and others: some Authors write, that the vicious Bernard of Aton, hauing vlsurped them, vnder a counterfeite promise to hold them of him, and to do him homage, hee afterwards made this acknowledgement to William Earle of Poictiers, vlsurper of the Countie of Tholoufa: but D. Raymond forced him by armes to submit himselfe vnto him.

Portugall.

In Portugall Cont Henry had defended his country against the Moores wisely and valiantly, and had gouerned with all iustice and honor, vnder the soueraintie of the King, or Emperour Don Alphonso, vntill the yeare 1112. that he died in Galicia, in the towne of Astorga, and was interred at Braga in S. Maries church, leauing for heire D. Alphonso Henriques his eldest sonne, about eightene yeares old. D. Theresa the Countesse widow, to whom the Earledome of Portugall did belong in proprietie, shewing her indiscretion, married soone after to a knight of a noble house, called Don Bermond Paez de Transamara, with whom hauing liued some time, by a disordered appetite, or some other damnable occasion, she left him, and married againe with a brother of his called D. Fernando Paez of Transamara; D. Bermond being thus forsaken, and as it were struing with his wife who should be most incestuous; hee married her eldest daughter, and sister to D. Alphonso Henriques, called D. Theresa Henriques.

D. Alphonso Henriques 2. Earle of Portugall.

The desirable marriage of the Countesse of Portugall.

F These goodly exploits were done among Christians, in the house of Portugal, which was but now growing: for expiation whereof, they say, that Fernando Paez, who had taken away his liuing brothers wife, built a Monasterie at Sobrado in Galicia, nine leagues from Saint Iagues, a penance and satisfaction taught by the pastors of those times, times, to miserable contempters of Gods lawes and ordonances. The young Earle A Don Alphonso being much troubled with these excesses, and moreouer seeing himselfe contemned, and out of all credit and fauour, for that the adulterous and incestuous D. Fernando intituled himselfe Earle of Portugal, in the right of his wife, he went to armes against him, the euent you shall heare hereafter.

Nauarre, Castille, Arragon, &c.

If this Countesse were vnchast in her seuerall marriages, her sister D. Vrraca shewed her selfe as loose and disloyall to her husband King Don Alphonso: so as this Prince who was endowed with great vertue and wisdom, was forced to restraine her in the fort of Castellar, neere vnto Sarragossa, from whence shee sought by all means to escape; as shee did, with the helpe of some discontented Noblemen of Castile; with whom shee retired into her Inheritance, where shee tooke counsell to bee diuorced from the King her husband, making her pretext, that shee had bene married against her will, and by constraint; and moreouer, that shee was his cousin germaine removed, and therefore the marriage could not be lawful, without dispensation from the church of Rome; the which in those dayes was not much vsed. Of this Council were the Archbishop of Toledo, the Bishops of Bourgos, Leon, Palence and others, who were aldisbishops, chased away, and banished by D. Ramir the kings brother. Wherefore the Nobilitie and Estates of Castile, considering what troubles and miseries would ensue, if this desseigne were put in execution against the king D. Alphonso, they would not give their consents, but took their Queene with all respect, and conducted her into Arragon; but her husband, who dissembled the wrongs shee had done him, receiued her into fauour; but as she continued her leud life, forgetting more and more the honor of her self & house, which should haue bin more deare vnto such a Princeesse, then her life, the king in the end caused her to be conducted to the towne of Soria, chased her from his company for euer: notwithstanding he kept still many strong places in Castile, not caring much for the government of the Realme.

Queene D. Vrraca vnchast.

D. Vrraca chased away by the king D. Alphonso her husband.

Castile separated.

Magnanimity of King D. Alphonso.

Without doubt this king was of a great courage, and gaue good proofes, that he did more esteeme vertue and his honor, then all worldly goods, dispossessing himselfe of so great iurisdiccions, as those of Castile, Leon, Toledo, and others, which D. Vrraca had brought him; who being settled in her countries, began to shew some tokens of amendment, governing her selfe by the aduice and counsell of D. Pedro Ansures, and other knights of greatest wisdom and fame among the Nobility of Castile. Haunting then assembled her estates, she complained that many forts were kept from her, demanding their aduice and ayde to recouer them: Those which were kept by Captains and gouernors Castillans, were presently yeilded vnto her, without attending any commaundment from the king D. Alphonso, in hatred that he had chased away the Queene. Among others D. Pedro Ansures, presently after the restitution of some places by him, went to the king, who was at Castellar, where coming before him, being mounted vpon a white horse, and clad all in scarlet, hee lighted, and holding a halter in his hand, hee sayed vnto him, That hee had done vnto his Queene (the naturall and soueraigne Princeesse of Castile) the dutie of a faithfull vassall: yet hauing failed vnto the king, to whom hee had sworne fealtie and homage, hee had brought vnto him both hand and mouth, the instruments of the oath which hee had made vnto him, to the end that his Maiestie might dispose of them, and of his whole bodie at his Highnesse pleasure and command. King Don Alphonso (alwaies like himselfe) although (vpon sufficient grounds) he were discontented with the yeelding vp of these forts, shewing no good countenance vnto the Earle, yet vpon his first speech hee pardoned him, yeelding to the counsell of the wife, who commended much the loyaltie and integritie of this knight, the which should serue as a President to posteritie: wherefore he was sent backe with honor into Castile.

After this, D. Vrraca did nothing of merit: for falling to her old desseigne of diuorce F she obtained it by the authoritie of Pope Pascal. Of whose commandement and Bulls, Don Diego Gelmirio, Bishop of Compostella, was minister and executioner. Thus finding her selfe without restraint in her lust & luxuriousnesse, she exceeded strangely. Shee

A Shee had familiar and dishonest conuersation with D. Gomes, Earle of Candespina, who had in former times pretended to be her husband, who was secretly deliuered of a sonne, gotten by him, and was for that cause called D. Fernand Hurtado, from whence as they say, is descended the house of Hurtados, a noble family of Spaine. Although that some doubt hereof, yet it is most certaine, that the Earle D. Gomes, had in a short time the whole gouernement of the Realme, and disposed of all the affaires, both of warre and peace at his pleasure, conuersing as familiarly with the Queene, as if shee had bene his wife: and yet another Knight called D. Pedro de Lara, sonne to Don Ordono, Earle of Lara, who entred combat at the seige of Zamora, against the three sonnes of Aria Gonzalo, after the decease of the king D. Sancho, did insinuate himselfe in the Queenes fauour, and was in a short time one of her greatest minions, whereof the earle D. Gomes was very ialous. The dissolute and vnchast life of D. Vrraca was so publicly knowne to all the world, as king D. Alphonso (mooued with a iust disdain, both for it, and for the about-mentioned diuorce) resolved to enter into Castile with an armie, putting all to fire and sword, being much incensed as well at the dissolute life of the Queene, as at the Castillans basenesse, who obeyed her, bearing them also a spleene, for that they had deliuered her those places which he had giuen them in gard.

Nauarre, Castille, Arragon, &c.

Queene D. Vrraca vnchast.

D. Vrraca chased away by the King D. Alphonso her husband.

Castile separated.

Loyaltie and integritie of D. Pedro Ansures.

Magnanimity of King D. Alphonso.

There went against him to field the Queenes two fauorites, D. Gomes, and D. Pedro, with the forces of Castile and Leon, who hauing incourted the kings armie, consisting of Nauarrois and Arragonois, they came to fight neare vnto Candespina, and not farre from Sepulteda. D. Pedro who led the foreward, was first charged, who abandoned his men basely vpon the first incounter, and retired to Bourgos, where the Queene was carrying newes of the route which he had no leysure to see. The army of Castile was defeated and put to flight, and many good Knights slain and others taken, namely, D. Gomes Earle of Candespina, with a brother of his called Diagomes died vpon the place. The valour of one of the house of Olea was great, which carried the Standard of the Earle D. Gomes, who being ouerthrowne from his horse, and both his hands cut off, he held his Standard fast in his armes whilest hee liued, crying out with a loud voyce, Olea, Olea. After this victorie, D. Alphonso past vnto Leon, by the territorie of Campos, making a cruell spoyle and murder, wherfoeuer his armie went, vpon D. Pedro's faction. And for that his treasure failed him, the souldiers abandoning themselves to the spoyle, committed infinit thefts and sacriledges, sparing nothing, were it holy or prophane.

King D. Alphonso hauing past into Galicia with the like disorder, the Nobilitie of those countries, assembled all that were fit to carrie armes, and came to meet with this furious enemy, bringing in the armie young D. Alphonso Raymond, the sonne of D. Vrraca, and of Count Raymond of Bourgongne her first husband. There king D. Alphonso had another battaille, neere vnto a place called Carrera of Anguas, betwixt the townes of Leon and Astorga, where the Nauarrois and Arragonois had the victorie. E So as hauing slaine a great number of Leonois, put the rest of the army to flight, and taken D. Pedro de Trauss prisoner, D. Alphonso Raymond was forced to saue himselfe in Portugall. King D. Alphonso past no farther, but returned with his victorious armie, ruining all those which followed D. Pedro de Lara's partie: who with their Queene shut themselves vp in a place neere vnto Palenza, called Mençon, which was the retreat of them that had fled: and so returned into his owne country, with many prisoners, and great spoiles.

F The Queene being freed from so great a danger, continued her lustfull and vnchast life, with her minion D. Pedro, with as little shame and respect, as shee had bene accustomed; who playing the king, yea the very tyrant, incensed the Nobility in such sort, as many of them conspired to abandon the Queene, and to call vnto the gouernment, D. Alphonso Raymond her sonne, who by hereditarie succession ought to haue succeeded her. The chiefe of these conspirators were D. Gutiere, Fernandes de Castro, and D. Gomes de Moncaneado, who with their confederates (hoping that the infant D. Alphonso should draw great ayde from his vnckle Pope Calixtus, who then gouerned the Church of Rome) they caused D. Alphonso to come vnto their assembly; and in despite of of the Queene his mother, and her Minion D. Pedro, made him king of Castile and Leon, in the yeare 1122. D. Alphonso King of Nauarre hauing raigned in those realms, almost 14. yeares, in continuall troubles and care.

This Pope Calixtus of whom we haue spoken, was before called Guy, brother to Cont Raymond, and Cont William of Bourgogne, who being Archb. of Vienna, had bin advanced to the sea of Rome, after the decaise of Gelasius the 2. in the yeare 1120. in the Abbey of Clugny, where Gelasius died, flying the fury of the Emperor Henry the 5. This Calixtus was to contend against Maurice Archb. of Braga, a Limosin, called Bourdin, who had bene chosen Pope by the Emperours faction, against the election of Gelasius, and caused himselfe to be called Gregory the 8. Hee had bin brought into Spaine by D. Bernard, Archb. and Primate of Toledo, with a great opinion of his holines and wise dome, and therefore he made him bishop of Coimbra, and afterwards Archb. of Braga: but he sought to make him a bad requitall, perswading Pope Pascall, who was Predecessor to Gelasius, to depriue D. Bernard of his dignity, and to choose him in his place, offering him a good summe of mony. The Pope who was exceeding couetous, took his mony, and put him in hope, but he did not any thing. Wherefore there growing great dissention betwixt the Pope and the Emperor Henry, for the nomination of Prelates, Bourdin, who had changed his name, & taken that of Maurice, to his promotion to Braga, ioyned with the Emperor, and ceased not till he was made Pope of Rome, whilst Gelasius liued, who soone after died, leauing this quarrell to bee decided by Calixtus.

Then might you haue seene Christs Vicars command armies, place guards, giue the word, be in battels armed, giue the bodies and goods of miserable Christians in prey, and to countenance the most horrible insolencies which warre could produce. Gregory the 8. going from Sutri, where he had assembled his forces, prest Rome by acts of hostilitie, spoyling pilgrims which went to get pardons, according to the Romane doctrine. On the other side, Calixtus sending many souldiers out of Bourgogne, vnder the conduct of Iohn de Crema, Cardinall of S. Chrisogone, he himselfe followed after in person, with other troups, so as he entred Rome with great effusion of blood, and there suppressed Gregorie, where making him a ridiculous spectacle vnto the people, mounted vpon a Camell, with his face backward, holding the tayle in his hand, for a bridle, he put him in perpetuall prison, where hauing renounced his Popedom, he ended his dayes. Thus were Ecclesiasticall charges executed among Christians in those dayes. Pope Calixtus hauing preuailed ouer his aduersarie about the time that D. Alphonso Raymond his nephew was chosen in Castile to raigne in stead of his vnchast mother, it was likely this election should be confirmed and supported by the authority of Rome, against all that should contradict it.

The estate of Portugall was troubled with the like disorder, and D. Alphonso Henriques, and the Portugals were prest with the like difficulties, by the disordered appetites of their Countesse, D. Theresa his mother, who was then enioyed by D. Fernand Paz: against whom D. Alphonso armed, pursuing him as a Tyrant and incestuous adulterer, their armies ioyned neere vnto Guymaranes, where D. Alphonso was vanquished, being too hastie to fight, and would not attend some supplies, which D. Egas Nagues (who had bred him vp, and gouerned him in his infancie) brought vnto him: by whome hee was then sharply blamed for his rashnesse, proceeding from want of experience and heat of youth. Hauing recovered new forces, there was a second battaile fought, whereas D. Alphonso had the better: for D. Ferdinands armie was put to route, and himselfe with the Countesse put in a safe prison, from whence D. Fernand was afterwards deliuered at her intreatie, with promise neuer more to stile himselfe Earle of Portugall, but to be a perpetuall subiect and vassall vnto D. Alphonso Henriques, who by this meanes remayned a peaceable Earle in Portugall. These fruites did the two vnchast and lasciuious sisters reape, beeing Daughters to king Alphonso the sixth, and in a manner at the same time.

D. Alphonso the 7. left raigning in Castile, where he had some places at his deuotion, held by a Nauarrois garison: during whose raign dyed S. Dominike of Calçada in Rioje, who

The Papacie disputed by armies.

Portugall.

VVarr betwixt the Mother and the son in Portugall
The Countesse
D. Theresa and her vnlawfull husband taken prisoner.

Castile.

A who was reputed a Saint: hee was buried in the tombe which hee had made in his life time. He had bene a Monke of the Order of Saint Benet, at Valbanera, and after in the Monasterie of Saint Aemilian, where they did not much esteeme him: wherefore he gaue himselfe to a solitarie life, and to follow the doctrine of Gregorie bishop of Ostia: for he was a man without any learning. At the place of his Sepulcher, there is at this present a towne built with a Cathedrall church, and Episcopall see, carrying his name, vntied at this present to that of Calorra. He was much honoured in his life time, and after his death his memorie was reuerenced: Monkes beeing then admired, which gaue themselves to a monastick and solitarie life. At that time there was giuen by the king D. Alphonso, to the Monasterie of Saint Mary of Valbanera, the church of Lcuador, to that of Saint Saluador of Leyre, halfe the towne of Aralcues: in imitation of whome other Noblemen gaue gifts vnto Churches, where they had speciall deuotion, euery one choosing for his Patron, Adocate, and Protector, that Saint of whom the churches and Monasteries were named. This was the ordinarie doctrine of that age to win Paradise.

In the meane time the Bishops intruded themselves into the Councells of Kings, to mannage affayres of State, and to maintaine their Ecclesiasticall priuiledges, rights, and reuenues, they led armies, and were many times too forward to fight, as wee reade of D. Pedro of Roda, Bishop of Pampelone, who about the yeare 1115. meddling with the quarrels of some souldiers in the Towne of Tholoufa, receiued a blow on the head with a stone, whereof he died a Martyr, as the Spaniards say: an aduertisement for the rest to containe themselves in their vocations. D. Mayor Garcia, daughter to the Earle D. Diego Ordognes, and of D. Vrraca Garcia, daughter to the king D. Garcia, gaue vnto the Monasterie of Nagera about that time, certaine possessions which she had in Calorra. D. Fortian Velez a knight, at that time one of the most renowned in the Kingdome of Nauarre, gaue vnto the same Monasterie, the place of Alecon, to furnish lights at the Altar of the Virgin Mary: so great and so constant was the opinion of men in that age, that by gifts vnto the Clergie, they might redeeme their soules from eternall damnation, as they did not spare the principall townes of their Estates: D. Raymond Arnould Earle of Barcelone, at the same time, gaue vnto D. Alderje the Archbishop, the citie it selfe of Tarragone, which the Archbishops did enioy in full proprietie, for the space of foure and thirtie yeares. The foundation of the Hospitall vpon the Pyrene mountaines, at the passage of Ronceual, seemes to be a godly worke, the which was done by D. Sancho de Rosas Bishop of Pampelone, about the yeare 1122. but it was onely for Pilgrimes, going out of France to Saint James, wherein King D. Alphonso assisted him with money. This Hospitall was built neare vnto the place which was called Charlemagnes Chappell, a place which was much subiect to winds, and continuall stormes: whereupon it was afterwards built lower in Ronceual where it is now.

As soone as D. Alphonso Raymond was crowned King of Castile and Leon, by the meanes and direction of D. Pedro de Trauas, a Nobleman, who was allyed in Catalogne, to the Earles of Vrgel, and had bred and gouerned that Prince, hee beganne to pursue his mother, and D. Pedro de Lara her minion. D. Vrraca fortified her selfe in the tower of Leon, where he besetged her: but by the mediation of some Noblemen, who were al of the new Kings partie, a peace was made vpon condition, that she should giue ouer all gouernement of affaires, and be content to liue a priuate life, hauing a pension fit for her estate and calling. As for D. Pedro de Lara, after that hee had wandered long vp and downe, in the end he left the countrie, and beeing as coldly enterrayned in Nauarre and Arragon, as in Castile, he made his retreat into Barcelone.

The exercise of Bishops of that age.

The citie of Tarragone giuen
in proprietie
to the Archbishop of that place.

Accord hee
reuiue the king
of castile and his mother.

B b

D. Al-

D. Alphonso the 8. of that name, and the 27.
King of Leon, and the fifth
of Castile.

An. 1122. 7. D. Alphonso being thus dispossessed, D. Alphonso Raymond carried himselfe forking of Castile and Leon. After which he thought vpon the recouerie of the forts of Castile, which his father-in-law, D. Alphonso King of Nauarre detayned from him, wherefore he rayfed a mightie armie to vse it, if hee might not recouer that which hee pretended without armes: with these forces he marched towards Nauarre and Arragon, which were not vnprovided for the King had also taken armes to crosse him, if he should proue insolent, and was already entred into Castile by Rioje, when as the Prelates of both kingdomes, foreseeing the great miseries which would insue, if these two great Princes should once enter into warre, they laboured to make a peace and nitie betwixt them: and they preuayled so, as they perswaded the new king of Castile, to make request vnto the king of Nauarre and Arragon, to restore him his townes and forts, the which was of such force, as without any difficulty, King D. Alphonso being glad that he had taken so modest a course, did louingly restore vnto him all that he held in Castile, retayning onely the countie which is from Villorodo to Calaoarra: for that (sayd he) those lands were of the ancient patrimonie of Natiaire, vsurped by king D. Alphonso his father-in-law, since the decease of Don Sancho Garcia king of Nauarre, and by the same reason, the Prouinces of Guipuscoa and Alaua remained to the crown of Nauarre. Thus they layed downe armes of either side, and retired into their countries: Alphonso Raymond King of Castile, seeing himselfe settled in peace, he beganne to make warre against the Moores, his first enterprise was vpon Coriz, which towne had bene surprized during the inter-regne or absence of the king of Nauarre and Arragon after the decease of King D. Alphonso the Braue, his grandfather. This was a worke of few dayes, for he easily recouered it, but not content herewith, hee past on into the countries of Extremadura and Portugal, held by the Moores, the which he wasted, and brought away the spoyle, not any Moore appearing to make head against him. This good successe of his affaires, gaue him courage to greater attempts, and were as a spur to the naturall vertue and bountie wherewith God had endowd him, as much as any Prince of his time: for he was active, hardy and valiant, and withall wise, mild, capable, and very deuout.

In his time flourished the Order of Cisteaux, and the religion of S. Bernard, of the which he was carefull, and a great benefactor, so as they attribute to him the building of most part of the Monasteries of that habit which are in Spaine: and hee was no lesse carefull to repaire the ruines of many townes, and castels, which had bene destroyed by the continuall courses of the Arabians, he built and peopled new, and made many good lawes and ordonances, for the administration of iustice, and gouernement of townes: so as for these excellent vertues he was fauoured of God, beloued and respected of his subiects, and greatly feared of his enemies. It was about his comming to the Crowne, that his vnckle Calixtus erected an Episcopall see at Zamora: whereof D. Bernard, Arch-deacon of Toledo was the first Bishop, whereas now the Sepulcher of Yllefonse, Arch-bishop of Toledo, is worshipped with diuine honours, found (as the Historie say) by a shepheerd, a testimonie worthe of the inuention: At the same time (which was about the year 1125.) the church of S. James in Galicia, was made a Metropolitane, in fauour of his nephew, King D. Alphonso, who shewed great deuotion to this Saint, for that he had had his breeding, and past most of his youth in Galicia. The first Archb. of that place was Don Diego Gelmirio, aboue-named, borne in the same Diocesse, vnder which Archb. were appointed 12. Bishops, S. Iampantay, Auila, Plaisance, Lampara, Badajos, Cite Roderigo, Coria, Lugo, Astorga, Ornate, Mondoguedo and Tuy. Then began the Abbey of S. Dominike of Calçada to increase, so the which was giuen by Don Alphonso the Warriour, king of Nauarre, the place called

Modestie of greater force
than armes.

Exploits of King D. Alphonso
the 8. against
the Moores.

The vertues of King D. Alphonso
the 8.

Zamora made
a bishopricke.

An. 1125.
S. James of Compostella made an Arch-bishopricke.

A called Olgabarte, or otherwife Iubarte, with great freedoms and exemptions. This Church was made subiect to the Bishop of Calaoarra, and at that time there was an Abbot and Monkes there, whereas since there were Chanoinis placed, and in the end it was made a Cathedrall church, the which is now a towne seated betwixt Nagera and Vilhorado, and in the beginning was but a small borough, called Malburguete, the which is now by corruption called Margubette, and is ioyned to the Cathedrall Church of that place, the which at this present is called the Bourg of Saint Dominike of Calçada.

B King D. Alphonso the Warriour had giuen some respite vnto the Moores, vnto the year 1125. when as he led his armie against them of Denia and Valencia, and spoiled the countie: then passing into Murcia and the marches of Carthage, hee attempted Alcaras; but could not take it: wherefore pursuing his good fortune, hee ouer-run the territories of Granado, then turning by Cordoua, as he prepared to beseege it, he was diuerted by an armie of Moores Almorauides, to whome hee gaue Battaille and defeated them: Yet he did not thinke it fit to stay then at this seege, but returned laden with spoyle into his countie, whither he led many Christians Musarabes, retired out of the tyrannie of the Moores, to whom he gaue dwellings and lands, with exemptions and titles of Nobilitie for them and theirs.

C In Portugal, Count D. Alphonso Henriques did in like manner annoy the Moores vpon his frontier, from whome he tooke Leyra, in the year 1127. the which hee gaue to the Monasterie of Saint Croix, in the towne of Coimbra, built by him, as the first fruites of his victories. Hee tooke in like manner the towne of Torrelinouas. The contrarie happened in Cattelogne, whereas the Moores (whilest that the king of Nauarre and Arragon did ouer-runne their western countie) were furiously entred, and committed infinite spoyle, the which might well bee one of the reasons which made the seege of Cordoua to cease, and caused the king of Nauarre and Arragon to retire to come and succor D. Raymond Aruold Earle of Barcelona.

D In these warres D. Alphonso king of Nauarre, had great ayde and assistance of many Knights and Noblemen of France, that were neighbours to the Pyrennees, to whome a great part of the victories obtained by him against the Moores are attributed by the testimonie of the Spanish Authors themselves. In this voyage of Cattelogne, hee led with him the infant D. Garcia, sonne and heire to D. Ramir Sanchez, to whom by right of succession the kingdome of Nauarre did belong, for that he was issued from the direct and lawfull line of the king D. Sancho Garcia his grandfather. This young Prince was left by his dying father in the gouernement of D. Sol widow to the infant D. Pedro, daughter to Cid, his Aunt by the mothers side, by whome he was bred up in his youth, in all vertue and religion, and they called him the Lord of Monçon. After this expedition the king peopled the new Bourg of Pampelone, which he had caused to be built nere vnto the old towne, and was called at that time Iruna, that is to say, good towne: hee placed French Inhabitants there, taken out of the souldiers which had followed him in the warres against the Moores, whom he would reward for their good seruices, in lodging them in this new inclosure, which he had made of the towne of Pampelone, giuing them the priuiledges and exemptions of the towne of Iaca. Some thinke they came from Cahors in Quercy: he also gaue priuiledges to the Inhabitants of Maragnon.

E During these things, the Countesse of Portugall, who was a prisoner, being too hardly intreated by D. Alphonso Henriques her sonne, had meanes to acquaint D. Alphonso Raymond, king of Castile her nephew, with her afflictions, and to intreate him to imbrace her cause, and so free her from that hard prison, wherein shee was detained: in recompence whereof she offered to make him her heire of the Earldome of Portugal. D. Alphonso desirous to ioyne this peece to his demaynes, came in person with a great armie, to deliuer this woman, forgetting that the Earle had assisted him in the warre, which he had against his mother D. Syraac Quene of Castile and Leon, but hee had a sharpe encounter in the fields of Valduces, along the banks of the riuer of Limia, where being vanquished by the armie of D. Alphonso Henriques, his cousin, hee saued himselfe, being hurt in the foot, in the territorie of Leon.

Bb 2

Being

Nauarre and Arragon.

Portugal.
An. 1127.

Nauarre and Arragon.

D. Garcia
sonne of Nauarre.

Castile.

Being cured, and hauing rayled another army, he entred againe into Portugal, being desirous to recouer his honour, and to force the Portugals to acknowledge him, and to do him the homage which they ought him, as King of Leon. Being arrived at Guymaranes, where the Earle was, he beseege it, and did all hee could to take the place: but D. Egas Nuges the Earles Gouvernor going forth with a safe-conduct, they so treated, as vpon a promise which Don Egas made vnto the King, that the Earle of Portugall should take an oath of fealtie, as to his Soueraigne, he returned satisfied into his Countrey, without doing any other exploit: but the Earle D. Alphonso Henriques would not performe that which his Gouvernor had promised: wherefore D. Egas went to the King being at Toledo, and there presenting himselfe at his feete, with a halter about his necke, he craued pardon, for that which he had promised, and could not performe; which was, that the Earle should do him homage for his Earledome of Portugall, whom the King pardoned, being duly informed that hee had done his best endeavour to effect his promise. These wars (which were the first the Castillians had against the Portugals, written by the Historians of Portugall, wherof notwithstanding others make no mention) past about the yeare 1127. D. Theresa for that time had no ease, Her sister D. Vrraca made her residence in Saint Vincents church, being streightly guarded: yet they say, that going one day to Saint Isidores church in Leon, to take the treasure which her father and grandfather had giuen vnto that place, as she was carrying this prey, hauing one foote within, and another without the doore, shee burst in the midst, a worthie and condigne punishment due for the adulteries which shee had committed, and the murders which ensued not long after, to the prejudice and dishonour of the Kings house, and of all the Christian Estate in Spaine, as also for the crilege. Others say, that shee dyed in the Castell of Saldagne, being brought in bed of a child by stealth. So Don Alphonso Raymond remayned destitute and without a mother.

Death prodigious
vnto D. Vrraca
of Castile.

Calatrava taken from the Moors.

About that time the king of Castile, provoked by the Moores, who were entred into the Territories of Toledo, marched farre into their countrey, and tooke from them by a long and painefull sege, the towne of Calatrava, the which he gaue to the Archbishop of Toledo, being a great fauourer of the Church and Clergie, into the which he put a good garrison, the which some belecue were Templers, who were wonderfully increased, and growne exceeding rich, euen in Spaine. After which D. Alphonso Raymond tooke from the Infidels, Alarcos, Caracuel, Almodouar del campo, and other places, whereof he fortified some, and razed others. At that time there reigned ouer the Moores in Spaine and Affricke, Hali Aben-Tefin, the third Miralmumin, and last of the Almorauides, vpon whom the King of Castile extended his limits vnto the Mountaines called Sierra Morena, where he fortified Pedroche: then he past into Andalousia with a great army, and layd sege vnto the towne of Iaca, but it was in vaine: for being valiantly defended by the Moores, he was forced to retire, and returned with his army into Castile.

Catalogue.
An. 1131.

Genealogie of Castelgne.

This King D. Alphonso had married D. Berenguela, daughter to Don Raymond Arnould Earle of Barcelona, who dyed in the yeare 1131. hauing held the Earledome eight and forty yeares. A litle before his death, he made himselfe of the Order of Saint John of Hierusalem, called the Hospitaliers. The Earledome of Prouence was fallen vnto him in the right of his wife D. Doulee, and of other lands in France: whereof shee caused himselfe to be called Marquis: by which Lady he had two sonnes, D. Raymond Berenger, who succeeded him in the principalltie of Castelgne; and afterward came by marriage to the Crowne of Arragon, and D. Berenger Raymond, who was Earle or Marquis of Prouence, thus ordered by his will. Of D. Doulee was also borne D. Berenguela Queene of Castile, and two other daughters, who were married into France. The Earledome of Prouence had bene in question betwixt D. Raymond Arnould, and the Earle of Tholoufa and Saint Giles, but their sute, after many delays, was ended by accord: which was, That the lands of Prouence lying betwixt the riuers of Dyrance and Isera, making at this day a part of Dauphiné, should belong vnto the Earle of Tholoufa, with the Castell of Beaucaire, the Lands of Argence, Castell of Bolege,

A bregge, and the moitie of the cittie of Auignon, and of Pont de Sorge, the rest should remaine to the Earle of Barcelona. According vnto this diuision, D. Berenger Raymond did inherit Prouence, and there was added, that if any of the parties dyed without lawfull heires, the other should succede. Among other Articles of D. Raymond Arnoulds testament, he ordained, that if his heires dyed without lawfull children, his daughter Berenguela, Queene of Castile and Leon, and D. Ximena, wife to Roger Earle of Foix should succede.

By this noble and vertuous Queene D. Berenguela, D. Alphonso king of Castile, had foure children: D. Sancho who was king of Castile, hee was bred vp in his youth and gouerned by D. Gutierre Fernandes de Castro. The second, D. Fernand, who did inherit the Realmes of Leon and Gallicia: and two daughters, D. Isabella, called by some D. Constance, wife to the French King, Lewis the young, the seuenth of that name, he that did put away Elenor, Countesse of Poitiers, heire of Guienne, daughter to Count William, who after this diuorce married with Henry Duke of Aniou and Normandie: who being heire to the Crowne of England, had long and cruell warres against the French, by reason of this Ladies patrimonie, the which continued about three hundred yeares, vnto King Charles the seuenth. The second daughter which D. Alphonso had by D. Berenguela, was called D. Sancho, or by others D. Beacia, who was Queene of Nauarre, hauing married the king D. Sancho surnamed the Wife, or the Valiant, as others write. There is to be seene among the tombes which are in the great Chappell C of the Monasterie of Ogna, an inscription of D. Garcia, who they imagine was sonne to the sayd D. Alphonso, who had a second wife, daughter to Vladislaus Duke of Polonia, called D. Rita, by whome he had one daughter called D. Sancho, who was married to D. Alphonso, the sixt king of Arragon, the second of that name. He had familiar acquaintance with two Gentlewomen, whereof the one, which was called D. Maria, broughthim a daughter, called D. Stephana; or Estienette: the other which was called D. Gontrude, bare him D. Vrraca, who was first married to D. Garcia Ramirez King of Nauarre: and for her second husband, she married a wife and valiant Knight, called D. Aluaro Rodrigues, without any respect of her degree, falling from a Queene to be the wife of a simple Knight: it may be the Ladies of those times had no such haughtie spirits as they haue at this day, or else could not distinguish betwixt vertue and fortune. D. Stephana her sister was married to another Knight, of the house of Castro, whome they called D. Fernand Rodrigues the Castilian, from whom issued a sonne, called D. Pedro Fernandes de Castro. This was the posteritie of King D. Alphonso of Castile. About the yeare 1132. he made his eldest sonne D. Sancho a Knight, on Saint Matthias day, vpon the which he also gaue the towne of Vra, to the Monasterie of Saint Dominicke of Silos.

It was about this time that Don Alphonso the Warriour, King of Nauarre, who alwayes called himselfe Emperour of Spaine, had certaine quarrels with them that dwelt on this side the Pyrenees, towards France, in the Duchie of Guienne, the occasion being concealed by the Authors, is not knowne to vs, but that wee may coniecture hee would fauour Don Alphonso Earle of Tholoufa and Saint Giles, from whome William Earle of Poitiers detained his liuing: but whatsoeuer moued him, hee beseege Bayonne, the which hee tooke with litle danger and difficulty, extending his limits much on that side.

During this sege he made his last will and testament, and as hee was alwaies enuironed with Bishops, who forgot not themselves in such oportunities, being also very deuout, and seasoned with an opinion, that finnes are wiped away, and punishments redeemed by gifts and foundations of rents and reuenues to Churches: Hee gaue vnto the great Church of Pampelona, and to the Monasterie of Leyre, the towne and Castell of Estella, to enioy the moytie thereof, with all the rights, profites, and commodities. To the Monasteries of Saint Mary of Nagera, and of Saint Emilian of Coggolla, he gaue the towne of Nagera and Tubie with the castels. To the Monasterie of Saint Dominicke of Silos, hee gaue the Towne of Sanguessa, together with the castell, and the two boroughs, the old and new. To that of Saint Saluador of Ogna, the

Genealogie of
Castile.

Nauarre and
Arragon.

Bayonne taken.

D. Alphonso
Testament.

A prodigious
claue in D.
Alphonso's re-flement.

towne and territorie of Villorodo. To the Monasteries of Jeau de la Pegna, and of Saint A Peter of Cerefa, and to the Cathedrall churches of Saint James in Galicia, and of Saint Saujour of Ouido, he gaue many Legacies of great consequence, but the most important was, that which he gaue to the religious of the holy Sepulcher, and to the knights of the Temple, and whatsoeuer else he should conquer from the Moores, ordaining in particular, that his armes and horse should be sent to the Knights of the Temple.

The King gaue all these prodigious Legacies, vpon a wonderful superstition, together with a hatred which he bare to them of his blood, finding himselfe old, and without any heires of his bodie: but there were but few put in execution, beeing so prejudiciall to the Christians estate in Spaine, and would haue bene the seed of diuision and wars betwixt the Princes: yet his testament was made with all solemnities, and fortified with the paines and threatens which were in vse in that age. Beeing returned into his countries, he ordained a feuerall court or iurisdiction for the Inhabitants of Calarajub, granting them many priuiledges and immunities, and ordaining that the reuenues of the Clergie should be hereditarie, to the end that the inhabitants, and such as were borne there, might onely enioy them, as in our time in Castile, those do which are of the Bishopricks of Calaoarra, Calçada, Bourgos, and Plaisance, and in many places of the Bishopricke of Pampelone.

An. 1133.
Assembly at Sarragossa.

In the beginning of the yeare 1133. this King and Emperour of Spaine, called an assembly of the Bishops and Noblemen of his country at Sarragossa, to resoluē vpon the warre against the Moores. Among those which were there present, they name the infant D. Garcia Ramirez, Lord of Monçon, the right heire of Nauarre: Roton Earle of Perche, Lord of Tudela, D. Sancho de Roses, bishop of Pampelone, another D. Sancho Bishop of Calaoarra, D. Garcia Guerra Bishop of Sarragossa, D. Michel of Tarrassone, and D. Arnould of Huesca, with many other great personages, both Clergie and Secular. There they concluded to make warre against the Infidels, enemies to the Christians, vsurpers of the countrie of Spaine; and withall, order was giuen for all things necessary for so great an enterprise: leuies of souldiers were made, and Commissaries sent out for victuals, carriages, boates and other things necessary for the conduct of munition, victuals, instruments and engines of batterrie, with great prouision of arms, and all that was needfull for so great an army.

Expedition
against the Moores unfortunate.

The King D. Alphonso the warriour hauing resolved to root out the Moores, hee began on this side Ebro to assaile them of Lerida and Fraga, from whence hee tooke the town of Mequinença by composition, being at that time exceeding strong, and valiantly defended by the Moores: from thence he came before Fraga, a town well fortified, and strong by nature, seated vpon the riuer of Cinca, the which he began to presse about August, and there made a long and fruitlesse stay: so as winter approaching, hee was forced to raise his seege, hauing an intent to returne in the Spring, the which hee did in Februarie, 1134. If the place were strong before, the Moores had so fortified it during the winter, as they had made it impregnable: when as they retired, the besegged taking courage, as wel by the retreat of the Christians, as by some succors which they had from about Lerida, they went to field, and charged the reeward of the Nauarrois army, whom they forced to turne head, and to fight with all his forces. There was the king D. Alphonso vanquished, the which was strange, and of hard digestion to him, who hauing bene accustomed to beate his enemies, euer since he commaunded an armie. Wherefore he retired wonderfully perplexed, hauing lost that day many Christians, and among others many valiant Knights, and great personages of his Realmes of Nauarre and Arragon.

Alphonso king
of Nauarre vanquished by
the Moores.

The Moores growne proud with this victorie, and that they had chased the king out of their limits, entred into his countrie, putting all to fire and sword, which they could not carrie away with them, and came as farre as Monçon: wherewith the king being incensed, he thrust himselfe into a calamitie vnworthie of so great and wise a Capitaine as he had alwaies shewed himselfe. But we strue in vaine against the will of heauen, and worldly man doth in vaine call backe good fortune, which hath once turned her face from

A from him, for his sinnes, which hee doth not vouchsafe to acknowledge. His troups being disperfed, and euery one retired to his house, after this route he called those that were nearest vnto him, and attending a conuenient number to attend his person, hee went in all haste, beeing old and broken, with foure hundred horse to pursue these Moores, who carried away a great prey, and an infinit number of Christians prisoners, hauing ouertaken them nere vnto their fort of Fraga, hee found his owne error, and would gladly haue retired, but it was too late; for the Moores descouering the small number which pursued them, turned head, and hauing stretched forth their bands, they enuironed the King and his whole troupe, and put them in a manner all to the sword, where amongst the rest the King was slaine. This happened in September, in the

Defeat and death of King
D. Alphonso
the warriour.

B yeere 1134. Such was the end of King D. Alphonso the warriour, a very worthy and a fortunat Prince, if home-bred calamities, the hatred of his owne blood, and his ouer great superstition, had not vndermined and weakened the vigour of his spirit, the which was much decayed in his latter daies. They say his body was taken vp and buried in the Monastery of Iesus of Nazareth in Montarragon: yet many hold that it was not found, beeing (it may bee) scattered in this defeat from his company, and so swallowed vp in some bogge or riuer, or lost by some other accident, as hath happened to other Princes, in the like encounters. The brute was among the common people, that he was escaped in the charge, and that seeing himselfe twice vanquished, whereto he had not bene accustomed, he was so greeued as he durst not shew himselfe to his subiects any more, but went to Ierusalem, from whence he neuer returned. He had reigned about thirty yeeres. At his decease, the Estates of Nauarre and Arragon were much perplexed, both for that their King had left no heire of his body, as also for the desperate will which he had made. These difficulties were augmented by the factions of the Nobility, who could not agree vpon the election of a new King.

9. Whilest they contended among themselves, D. Alphonso Raymond King of Castille, being aduertised of the decease of his father in law, by the aduice and perswasion of his counsell, hee reuiued his pretensions to the Estates of Nauarre and Arragon, as great grand-child to D. Sancho the great, who was King of Nauarre and Earle of Arragon; wherupon hee seized vpon the Lands of the riuer of Oija, of Villorodo, Granon, Nagera, Logroño, Arnedo, Bigueria, and many other places vnto Calaoarra, which were thence cut off from the body of Nauarre: so as the iurisdiction of that Kingdome was then lymited towards Castille, by the riuer of Ebro. D. Alphonso continuing his conquests, whilest that no man made head against him, hauing attempted the town of Victoria in vaine, hee ouer-ran the country of Alaua, and tooke the town of Maragnon and other forts: striking such a terror into the Nauarrois and Arragonois, as if they had not feared to loose their exemptions and priuiledges, and to bee ill intreated by King D. Alphonso, they would haue willingly yielded all vnto him.

Visitation of some places in Nauarre by the King of
Castille.

Amongst the chiefe which did counsell and accompany the King in this spoile, were E the Bishops, D. Bernard of Siguença, D. Sancho of Nagera, & D. Bertrand of Osma; and of Noblemen D. Lope, and D. Sancho Diaz, D. Garcia Fortuñones, D. Rodrigo Gonzales, the Earles D. Pedro Lopes, D. Gomes Nugnes, D. Gutierre Peres de Lores, Diego Nugnes, Garcia Garces, Almerigo standard bearer to the King, D. Lopes Lord Steward of the Kings house, Melendo Bosno, Ordogno Peres, Rodrigo Gonzales of Olea, Gutierre Fernandes, Rodrigo Fernandes, and Rodrigo Nugnes de Gusman. King D. Alphonso spoyling all along the riuer of Oija, beeing admonished not to forget to make expiation for his excesse, he gaue many goodly things to the Monastery of Saint Emilian, the which are found written and receiued by Berenger Arch-deacon of Toledo. Beeing afterwards entred in Arragon, hee committed the like spoiles as in Nauarre. The Nauarrois and Arragonois seeing themselves prest by the King of Castille, they made haste to preuent F these mischiefs, whereto they were subiect for want of a head: wherfore beeing assembled at a place called Borja, a town belonging to D. Pedro de Atares, a knight of the blood royall, who some thinke was sonne to D. Garcia, the sonne of D. Sancho, Bastard to D. Ramir first King of Arragon, and of D. Theresa Caxal his wife, a great number

Names of Knights and Prebats, which did accompany
the King of
Castille.

Expiations of the sins and visitations of
D. Alphonso
King of Cas-
tile.

number of them were of aduice, that they should choose him for King of Nauarre and Arragon, for that they had obserued in him many royall qualities, and did know that the deceased King had much esteemed him, and had giuen him that towne in rewarde of his seruices, with many other gifts. Notwithstanding this personage (otherwise of his seruices, with many other gifts) was graue and exceeding seuer; which made him to bee endowed with great vertues) was graue and exceeding seuer; which made him to bee the lesse beloued by the Nobility of Nauarre: of whom some held themselves wronged in their particular, for that offering some times to visit him, they haue refused them the entry, the porters saying, that Monsieur was busie about matters of great importance, but they vnderstood afterwards that the great affaires which had made D. Pedro exclude his friends, were, that his Barber was a trimming him: wherefore his great ouer-weening and his vnseasonable grauitie, did him then harme, so as hee was not chosen King of these two large Kingdomes, his greatest aduersaries beeing Pedro Tisan of Quadrieta, and Pelagrin of Castellazuelo, who gaue the assembly to vnderstand, that the chiefe vertues, requisite in Kings, wanted in D. Pedro which were clemency and affability, in steed of which hee was full of Arrogancy and insupportable presumption.

If he haue (say they) made shew thereof in many places luying in a priuate estate, who can doubt, but after that hee hath attained to the royall throne, hee will passe all bounds of modesty, and that hee will contemne the Noblemen and Gentlemen his subjects: who shalbe the more reiected, when hee shall finde them to bee vertuous, for pride in him that holds the soueraine place, is euer accompanied with ialousie and deadly hatred against the best men. Wherefore they concluded, that they must bee very carefull, not to submit themselves to such a man, but should choose some other Lord, who was descended of the same blood, whereof the country, by the Providence of God, was not vnfurnished: that they had D. Ramir, brother to the deceased King, D. Garcia Ramires, Lord of Monçon and others, who had giuen better hope of them then D. Pedro.

By their perswasions, the Noblemen and men of State assembled at Borja, inclined to D. Ramir, who was a Monke of the order of Saint Benet. But to the end it might be effected with more order, and lesse difficulty, they resolved to change the place of their assembly, and goe to Monçon.

D. Garcia Ramires the seuenth of that name and the nineteenth King of Nauarre.

10. IN this dislodging, the Nauarrois grew to bee of an other opinion, considering that D. Ramir hauing beene bread vp amongst Monkes, for the space of forty yeeres, it was likely that hee was better acquainted with matters belonging to a monastike and solitarie life, then to gouerne a Kingdome, besides they grew ialous, that the Arragonois choosung a King of the bloud royall of Arragon, they would by this meanes aspire to the chiefe places of fauour and honour in Court: wherefore these things being propounded in priuate assemblies, by D. Sancho de Rosas, Bishop of Pamplone, Ladron de Gueuara, sonne to Tynes, chiefe of the house of Gueuara in Alaua, pelone, Ladron de Gueuara, sonne to Tynes, chiefe of the house of Gueuara in Alaua, William Aznarez of Oteyça, Fortunacion Ynigues of Leete, Ximen Aznarez of Oteyça, the which hauing performed with great diligence, they did choose D. Garcia Ramires, the which hauing performed with great diligence, they did choose D. Garcia Ramires, Lord of Monçon for King of Nauarre, who was sonne to the infant D. Ramir grand-child to D. Sancho Garcia, &c. great grand-child, to D. Garcia the 6. who was son vnto the king D. Sancho the great. D. Garcia was at Monçon at the time of this election, with the Arragonois, assisting at their assembly, for the election of a future King, hauing no thought to aspire to that degree, when as Willi. Aznarez of Oteyça, &c. Ximen Aznarez of Torres,

D. Pedro King fled for his solence.

Division &
among the Nobility of Na-uarre and Ar-
ragon.

A Torres, beeing sent by the assembly of Pampelone, came to aduertise him of that which had past, and led him secretly away to Pampelone. So D. Garcia Ramires was established King of Nauarre, in October, 1134. being about forty yeeres old.

D. Ramir the second of that name, and fifth King of Arragon.

11. VVhen as the Arragonois vnderstood that there was a King in Nauarre, they suddenly made choise of D. Frere Ramir for their King, who had beene Monke at Tomires, appointed to bee Bishop of Roda and Barbastro, hauing beene before of Bourgos and Pampelone, and in like manner had beene chosen Abbot of Sahagun in Castille, and was a priest, as D. Rodrigo Ximenes the Archbishop doth write: To his election was added a dispensation from Pope Anclerus, then reigning. By this meanes the Realmes of Nauarre and Arragon, which had beene vnited eight and fifty yeeres, since the King D. Sancho Ramires, were seperated in these two Kings.

D. Frere Ramir, the new King of Arragon, had need of a more quiet estate, in respect of his breeding vp in Saint Benets order, for thinking to raigne in Arragon, hee found a rough aduersary in D. Alphonso Raymond King of Castille, wherefore hee retired himselfe into the mountaines of Sobrarbre, hauing neither force nor courage to oppose himselfe against him: so as to settle and to assure himselfe, he was forced to vse mildet meanes then armes, and come to prayers and intreaties, imploying mediators which were fit to treat, and pleasing to his enemy. Amongst others which labored to make a peace betwixt these two Princes, were, D. Oldegaire Archbishop of Tarragone; but both he and the rest lost their labours, for the King of Castille beeing come neere vnto Saragossa, the chiefe city of that Estate, hee was receiued, and commanded there as King, hauing in his company D. Raymond Berenger, Earle of Barcelona, his wiues brother, and Roger Earle of Foix who had married the other sister of Queene D. Berenguela, D. Alphonso Iordain Earle of Tolouse, Armingol Earle of Virgel, Mir Earle of Pallars, Berenger Arch-deacon of Toledo, and many other Knights of Castille, Arragon, Cattelogne, yea and of France.

Hauing with this company disposed of the affaires of Arragon, he returned to Leon, whereas he made an assembly of Prelats, and other chiefe men of his Estates, whereas hee caused himselfe to bee crowned Emperor of Spaine in the Cathedral church, with the solemnities and ceremonies requisite in so great an act, receiuing the holy vnction and the crowne from D. Raymond, Archbishop of Toledo, which title was afterwards confirmed (as some Spaniards write) by Pope Innocent the second, although that the Kings his Predecessors (who had vsurped the like title, for that they were soueraine Lords in their countries, without acknowledging any other secular power) had not affected the like confirmation. Some say this coronation was at Toledo: it may bee it was a reiteration of that pompe and ceremony in Castille and the territory of Toledo, which were distinct Kingdomes, and different from that of Leon, or it may bee a second coronation, as the custome is in the Empire of Germany.

They adde moreouer that the name of Imperiall was confirmed to that city, by King D. Alphonso the eighth, and armes giuen it, the which it carries at this day, which are, an Emperor in a roab of gold, sitting in a throne, holding a globe in his left hand, and in his right a sword. In this pompe the church of Toledo had by gift from the Emperor D. Alphonso, the towne of Alcala the old, in the yeere 1135. It was a fort built by the Moores, and ruined in the former warres: wherefore they hold that D. Raymond the Archbishop did afterwards build the towne of Alcala de Henares, whereas it is at this day, and whereas in old time the towne of Complutum stood.

This Spanish Emperor seeing himselfe in that greatnesse, strooke against the same stone where his Predecessors had grossly stumbled, and came to diuide his realmes among

Arragon.

Saragossa sited on by the King of Castille.

Castille.

Alphonso Raymond King of Castille crowned Emperor
of Spaine.

Toledo the Imperial
towne.

An. 1135.

Castile and Leon, divided.

mongst his children, making them Kings, being ill aduised by bad counsel: to D. Sancho A the eldest he gaue Castile and Toledo; and to D. Fernand Leon and Galicia. To D. Sancho hee extended the ancient lymits of Castile towards Leon, vnto the towne of Sahagun, by Moral de la Roine, Tordehumos Vregna and Cauillas. To the second he assigned the Lands of Leon and Galicia, with that part of the Asturias, which lies from the river of Oua vnto Galicia.

These seeds of warre and discord, were laied by the bad counsel of the Earles D. Almeric de Lara, otherwise called Manriques, sonne to D. Pedro de Lara, and D. Fernand of Transmara, great Noblemen, who thought to maintaine the greatnesse and reputation of their houses the better, by these partages, and from the troubles which might ensue, then if there were but one Monarke in Spaine, an ordinary practise in great Christian Estates: this done D. Alphonso returned into Arragon.

Nauarre.

D. Garcia Ramires King of Nauarre, seeing the successe of the King of Castile, in the countries of Nauarre and Arragon, doubting hee should not be able to resist the great power of this new Emperor D. Alphonso, especially if hee made himselfe maister of D. Ramirs Kingdome, as hee was very likely, hee resolved to purchase a peace and his friendship, by some submission vnto him for his realme of Nauarre. D. Alphonso then being returned into Arragon, after the ceremonies of his coronation, these two Princes had an interview at Pradilla, with great shewes of loue, where their accord and league was confirmed.

Nauarre was salto Castile.

Arragon.

King D. Ramir, who could not obtaine his realme of Arragon, pretended to recouer that of Nauarre from D. Garcia Ramires, saying, that it belonged vnto him, as being brother, and lawfull successor to the deceased King D. Alphonso the warrior; notwithstanding that D. Garcia had more interest then hee, or his Predecessors Kings of Arragon, being sonne to the Infant D. Ramir Sanchez, and grand-child to the King D. Sancho Garcia, slaine by his brother D. Raymond through desire of raigne, after which Parricide, the Nauarrois called in D. Sancho of Arragon, father to the Kings D. Pedro, D. Alphonso, and of this Monke, to raigne ouer them, by reason of the minority of the children of their deceased King, and with the forces of Arragon to repulse the murderer D. Raymond, and his faction: and to keepe him from raigning in Nauarre: yea D. Garcia Ramires had a better title to Arragon, then D. Alphonso Raymond King of Castile, for that he was descended from the King D. Garcia Sanchez, the eldest sonne of D. Sancho the great, but where force raignes, right must giue place. Notwithstanding all these reasons, D. Frere Ramir would make warre in Nauarre, and being in armes, hee forced D. Garcia to arme also, who to auoide the danger which did threaten him, if D. Ramir should make an agreement with the King of Castile, hee made hast to doe the homage, whereof wee haue spoken, but it continued not long: for soone after the Kingdome of Nauarre recouered the ancient and hereditary souerainty. D. Ramir, who kept at Monclus in the mountaines of Sobrarbe, staid not long to submit himselfe also to the King of Castile, and to doe him homage for his realme of Arragon: wherefore D. Alphonso restored him all his lands except Sarragossa, and some other places, which he kept, to make vse of them against the Moores.

War betwixt Nauarre and
Arragon.

In the meane time there were cruell warres vpon the frontiers of Nauarre and Arragon: but the Prelats desirous to see this warre ended, laboured to reconcile the two Kings. D. Sancho de Rosas, bishop of Pampelone, an Arragonois borne, delt so in this treaty of peace, as hee gaue the King D. Garcia occasion to suspect him to be false vnto him, for the which he chased him out of his countries, whereupon he was taxed of two great seuerity; and for that he had banded himselfe against a prelat, he was in a manner compared to D. Pedro d' Athares, who by reason of his sterne and fower disposition, had become reiected from the royall dignity, so dangerous it was to touch these sacred persons, were they good or bad.

The Prelats who had vndertaken to make this appointment, neuer ceased vntill they had brought it vnto these termes, that they should choose fixe knights: three of either realme, by whose iudgement all quarrells should be ended: for Nauarre were chosen Ladron de Guenars, William Aznars of Oteyca, and Ximen Aznars of Torres for Arragon

A Arragon they did choose D. Pedro d' Athares, D. Casal, and D. Ferris of Huesca. These fix being assembled at Vadoluengo; after many countels and conferences, in the end they concluded that either party should lay downe armes, and the two Kings should continue good friends; and for an order betwixt them, they assigned vnto D. Garcia Ramires, the superiority ouer the Nobility, who should haue the conduct of armies as General of both realmes; and that D. Ramir should haue commandment ouer the rest of the people, and administer iustice, the which should take place in regard of their persons onely, and during their liues: with which sentence the Kings were not well contented. Yet D. Ramir being willing to satisfie D. Garcia, came to Pampelone, where hee was receiued with great honour procuring at his first coming the restitution of D. Sancho the Bishop, whom hee restored into fauour with the King D. Garcia. There they consulted for the setting downe of certaine and apparent lymits, betwixt the two realmes of Nauarre and Arragon. The seperation was drawne by a direct line, from Saint Encratia, to Bisoal, the valley of Roncall remayning to Arragon. Then passing the river of Sarazas, vnto the place whereas it falls into that of Yda, and to Pont Saint Martin, and from thence to the place whereas Yda falls into the river of Arragon, and that of Arragon into Arga, and that of Arga into Ebro, and a long Ebro, into Tudela.

Treaty of peace betwixt Nauarre and
Arragon.

Ancient lymits betwixt
Nauarre and Arragon.

Nauarre.

This diuision being made, it seemed there should not remaine any cause of hatred betwixt these two Kings; and that D. Garcia Ramires, should reuerence D. Ramir, as his father; and D. Ramir embrace D. Garcia as his sonne, to whom moreouer hee granted, during his life, out of his portion, Valtierra, Quadrita, and that which lies betwixt Roncal, and Bisoal, the which he should hold in fee of the crowne of Arragon, to bee reunited againe after his death. Yet D. Garcia was not satisfied with this accord, perswading himselfe still, that D. Ramir ought not to raigne in Arragon; for that hee had bene a professed Monke, and had taken all orders: so as vpon the pursute thereof he made to bee freed from the homage which hee had done vnto D. Ramir, for those places aboue mentioned; he attempted to stay him in Pampelone, giuing the charge thereof to some of his followers, but they could not put it in execution; for the King of Arragon was aduertised by a Knight, called Trigo d' Ayuar, so as hauing conferred with D. Pedro d' Athares, and other knights of Arragon, he went out of the towne vnknewe, with foure more with him, posting away with all speed vntill he came to Saint Sauour of Leyre, where hee staid three daies for his traine, who came vnto him, according to his directions, and from thence he retired in safety to Huesca. So it happened to the King D. Sancho Ramires, as to his great Grand father. D. Garcia Sanchez, when as he would haue taken King Fernand the first King of Castile, his yonger brother, prisoner, in the towne of Nagera:

Strande of the
King of Nauarre
ill executed.

Hereupon D. Ramir began to leauy men for the future warre of Nauarre, whereof the King D. Garcia was assured; and therefore hee made many prouisions for his defence and safety: the best and most worthy to bee imitated, was, that hee made choise of twelue of the chiefe families of his country, whom hee bound vnto him by honours and preferments, making them as it were heads of all the rest of the Nobility and gentry of Nauarre. Which were the houses of Guenara, Almoraut, Baçtan, Aybar, Leet, Subica, Rada, Bidaurre, Monragut, Vrox, Calcant, and Mauleon. He made one Commander ouer these noble houses, which should bee respected of them next to the Kings person: this was D. Ladron of Guenara to whom he gaue the title of Earle, and was the first which called himselfe Earle of Nauarre: this hee did, for that there were some gentlement of his country beganne to abandon him; to follow the partie of Arragon, retyring to D. Ramir, who entertained them; and assigned them lands in Arragon. Of which number was D. Casal, a man of great quality in those daies, hauing lands in both realmes, so as hee quit them in Nauarre to serue the King of Arragon, but as hee carried himselfe verie passionately in these quarrells, hee fell soone after into a great danger; for being sent by D. Ramir, to the Emperor D. Alphonso of Castile, to confirme a peace with him, that hee might with more liberty attend the affaires of Nauarre, as hee

Orders for the Nobility of Nauarre.

past

past vnaduisedly neere vnto the lands of D. Garcia, being aduertised thereof, he caused a him to be taken, at a place called Cares, a little Bourg, the which is now become a towne, named Pont de la Roine, vpon the riuier of Arga, about the which growes the best wine of all the countrie of Nauarre. D. Casal was put in a streight prison, where he continued long; but the Abbot of Saint Saluador of Leyre, who was his kinsman and friend, gaue vnto theking all the Jewels and treasure of his Abbey to redeeme him: wherefore after his deliuerie he shewed himselfe very thankfull to this Monasterie, and gaue vnto it all the lands he had in Tudele.

Arragon.

Dexterity of
D. Alphonso
King of Cas-
tile.

All matters betwixt the Kings of Castile and Arragon were reconciled, and there was an interview of these two Princes at Alagon, whereas D. Ramir did acknowledge to hold his Realme in fee, and did homage to D. Alphonso, which submission continued some yeares. Such was the dexterity of the King of Castile, hauing reduced these two some yeares. Such was the dexterity of the King of Castile, hauing reduced these two Kings vnder his Soueraigntie, and as it were feudataries of his Empire, that although they had a great desire to inuade one another, yet he kept them from all open hostility, as well by his authoritie, as by other meanes: sometimes restraining them by promises, sometimes by threatnes, presuming, that if they continued in that estate, he should haue them more at his commandement, then if one increasing with the ruine of another, he would grow so great, as he might rebell, and deny him the homage which hee had sworne.

King D. Ramir presently after he had left the Monasterie, married (with a dispensation from the Pope, for that he had sung Masse) to a French Ladie, called D. Agnes or Agnes, daughter to William Earle of Poitiers, and Duke of Guienne, who dyed in the year 1136. going in pilgrimage to Saint James, for else his sister, as some hold, by whom he had the Infanta D. Petronilla, who was afterwards married to the Earle of Barcelone: he did not long enioy his wife, after whose death, desiring to quill the affaires of the world, he sent his onely daughter to D. Alphonso King of Castile, to be bred vp in his Court with the Queene D. Berenguela: notwithstanding that the Noblemen of Arragon, brought her backe againe, saying, that shee did not find her selfe well in Castile.

Arragon and Castile, reunited by marriage.

An. 1137.

Conditions of the treaty.

About that time there was a knight retired into Arragon, called D. William Raymond of Moncada, Seneschal of Catlogne, who had fled, for certaine outrages which he had committed. By him there was a treaty of marriage begun, betwixt the Infanta D. Petronilla, heire of Arragon, and D. Raymond Berenger, Earle of Barcelone: his Lord, the which was afterwards accomplished, and in recompence of so great a service, the Seneschall obtained his pardon, and his dignity, which was to be chiefe and captain of the horsemen. It is not certaine when this marriage was effected, but it is probable, that it was neere the end of King D. Ramir, for that the Infanta Petronilla, was onely two or three yeeres old, when as the King left the gouernment of the Realme, to returne to his religious order, which was in the yeere of our Lord 1137. three yeeres after his election and promotion to the crowne, at which time the authors write that this marriage was concluded by words, De futuro: the conditions amongst others, were. That the Earle should not take vpon him the title of King, but should onely call himselfe Prince of Arragon, and Earle of Barcelone, but that the children which should descend of this marriage, should be called Kings of Arragon. That the Earle should carry in chiefe, the first and most ancient armes of Arragon, which was a crosse argente in a field azure, in all actions of warre, but hee might carry those of Barcelone in his shield and ensignes, hauing foure bends gueules, or a field or: yet the ensigne bearers should be of Arragon; that the Arragonois should take the deuise of Saint George.

This treaty being made and concluded in Barbastro, by the King, being assisted by the Noblemen of Arragon, and the Earle of Barcelone, hee was received in quality of Regent of the Realme of Arragon, with the which Catlogne remained vntil a hundred and three yeeres, after that Arragon was made a realme, and two hundred and three yeeres after that there had bene hereditary Earles in Catlogne. This done, King D. Ramir giuing over all administration and gouernment, as in a royall

Estate

A estate and habit, hee had alwaies carried a Monkes heart, hee retired into a Monastery which hee had buile, in the Parish of Saint Peter the olde at Huesca, there to spend the remainder of his daies religiously, with the Chaplins.

This Prince is taxed of cowardise and great cruelty, being transported with continual ieaousies, his deeds doe witnesse it, for that by the counsel of the Abbot of Saint Ponce of Toumese in Languedoc, he cut off the heads of Lope Ferencio, Rodrigo Ximenes, Pedro Martines, and Fernand Gomas, all of the house of Lara: Federic Lisana, Pedro Verga, Gyles Atroft, Pedro Sarmel, Garcia Pigna, Raymond de Fesses, Pedro Lucilla, Michel Aclurio and Sancho Fontana, all noble men of great houses; onely vpon a conceit that hee was contemned by them: This execution was done at Huesca. They

Cruelty of the King D. Ra-
mir.

B hold that this yeere 1137. the towne of Lerida, held by the Moores, was attempted, but not taken, by the Earle D. Raymond Berenger, who seeing himselfe aduanced in dignity, greatnesse and forces, being Prince of Arragon and Earle of Barcelone, would also enlarge his estates, and ioine vnto it the realme of Nauarre, reuiuing the pretended title of his father in law D. Frere Ramir, for the effecting whereof hee had many treaties with the Emperour D. Alphonso of Castile, whom hee found alwaies fauourable, by the mediation of the Queene D. Berenguela his sister, so as being prouoked by the Earle, and no lesse by his owne ambition, hee led an army against D. Sancho Ramirez, whom hee found well attended to make head against him betwixt Cortes and Gallur, where it pleased God to stay these armies from fighting, by the meanes of some good

C men, who did mediate some kinde of accord for that time. Notwithstanding Count Raymond (desirous to imbarke the Emperour D. Alphonso, his brother in law in this warre) came vnto him to Carrión, where hee renewed the oath of fealty, doing him homage for the country of Arragon, where he did insinuate so well into his fauour, as hee got out of his hands the townes of Sarragosse, Tarasone, Calatajub and Daroça, which were held by the Castilians. Afterwards D. Raymond Berenger returned againe to D. Alphonso's court at Carrión, whereas the conditions and Articles were concluded and set downe, concerning the warre which they should make in common, against D. Garcia King of Nauarre.

League betwixt the King of Cas-
tile and Prince of Arragon against
the King of
Nauarre.

D Amongst the which they diuided the Beares skinn before hee was taken, agreeing, that of all the country of Nauarre which they should conquer, the Emperour D. Alphonso should haue a third part, and the other two should belong vnto D. Raymond, Prince of Arragon, vpon condition to hold them in fee of the realme of Castile. At this treaty there were present the Bishops D. Berenger of Salamanca, and D. Pedro of Burgos, with other Noblemen both Clergy and Secular. From Carrión they went to Soria, where after they had held a councill of prophane things, they had a great care of religion, that is to say, of the temporal reuenues of the Church, wherefore the King and Queene did giue vnto the Monastery of Saint Mary of Valbanera, a house in Canegosa, with certaine immunities, to the end that if any thing were attempted vniuistly, to the ruine of another, this sinne might by that means be purged.

E The army of Castile being ready to march, the Emperour D. Alphonso past vnto the frontier of Nauarre, by the riuier of Ebro, marching along the which, hee came to Calaoorra, where hee was met by D. Sancho Bishop of Calaoorra, D. Stephen Prior of Saint Mary the royall of Nagera, D. Michel Bishop of Tarasone, with the Earle D. Ladrón of Gueuara, and others, who employed themselves happily to appease the ambition of this Prince, and to conuert the warre into a good peace, the which was concluded by an interview of the two Kings of Castile and Nauarre, betwixt Calaoorra and Alfaro: to confirme the which, there was a marriage concluded betwixt the Infant D. Sancho, the eldest sonne of Castile, and D. Blanche, daughter to D. Garcia King of Nauarre, in the yeere of our Lord 1140. and promises made by words, de futuro, by reason of the tender age of the Infanta, who was deliuered vnto D. Alphonso her father in law, to be bred vp in Castile, vntil shee were capable for the consummation of the marriage.

Nauarra.

Peace betwixt Nauarre and
Castile.

Cc

14. This

The generall Historie of Spaine.

Lib.9

14. This was a second crosse to the desires of the new Prince of Arragon, who was at the same time in quarrel with the knights of the Temple, and the Hospitaliers of Saint John of Ierusalem, which pretended the succession of the realme of Arragon, by the vertue of the Testament of the deceased King D. Alphonso the Warrior, by the which they were made heires. Raymond Maister of the hospitaliers was come into Spaine to that end, who seeing it very difficult to challenge their right by armes, and that to pursue it by Iustice, besides the tediousnesse, the event would be vncertaine, and the execution very hard, hee sought to make an accord, and compounded with D. Raymond Berenger, quitting vnto him that part which did belong vnto the Hospital, vpon condition, that if he died without children lawfully begotten, it should returne to the same religion.

Besides hee receiued many benefices and charitable gifts for the sayd religion, in those places which the Earle did then enioy, with promise of a large portion of all which hee should conquer from the Moores. According to this accord the Templers turkeased their action: so as after that time those two Orders got great revenues in Arragon, Catalogne, and Valencia. In the transaction which was made betwixt D. Raymond Berenger and the Templers, for the Prince there assisted, the Bishops of Saragosse, and Huesca, with the ArchBishop of Tarragone: and moreover Arnaud Earle of Pallars, Bernard of Comminges, Peter of Bigorre, and other Noblemen and knights of Arragon, Catalogne and others: and for the Templers, Euerard, Ostan of Saint Ordogno, Hugo Borrato, Pedro Anticho and Bernard Rignol. This accord was confirmed by Pope Adrian the fourth.

Nauarre.

D. Garcia Ramires King of Nauarre, being (by meanes of a peace made with D. Alphonso Emperour of Spaine) freed from a great danger, he stood very carefully vpon his guard, in respect of D. Raymond Berenger, who prest him towards Arragon, finding himselfe strong ynough to resist him: for notwithstanding that the Earle was a wife and valiant knight, yet the King D. Garcia was nothing inferiour vnto him in vertue, greatnesse of courage, knowledge and discipline in warre, and was also well assisted with good and wife Knights, amongst the which hee was faithfully serued by D. Sancho de Rosas Bishop of Pampelone, newly reconciled, the Earle D. Ladron of Gueuara Lord in Ayauar, William Aznares Lord in Sanguesse, Ximen Aznares, Lord in Tafalle, Ramir Garcia, Lord in the towne of Saint Mary of Vxue, Martin de Lees, Lord of Galmipienço, & Peralta, Lord in Funes and Valtiera, Iean Dia, Lord in Calcant, Ramir Sanchez, Lord in Maragon (they were Gouvernors or Captaines in these places) & many others, as well of his owne country, as of France. Hee kept in fronter places well manded, like a prouident Prince, as the fort of Tudele, which came vnto him by marriage, as we will shew, Bureta and Sos.

Hee had put a valiant captaine into the fort of Malon, called Gerard the Diuell into that of Frescano an other captaine, a stranger, called Robert of Matalon, and so in the rest which frontered vpon Arragon. Moreover hee had practised a league with France, first with Lewis the sixth, surnamed the Grosse and then with Lewis the seueneth, called the young, who assisted him with their forces, and fortified his army, when as the Emperour D. Alphonso presented himselfe first betwixt Cortes and Galur, and then in the second expedition of Calaoorra, where the peace was concluded and confirmed by the marriage of D. Sancho Infant of Castille, with D. Blanche, Infanta of Nauarre, whom the King D. Garcia had had by D. Marguerite his wife, daughter to Rotron Earle of Perche, who had brought vnto him the towne of Tudele for her dowrie, the which Count Rotron had obtained from King D. Alphonso the warrior, for his valour and good deserts. The King D. Garcia Ramires had many other children by this Ladie: D. Sancho who was King after him, D. Alphonso Ramires, Lord of Castro Vicio, D. Marguerite, who was Queene of Naples and Sicile, married to William, sonne to Roger, father and mother to an other William, King of Naples and Sicile. Queene Marguerite dyed about the yeere 1141. after which the King D. Garcia married againe with D. Prraca, bastard daughter to the Emperour D. Alphonso, which he had by a gentle.

Genealogy of Nauarre.

Lib.9.

The generall History of Spaine.

291

A gentlewoman, called D. Contrude sister to one Diego Abregon, or Apricio. The King had one daughter by this second wife, called D. Sancho, who was married first to Gaston Earle of Bearne, and afterwards to D. Pedro de Molina, from whom issued D. Almerigo, or Manrique, who was vicont of Narbonne, by succession from D. Ormesind, his grand-mother by the fathers side: some say, that the second wife of the King D. Garcia, was not D. Vrraca, bastard daughter to D. Alphonso King of Castille, but the daughter of D. Lope Diaz de Haro, Lord of Biscay the third of that name, and the first which intitled himselfe de Haro, the which was called D. Geoffrey, who sister D. Prraca Lopes, was wife to D. Fernand King of Leon, the second of that name, sonne to the Emperour D. Alphonso then raiging. These two Ladies had also one brother, called D. Diego Lopes de Haro, surnamed the good, who was a braue a valiant Knight. Yet the first opinion taken out of D. Rodrigo Jimenes, Archbishop of Toledo, a Nauarrois, is more approoued by the Spaniards, touching the marriages of the King D. Garcia.

Family of Haro
the Lords of Biscay.

There is mention made in the Histories of Spaine, of a Lady of this house of Biscay, called D. Maria Lopes, verie deuout and bountifull to the Clergy, who gaue Saint Michele de Barbadiella, Saint Mary de Lor, Saint Mary d'Estialu, Aperreguin and Magnariette, with other lands which are in the Province of Alaua, where she dwelt, to the Monasterie of Nagera. The deuotion of Princes and Noblemen in those daies was great, struing who should giue most vnto the Church, being instructed by the Clergie, that the onely meanes to redeeme their soules from eternal damnation, was to doe good to religious men, who praied to God for them, whilst they abandoned themselves to all voluptuousnesse, and pleasures in their secular estates, spoiling oftentimes their neighbours, or subiects of their patrimonies to enrich (that is to say, to ruine) the Church, making Bishops, Abbots, Priests and Monkes partakers of their rapines and spoiles.

Donations vnto
the churches.

During the troubles of Castille, Arragon and Nauarre, there grew great contention betwixt D. Simeon Bishop of Burgos, and D. Sancho de Punes, Bishop of Calaoorra, for the church & sepulture of Saint Dominike of Calçada, either of them maintayning that it was of his Diocese and iurisdiction. Therein (in my opinion) they did not strue who should hate the greatest flock, and feed the best for their soules health, but they rather sought their owne reputations, and particular profits, for that the opinion of the holiness of this dead man, did every day increase, in which place they built a towne, and moreover that the Kings then raiging in Spaine were very deuout, and great benefactors; namely the Emperour D. Alphonso Raymond, and his wife D. Berenguela, who had a little before indowed this church with great possessions. The cause was argued before Iudges appointed by the Emperour, yet named by the two Bishops which contended: for him of Calaoorra there was chosen Pedro de Granon, Arch-deacon of Calaoorra, and for the Bishop of Burgos, the Arch-deacon of Birbiesca, called also Peter, a dignitary of Burgos; these two hauing made diligent inquiry, examined ancient and credible witnesses, and visited the confines of both Dioceses, they gaue sentence for the Bishop of Calaoorra, the which in the yeere 1137. many notable personages assisting at the Iudgement signed.

Castille.

Debate among Bishops to enlarge their Dioceses.

In the yeere 1141. the Emperour D. Alphonso, to incourage men to people the towne which they began to build about the church of Saint Dominike, granted to the Inhabitants thereof, the use of the woods, Forrests, mountaines and pastures thereabouts like vnto the other townes their neighbours, and moreover the waters which fell from the mount of Fayola, with other commodities, which did helpe to plant this Bourg, which beganne then to bee build, and since is growne a good towne, and a Cathedrall church, as we see it. The towne was vnder the iurisdiction of the church, for a time, for some occasions, there was a Court rayoll established, in the time of Ferdinand the third, as we will note hereafter.

An. 1141.

Cc 2

D. Alphonso

D. Alphonso Henriques the first King of Portugal.

Portugal.

The affaires of Portugal during these actions aboue mentioned, remaine obscure, by the error and negligence of authors; for there is no memory found of the deeds of D. Alphonso Henriques, since the conquest of Leyra and of Torresnuas, which was in the yeere of our Lord 1127. vnto the yeere 1139. when as hee past the riuier of Tayo, and led an army against a King of the Moores, called Ismar or Ismael. In this voyage died D. Egas Nunez who had bene Gouvernor to the Earle in his youth, and his faithfull counsellor; hee was interred at the Monastery of Sonfa, neere vnto the towne of Porto. Hee had founded, according to the opinion of some, the Monastery of Saint Martin of Cucuayes, in the country of Saint Mary. Ismar came out of his country, against D. Alphonso Henriques, being accompanied by foure other petite Kings Moores: the two armies were in view one of another, in the fields of Obrique; the Earles was about Castroverde, which at that time was called Cabeças de Reis, that is to say, heads of Kings: and as the Christians were much inferiour to the Infidels in number; so their opinions were diuers, most inclining to a retreat without fighting: but the Earle who was of a Noble courage, and generous resolution, perswaded his people with such forcible reasons, as they resolved to all hazards, and for a happie presage of a future victory, the souldiars turning themselves to God, were moued to salute their Earle, with a royal name and title, crying all with one voice, Portugal, Portugal, for the King D. Alphonso Henriques.

Royal title of the house of
Portugal.

Being thus incouraged, and all in good order, they charged the Moores squadrons, and made a horrible slaughter of them, so as hauing put them all to flight, they remained Maisters of the field; they tooke five royal Standards of the Moores, and all their baggage.

Victory of O-brique.

The Portugals celebrate this memorable victory, called of Obrique, vnto this day: the honour whereof is due to them which dwell betwixt Tayo and Duero, and betwixt Duero and Minio, for the Inhabitants beyond Tayo were at that time subiect to the Moores, who held also a great part of the country on this side. After this bataille D. Alphonso Henriques tooke vpon him the title of King of Portugal, and left by succession to his descendants this title obtained by a military prerogative, before the bataille. Then beganne the armes of that royall house, this King taking (in memorie of so great a victory which God had giuen him) five little shields Azure, representing the Standards of those fackings which he had vanquished, in a great scutcheon argent, placing the small scutcheons like a crosse, through deuotion, in signe of our Sauours five wounds vpon the crosse, adding moreover to euery one of them five deniers argent, which make in all 25. the which with the five scutcheons made the number of thirty representing in some sort the thirty pence which Judas receiued to betray his Master, our Lord and Sauour Iesus Christ (it is the allegory and spirituall interpretation of the armes of Portugal) to the which was since added a border gucules charged with castles, or, in the time of D. Sancho the second of that name King of Portugal, for some causes which we will hereafter speecifie. After the defeat of these five Arabian Kings, who, you must vnderstand were vassals to Alboali, Aben-Tefn, the great Miralmumin of Affrike King D. Alphonso returned with his victorious and rich army, to Coimbra, being then the chiefe city of his Estate.

Armes of Portugal.Practises of the Countesse
of Portugal: against her son.

In this happie successe of his affaires, D. Theresa his mother, being a prisoner, sought to crosse him, treating with D. Alphonso King or Emperour of Castile, for her deliuey and restitution: and moreover by her instruments shee made great complaints at Rome, to Pope Innocent the third, accusing her son of cruelty and impieties: so as the Pope sent the Bishop of Coimbra into Portugal, being then at Rome, with charge to enioyne the King by the Apostolike authority, and in his name to set

A for the Countesse at liberty: which the sonne refusing to obey, the Bishop did interdict the city of Coimbra, and returned to Rome, stealing away secretly in the morning, without the Kings priuity, wherewith being incensed, hee would haue forced the Chapter to proceed to the Election of a new Bishop, wherein hee was not obeyed, so as hee committed many outrages: whereupon the Pope sent a Cardinal Legat vnto him, to correct him, but hee lost his time; for the Countesse continued still in prison, being very expedient and necessary for the good and quiet of the country. For this the Cardinal did interdict all Portugal, and then tooke his way towards Rome: but hee was pursued by the King, who did greatly feare these interdictions: and hauing ouertaken him betwixt Coimbra and Vera, heere vnto the Comanderie of Poyares, hee forced him to disanul this interdiction, and moreover to grant him whatsoever hee desired, partly by force and threats, and partly by persuasions.

Whilest hee was in this debate with the Church, Ismael or Ismar, who had bene vanquished, came vpon the towne of Leyra, belonging to the Monkes of Saint Croix of Coimbra (the which for that it was ill garded by a Knight called Payo Guttierres, who was there in garrison for the Prior) fell againe into the Moores power; whereof the Abbot being aduertised, leauing his frocke and monkes weed, hee went to horse-backe with a good troupe of souldiars, where hauing spoiled the Moores country, hee seized vpon Ronches: soone after King D. Alphonso Henriques came and laied siege to Leyra, and tooke it, since which time hee depriued the Monkes of the Temporality of this place and of Ronches also, leauing them only the profits of the spirituality.

Leyra taken by
the Moores.

The warre betwixt Nauarre and Arragon was hot at this time: but D. Raymond Nauarre. Prince of Arragon found himselfe troubled, not only against the Moores, which were neighbors to Arragon and Cattelogne, from whom hee tooke Chalamera and Alcolea, vpon the riuier of Cinca, in the yeere 1143. but also against some knights of Province, which were enemies to D. Berenger Raymond his brother, hauing seized vpon some places, and bene the cause of great troubles, so as hee was forced to goe himselfe in person: wherefore his country was much annoyed by the Nauarrois, who finding all assured towards Castille, did what they listed: yet at his returne hee had some smal reuenge and tooke the fort of Sos. The peace betwixt the Castellans and Nauarre, being sealed and entertained, it was againe fortified by the marriage of the King D. Garcia Ramires with D. Vrraca, bastard daughter to the Emperour D. Alphonso, by whom hee had the Infanta D. Sancho aboue mentioned: and wee must not doubt but that which some haue left written of this Kings third marriage with the daughter of D. Lope Dias de Haro, is a mere fiction. It is likely the towne of Haro was built at that time, whereof the Lords of Biscay, and there successors, carried the name, from whence are descended many worthy knights, and great personages in Castille and Leon. The realme of Nauarre at that time had larger bounds then it had since, hauing no means to augment them vpon the Moores, for that the realmes of Arragon and Castille lay betwixt both; so as the Arragonois, Castellans and Cattelans were to make warre against them, as frontering vpon Valencia, and other their lands and Siegneuries. Yet the Kings of Nauar, which haue bin since, were so far from extending of their lymits, as they haue bene often restrained by the violence and too great power of the Kings of Castille.

An. 1143.

Confirmation of the peace betwixt Na-uarre and Ca-
stille.

About the yeere 1146. D. Alphonso Emperour of Spaine, resolved to make warre with all violence against the Moores of Andalusia, by reason of the seditions and reuols which were in Affrike, against the Almorauides, whose History it is needfull to relate.

An. 1146.

F 16. Alboali, Aben-Tefn (whom some will haue to bee Auicenne the great Philosopher, whose workes wee read, but without any ground) reigning ouer the Moores of Affrike and Spaine, the third King or Miralmumin of the race of the Almorauides; a Moore of Affrike, called Aben-Thumert, very learned in Astrology, told a certaine young-man called Abdelman, that he found by the starres, he should get the crowne of the Arabians: and therefore hee aduised him to meete with these heavenly influences, and

Moores.

Troubles in
the Moores estate in Africke by the perditions dy-uinations.

and to prepare himselfe to receiue this great good which they had promised him. A
This man although hee were of a base and vile condition, whose father got his ly-uing by making of pots, and other earthen vessel, yet hee was neither faint-hearted, nor without ambition, wherefore hee gaue such credit to that which the Astrologer had deliuered vnto him, as leauing his house and trade, hee acquainted himselfe with a certaine religious Moore, a Doctor in the law of Mahumet, and withal eloquent in the Arabian tongue, and therefore much esteemed amongst all the Affrican Moores, to whom hee imparted the prognostication of Aben Thumert, intreating him to coun-cell him, and to assist him in a matter of so great importance, assuring him that if hee attained to that which hee aspired, hee would make him the chiefe man amongst the Arabians, next vnto himselfe. B

A new sect among the Ara-bians of Af-fricke.

This Doctor who was called Almohadi, tickled with the hope of greatnesse, could finde no better, nor more expedient meanes, then to bring in new sects, and to make some change in religion, knowing that nothing doth more alter and transport the hearts of men, then perswasion of religion: wherefore he employed his knowledge and eloquence to interpret Mahumets Alcaron, after a strange manner, and neuer heard of among the Arabians, nor any other nations that were his sectaries: fitting it so well to the humors and dispositions of the people, as in a short time hee was followed by the greatest part of the Affrican Moores, a nation easily misled with superstition: so as if before they tooke Almohadi for a holy man, now they held him for a Prophet, sent vndoubtedly from God. Hee seeing this businesse succeed so well as hee was wellcome throughout all Affricke, and admired of all men, hee beganne to put forth this youngman Abdelmon, giuing the people to vnderstand, that he was of the true and lawfull royall race of their great Prophet Mahumet, and that hee was a man sent of God, endowed with such vertue, as hee should subiect all the world to the Law of Ma-humet; that those great matters had bene diuinely fore-told him, and signified by the starres and heavenly motions: so as by his perswasions his fictions were receiued and beleued of all men. And proceeding farther, he presumed to speake something against King Alboali, and the present Estate and Government of the Almorauides, and so by little and little to taxe him openly, declaring with great assurance, that Alboali was a tyrant, whose race had by force and violence expelled out of the royal throne of the Arabians in Affricke the lawfull Princes descended from Aben-Alabey, and that the will of God, reuealed and knowne vnto him by many signes from heauen, was that Abdelmon should bee aduanced and chosen for King: hee who was sent of God, and descended from the royall bloud of their great Prophet Mahumet. This Impostor did so preach vnto them, concurring with the diuell to bewitch these credulous men, giuen to the damnable art of dyuining, as many Noblemen and Knights, with an infinit number of the Affrican people, desirous of Innouations, according to the mutinous nature of that nation, tooke armes against King Alboali, bee-ing accompanied, assisted and counselled by Abdelmon, Aben-Thumert and Almo-hadi. Whereof the King aduertised, meaning to suppress these great alterations, hee rayfed his forces, and had diuers incounters against this new sect, which carried the name of Almohades, by reason of their Preacher Almohadi. E

Auicenna and other learned Arabians.

Wee haue sayd that some were of opinion, that the King Albo-Ali Aben Tefin, was hee whom we call Auicenna or Auicenni, saying that the goodly workes which are amongst vs at this daie, were compiled and written by his commandement, by the four and twenty great Philosophers, and published vnder the name of Auicenna. For my part I rather beleue them which haue written that Auicenna or Auicenna, called also Albo-Hali, was an excellent man, learned in Philosophy and Physicke, as his rare workes written in the Arabicke tongue doe witnesse, being translated since into Latin, who liued in those daies at Cordoua in Spaine, where it seemes the Moores had alwaies entertained an vniuersity of all sorts of sciences, with a great concourse of learned men of their nation; the which had bene alwaies well furnished, the Affricans being people giuen to contemplation, and of a subtil spirit: wherefore they haue made Astrology famous, and aduanced a sect of Physicke diuerse from that

A that of the Grecians, giuen wonderfully to diuination and coniuring, very superstitious in matters of religion, and reasonably eloquent either in verse or prose.
Aben-Rols whom wee call Auerrois liued and frequented with him, a great Commentator of Aristotle, who through enuy poysoned Auicenna, who finding it before it had wrought his full effect, caused the poysoner to be slain, as Mesua and Zoar report:
for hee was a man of great authority, and of a Princes house.

B Then also liued Aben-Zoar, and other great and learned Arabians, which haue written many goodly workes in their owne language, in naturall Phylosophy, Metaphisicke, Physicke and Astrologie, whereof part haue bene preferred and kept vnto our daies, and some lost. If these were Moores borne in Spaine, it redoundes to the honour of the countrie: but it is doubtfull whether they came out of Affricke.

The Moores Estate being thus troubled in Affricke, it moued the Christian Princes to make some gallant attempt vpon them of Spaine: wherefore the Emperour
D. Alphonso beganne in the yeere of our Lord 1146. to raise a great army of his subiects of Castille, Toledo, Leon and other countries, and to make the Christians armes of greater force, hee laboured to make a peace betwixt the King of Nauarre, and D.
Raymond Prince of Arragon, for the effecting wherof hee called them to Saint Stephano de Gormas, whither becoming come, hee could not obtaine any thing of them, but a truce for some few daies. There notwithstanding they treated of the warre against the Moores, in the which these two Princes ayded the Emperour: the King of Nauarre by land, and the Earle of Barcelone by sea, who hauing armed some ships, and giuen the charge thereof to D. Galician great Admiral of Cattelogne, and to the Earle of Vrgel, hee caused them to ioyne with the Geneuois, who either for pay, or voluntarily in hope of some gaine, came to this warre, and there did great seruice. The land army was great and well furnished with good and valiant Knights, the Emperour D. Alphonso, and the King D. Garcia Ramires bee-ing there in person, their entrie into Andalusia was so fearefull, as approaching and coming neere vnto Cordoua, with a shew to besiege it, that great and well peopled citie, which had bene the Queene of Spaine for so many yeares, was yeeled vnto him by the Gouvernour Aben-Gami, who presented him the keyes with great hu-militie, not attending either assault or batterie; into the which the Christian Princes entred in armes, but very peaceably, in the yeere 1147. Yet the Spaniards write, that for that the towne was of too great a guard, and wonderfully peopled, it was left in see to Aben-Gami himselfe, who did homage to the King of Castile, the which is very doubt-full, considering the importance of the place, and the consequence thereof. We may beleue that the Emperour assured himselfe after another manner, and with better caution then the faith of this Moore, who (they say) sware vpon their Alehoran, to bee his faithfull vassall: from thence the armie marched towards Baeça, the which being E inuested, they had newes that the Moores came to succour it: wherefore the Emperour going to meet them, he fought with them, and had the victorie, and afterwards tooke
the towne by composition; where leauing a sufficient garrison to assure the countrey behind his armie, he marched on to Almerie, a towne vpon the Mediterranean sea, which at this day belongs to Granado, much frequented of Merchants of diuers nations. There he found the sea armie of Count Raymond, and the galleys of Genoua, which had alreadie attempted it, vnder the command of Ansaldo Doria, Ybert Torre, and other captaines of that common-weale. This place was so furiously battered both by sea and land, as it was taken by force: yet the Moores being retired into a part of the citie of good strength, they were taken to ranfome, from whom they drew great sums of mony.

Castile.

Cordoua yeeld-
ed to the king
of Castile.

Baeça taken from the Moores.

Almerie taken
by force.

F They say, that at this prize, that great and inestimable Emeraude without peere, was taken, the which is at this day at Genoua, and was giuen vnto them for their part of the bootie, and in recompence of the great seruice they had done there. Yet many beleue, that the Geneuois brought it out of Palestina, from the towne of Cesarea, at which seege they were employed. The spoyle & sacke of this place was diuided betwixt
the Emeraude of inestimable price.

the Castellans, Nauarrois, Geneuois, and the subiects of the Earle D. Raymond. This is all which was done in that voyage, from whence euery one retired into his country rich, some by land, some by sea. The King Don Garcia Ramires accompanied his father-in-law into Castile, where he remayned, with great tranquillitie and content, the rest of that yeare.

Councell at Rheims.

If the Christian affaires in Spaine succeeded well against the Moores, those in Syria declined much: wherupon a Councell was held at Rheims, vnder Pope Eugenius the 3, to resolve vpon some meanes, to support the estate of the Kings of Ierusalem, by some ayde from the Princes of Europe. Thither went D. Raymond, Archbishop of Toledo, as Primate of Spaine: who passing by Saint Denis in France, obserued in a chappell an Inscription of this tenour: Here lyes Saint Eugenius the Martyr, the first Archbishop of Toledo.

Being returned, he reported vnto the Church what he had found, whereof the Emperor Don Alphonso, and the Kings children were aduertised, who together with all the people were exceeding glad: for since the death of this holy man, they could not learne where his body lay. Being thus found, they of Toledo procured means to haue one of his armes, from king Lewis the young. It was a remarkable act of Religion in the Archbishop Don Raymond in his voyage to Rheims: In our time King Philippe obtained from Charles the ninth, the French King, and from Charles Cardinall of Lorraine, and Abbot of Saint Denis, therest of the bodie (as they say) of this Martyr, the which was brought to his Church of Toledo, where he had gouerned, Dominican being then Emperour at Rome: for they did not know him much in France, neither did it serue to any purpose, amidst the ciuill, or rather vnciuill warres, growne for matter of Religion.

Aragon and Barcelona.

D. Raymond Berenger being returned into Cattelogne, hauing the Geneuois army ready, and at his commandement, he employed it against the towne of Tortose which was held by the Moores, the which he beseged both by sea and land: at which sege the Earle left D. William Raymond of Moncada, Seneshall of Cattelogne, for his Lieutenant generall, whilst that he made a voyage to Barcelona, to pacifie some seditions which were risen in that citie. Such was the diligence of the Seneshall and Geneuois, as by the 30. day of the sege, after many sharpe assaults giuen and valiantly defended, the towne was taken, and soone after D. Pedro de Sementa arriuing with fresh supplies, the castell was also taken: the Geneuois had their part of the spoyle, for the good seruices they had done vnto the Earle. And the Authours of the Arragon Historie write, that a third part of the towne was giuen in fee to the Seneshall D. William Raymond of Morcado, and another third part to the common-weale of Genoua, which portion was afterwards redeemed by the Earle D. Raymond Berenger, for 16000. Maraudis Marroquins, a kind of mony which was then currant, leauing vnto the Geneuois the Island of Saint Laurence, and granting vnto all the Inhabitants of the citie of Genoua, and of the iurisdiction (the which was limited by Porto venere towards the East, and by Monaco, vpon the West, along the sea shore) exemption of all Imposts and customes, Henrico Guercio, Marin Moro, William Luso, and others, being then Gouvernours of the Common weale.

Vvarre betwixt Nauarrois and Arragon.

Whilst the Earle was busie at this warre, the King of Nauarre brake the truce made at Saint Estienne de Gormas: for that the King Don Garcia hauing caused the Emperour Don Alphonso, and other Noblemen and Prelates, to perswade and aduise the Earle, to relinquish the pretensions, which hee vaunted to haue to the Realme of Nauarre, hee would not do it, but threatened to pursue it, when oportunitie serued: wherefore the Nauarrois did ouer-runne the Countrey of Arragon, and tooke the Towns of Thauiste and Fayos, where they put good Garrisons, to serue as a frontier against the Arragonois.

Portugal.

It is no wonder, if in all these attempts of the Christian Princes in Spaine, against the Moores, the new King of Portugall did not ioyne with the rest: for that hee was in disgrace and out of fauour with the Emperour D. Alphonso, who held him as an vlturper of the Estate of D. Theresa his mother: and moreover, of the title of a king, in a

Province

A Province which was subiect to the Soueraigntie of Leon. King D. Alphonso Henriques hauing liued now 52. yeares without a wife, he married in the yeare 1146. D. Malfada Manrique de Lara, daughter to the Earle D. Manrique, Lord of Molina, a great Nobleman of Castile, by whom he had one sonne named D. Sancho, who succeeded him in the Realme of Portugall, and the Infanta D. Vrraca, who was married first to D. Fernand the 2. of that name, King of Leon and Gallicia, and from them issued D. Alphonso king of the same Realms, father to the king D. Fernand the 3. of Castile and Leon: a marriage notwithstanding which was broken, by reason of their proximitie of blood, and for that they were married without a dispensation. King D. Alphonso Henriques had another daughter by D. Malfada, called D. Theresa, married to Philip Earle of Flanders, the first of that name, and one called Malfada, as the mother: Besides these lawfull children, the King of Portugall had one bastard before he was married, whom they called D. Pedro Alphonso of Portugall. Soone after his marriage, being importuned by the continuall complaints of his subiects, for the spoiles which the Moores of Saint Iren committed in his countrey, he resolved to beseege that place, but he preuailed more by policie, then happily he should haue done by open force: for marching thither in the night, after that he had made a vow (passing by that place where as now stands the royal monasterie of Alcouaga) to build a Monasterie there if his enterprise succeeded well: it fell out according to his desire, for he put his men secretly into the towne, being ill guarded, without discouerie, and tooke it in the yeare 1147. on Saint Michaels day, putting all that resisted to the sword, and taking many prisoners: Being returned to Coimbra, and hauing giuen thanks vnto God for the fauour which he had done him, hee performed his vow, and built the Monasterie of Alcouaga, where he placed Monkes of the Order of Cisteraux, for the loue of Saint Bernard, who liued in those times. After this conquest, seeing that the Miralumin of Affricke and Spaine, was much troubled to defend himselfe against the faction of the Almohades, he followed his good fortune, and tooke from the Moores the castell of Mafra, where he placed D. Fernand of Montezzo for Gouvernor, who in succession of time was great Master of the Order of Auis, of the profession of S. Benedict, which had its beginning during the life of this king of Portugall. Hee tooke also from them the castell of Sintra, and from thence came to lay sege to Lisbon, where he was assisted by many knights of France, England, and Flanders, which came by sea, and landed at Cascais, then came they & camped where as the Monasterie of S. Francis was since built, the Kings armie being lodged where as Saint Vincent now stands: which places were then without the circuit of the city walls. The citie was so prest by these forces, as after many dangerous assaults, it was taken, the Christians entring by the port of Alfama, the 25. of October 1147. the sege hauing continued siue whole moneths. Many Knights and other strangers, which were come to this warre, desirous to employ themselves continually against the Infidels enemies of our faith, vowed neither to returne into their countreys, but to remaine in Portugall, who by the kings permission inhabited there, and peopled Almada, Villeuerda, Arruda, Zambuja, Castagreira, Lourinhã, Ville-franche, and other places: This citie of Lisbon, which since hath bene the chiefe of Portugall, and the ornament of Spaine, was purged by the bishops from the impieties of Mahomet, and their great Mosquee made a Cathedral church, where as one Gilbert a stranger, but of a holy life, was made bishop: and the king caused the Monasterie of S. Vincent to be built in the same place where he had camped. By means of this important conquest, the king took also from the Moores, Alanguer, Obidos, Torresvedras, and many other places, so as he dispossessed them in this warre, of all the countrie which is called Extremadura, and passing Tayo, he extended his limits, conquering Acaçar de Sal, Ebora, Yelbes, Moura, Serpa, & vnto Veja, where he put the Moores which defended it to the sword, for that during this sege, other Moores hauing taken the towne of Troncoso, had vnpeopled it, and chased away all the Christians that were within it.

Genealogie of the Moores.

S. Iren taken from the Moores.

Lisbon taken from the Moores.

F King D. Alphonso Henriques did these goodly exploits, whilst that the Arabians were at war among themselves, by reason of the factions of the Almorauides and Almohades, the which was continued with such animositie, as after many routes of either part

Moores.

on

French king
fauours the king of Na-
uarre

Genealogie of Castile.

Arragon.

1156.

was called by some, Valiant. Hee had some knowledge of learning, honored learned men, and was studious of the Scriptures, as the vse was in those times, and shewed himselfe a great Iusticer: for all which vertues he was much esteemed by other Princes, and was honoured, feared, and loued of his subjects. The armies of the league made at Tudela, beganne to annoy him at his first entrance, and did him some harme vpon his frontiers, yet he did not loose any place of importance: for although hee were very young, yet he was of an active spirit, and a noble courage, and was well and faithfully assisted by his allies, and serued by the Nauarrois. This warre was hottest in the valley of Roncall, but there is no mention, that either in that yeare, or in the others following, there was any memorable exploit done; and they hold that Lewis the French king, who had bene a great friend to Don Garcia his deceased father, did wonderfully crosse the enterprises of the League, and hindred them all he could, being either vpon his treatie of marriage, or else newly married to Dona Isabella Infanta of Castile, in fauour of which, allyance the Emperour D. Alphonso did desist from that warre, or did neglect it, and Don Sancho his sonne, King of Castile, (who had his choice to marrie D. Blanche, or to leaue her) married her, and had a sonne by her at the end of the yeare called D. Alphonso, who was king of Castile and Toledo, after the father. Some hold that the marriage of king Lewis with D. Isabella, was after all this, in the yeare 1154. and that the King of Nauarre came to Burgos, to the celebration thereof, the which was admired by the French, for the exceeding pompe.

The Countie of Nagera was then one of the chief gouernments of Castile, for the C. Gouernour thereof was Captaine generall of the frontier towards Nauarre. The Infant Don Sancho who was called king of Castile, did enioy those lands, and had a Lieutenant called Roderigo Pelaez, a wise Knight. About that time died D. Roderigo Gomez, sonne to Don Gomez of Candespina, one of the greatest Noblemen in Castile, whose Tombe is yet to be seene in the Cloyster of Saint Sauinour of Ogna: and the towne of Surita was peopled with Christians Musarabes, which came out of Calatajub, Saragossa, and other parts of Arragon.

The Earle Don Raymond Berenger sought all meanes possible to seize vpon Nauarre, so desirous he was to ioine it vnto Arragon: importuning the Emperour Don Alphonso continually, to declare himselfe an open enemy to D. Sancho, so as in the yeare 1156. there was a new League made betwixt them, to vndertake this warre: where among other Articles, for the better fortifying of their friendship, there was a future marriage concluded betwixt Don Raymond, the young Infant of Arragon, who was afterwards called Don Alphonso, and D. Sancho daughter to the Emperour Don Alphonso, by his second wife, Dona Rica, daughter to Vladislaus king of Pologne, whom he had married in the yeare, 1151. yet they could neuer perswade the Emperour Don Alphonso to hurt the king of Nauarre, whom he loued: but rather assisted him vnderhand. The same League was renewed at Toledo, in the yeare 1157. after Don Raymond returne out of Prouence. The occasion of which voyage was to defend his Nephew, heire to his Brother Don Berenger Raymond, who (being in a manner dispossessed of his Estate by the enemies of their house, which had slaine his father in an encounter) had need of his ayde. Hee repulsed the young Earles enemies, assured his Estates, and brought him into Cattelogne, there to bee brought vp. And for that in those troubles of Prouence, the Knights and Commanders of Saint Iohn of Hierusalem, (who were growne mercenarie in these Christian warres) did intermeddle, hee gaue them large reuenues in Cattelogne. After the renewing of this League, we find no mention of any worthe ad done by this earle, but that hee debauched some faithlesse and trecherous Knights, which fled out of Nauarre and Arragon; yea one of the greatest called Garcia Almoraut, who came vnto him to Lerida, and there made himselfe his vassall, and receiued from the Earle the title of Lord of Roncevaux, Vrras, and Obanos, F which were not in his power: wherefore it is to be presumed, that from that time hee sought to gouerne his Estates peaceably, seeing he could not get the Crowne of Nauarre: and with this desire he ended his dayes, after all his vaine attempts against this Kingdome. Soone after this last assembly at Toledo, the king of Castile was engaged in warre

A warre against the Moores of Andalusia, which made him perchance neglect that of Nauarre, besides he did not greatly affect it.

19 The troubles of Affricke being past, as we haue sayd, Abdelmon established Miralmin of the Arabians, and the Almohades in credit by the ruine of the Almorauides. The Preacher Almohadi would also haue the Moores of Spaine submit themselves to this yoke: wherefore leauing Aben Thumert the Astrologian at Maroc; hee past with Abdelmon into Spaine, with great numbers of souldiers, being puffed vp with pride by their late victorie against their enemies. They found no great resistance there: for the petty Kings and Gouernors of Prouinces and townes in Spaine, being prest by the Christians, and too weake to make head against them, seeing the race of the B Almorauides of Affricke extinct, from whom they might haue expected some succors, they sought nothing more then support, to maintaine themselves in their authoritie, and greatnesse, which is most commonly the chiefe god of great men of this world, and therefore as men which regarded not Religion, but for a colour, and for their owne private commodities: so as leauing the interpretation of the Alcoran, they embraced the new doctrine of Almohadi, without any opposition, thinking to preferre themselves by that means. And as this Impostor did vomit fourth greater blasphemies and impieties, then his Predecessors had done against the true Religion, they became violent and furious persecutors of the Christians: so as the poore Musarabes, who had had some peace of conscience, liuing among the Moores, and had there exercised their religion, without any violence done vnto them for many yeares, were in great perplexitie, being now persecuted by these new Sectaries of Almohadi, both in their persons and goods, with all kind of rigor: for that they would not yeeld to their superstitions: so as either by the reuolts, or by death, or by the continually flying away of these poore people, all the townes of Spaine which were held by the Moores, were vnto the Christians, who for about 400. yeares had preferred themselves, inuoking (though C with little knowledge) the name of Iesus Christ. The gouernement of the Almohades in Spaine, continued in Abdelmon and his successors 52. yeares, vntill that notable battle in the fields of Tholoufa, called by another name of the mountaines of Muradal, or of Vbeda. Abdelmon hauing aspired to that which he pretended, held his royall seate in the citie of Maroc, and shewed himselfe a profitable Prince, and pleasing to the Moores, notwithstanding that he was a Potters sonne, and for his chiefe Councillors, the Astrologian Aben Thumert, and the Preacher Almohadi, who dying within few months after this conquest, was by the commandement of King Abdelmon, buried with pompe and royall honours in a sumptuous Tombe, neare vnto the citie of Maroc, whereas since the foolish multitude, holding him to be some great Prophet, and a messenger of God, made prayers and vovues in all their necessities: as amongst the Christians they had recourse vpon all occasions, to the sepulchers (either true or fained) of Apostles, holy Confessors and Martyrs of the name of Iesus Christ, This passage of the Almohades, bred a great alteration in Spaine, whereas many Moores which held their countries in fee and homage of Christian Princes reuolted.

E The Emperour D. Alphonso led first an armie of Christians against this new Estate, in the yeare 1157. being accompanied by his two sons, D. Sancho, and D. Fernand, who had the titles of Kings: in Andalusia he recovered the towne of Baeça, which had bene lost, and tooke Quefada and Ardujar. But he did not long enioy this victorie with his subiects, for bringing backe his armie towards Toledo, hee fell suddenly sicke, the which (as he past the mountaine or streight of Muradal) did so increase, as hee was forced to light at a place called Fresnedas, where he dyed in the armes of D. Iohn Archbishop of Toledo, and of his sonne D. Fernand: D. Sancho remayning behind to guard those places which he had newly conquered. Hee was a worthe Prince, but too ambitious, a great fauourer and benefactor of the Clergie, a friend to the people, and a severe punisher of the insolencies of great men: of whom the Spaniards write this Historie. That a certaine Gentleman called D. Fernand in Gallicia, hauing taken away a poore labourers goods, for which wrong he could haue no iustice from the ordinarie Magistrate of the country, so as he came to the Emperour being at Toledo, where ha-D d uing

Moores.

Change of Religion among the Arabians in Spaine.

Christians persecuted by the Almohades in Spaine.

Castile. Death of the Emperour D. Alphonso.

uing watched his oportunitie, he cast himselfe at his feet, making knowne vnto him the violence which had beene done him by D. Fernand, and demanded Iustice: The Emperour did not disdain this poore man, but beeing duly informed of the fact, he sent vnto the Gouvernour, and Merino Maior of Galicia, commanding them to cause restitution to be made presently vnto the Labourer, of all that he should find had beene taken from him, but the Gentleman would not obey any commaund, neither durst the Iudge force him, either fearing to displease him, or else wanting meanes to constrain him: whereof the Emperour beeing aduertised, hee parted from Toledo, to come into Galicia, where hauing made diligent inquirie of D. Fernands fact, and of his disobedience and contumacie, he caused his house to be enuironed; where being taken, he commanded he should be hanged before his owne gate; for a warning to others to liue vprightly and in peace with their neighbors, & not to contemne Iustice nor their Prince. A noble act and worthe imitation. He had reigned king and emperour 35. yeares: his Bodie was carried to Toledo, and interred in the royall chappell of that Church. His Estates were diuided after his death, as hath beene layd, betwixt his two sons D. Sancho and D. Fernand.

D. Sancho the sixth King of Castile.

Castile and Leon diuided.

20 The Realmes of Castile & Toledo, were then dis-ynited from Leon and Galicia, in the year 1157. D. Sancho being aduertised of his fathers death, he parted suddenly from Baeza, and came to Toledo to his funerall. A Prince who did nothing degenerate from the vertues of his Ancestors, yea did rather exceed them, but he reigned little.

D. Fernand, the 28. King of Leon.

Leon.

21 His brother D. Fernand, neither attending his coming, nor the performance of his funerals, departed presently, and went to take possession of his Kingdomes of Leon and Galicia, according to the fathers will, which diuision was a great cause of ciuill warres, to the preiudice and dishonour of the Christians name in Spaine: wherefore great Monarkes should be warned by these examples, (which are ordinarie in Histories) neuer to dismember their Monarchies, but to employ all their spirits and wisdom, to continue it still vnited, although they leaue many children, leauing the Soueraigne authoritie ouer the rest, vnto him whom the lawes and customes do call.

Nauarre.

D. Fernand beeing receiued and settled in his Realmes of Leon and Galicia, hee began to intreate his Nobilitie ill, & among others he dispossest one of the chiefe knights of Leon called D. Pedro Ponce de Minerva, of his lands and goods, who for this cause came into Castile, to beseech the King D. Sancho, to mediate his restitution, and to bring him againe into fauour with the king his brother. But it falling out at that time, that Don Sancho the wife king of Nauarre, beeing aduertised of the death of the Emperour D. Alphonso, had made certaine roades into Castile almost vnto Burgos, for that D. Sancho had alwaies signed the Leagues which the Earle of Barcelona had made against his father and him, with the Emperour D. Alphonso: and moreouer, detayned from him Nagera, and the lands vpon the riuer of Oja, this knight was entertained by the king of Castile, who imployed him in this warre of Nauarre, and made him head of an armie, which he sent vnto the frontiers, by the riuers of Oja, which hauing incouerted that of Nauarre neere to Bagnares, they came to battaile in the fields of Valpierre neere to S. Assento. In the Nauarrois Armie D. Lope Dias de Haro, Earle of Biscay, led the foreward: Count Ladron of Gueuara had charge of the rereward, with the Earle D. Sancho of Larrinacar, Inigo Ramires & Aiuar, with other, and the king the battaile. On the other side, the Earle D. Pedro Ponce had ordered his men as well, and were more in number: wherefore coming to fight, although in the beginning the Nauarrois seemed to haue the better, yet were they defeated, and forced to saue themselves in the next towns,

The

A The king D. Sancho had this route for that he was too hastie to fight and would not attend the succours of horse and foote, which came out of France; which beeing arriued, and desirous to wipe out this blemish and infamie, they charged the Castellans, which gaue them battaile againe in the same fields of Valpierre, and defeated them.

Battell of Valpierre.

These things are written in some Histories, but not allowed nor credited by other Spanish Authors: for that they insert some things which haue small probability, and others that are mere fictions. Whereas they say, that Don Pedro Ponce de Minerva, vsed a strange liberalitie to prisoners, both Nauarrois and French, setting them all free without any ranfome, which is not probable: and they also affirme, that D. Sancho king of Nauarre dyed in the first battaile, the which is reprooued by other Authors, and by the letters and titles which are yet extant, witnessing that he liued about 37. yeares after: by these reasons, whatsoever is written of these two victories may iustly bee suspected.

That which is written of the Earle Don Raymond Berenger, Prince and Gouvernour of Arragon, is more authentick: that burning with desire to haue the Realme of Nauarre, he did sollicite D. Sancho King of Castile to declare himselfe with him, and that they two ioyning their forces together, should set vpon the King of Nauarre: and that in the year 1158. D. Raymond came againe into Castile, accompanied with a great number of Prelates and Knights, to renue their League, yet without any effect for Castile, for this assembly and enterview past not without great contention; for that Don

Aragon.

C Raymond Berenger refused to do homage vnto the King of Castile, for the townes of Sarragossa and Calatajub: but in the end he was forced to acknowledge himselfe his vassall in that regard, with a bond to come to Court, and to assist at the coronation of the Kings of Castile, to carrie the royall sword before them at those ceremonies: As for the Earle D. Pedro Ponce de Minerva, and other Noblemen which were in the like perplexitie, the best Spanish Authors say, that the king D. Sancho tooke the paines to geue himselfe in person with them into Leon, to reconcile them to the King D. Fernand his brother, who came in a peacefull manner, to meete him as farre as Sahagun, receiued him honorably, with great shewes of loue, and restored these Noblemen to their goods and honours; yea he augmented them by his bountie, in fauour of the King D. Sancho, to whom he carried so great honour and respect, as he offered to acknowledge to hold of him (as his vassall) his Realmes of Leon and Galicia; the which D. Sancho would not accept, saying, God forbid, that the son of so great a Prince as the Emperour Don Alphonso was, should euer acknowledge to hold his land of any. In the end after great contests and ioy, these two Kings parted good friends.

Castile.

The king D. Sancho being returned to Toledo, hee had newes that the Moores were gone to field, & came with a great power to beseege Calatrana, a fort of great importance vpon the frontier, the which did then belong vnto the knights of the temple; who amazed at the brute of this seege, did so distrust their owne strength to defend it, as they deliuered it into the kings hands, to the end he should send Captaines and souldiers to resist the Moores. The king hauing receiued it into his protection, and meaning to provide for it, he found himselfe much troubled: for there was not any one that presented himselfe to take this charge, but they all drew backe and excused themselves, fearing the great power which was laid the Moores had. In the end God inspired the hearts of two religious men of the Order of Cisteraux, who offered vnto the king, that if it pleased him to giue them that place in gard, they would defend it like honest men. One of these religious men was Friar Raymond, Abbot of the Monasterie of S. Mary de Utiel, vpon the riuer of Pisuerga, in the Diocesse of Palence, not of Hilero in Nauarre, which was not then built: the other was one of his Monkes, called Diego Velasco, who had carried armes long before he became a religious man of that Order. The offer was pleasing vnto the King, but more to D. John Archbishop of Toledo, for that the lands of this Diocesse should be first annoyed by the entry of the Moores to Calatrana: wherefore this Prelate by preaching and publike exhortations, began to commend this Abbot D. Raymond, and to encourage all men to assist him, so as in a short time hee was followed by a great number of Nobilitie and other souldiers, some thrust on to winne honour,

D d 2

some

some mooued with zeale to defend the Christian Religion against the inuasion of Infidels, and some with shame. The king, the Archbishop, the Nobilitie of his Court, and the Inhabitants of Toledo, euery one for his part, furnished money, armes, horses, corne, and other necessities for a towne which attends a seerge; and all with such willingness and bountie, as the Abbot might well put himselfe into Calatraua, being assured not to be taken for want of men, victuals, and munition of warre: but before hee dislodged, the king to encourage him to do his duty, and to recompence the good which he had shewne, to employ himselfe for the defence of the countie, mooued also with some Religion, gaue vnto God, to the Virgin Mary his mother, to the congregation of Cisteaux, to the Abbot D. Raymond, and to his Monkes, both present and to come, the towne of Calatraua with all the confines, hills, land, waters, meddows, pastures, entries and issues, rights, names and actions belonging thereunto, whereof he caused letters patentes to be drawne in the year, 1158. signed by his Secretarie Martin Pelaez: in the which are named as witnesses, Don Sancho king of Nauarre, vassall to the king of Castile, Don Iean Archbishop Primate of Spaine, Don Raymond Bishop of Palence and others.

Calatraua given to the Monkes of Cisteaux.

The Abbot hauing this prouision, he set forward, and came to Calatraua, a place of great importance, as we haue sayd, and the onely rampar for the Christians on that side against the Moores: who either aduertised of this great preparation to defend that place, or for some other lets, did no great exploit worthie the great brute which had runne of their armie, neither came they to beseege Calatraua, whereof the King was exceeding glad, and the Abbot with his Monkes no lesse, who by their couragious resolution had gotten this towne, the which the Templers had basely abandoned. Many Gentlemen which had followed the Abbot in this voyage, seeing him in such reputation left the world, and made themselves Monkes of Cisteaux, yet with a decent habit, fit for the exercise of armes, the which they meant to follow against the Infidels Moores, enemies to the Christian Religion.

Knights of Calatraua first instituted.

Death of Don Sancho the Desired.

This was the beginning of the Knights of Calatraua, an Order which was famous in Spaine. The Abbot Don Raymond being freed from feare of seerge, leauing a good garrison in Calatraua, he returned to Toledo, and from thence past to his Monastery of Hitero: about the which he gathered together a great multitude of people, to the number of twenty thousand, as the Histories report, whome with their mooueable goods and cattell, hee transported to Calatraua, and other places of the frontier, which was badly peopled, making it as it were a strong bastion against the enterprises of the Arabians. The king Don Sancho the desired, liued not long after, but dyed the same year. They write, that his wife D. Blanche being deceased some few dayes before in child-bed, hee was so opprest with griefe, as he fell sicke and dyed. His death was very preiudiciall to the Realme of Castile, and followed by many miseries, the which he did well fore-see. He left the gouernement of his sonne Don Alphonso, who was yet very young, to a knight whose name was Don Guttiere Fernand Ruis de Castro, ordaining that hee should be bred vp vnder his discipline, vntill hee came to the age of fifteene yeares complete: willing that the Knights which held any places and garrisons, should keepe them vntill that time. They surnamed him the Desired, by reason of the great vertues wherewith hee was adorned, and the hope and taste the people had of his good and iust gouernement, in one yeare, or thereabouts, that hee reigned. Hee was buried at Toledo in the Cathedrall church, neere to the Emperour Don Alphonso his father. The Queene Dona Blanche his wife lyes in the Monasterie of Saint Mary the royall of Nagera, to the which a little before her death shee had giuen the towne of Nestares, neare vnto Torrezillas de los Cameros.

Aragon and Barcelone.

The Earle Don Raymond Berenger Gouernour of Arragon, hauing in the meane time made warre against Don Sancho King of Nauarre, with his forces of Arragon, and Cattelogne, being not able to ingage the King of Castile, and taken Buereta, with some other pettie forts of small importance, seeing in the end that hee strived in vaine against an enemy which had not onely meanes to defend himselfe, but also on the contrarie, to offend him: hee yielded himselfe tractable to the perswasions of

A of certain good Prelates, who were much grieued to see Christians seeke the ruine one of another, for their ambition: wherefore in the year 1159. after many treaties of Peace, betwixt these two Princes, in the end there was an interview, and they remained good friends, making an end of all their quarrels, which had continued almost fyeve and twentie yeares.

We must not wonder, if Secular Princes were in combustion, seeking to rule one ouer another, hauing (it may be) some plausible pretext, seeing that the Prelates of Spaine were a president for them without any reason. The Primacie which hee of Toledo held ouer other Bishops, was not acknowledged of all: for the Archbishop of Braga, and he of Saint James refused to obey him; but the Primate of Primates, Adrian the third, sending Cardinall Hyacinth his Legat from Rome, forced them by a sentence.

1159.
Peace betwixt Nauarre and
Arragon.

Primacie of Toledo confirmed.

The end of the ninth Booke.

D d 3

THE

THE TENTH BOOKE

of the Historie of Spaine.

The Contents.

1. D. Alphonso the seventh King of Castile, and the fourth of that name, call'd the Noble, and the troubles which did rise by the factions of Castro and Lara.
2. D. Alphonso the second of that name, and sixth King of Arragon, Earle of Barcelona.
3. Confirmation of the Order of Calatrava.
4. Beginning and continuance of the ancient house of Biscay.
5. Marriage of King D. Alphonso the noble, and of Elenor daughter to Henry the second King of England.
6. Warre of Nauarre against Castile and Arragon.
7. Marriage of D. Alphonso the second king of Arragon, with D. Sancha of Castile, to the daughter of the daughter of Manuel Emperour of Constantinople.
8. Province annexed to the Crowne of Arragon, the which is exempted from all fealdie and homage to Castile.
9. Institution of the knights of the sword, of the Order of S. James in Galicia. Their increase and forces, with their Commanderies and benefices.
10. Commanderies and other benefices of the Order of Calatrava, and their strength.
11. Continuance of the warre against Nauarre, and the taking of the lands of Burena and Rioja from this Realme by the Castilians.
12. Sedition of the Nobilitie of Castile to defend their Immunities.
13. Continuance of the deedes of D. Alphonso Henriques the new King of Portugal, and the quarrels betwixt him and the king of Leon.
14. Limitations and diuisions of the conquests which were to be made upon the Moores, betwixt the Christian Princes of Spaine.
15. Exploits of the Portugals against the Moores.
16. Continuance of the raigne and deedes of D. Fernand the second king of Leon.
17. Beginning of the towne of Victoria in Alama: Expedition of the Nauarrois in Castile, and other deeds of armes of D. Sancho the seventh.
18. Catalogue reiects the Soueraigntie of the French.
19. The last acts of D. Alphonso Henriques, king of Portugal.
20. D. Sancho first of that name, the second king of Portugal.
21. Marriage of D. Fernand, the 28. king of Leon, and his death.
22. D. Alphonso the ninth of that name, and 29. king of Leon.
23. Submission of the king of Leon, to him of Castile. Assembly of the ordinarie estates in Castile. Enmity and hatred betwixt five Christian kings raigning in Spaine.
24. Deeds of D. Sancho king of Portugal, the first of that name, and the institution of the Order of Auiz.
25. Continuance of the deeds of D. Alphonso king of Castile, the building of the fort of Nauarre, neere to Nagera.
26. Aben Ioseph Mazemur king of the Moores, and his exploits against the Christians of D. Sancho Spaine.

- A 27. D. Sancho the strong 21 King of Nauarre the 8. of that name.
28. Spoiles done by the Moores in the countries of Castile and Leon.
29. D. Pedro the 2. of that name, 7. King of Arragon, his marriages and submission to the Pope.
30. Descent of the house of Champagne unto Thibault King of Nauarre, the first of that family.
31. Inuasions of the realme of Nauarre by the Castilians and Arragoneis, the Province of Guipuscoa taken from it.
32. Buildings and reparations of D. Alphonso the Noble, King of Castile, marriage of D. Blanche his daughter, with Lewis, father to Saint Lewis the French King.
- B 33. D. Rodrigo Ximenes Archbishop of Toledo: his deeds, buildings and the vniuersity made at Palence by King D. Alphonso.
34. Great preparatiues of warre, both by the Christian Princes, and the Moores: the memorable battaile of Muradal.
35. Armories of Nauarre.
36. The last exploits of D. Sancho King of Portugal. D. Alphonso second of that name, and third King of Portugal.
37. Exploits of D. Pedro the 2. King of Arragon. Hatred betwixt him and Symon Earle of Montfort, his death in the warre of the Albigeois, mooued by saint Dominike.
38. D. Iaques the 1. of that name 8. King of Arragon.
- C 39. Seditions at Pampelone. Exercises of armes appointed by D. Sancho the 8. King of Nauarre, as necessary for a warlike nation.
40. Order of the Knights of Alcantara.
41. D. Henry the first of that name, and 8. King of Castile.
42. Council of Saint Iohn de Latran, under Innocent the 3. sute for the Primacy of Spaine.

This tenth Booke conteines the descent and continuance of the royall families of Spaine. that is,

| Of Nauarre.      | Of Leon.          | Of Portugal.                       |
|------------------|-------------------|------------------------------------|
| 21 D. Sancho 8.  | 29 D. Alphonso 9. | 2 D. Sancho 1.3 D. Alphonso 2. |
| Of Arragon.      | Of Castille.      |                                    |
| 6 D. Alphonso 2. | 7 D. Alphonso 4.  |                                    |
| 7 D. Pedro 2.    | 8 D. Henry 1.     |                                    |
| 8 D. Iaques 1.   |                   |                                    |

D. Alphonso the noble the seventh King of Castile
the fourth of that name.

HE death of the King D. Sancho confirmed his surname of desired, for that there followed dangerous combustions, he-gunne betwixt two great families of Castile, through ielou-sie and desire of rule. The young Kings person (beeing then but foure yeeres old) was vnder the charge of D. Gutierre Fer-nando Ruiz de Castro, according vnto the will of the deceased King his father, who had also ordained that the capitaines, and Gouvernors of Prouinces and places should continue in their charge, s, charges, vntill that his sonne D. Alphonso should bee fiftene yeeres old compleate. A Those of the house of Lara, being men of great account, were discontented with this decree; of which family the chiefe was the Earle D. Manrique de Lara, who had two brethren, D. Aluaro, and D. Nugno, all sonnes to D. Pedro de Lara (of whom wee haue made mention) and of D. Aba, forsaken by the Earle D. Garcia de Cabra: with these there ioyned by reason of consanguinity, D. Garcia d'Acia, their brother by the mothers side, sonne to that Lady D. Aba, and the Earle D. Garcia de Cabra, her first husband: they were greeued to see the Kings person, and the chiefe affaires of the Realme band: they were greeued to see the Kings person, and good governments in the hands of them of Castro, who held many places, and good governments in Castille and Toledo: wherefore they sought all occasions to seize vpon the authority, and to dispossesse their aduersaries: D. Gutierre Fernandes, was an ancient Knight, but wise, faithfull, and without any malice, who gaue no man occasion to complaine, but great meanes to such as enuied his honour to hurt him by his sincerity. Hee had also bene Gouvernor to the King D. Sancho his father, in his youth, and was so worthy a knight, as they say hee had made and armed fise hundred Knights, with his owne hand. Onely hee wanted the happinesse to haue children: but his brother D. Ruy Fernandes, called the Bald, had fourc. D. Fernand, D. Aluar, D. Pedro and D. Gutierre, furnished Ruys, and one daughter, called D. Sancha Ruys married to D. Aluaro Ruys de Gasman.

Indiscretion of
D. Gutierre
Fernandes.

These factions declaring themselves, euery one stood vpon his gard: and for that it was not easie to dissolue that which D. Sancho had decreed by his testament, nor to wrest the authority from them of Castro by force, being in possession: the brothers of C Lara found meanes to circumuent the good knight D. Gutierre Fernandes, by goodly persuasions, saying, that for the good of the general peace, he should bee content with those honours hee had, and suffer the Earle D. Manriques to keepe the Kings person: the which should in no sort blemish his authority, but should giue great reputation vnto the Earle, who was a noble man of that quality, as hee well deserued it: all the foure brothers promising and swearing vnto him, that they would alwaies preferre and defend the honour and authority which was due to his reuerent age. D. Gutierre was deceiued with these good words, deliuered the King into the hands of these foure brethren, who remained with D. Garcia d'Acia, as the eldest, the rest hauing at that time no meanes to contradict it, but soone after they had an oportunitie to get the King from him: for D. Garcia, who was not cunning, nor of a bad disposition, being entred into some termes and difficulty, touching the entertainment of the yong Kings house, and the necessary prouisions of money for his Estate with the brothers of Lara, they wrought in such manner as hee resigned this burthensome charge vnto them, the which they willingly accepted, as a thing which they had long affected; wherein the Earle D. Garcia, did some what wrong his honour and faile of his dutie, as well as D. Gutierre Fernandes de Castro had done; so the King came into the power of D. Manriques de Lara.

These alterations, vnfit for the dignity of the young King, discontented D. Gutierre, and withall, those of Lara beganne to faile in that which they had promised him; wherefore he let them vnderstand that he would haue the King D. Alphonso againe, to nourish and breed him vp according to the disposition of the King D. Sancho: will but they mocked him, as a man which had lost his senses. Wherevpon these two houses went to armes, and drew vnto them their kinsmen, friends and partisans, in- uing way and meanes to all the lewd people of the country to commit a thousand in- solencies, following the one or the other faction, as in this vntill in civil warres.

And moreover they made a passage for D. Fernand King of Leon, to enter into the territories of Castille, where hee committed great excessse vnder pretext to pacifie the warres betwixt these two houses of Castro and Lara: for being entred with an army, he seized vpon those forts, which were nearest vnto his frontiers of Leon, along the ri- uer of Duero, and passing on further, hee caused the Earle D. Manriques and his bre- thren to dislodge, who carried the King D. Alphonso with them to Soria: During these tumults D. Gutierre Fernandes de Castro died, and was buried in the Monastery of Saint

A Saint Christopher of Encas: after whole decease the Earle D. Manriques caused his Nephewes D. Fernand, D. Aluaro, D. Pedro and D. Gutierre Ruys to be summoned to deliuer vp into his hands the places belonging vnto the crowne, the which they held, and had commanded vnto their vncles death: but they made answer that they were not bound to deliuer them vp, seeing that the will of the deceased King was, that they should hold them vntill the King D. Alphonso were full fiftene yeeres old. There vpon D. Manrique commanded that the body of D. Gutierre Fernandes should bee vn- terred, and charging him with felony and treason against the King and crowne, hee sought to haue him found guilty.

His foure Nephewes embraced the cause, and defended both themselves and their deceased vncle, saying that they neither had, nor did commit any felony, in retaying of those places, seeing it was according to the last will and testament of the King D. Sancho, the which they had neuer demanded of their vncle luying. The Lords of the counsell, who were Iudges in this cause, gaue sentence that there was not any felony committed, and therefore they ordained, that the body of D. Gutierre, which had bene against the law of Nations inhumainely pulled out of his graue, should bee laied in a- gaine. Their contentions were so great, and the miseries which ensued so infinit, as prest by necessity, they were forced to ingage all the reuenues of Castille and Toledo, for twelue yeeres, vnto King Fernand; and in the end the Earle D. Manriques bound himselfe to deliuer vnto the King of Leon, the person of young D. Alphonso, his Lord,

C and to make him his vassal. And to performe his promise, he led the King D. Fernand to Soria, where hauing propounded certaine reasons, in an assembly of the Noblemen of Castille, to perswade them that it was expedient the Kings person should bee put into his vncles custody, they deliuered him vnto him, protesting that they put him into his hands, being a free Prince, and therefore they intreated him to maintaine him in his liberty. The Noblemen durst not herein contradict the King D. Fernand, being within the country and in armes. The young Infant being carried in a gentlemen's armes, beganne to weepe and cry out; wherefore they carried him backe to the lodg- ing to giue him an aple, or some such like thing to please him. At that time there was present D. Pedro Nugnes Almeyra, a hardy and generous knight, who being gree- ued at this trecherous act of the Earle D. Manrique, gaue order (that whilest they dand- led the child, to still him) they should bring him a good horse behinde the Kings lodg- ing, then approaching neere vnto the young Prince, making shew to flatter him, hee tooke him in his armes, and slipping away by some secret passage well knowne to him, he carried him to his horse, and so fled with him to the towne of Saint Estienne of Gormas: doing this act for the liberty of his King with such dexterity and diligence (whilest that the King D. Fernand attended the Infants returne) as he was gon a good way before it was discovered.

Treachery of
D. Manriques
de Lara, against his Prince and country.Pedro Nugnes
a faithfull vassal.

This being knowne by the King D. Fernand hee grew into a great rage, and vsing threats, he commanded D. Manrique and the rest of his faction, to giue order, that the child might bee found out and brought againe, wherefoeuer he were: wherevpon the Earle D. Manrique, and his brethren, vnder colour of seeking the King D. Alphonso, had meanes to get out of Soria, where all was in Combustion. Being arriued at Saint Estienne de Gormas, that night they seized againe of the Kings person: notwithstanding whether remorse of so foule an act, altered the mindes of these knights of Lara, or that all the bretheren were not a like affected, as D. Manrique: D. Nugno the yongest of the brethren tooke king D. Alphonso, and carried him to Atienza, not respecting the ac- cord made with the King D. Fernand, who holding himselfe deceiued by D. Manrique, sent him word by a knight, that hee was a traitor, and that he would bee reuenged. The Earle made no other answer, but that it was lawfull for him to doe any thing to deliuer his King and natural Prince from captiuitie. Afterwards the Earle meeting with the King D. Fernand, who accused him of treachery, and demanded Iustice of the Estates of Castille; he answered againe, that he knew not that he was a traitor, but that hee re- pented him not to haue done his best endeauor, to deliuer his King, a child of so tender age from such vniust slavery.

After

Theyng King
D. Alphonso
giuen in garde
to the inhabitants of Auila.

Nauarre.

Death of D.
Raymond Berenger Earle of Barcelona,
1162.

After many reasons and allegations of either side, the Earle D. Maurique was absolved: but the King D. Fernand kept in a manner all the places and townes in Castille, except some of the lesser, which continued vnder the obedience of the King D. Alphonso, who was not in any great safety, vntill they had found meanes to put him into the Citie of Auila, where hee was faithfully kept, by his good subiects the inhabitants thereof, vntill he was twelue yeeres old, wherefore they say commonly in Spaine, the Loyal of Auila.

The tumults and confusions of Castille, inuited D. Sancho King of Nauarre, surnamed the wise, to make his profit, which is the marke whereat all worldly men doe aime: yet had he some iust pretension to doe it, especially to inuade the lands lying vpon the riuier of Oja, which the Emperour D. Alphonso had laied hold on, during the vacancie and Interregne of Nauarre and Arragon. So as hee went to armes, entred in hostile manner into that Prouince, and tooke Logroño, Entrena and Cerezo: and passing on, he also tooke Birbiesca, and in a manner all that was in his way, euen vnto Burgos: all which places he did fortifie, but yet he enioyed them not long. The King of Nauarre did all these things, without any resistance made by them of Castille, being fauoured by the confusion of the time, and the infancy of the young King D. Alphonso: besides that towards Arragon hee found himselfe assured by a peace concluded with the Earle D. Raymond Berenger, the which was the better confirmed by his death, which happened in the yeere 1162. in Piedmont, in the Bourge of Saint Dalmace, neere vnto Turin. This Prince went by sea into Italy, with his Nephew the Earle of Prouence, to conferre with the Emperour Frederic Barbarossa, who made warre then in the Dutchy of Milan.

D. Alphonso the second, and the sixth King of Arragon.

Arragon.

Disposition of
D. Raymond
Berenger's will.

Nauarre.

2. THis Earle had gouerned Cattelogue and Barcelona thirty one yeeres, and the realme of Arragon fife and twenty. He was wise and valiant, but too ambitious. He left D. Raymond his sonne, who was afterwards called D. Alphonso, heire of both Estates by his testament: by the which hee gaue vnto D. Pedro his second son, the Earle-dome of Cerdagne, with the same rights as Cont Bernard William had held it, and moreover the demesns and reuenues of the lands of Carcassone, and rights of Narbonne, and other places in Languedoc, reseruing the homage vnto the Earle of Barcelona, and King of Arragon his eldest: substituting to D. Pedro his third son D. Sancho, in case hee died without children, and them two to their eldest brother D. Alphonso, either of them in his Siegneuries, with his children, vnto Henry the second, King of England, his ally and faithfull friend, the Queene D. Petronille his wife remayning Regent and tutresse of her Son, and Realme; but she brought D. Alphonso, being but 12. yeeres old, to the gouernment of the State, vnder the conduct of the Earle of Prouence, his cousin germain, the Queene giuing ouer that charge, as vsit for women. This was the first King of Arragon that was Earle of Barcelona, since which time these two Estates haue not bene diuided.

Returning to D. Sancho King of Nauarre, hee gouerned his realme wisely and iustly, and had about him many good and vertuous Prelats and Knights: amongst the which were D. Pius Bishop of Pampelone, the Earle D. Bela Ladron Lord, that is to say, gouernor in Alaua, Rodrigues Martines Gouernor in Maragon: Pedro Ruiz in Estella, and Gallipienço; Sancho Ramires in Sanguessa, Ximeno of Ayuar in Roncal; Ximen Aznares in Tafalla, Sancho Esquerra in Saint Mary of Vxua, Martin de Lee in Peralta, Aznar de Rada in Falfes and in Valtierra, Peter of Aracury in Logroño and Tudela, with diuers others. As for his domestike affaires, hee was married to D. Sancha Infanta of Castille, whom others call Beacia or Beatrix, daughter to the Emperour D. Alphonso, by whom he had a goodly issue: D. Sancho, who was King after his father, D. Fernand, and D. Ramir,

Genealogy of Nauarre.

An. 1165.

Portugal.

Castille.

Confirmation
of the order of Calatrava.

The family of Aualos.

A D. Ramir, the which was Bishop of Pampelone: for Ecclesiastical charges which had great reuenues, were not there giuen to Pastors, which had care of Christians manners and consciences, but were portions for Kings children: hee was otherwise called D. Remy. Beside three sonnes, he brought him three daughters, D. Berenguela, who was married to Richard King of England, surnamed Corde-Lion, and had for her dowry the country of Maine in France, where shee spent the remainder of her daies, like a vertuous widow, after the decease of the King her husband D. Sancho second daughter was D. Theresa, otherwise called Constance, who died a virgin: and the third was D. Blanche, married to Thibaud Earle of Champagne and Brie, from whom the race of the Kings of Nauarre, of the house of Champagne had their beginning, in D. Thibaud their son.

B About the yeere 1165. the sentence of the Proceffe betwixt the Bishops of Pampelone and Saragosse, begunne in the time of D. Lope, Predecessor to D. Pinian, with D. Pedro of Zarroja, for the lymits of their Dioceses, and Iurisdiccions, which had bene iudged by the Legat Hyacinthe, Cardinal of the title of Saint Mary in Cosmedin, was confirmed by Pope Alexander the third, successor to Adrian the fourth, beeing at Montpellier in France, who also by his Bull confirmed the priuiledges of the Church of Pampelone, and the order of the regular Chanoins of Saint Augustin, instituted by D. Pedro Rada, the Bishop, as other Popes his Predecessors had done.

During these things, D. Alphonso Henriques King of Portugal, having some quiet with the Moores, who were not well settled vnder the obedience of the Almohades, spent his time about the fortification of the frontier townes of his realme, vnto the yeeres 1165. when as he went againe to field, parting from Alcazar de Sal, and went and laied siege to Cezimbra, the which he carried, and in like manner Palmela hauing put the Moores of Badajos to rout, in the mountaines of Cezimbra, comming with great troupes of horse to succor these two places. It is a remarkable thing in this Prince, that although he were three score and fife yeeres old, yet he was continually in armes, and himselfe in person, enduring the trauels and discomodities of the warre, as well as the yongest. The troubles of Castile and Leon procured his peace on that side, where hee was to dispute his royal title, and the acknowledgment of the lands held by him, with D. Fernand king of Leon: who giuing some time of breathing vnto the Castilians, vpon whom he had made his profit, although he could not get their kings person, he retired into Leon, leauing them of Lara and Castro to end their owne quarrels.

3 The Estates of Castille and the Gouernors of places, amidst so great troubles which the King D. Fernand, hee of Nauarre, and the factions of the noblemen of the country had caused, maintained themselves as well as they could, whilest that the King D. Alphonso was bred vp at Auila. The Order of the knights of Calatrava, which had his beginning in the time of the King D. Sancho the Desired, was now confirmed by Pope Alexander the third, by his Breefe in the yeere 1164. directed vnto D. Garcia, first Master of the knights of that Order. It appeeres by the Spanish Histories, that at that time there were Abbots at Calatrava, and that D. Raymond liued yet: in whose place there succeeded Priors, by grant from the Chapter generall of the Order of Cisteaux. We finde also that at that time the house of Aualos (which hath bene famous since in Castille) was then great in Nauarre, from whence it is descended: and mention is made of many great personages of that family: of D. Ximen d' Aualos, tean Martines, and Sancho Martines d' Aualos brethren, and of Garcia Nugnes d' Aualos whereof D. Ximen, in the yeere 1162. gaue vnto the Monastery of Saint Emilian, certain rights which he had in the church of Saint Felix d' Aualos, the letters whereof are yet extant in that Monastery.

The King D. Alphonso beeing eleuen yeere old; the Earles D. Manrique, D. Aluaro and D. Nugno de Lara with other Noblemen, which had the charge of him, thought it now fit, that he should goe and visit the townes of his realme, and shew himselfe to his subiects, who desired to see him: wherefore they drew him out of Auila, with good troupes of horse, besides an hundred and fity horse which they of Auila gaue him for his gard. Some places which D. Fernand King of Leon had seized on in Castille, began already to reuolt; but when as King D. Alphonso went his progresse, euery towne towne where hee past, obeyed him, vntil hee came to Toledo, whereas D. Fernand Ruis A Castro was Gouvernor, since the raigne of the King D. Sancho, and ment to keepe it vntill the King D. Alphonso was fiftene yeeres old, as it was decreed by the fathers will: but the Earle D. Manrique de Lara was not of that minde: for hauing some secret intelligence with a knight of Toledo, called D. Estienne Illian, who had built the parish church, and the high tower of Saint Romains, and was in some bad termes with D. Fernand Ruis, hee had by his practises meanes to stirre vp the people to a mutiny, hauing caused the King to approach to Saint Romains tower, in a disguised habit, where hee hung out his armes and collours, so as D. Fernand (feasting his owne weaknesse) abandoned the castle, and fortified himselfe in Huete.

By this meanes the city of Toledo was deliuered vnto the Earle Manrique in the Kings name, by this knight D. Estienne Illian, whose picture armed on horse-backe, for this goodly act, is to bee seene in the body of the great church of Toledo, and not for any prouesse that is knowne to the ignorant people. In recompence whereof they gaue him the gouernment of this Citie. From thence D. Manrique led the King to Huete, against D. Fernand Ruis, who beeing faithfully and courageously assisted by the Inhabitants of Huete, sallied forth against the Earle D. Manrique, where there was a cruell battaile: before the sight D. Fernand had giuen his armes and deuice vnto a Squire of his, setting him in the most remarkable place of the battaile, to the end they should take him for his master: for hee knew they had vowed and conspired his death, at what price soeuer: so as comming to fight, the Earle D. Manrique followed by his choise men, picked out this Squire, whom hee slue with his owne hand: C but an other of D. Fernands Squiers, reuenging his Campanians death, gaue the Earle a deadly wound, and slue him vpon the place: so as D. Manriques army hauing lost their Generall, was put to route, and defeated. D. Nugno de Lara for his brotst their Generall, was put to route, and defeated. D. Nugno de Lara for his brotst their death, did afterwards accuse D. Fernand of treason, saying that hee had caused his brother to bee treacherously slaine, but it was ended by the Prelats, by reason of the great spoiles they endured; but the hatred continued still betwixt these two families: many forts came afterwards into the power of the yong King D. Alphonso, without any resistance.

The Earle D.
Manrique de Lara slaine
before Huete.

The towne of Surita which was held by Lope d' Arenas, would not yeeld, obiecing D the testament of the yong King D. Sancho, yet notwithstanding they would haue the place, and hauing inuested it, they beganne to batter it. D. Lope Diaz de Haro, Lord of Biscay, was at this siege well accompanied, although hee had not bene called, the Earle D. Nugno de Lara and hee, beeing at some iarre. The taking of this place seeming euery day more difficult, D. Nugno, and the Earle D. Suero entred into the towne, vpon assurance giuen by oth, to parle, with Lope d' Arenas the Gouvernor, but they were detained prisoners; Lope was soone after punished for this fraude, God shewing that there is not any thing which displeases him more then false-hood and treachery; and in truth there is no brute beast more detestable then that man which seekes to circumuent by promises and othes.

There was in King *D. Alphonso*s campe, one which had serued, or beene bred vp in Lope d' Arenas house, who presented himselfe vnto the King, offering to deliuer him the place, if hee would giue him meanes to liue, and that there were any one which would bee content hee should wound him, that hee might haue some collour to flie vnto any enemy. The King promised to recompence him well, but as for the hurting of any one, there was some difficulty: yet there was one Pedro Diaz, or Pedro Ruis, as others call him, of Toledo, offered himselfe to receiue the blow. This varlet, whose name was Domingillo, drew his sword presently, and gaue this poore Pedro Diaz, a deadly wound, and then fled, the gard and other soldiars making shew to follow him towards the towne, where hee was receiued and knowne by his old Master Lope d' Arenas, who nothing suspecting Domingillo, was treacherously slaine by him; the murderer hauing meanes to slip downe the wall, and to recouer the campe. Vpon the Gouvernors death the souldiars and inhabitants resolved to yeeld the towne of Surita vnto the King. Domingillo, who was proud of this execution, demanded his reward of the King: E

A King: But the King by a memorable example of Iustice, whoseoeuer aduised him, vsed an admirable proportion in this action: for hee first caused his eyes to bee put out, for the murder which hee had committed, hauing not made him acquainted therewith; and then hee gaue him that which was needfull for his entertainment: but hearing after that hee did glory too much in his treason, hee caused him to bee slaine. After this enterprize of Surita, the King dismissed his souldiers, who returned to their houses.

B Howsoeuer D. Alphonso Henriques King of Portugal; ended his quarrels with D. Fernand of Leon; yet in the yeere of our Lord 1169. hee had confirmation of his royall titles from Pope Alexander, to whom he sent his Bulles, taking the King D. Alphonso Henriques, his successours, Realme and subiects, into the protection of the church of Rome, paying two markes of gold for an acknowledgment or rent; the which the Archbishop of Braga, did receiue yeerely for the church of Rome, yet no man can say, that this rent was euer paid; and if D. Fernand married his daughter D. Vrraca, by whom hee had one sonne called D. Alphonso, who succeeded him in his realmes of Leon and Galicia; yet this affinity did not suppress the troubles and lamentable factions, which followed.

Portugal

King D. Fernand, by the aduise of a banished Portugais, caused the city of Rodrigue to be fortified, the which some hold to bee ancient Mirobrisa, and there placed a good garison, the which did wonderfully annoy the Portugais that lay neere it, & built Ledesma, neere to Salamanca, which did much in-doinage that city; as you shal heare: this King tooke pleasure in building, when hee was not prest with waire: and therefore they say that Granada, which is neere to Coria Valencia in the Bishoprike of Ouiedo, Villalpando, Manilla, Majorga in the Bishoprike of Leon, and Castro in Toraphe in the Bishoprike of Zamora are his workes: Hee was diuorced from D. Vrraca, by reason of consanguinity, and tooke to his second wife D. Theresa daughter to Nugno de Lara, after whose death hee had a third wife called D. Vrraca Lopes, daughter to D. Lope Diaz, Lord of Biscay: By this last wife D. Fernand had D. Sancho and D. Garcia, lawfull heires to the realme of Leon, for that they were, by the Popes sentence, botne in lawful wed-locke, & not D. Alphonso: yet they reigned not; neither did they leaue any heires.

Leon

Places built by
D. Fernand
King of Leon,

Genealogy of
Leon.

D 4. The house of Biscay was then in great esteeme; out of the which was issued the third wife of the King D. Fernand: the order and continuance of which family is thus set downe by the Spanish writers. They name for the best knowne stem of this house, D. Suriz, who by his mothers side was Nephew to the King of Scotland, begotten by a knight of Biscay, called D. Lope, who obtained the Siegneury of Biscay in the yeere 870. Suria in the Cantabrian tongue signifies white. He carried in his armories two wolues fables, either of them with a Lambe in his mouth, in a field Argent, which were the ancient armes of Biscay: he married to his second wife D. Balda, daughter and heire to D. Sancho Esteuaguis Ordoynes, Lord of Tauria of Durango, by whom hee had one sonne, called D. Manso Lopes, who was Lord of Biscay, and of Tauria of Durango: this D. Manso had by his first wife (for hee was married thrice) one sonne, called D. Inigo Esquerre, that is to say, deafe, in the Biscaine tongue, who was the third Lord of Biscay. Of him was borne D. Lope Diaz, the fourth Lord of Biscay, who liued in the time of D. Fernand Gonzales Earle of Castille. D. Sancho Lopes was his sonne and the fifth Lord of Biscay: who although hee had two sonnes, D. Inigo and D. Garcia, surnamed Sanchez, yet did neither of them succeed him in the Siegneury of Biscay: the reason was, that the souldiars beeing in mutynie, at their returne from a certaine waire in Cubijana of Morillas, in the Prouince of Alaua; as D. Sancho Lopes came amongst their drawne swords to pacifie them, hee receiued a wound for another, and was slaine, leauing those two verie little: wherefore the Biscaines hauing neede of a Lord able to gouerne them, they made choise of D. Inigo Esquerre the second of that name, bastard brother to the deceased, who was the sixth Lord of Biscay: of him came D. Lope Diaz the second, who ruled in Biscay. And to make some recompence to the children of D. Sancho Lopes, D. Inigo Sancho had Lodio giuen him for a portion, and D. Garcia that of Orozo. D. Lope Diaz, the seuenth Lord of Biscay, was father to D. Diego Lopes, E

The house of Biscay.

Lopes, who succeeded him in the daies of King D. Alphonso the sixth. This D. Diego was A the eighth Lord of Biscay, surnamed the white, and being married to a Lady of Arragon, he begat one sonne called D. Lope Diaz, who was afterwards the ninth Lord of Biscay, the third of that name. It is that D. Lope which was at the siege of Surita, with King D. Alphonso, called the Noble, in whose raigne we now are come, and whose daughter D. Ferraca was married to Fernand the second King of Leon and Galicia: hee also (having built vp the towne of Haro, in Rioje) surnamed himselfe of Haro, and left it to his posterity. He had of D. Mençia his wife, one sonne called D. Diego Lopes de Haro, heire of his fathers estates, and an other daughter called D. Gausfreda, who some say had bene Queene of Nauarre, but it is doubtfull. This D. Diego Lopes, was the tenth Lord of Biscay, and a very good Knight: who had the honor to bee standard-bearer to the King of B

Castille.

An. 1170.
D. Alphonso
the noble King
of Castille
comes to year.

And marries Elenor of England.

Returning to King D. Alphonso, after the taking of Surita, having dismissed his souldi-ars, he returned to Toledo, where hee kept his court, and assembled the Noblemen and knights his vassals: where finding himselfe in free possession of all the country of Tole- do, he came to Burgos, where hee called an other assembly, and kept his court, in the yeere 1170. touching that which lies on this side the mountaines, belonging to Castille C and Nagera: and for that the fifteneenth yeere of his age was now ended, all the townes & forts were yeelded vp vnto him, without any contradiction, according to the will of his deceased father, yea those which were held by D. Fernand of Castro, who was neuer more seene in Castille, by reason of the quarrels he had with the house of Lara, but passing to the Moores, hee shewed himselfe a perpetual enemy to his country. In the assembly at Burgos, there was speech of the excesses, and outrages done by Fernand King of Leon; to reuenge the which hee resolved to proclaim warre against him, but it was not put in execution long after, by reason of D. Alphonso's youth, who was not yet capable of so great an enterprise. There they treated also of the Kings marriage with Elenor daughter to Henry the second King of England, who was as renowned as any Prince at D that day in Christendome: he was sonne to Geoffrey Duke of Aniou and Normandie. It was this Henry, which had married Queene Elenor, heire of the Dutchie of Guienne, and countrie of Poitou, put away by Lewis the seventh the French King.

5 After these things, there was an enter-view of two yong Kings, D. Alphonso of Ca- stille, and D. Alphonso of Arragon, at Sahagun, with shewes of great loue; and from thence they went to Sarragosse, from whence there was an Ambassage sent to effect the marriage of the King of Castille. The Ambassadors were D. Celobrun Archbishop of To- ledo, the Bishops of Palenza, Calaorra, Burgos and Segobia, the Earles D. Ponce and D.
Nugno, with other Noblemen; who found the court, with the Queene mother and her daughter at Burdeaux: whose returne the King of Castille attended at Sarragosse, E and where during his aboad, the league was renewed betwixt Castille and Arragon, and a new made for the mutuall defence of both Kings, against all men, except the King of England, in the which were named all the great men belonging to either estate:
for assurance whereof, there was assigned and laied in pawne the castles of Na- gera, Bigueria, Clauiso, Ocon and Arueda, for the King of Castille; and for the King of Arragon, Hariza, Daroca, Aranda, Epila Borja: with a condition that hee which should breake the league, should loose these places: and the conuentions were signed and confirmed by the two Kings, and their chiefeft Nobles. The Ambassadors of Castille were welcome to Burdeaux, and their charge was very pleasing to the king of England: wherevpon the Princeesse Elenor was sent into Spaine, F being accompanied by Bernard Archbishop of Bourdeaux, the Bishoppes of Poi- ctiers, Angoulesme, Perigieux, Xaintes, Agen, and Bazas: by Raoul de la
Faye, Seneschall of Guienne, Helie Earle of Perigort, the Vicounts of Tartax, Chaste.

A Chasteleraud, Chastillon, Mortmar, Vendome, Angoulesme, Labris or Albret, with very many other Noblemen and Knights. By the treaty made with the Ambassadors it was sayd, that the assurance and contract of marriage should bee made at Tarrassone, and should be solemnly ratified in the presence of the King of Arragon: wherefore the two Kings came to Tarrassone, where these things were celebrated and sworn with great solemnity, in the yeere of our Lord 1170. and for accomplishment thereof at that instant D. Alphonso King of Castille, caused all the Knights of Castille, which were there present to swear fealtie to his future spouse: and moreover hee gaue vnto her in satisfaction of the marriage, the castles and city of Burgos, Castro, Xeris, Auia, Monçon, Sal- dagne, Tariego, Dueregnas, Carrion, Aabeson, Medina del Aampo, Villa Escusa, A- guillar & Astudillo, & for her idle expences & to furnish her cabinet, he assigned particularly vnto her, Burgos, Nagera, and Castro Xeris: besides he gaue vnto her the rents of the port of Saint Emeterio, Besgo, Cabedo, Briza de Centillana, Calaorra, Logroño, Arnedo, Bigueria, Granon, Vilhorado; Pancoruo, Monasterio, Pozza, Atienza, Olima, Penafil, Curiel, Surita, Hita, Aegna Negra and others. Moreouer hee promised to giue her the moytie of all hee should conquer from the Moores from the day of their marriage. These promises and matrimoniall conuentions were sworn in the presence of the Archbishop of Bourdeaux, and other English Ambassadors, to whom in the Queenes name hee caused the forts to bee deliuered, and the homages aboue mentioned to bee done, all in the presence of the King of Arragon, as an indifferent arbitrator for both parties. These things thus finished, the two Kings of Castille and Arragon, parted good friends, and the Ambassadors, with the new spouse, came with D.
Alphonso the Noble, to Burgos, where the marriage was celebrated with great state and royal pompe, after which the court parting from Burgos, it came to Nagera, in the countrie of Oja, where the King gaue leaue to many which had come to attend the solemnitie of his marriage, namely to them of Auila, who had alwaies followed him, to whom for their willingness to serue him, hee graunted many priuiledges.

Gifts to the new Queene of Castille. in fauour of her marriage.

After which hee led the Queene to Toledo, where hee grew so amorous of a Jew, whom they called Hermosa, as hee forgot his new spouse, and intrangled himselfe so farre in her loue, as hee almost lost his senses; whereat some Knights of Ca-
stille being verie much greeued, they thought to doe an act pleasing vnto God, and profitable to the common-weale; to kill this Jew, the which in the beginning the King did beare verie impatiently; but in the end hee acknowledged his error, and de-tested it.

Disorder at law
of D. Alphonso
King of Castille.

Vpon the confines of Arragon and Castille, there began at that time a petty estate in Albarrazin, which place was vsurped by a Knight, called D. Pedro Ruis d'Acagra, who held it of God and his sword. Hee was borne in Nauarre, and wonne the loue of the Moores of Murcia, and other neighbour places, which did fauour and succor him in his enterprises, and withall hee had newly made a league with D. Sancho King of Nauarre, who supported him and vsed him, to bridle Arragon and Castille, with which estates hee had or feared some Iarres. This fort which had bene in ancient time called Saint Ma- rie of Albarrazin, was a troublesome thorne in the feete of the Kings of Castille and Arragon, into whose territories D. Pedro Ruis d'Acagra, made often roads, at his pleasure: who hauing about this yeere of our Lord 1172. taken some places in Castille, the King D. Alphonso the noble, resolved to make warre against him, and to take them from him if hee could: for this consideration hee made a priuate league with the King of Arragon, who was interested; by the which it was concluded, that the King of Arragon should haue the fort of Albarrazin; and hee of Castille should haue the rest which D. Pedro did hold, for the obseruing of which Articles, hee of Arragon did giue in pawne to the King of Castille, the castle of Hariza, with Aranda, Borja and F Arguedas: and the castle of Verdejo was giuen to the King of Arragon by him of Castille, bynding also the townes of Agreda, Aquilar and Cerueta, which places were assurances for that which had bene contracted betwixt them; promising that if there should bee any contrauention, or fraude betwixt them, it should bee repaired within three yeeres, or the places lost for him that had committed the fraude, But these

Fort of Albarrazin.

An. 1172.

these designs went to smother, the two Kings being at a iarre for Hariza, the which was delivered to the King of Castille by Nugno Sanchez a knight, without the King of Arragons expresse command, and before the warre of Nauarre was begunne. Then the King of Castille was most commonly accompanied by D. Celebrun Archbishop of Toledo, Primar of Spaine, the Bishops D. Iohelmo of Siguença, Gonçalo of Segobia, Raymond of Palencia, Pedro of Burgos, Sancho d'Avila, Bernard d'Osma, with other Prelats and Church-men, of which kinde of men Kings counsels did then most commonly consist; and therefore whatsoeuer Princes committed, were it good or bad, is iustly to be imputed to them, be it in religion or in matters of State. There were also many Noblemen of Marke in those daies; amongst the which were D. Ponce, Lord Steward, and D. Nuygues standard-bearer of Castille D. Gonçalo Maraguan, a standard-bearer also, and D. Rodrigo Gutierrez a Steward, which were the chiefe offices of the crowne: they were annual, as it seemes, or else at the Kings pleasure.

Nauarre.
An. 1173

Nauarre invaded by the Kings of Castille and Arragon.

6. By their aduice and assistance, with other Prelats, Noblemen and Knights of his realmes, D. Alphons entered Nauarre in the yeere 1173, with a great army, against his vncle D. Sancho the wife, moued thereunto, as wel by the spoiles which he had done in the territories of Rioje and Bureua, during his nonage, as also by the perswasion of the King of Arragon his cousin, whose countrie D. Sancho had invaded, whilest that the armie of Arragon was in the Realme of Valencia against the Moores, thinking to make his profit thereby, whilest the King of Arragon was absent with his forces. So breaking the accord and peace, which hee had made with the deceased D. Raymond, and renewed with Queene Petronilla, hee had ouerrunne his country, and forced D. Alphons King of Arragon, to giue ouer his praise-worthie enterprises, and to turne head against his enemy, whom he had repulst into Nauarre, entering by Tudela, where hee did besiege and take the towne of Arguedas, the which hee fortified and manned with a good garrison.

These two Kings of Castille and Arragon being in armes, and pressing D. Sancho in diuers places, hee found himselfe to weake to make head against them, so as his countreies endured great spoiles and miseries, for his armie being defeated towards Castille, the Castillans did runne as farre as Pampelone: on the other side the King of Arragon tooke from him the towne and castle of Milagro, the garrison whereof did alwaies keepe his frontiers in alarme, by reason whereof hee razed it, but it was since repaired by the Nauarrois. Notwithstanding these two vnited forces, yet D. Sancho defended himselfe valiantly against the King of Arragon and tooke from him the castles of Trasmos and Caxuclos. The most renowned Knights which were in those daies in Nauarre, as appeeres by the ancient Records of townes and Monasteries, were Inigo Almorauid in Roncal, Sancho Ramires in Aybar, Jordain in Saint Matie in Vxue, Ximen Almorauid in Peralta, Garcia of Alberio in Tudela, and Martin Ruiz in Estella, who had the government of these places and forts, and commanded D. Shanchos souldiers.

Arragon.

King of Arragon leaves the Emperors daughter, to marry D. Sancho of Castille.

An. 1174

7. During these warres, the King of Castille resolved to propound a marriage vnto D. Alphons King of Arragon, the which had beene treated of betwixt him and D. Sancho his aunt, daughter to the Emperor D. Alphons, by his second wife D. Rica, and would attempt (by the charity which did guide both him and his counsel) to breake the marriage which was already concluded betwixt the sayd King of Arragon and the daughter of Manuel the first Emperour of Constantinople, and so farre aduanced, as shee was come already to Montpellier, when as D. Alphons of Arragon forooke her to hearken to the marriage of D. Sancho of Castille, to the great contempt and disgrace of the Emperour. This other marriage was afterwards celebrated in Sarragossa, in the presence of Cardinal Hiacinthe, the Popes Legat in Spaine, in the yeere 1174. in consideration whereof, the King of Arragon gaue vnto his spouse many townes in Arragon and Cattelogne, imitating the example of the King of Castille, who had extraordinarily aduanced the Princeesse of England.

8. Queene Petronilla of Arragon was deceased the yeere before this marriage, it may bee whilst her sonne was in Prouence to dispute the succession of the Earle of Prouence.

A Prouence his cousin, who had beene slaine nere vnto Nice by the Nissards: whose inheritance he had obtained, notwithstanding that the Earle of Tolouza were a great enemy vnto him. They write that this Princeesse by her last wil and testament did ordaine, that no women should succeed to the crowne of Arragon.

It was the same yeere 1174, that King D. Alphons the noble confirmed the priuiledges of the city of Toledo, the which we haue set downe by Articles during the life of the Emperour D. Alphons the sixth: a while after the King D. Alphons of Castille, being at the siege of Cuenca, hee quit vnto D. Alphons of Arragon the fealty and homage, and al pretension of souerainety, which hee had to the realme of Arragon, in confirmation of their friendship, and in respect of their new contracted alliance, three and fortie yeeres after that the Realme of Arragon had begunne to hold of the crowne of Castille.

The Noblemen and Knights which had conducted Manuell the Emperors daughter to Montpellier, seeing themselves and their Princeesse thus mocked, not knowing what other course to take, they would haue carried her backe into Greece: But either by loue or force they married her to William Earle of Montpellier, in whose house shee was lodged: of which marriage issued a daughter, called Mary, who in time, was wife to the sonne and heire of this D. Alphons King of Castille. This sonnes name was D. Pedro, borne of D. Sancho of Castille, besides three brought the King her husband, D. Alphons, who was Earle of Prouence, and D. Fernand, who being a Monke in the royal Monasterie of Poblette, which his father had finished, hee left it to bee Abbot of Montarragon. King D. Alphons had three daughters also by the Queene D. Sancho, that is D. Constance who was married first to the King of Hongarie, and afterwards to the Emperour. Frederic the second, D. Elenor and D. Sancho, both Countesses of Tolouza, the one married to Cont Raymond the father, and the other to Cont Raymond the sonne. This Queene D. Sancho was verie deuout, after the manner of that age: wherefore as soone as she was married shee built the Monastery of Sixena, of the Nuns of Saint Iean.

9. This age was (as the rest) full of deuotions, and inuentions of new seruices: for Cardinal Hiacinthe being Legate a Latere for the Pope in Spaine, the order of knights or men at armes, of Saint Iames, had his beginning in the realme of Galicia, by an emulation betwixt some knights, & Monkes of Saint Eloy, a Monastery in the same Kingdome. These good religious fathers seeing the great concourse of people which came from all parts of Christendome to the sepulcher of Saint Iames, they beganne to build Hospitals, out of their reuenues which were very great, vpon the passage which in Spaine they doe commonly call the French way, to lodge and feed Pilgrimes, and to supplie all their necessities, in sickness or in health: wherein they employed themselves honestly, and the first Hospitall of their foundation was that of Saint Marke the Euangelists, without the walles of the city of Leon: afterwards they built another vpon the passage of Castille, called de las Tiendas. In imitation of these Monkes, vsing such courtesie to strangers which went to Saint Iames, there were thirteene Knights, very deuout to this Apostle, taking him for their particular Patron and aduocate, according to their instruction, vowed themselves to gard and assure the way for pilgrimes against the incursions of the Moores, and other theues which troubled Spaine; and hauing imparted their designe to the Monkes of Saint Eloy, they agreed to make one body amongst them, and to make the patrimonie of the Monastery of Saint Eloy common, with that of these Knights, and others which should ioine with them: at that time they did enioy about twenty castles, which made the Monkes more willing to allow of this communion: al these holy souldiers were married from their first institution, wherefore they did onlie vow coniugal chastetie, and as for pouerty it was not very great, they onelie renounced the proprietie of their goods, for the seruice of the order, enioying the fruites, whereof they payed tithe vnto the Monkes for the diuine seruice, wherein they were employed: they did vowe obedience to their Prior and Maister, by such an order, as the Monkes should bee subiect to their Priors both for spirituall and temporall; and the Knights to the same Prior touching the spiritualty

Ec 3

First convent of Knights of Saint James.

spirituality; but in regard of the temporall they should obey the maister of the order. A Whereof the first was named D. Pedro Fernandes de Puente Encalada. The first convent which was built for these Knights, was neere vnto Saint Markes Hospitall, without the walles of Leon, on a peece of ground belonging to the Monkes of Saint Eloy, which they gaue; into the which they all retired, taking vpon them a modest kinde of habit, fit for the warre, carrying vpon a white cloake a red-crosse, in forme of a sword, for a marke of their order, and for an argument of humilitie they had their haire powled, which was no small abasement in those times.

Their Order was vnder Saint Augustin, according to that of the Monkes of Saint Eloy: and all these things were ordred in the presence of Cardinal Hyacinthe, the Legat, and allowed by him, hauing especiall authority for it. A while after D. Pedro, the Maister of the Order, accompanied with certaine Knights, this order beeing wonderfully increased, went to Rome, to present himselfe to Pope Alexander, who confirmed the order in the year of our Lord 1175. according to the disposition of Cardinal Hyacinthe, his Legat, who was afterwards Pope. Many haue beleueed, and some haue written, that this order of Knights of Saint James is more ancient, grounding it vpon a certaine priuiledge which is found at Salamanca, in the Monasterie of the Holie Ghost, where at this present the religious women of that order are: for besides the moderne Castilian Language, in the which this priuiledge is written, with the date and yere thereof, counted from the natiuity of our Lord Iesus Christ, discouers the falshood: for that in those daies all Instruments, titles and letters were written in Latin, and that they did account the yeeres from the Ara of Cesar, there is not any mention found in Authors of the Institution of this Order, nor of any exploit of the Knights thereof, before this time: besides other markes of falshood which may bee discouered in this priuiledge, as to intitle the King D. Fernand the Great Lord of Biscay, and King of Leon, which hee was not, and by consequence had no cause to grant priuiledges to that Monastery of the citie of Salamanca, which hath been alwaies of the iurisdiction of Leon. Whereas in the yeere 1034. which is the date thereof, there reigned D. Bernard the third of that name, so as it is not without cause if they doubt of the truth of the priuiledges granted to churches and convents.

These Knights newly instituted being fallne into some dislike with D. Fernand King of Leon, reigning at that time, they left their Conuent of Saint Marke at Leon, and retired into Castille, where they were courteously receiued by the King D. Alphonso, who gaue them the towne and Castle of Vcles, called in old time Vrcesia, where they built that renowned conuent, which is the chiefe seate of their religion and order: yet they sent some of their brethren to dwell in their first conuent of Saint Marke at Leon, after the decease of the King D. Fernand, vpon condition that the superiority should belong to that of Vcles: but it is not obserued, for the conuent of S. Marke doth not acknowledge that of Vcles in any thing, but doth keep their first reuenues, the which were since augmented in Estremadura, after the conquest thereof by them of Leon. In time this order did extend farre into Portugal, where it got great reuenues vnder the obedience of the conuent of Vcles, vnto the King D. Denis, who put the Knights out of his country.

A thousand launces of the Order of Saint James.

Two chiefe
gouernants.

This order of the Knights of Saint James did so grow in wealth and number, by the bountie of Kings, and indulgences of Popes, as they were able to arme a thousand launces compleat, in both conuents of Vcles and Saint Marke: and before that by the authority of Pope Adrian the sixth, the masters place was incorporate to the crowne of Castille, the Maisters of the Order were chosen and displaced, if there were cause, by the suffrages of thirteene brethren, who had that authoritie and power from the whole Order, the which doth enioy more dignities, conuents, monasteries, colles, and other lands, then any Order that is in Spaine: first there are those principal conuents, which are the chiefe of all the rest, which bee Vcles and Saint Marke, vnder the which are foure Hermitages, Saint Marie de la Pegna, neere vnto the Towne of Segure of the Mountaine, Saint Saluator of Munstiers, neere to Almeda: Saint Mary of Cagnamanes in the fields of Montiel, and Saint Anthony about Alhambra.

Besides

A Besides one Conuent in the Citie of Seuille, two Colledges in the Vniuersitie of Salamanca, sixe Monasteries of Religious women, which were the holy Ghost at Salamanca, S. Foy at Toledo, Saint Croix at Villedolit, Saint James at Granada, S. Olalia at Merida, and Saint James la Languera of Barcelona. They haue also siue Hospitals: S. James of Toledo, where they go to be cured which haue the poxe or French disease, and all other infirmities which depend thereon, S. James at Cuenca, las Tiendas in Castile the old, the hospitall neere vnto the Conuent of Saint Mark at Leon, and the hospitall of the Conuent at Vcles. Moreover, this Order hath many commanderies, the which are bound to serue in time of warre against the Moores, and to furnish 368. lances: those which belong to the iurisdiction of Vcles, are, the great Commanderie of Castile, that of Paracuellos, Monthermand, Mora, dos Barrios, Montreal, Horcajo, el Corral of Almaguer, el Campo de Critana, Alhambra, Membrilla, Montizon, Bedmar, Vacas, Segura de la Samera, which is the best Commanderie of all Spaine: Yeste, Moratallal, Carauaca, Aledo, Ricote, Biedma, Ciega, Soconos, Torres, and Cagnamares, Montiel, Sociellamos, Villamajor, Carrizosa, Vilhermosa, Vallanousa de la Fuente, the buildings del campo de Montiel, Villa Escusa de Haro, the buildings of Mancha, and the riuer of Tayo, Huellamo, Orria, Estremera, Saint Croix de Sarca, Villoria, Villarubia, Alpages, and the Priorie of Vcles, the Chamber of the Priuiledges of the Order, and Alorqui. These bee those which acknowledge Vcles. Now those follow which are of the iurisdiction of Saint Mark of Leon, the great Commanderie Aquilarejo, Calcadilla, la Puebla de Sancho Peres, el Santo, Villafrancha, la Fuente del maestre, Almendralejo, Lobon, Montijo, Merida, Alcuelfar, Riuera, and Azebucha, Hallame, Elliotua, Palomas, Ornachos, Reyna Hinojosa, Medina de la Torres, Valencia del ventoso, Monasterio, Montermolino, Vlagre, Azuaga, Guadalcanal, Mures, Benaçuca, Estepa, the houses of Corduba, the buildings in the Prouince of Leon, the Prouince of the conuent of Leon, Villanousa of Alifdar, Vena Mexi, the Prouostship of Bienuenida. In Castile the old, are Pegria, Viende, Estriana, Castrotroua. Besides all these there are the commanderies of la Torre d'Ocague, Sarca, Mirauel, Castelleja de la Cuesta, Barra, Castroverde. And in the Realme of Valencia are the commanderies of Museros, Enguerra, Orcheta, Sagra, Zenet and Fradel. Besides these commanderies, this Order hath at this day about fixe hundred Knights of the habit, about two hundred Clerkes breethren, which remaine in the conuents, with Vicarages and other Benefices, so as it is wonderfull great and rich. And although it were first instituted to make warre against the Infidels, yet there are few at this day which affect these commanderies, or the habit to that end, but only to increase their reuenues, or to be in greater reputation among souldiers, by meanes of this habit. Such was the iurisdiction of this Order of Knights.

During the raigne of this King Don Alphonso the Noble, the Monasterie of religious women of Balbuena was built by Peter of Balbuena an Hermite: in like manner one John of Ortega, borne at Quintana in Ortugno, in the Diocese of Burgos, was sanctified, I know not for what holines, and his bodie was buried in the yeare 1173. in the Monastery which carries his name: where the Spanish Authors say, hee did many miracles. There were infinit donations made vnto Monasteries, Conuents, and Orders of Knights, by the King and the Nobility of Spaine, for the redemption of their soules, and of their kindred and friends deceased, as their letters report.

10 The Order of the Knights of Calatraua, whose beginning wee haue described in the life of the king D. Sancho the desired, was much augmented at that time, and was only governed by masters: whereof the first was called D. Garcia, to whom succeeded D. Martín Peres of Syon: and the third master which gouerned at that time, was D. Nugno Peres, of Quignones. The first Conuent of this Order was at Calatraua: but since the Knights made diuers changes, as appears by their Histories, as to Ciruelos, Buxeda, Corcoles, and castel of Saluatierra: and since the chiefe seate of their Order was translated to the castell of Couo, in the time of D. Nugno Hernandes the twelfth Master, where it now remaines. The rents and reuenues of this holy company of Warriours haue so increased from time to time, by the bountie of the Kings of Castile, as they haue bene sterle to serue against the Moores with 300 Lances well appointed, whereunto those Com-

Order of Calatrava.

manderies

manderies are ordinarily bound, whose names be, first the great commanderie, Clauerra, A Obresia, and Argamassilla: the commanderies of Malagon, Mançares, Almagro, Montan- theculos, Daymiel, Villarubia, val de pegas, Eluico, and Saint Croix, Fuente el Moral, and the houses of Cité Real, Castellanos, Almodouar del campo, Puerto Llano, Corral of Caracuel, Piedra Buena, Herrera, Fuente del Imperador, Carrion, Guadalerza, Me- riança, Castilleras, Balesseros, Alcolea, Possuelo, Torroua, Bolagaos, Moral, Almira- diel, Hauanilla, the houses of Seville, the houses of Corduba, Belmer, Villafranca, Lo- pera, Canaueral, Ximena, and Recena Pegna de Martos, Biouras, Moratalaz, Torres and Canena, Tallega, Sorita, Almoguerza, Auignon, and Verniches, the houses of Talauera, those of Toledo, Huerta, Val de Caruanes, the houses of Plaisance, Ateca, Carezuela, Ortas, Calatraua the old. And in the realme of Arragon are the commanderies of Alca. B. n. Mousiojo, Penna Roija, Faraxneda, Ralfas, Castelleras, Laguna totta, Molinos. In that of Valencia there are also other commanderies. In Castile are the Priories of Seville, Gra- nado, Iacn, Alhama, Fuencaliente, Porcuna, Sugueca, and Villatoro, besides other dig- nities & ecclesiasticall reuenues. This Order was confirmed by Pope Alexander the third, and receiued into the protection and tuition of the Apostolike Sea, and had vnder it, Knights of the Alcantara for a time.

Nauarre.

An. 1176.

About the yeare 1176. was founded the Monasterie of our Ladie of Irançu, by Don Pedro de Paris, bishop of Pampelone, who notwithstanding he called himselfe so, was of Nauarre. It is very likely that the Prelates in those dayes had a great desire to build Mona- steries and such like houses, that they might leaue some markes and memorie after their death of their diligence in the estate whereunto they were called: for otherwise they could leaue no subiect to speake of them, that age beeing vnlearned, and full of ignorance, so as not knowing in a manner any other duties, they thought themselves sufficiently dis- charged, if they did build any retreat for Monkes: and withall, they had an assurance, that their beginning should not remaine imperfect, nor vnprovided of rich reuenues, se- ing that the hearts of Kings, and of all men in generall, were seasoned with this perswas- ion, that to enrich the Clergie, was the true meanes to wipe out all their offences, and to bee saued: Wherefore all their exhortations, counsellors, and other care, tended onely to this end, to entertaine all, especially the Nobilitie in this opinion. This Bishop, accord- ing to this kind of doctrine, built and erected this Monasterie of Nostre Signora of Irançu, and there placed the religious of Cisteaux: the Abbot of which place is of great authoritie in Nauarre, and hath a voyce in the assembly of the Estates, as a chiefe member of the Clergie.

Castille.

An. 1177.

Cuenca taken from the Moors.

11 Returning to the secular affaires of Castile, wee finde that this yeare, Don Alphonso, the Noble, made another roade into Nauarre, being assisted by Don Cels- brun, Arch-bishop of Toledo, and many other Bishops, but to small effect. The most renowned among the Knights, which serued him, were Don Gonçal of Maragon, his Standard-bearer, and Don Roderigo Gutierrez Lord Steward: these were Offices in the court of Castile, which were held during the kings pleasure.

This warre was diuerted by the inuasions which the Moores made into Castile and Arragon, in the yeare 1177. Whereupon the two Kings ioyning their forces together, besieged Cuença. The place was strong and well manned, and hard to be forced: where- fore the King of Castile left the king of Arragon there, who after many assaults tooke it. There they placed and instituted an Episcopall seate, changing that of old Valeria, by a graunt from Pope Alexander the third. After which, the Moores of Alarçon, doubting they should not be able to defend that place, quit it: which conquests remained to Cas- tile: and this was at the same time when as King Don Alphonso the Noble, did remit the Soueraignie and homage which the King of Arragon did owe to the Crowne of Castile.

An. 1179.
League against
Nauarre.

In the yeare 1179. there was a new League made and confirmed betwixt these Prin- ces of Castile and Arragon, to make warre against the king of Nauarre, at their com- mon charge, and equall conquests: according to the which Don Alphonso the Noble did so presse the King Don Sancho alongst the Riuer of Oja, as hee tooke from him the places which hee had seized on during his infancie, and recouered Burbiesca, Cerefo,

A Cerefo, Granon, Entrena, and Logroño, remaining by this meanes Lord and Ma- ster of Rioje and Bureua, the which the kings of Nauarre could neuer after get. This losse was made more grievous by the death of Donna Beacia, Queene of Nauarre, a Princess of great vertue, who (as some write) was buried in the Cathedrall church of Pampelone.

12 After all this, D. Alphonso the Noble came to Burgos, to provide for the necessi- ties of the warre, as well against Nauarre, as the Moores: and having need of great sums of money to that end, he propounded in a generall assembly of the Estates at Burgos; to leaue a taxe vpon the people, whereunto the Nobility as well as the rest should contri- bute, imposing five Marauidis of gold for euery person, the which was valued about five Ducats: this counsell was given him by Diego Lopes de Hara, Lord of Biscay, but it tooke no effect: for all the Gentlemen of Castile (beeing discontented that hee sought to in- fringe their liberties) fell to armes, and beeing led by the Earle Don Pedro de Lara, they were resolu'd to defend it, with the hazard of their liues. Wherefore D. Alphonso chan- ged his opinion, and let them vnderstand, that from thenceforth hee would maintaine their immunities, and that whatsoeuer he had then propounded, was not to continue, but onely to supply the present necessitie of his affaires, which he would seeke to surr- ish by some other meanes. For the great resolution which D. Pedro de Lara shewed in this action, they say, that the Nobilitie of Castile did grant to him and to his successors, a sollemne break-fast, in testimonie of his good indeuour in a businesse of so great conse- quence: and moreouer they affirme, that thereby the Lords of Lara haue the first voyce

Rioje and Bu-reua taken by the Castilians
from Nauarre.Nobility of Castile defend their freedom.

C for the Nobilitie in the Court of Castil. It is not from these 5. Marauidis of gold, that the Prouerbe is growne in Spaine, To reuenge or defend their Nobilitie for five hundred solz, for five Marauidis are not five hundred solz. Wherefore leauing all the fables which some produce to that purpose, you must vnderstand, that according to the ancient lawes of Castile, the iniurie which any one did vnto a Gentleman, where there was a ciuill repa- ration, they payed five hundred solz for a fyne, which were worth foure hundred Marau- dis of currant money at those dayes, and that which was done to one which was no Gen- tleman, was repayed by three hundred solz, which were worth but two hundred and for- tie Marauidis: wherefore the Prouerbe, to reuenge his Nobilitie, for 500. solz, is drawne from these ciuill lawes, D. Alphonso king of Castile meaning to follow the lawes with all vehemencie against the Moores, after that he had recouered those places which D. San- cho king of Nauarre had taken from him, and the quarrels betwixt him and his vnclé Don Fernand king of Leon beeing somewhat reconciled: by the mediation of the Noblemen and Prelates of both Realmes, and by the meanes of the king of Arragon, who sent Don Berenger Bishop of Lerida, and D. Raymond of Moncada thither: the more to tye the holy Knights vnto him, and to haue them readie at need, he made Vcles the chiefe seate of the Knights of Saint Iames, to whom he gaue the Townes of Mora, Ocagne, Oreja, and o- ther places, along the riuer of Tayo. He gaue to the Order of Calatraua, the townes of Magueda, Aceca, Cogolludo, Surita and others: hee peopled the towne of Palence in Vera, or rather Playfance, and there placed the auncient Episcopall seate: hee fortified To- ledo, and rampared Alarcos in that Diocesse, beeing a place of importance vpon a hill on the left hand, coniming from Almodouar del Campo, to Cité reall about Caracuel.

13 In the meane time there fell out a great quarrell, betwixt Don Fernand king of Leon, and Don Alphonso Henriques King of Portugall, by reason of the fort of Cité Ro- derigo, whereas the King of Leon maintained a garrison which did much annoy the Por- tugals: for the soldiours of this place did continually spoile the Portugals countrie, with- out any respect: wherefore D. Alphonso Henriques, who was now very old, sent his Sonne D. Sancho with an army against this garrison of the King of Leon, and to raze the place, whereof D. Fernand beeing aduertised, he fortified his guard there, and approaching him- selfe with good troupes, he encountred the Portugals neere to a place called Arraganal, or Arganal, where they were defeated, and their Generall D. Sancho taken, with many Noblemen and Knights of his armie, who notwithstanding were courteously set at liber- tie by the King of Leon.

D. Alphonso Henriques wonderfully incensed at this losse, being now about 85. yeares old, he gathered his army together, and went to horfe, where entring Galicia in hostile manner,

Vpon the Prouerbe comin Spaine, to revenge his Nobilitie for 500
solz.Portugal.
Kings of Leon and Castile in quarrell.

D. Alphonso K.
of Portugal
and the warre of Leon ended.

Leon.

Badajos taken
by D. Fernand
of Leon.

Portugal.

Exhorts of D.
Sancho against
the Moores.

manner, he tooke Lymia, Turon, and other places: then returning into his countrey, hee drew his forces againe together, and marched beyond Guadiana, where he did assaile the citie of Badajos which the Moores held, being in a countrey, the conquest whereof did belong to the Realme of Leon: whereby it appeares, that among the Christian Princes of Spaine, there was some diuision made for their warres against the Moores, to the end they should not crosse one another by their ambition and couerousnesse. The king of Portugal battered Badajos with such speed, as he had meane to enter it, and wonne two parts of the towne, forcing the Moores to retire into a part, which was of some strength, where they defended themselves. The King of Leon hearing of this enterprife of the King of Portugal, (although he were not fully reconciled with his nephew of Castile, by reason of the new troubles which happened by the reuolt of D. Fernand Ruiz de Castro, & that he must of force leaue some part of his forces to make head vpon the frontiers of Castile, (if happily they would presse him on that side) marched from Zamora, which was newly taken by him, with such souldiars as he could gather together, towards Badajos, whereas D. Alphonso came to meet him, and gaue him battaile, which the Portugals lost: so as D. Alphonso Henriquez was forced to fortifie himselfe in that part of Badajos, which he had wonne: yet finding himselfe not very safe, he resolved to retire as well as he could into his countrey: but as they went out of the citie in a great presse, hee bruized his foot against a barre of the gate, so as he was taken by the Leonois, who carried him to the campe to the king D. Fernand, who receiued him with all honour, as his father-in-law, and a great Prince as he was, from thence he was carried to Auila, where hee was carefully looked vnto, and there made an accord with the King of Leon his sonne-in-law: so as they continued good friends. The places which the Portugals had taken in Galicia, were restored, and D. Fernand desired no other satisfaction, but an oath of fealtie and acknowledgement of the countrey of Portugal, holding of Leon. So Don Alphonso Henriquez returned free into his Realme of Portugal: after which time he could not ride, being lame of his fall, but was still carried in a coach or chariot.

As for D. Fernand Ruiz de Castro, who, as wee haue sayd, had left the king of Castile service, and was retired into the Moores countrey, after that hee had followed their armies some time, in the end he came to serue D. Fernand King of Leon, by whom he was put into citie Roderigo, after that he had succoured it, and chased away the Portugals. This Knight who was of a turbulent spirit, and did hate the Castilians deadly, bred a quarrell betwixt the Kings of Leon and Castile, making continuall roades from his garrison of citie Roderigo, into the countrey of D. Alphonso King of Castile, and had newly defaced some troupes of Castilians, which were gathered together to repulse him, whereas some were slaine vpon the place, and some taken prisoners, among the which was the Earle D. Nugno de Lara, and others whome he deliuered afterwards vpon their faith. This was the occasion which did much trouble and hinder the King D. Fernand, when as hee came against his father-in-law: and the Portugals who besieged Badajos, a towne in his iurisdiction belonging to the Moores, whom notwithstanding hee chased away, making himselfe master of the towne: where he left Aben Abel, a Moore for Gouvernor, in whom he trusted, for that the Inhabitants were all Moores: but this Infidell did not keepe the place long, but yeelded it to Aben Jacob, great Miralmanin of the Almohades, sonne and heire to Abdelmon deceased.

15 Aben Abel did not onely commit this trecherie against the king D. Fernand, but moreover hauing gathered together great forces of the Moores Almohades, hee ouerrunne and spoyle the territories of Leon: then entring into Portugal, he came and besieged the towne of Saint Iren, in the which the king D. Alphonso Henriquez was, being then old, and vnprofitable for the warre, who was in great danger to be taken within that place: but the King Don Fernand comming in good time, the sege was raised, and the Moores put to route: who were afterwards pursued by the Infant Don Sancho, who marched with the armie of Portugal neere vnto Seuille, where being incountried by the Moores, he vanquished them, and then besieged Niebla: but he was forced to leaue it, being aduertised that the Moores were entred by Extremadura, and did besiege Veija: wherefore being prest to defend his owne, he left the other. Arriuig at Veija, he defeated and dispersed the Moores, and freed the towne from danger: this was in the yeare, 1181.

and

At that time the chiefe in Spaine among the Princes of the Moores, according to the diuision which they had made among themselves, vnder the Soueraigntie of Maroc, were the Kings of Murcia; one of the which called Lobo, had had a perpetuall harred against the Royall family of Almoahade, called the Mazemutes. This Lobo had bene tributarie to the King of Arragon: but during the quarrels betwixt Arragon and Castile, he had rebelled, by the fauour of the King of Castile: whereupon the King of Arragon fauoured the Mazemutes. Lobo being dead, his sonne Moyses succeeded him, who was father to Zaen, the last King of the Moores at Valencia. 16 As for Zamora which D. Fernand King of Leon had newly subdued, it was thus: The king of Leon hauing built and peopled the town of Ledcina and others, to accomodate his new Collonies, hee had somewhat restrained the territorie of Salamanca, whereat the Inhabitants being incensed, they rebelled against him: and hauing drawne vnto them Auila and Zamora, and infected other neighbour places with the poyson of their rebellion, they made choice of a Knight, called Nugno Rauia, for their head; with whom going to field with a great number, as well of their citizens, as of their allies, the King D. Fernand came and charged them neere vnto Valdemuca, where he did quite defeat them, and tooke their capitaine D. Nugno Rauia aliue; whose head he caused to be cut off. This victorie made the chief of them which had taken armes against the King, to retire, giuing the rest occasion to giue ouer the enterprife, and then all ioyntly together demanded pardon, and obtained it. The towne of Zamora being (as we haue sayd) ingaged in this mutinie, the King D. Fernand led his victorious armie thither, but the Inhabitants yeelded without any difficultie: so within few daies these two townes, and others by their example, returned to the obedience of the king of Leon.

17 This yeare 1181. D. Sancho king of Nauarre, fortified a little towne, called at that time Gasteiz, to serue for a barre against the king of Castile, and to defend the frontier in the Prouince of Alaua. This place being since augmented in circuit and people, was called Vittoria, a part whereof (which at this day is called Villa de Suco) was that Bourg of Gasteiz. The king granted to his new town the same Lawes he had done to Logroño, correcting and reforming them in some points: he gaue many priuiledges to the Inhabitants, namely, that they should not haue any stranger to bee Iudge or Gouvernor ouer them; but one borne in the countrey, who should be chosen and changed by them, if they found him not faithfull and capable: the which was called the priuiledge Merino, according to the style of the countrey. They haue obserued this order in the gouernement of the towne, the which is one of the best ordered in Spaine, hauing aboue all things bene carefull not to admit any new Christian to publike charges, vnlesse he bee of soure descendants. The reason of this name Vittoria, was for some victorie obtained in that countrey against the Castilians, as it is to be presumed: but by the defect of Histories of those times the particularities are not knowne.

After that this town came vnder the obedience of the kings of Castile, they did much enlarge it in circuit, and built the foure parishs of Saint Michel, Saint Vincent, S. Peter, and Saint Illefonce or Alphonse. It is written of this king D. Sancho the Wise, that hauing about this time ouerrunne the territorie of Rioje and Bureua, the which D. Alphonso of Castile had taken from him some yeares before, and being neere vnto Burgos, at a place called Atapuerca, he gaue a blow with his sword against an Elme, for a marke that the limits of Nauarre should extend so farre: then returning with an infinite number of cattell, and other spoyle, as he had a little past the Monasterie of Saint Peter of Cardegna, the Abbot of that place, who was a reuerent man, took the Standard of Cid Ruiz Diaz great Grand-father to the king D. Sancho, (who was buried in that Monasterie) & mounted vpon a Mule, being accompanied by tenne of his Monkes; the strongest of which carried this Standard: he made all the haste he could after this armie, vntill hee had overtaken the king, before whome he humbled himselfe. The king wondering to see these Monkes in this equipage, with standard of warre, yet he gaue them good reception, being of himselfe very deuout: and demanding what was the reason of their comming, the Abbot sayd vnto him, That he was Abbot of Saint Peter of Cardegna, and that he was come vnto him to beseech him, for the honour of Cid Ruiz Diaz, his great Grandfather, (who 1181.

Moores.

Zaen the last King of the Moores.

Nauarre.

Vittoria built at Alaua.

(who was interred with them and his Standard which he saw in their hands) that it would please him to leaue the prey which he carried away. The King thought thereon a little, in the end he found himselfe so touched with the remembrance of Cid Ruis, and the deuotion and great reuerence he bare vnto the religious, as he left this great bootie which hee had made, to restore it to the owners, wherewith all men were not content.

Castile.

The quarrels betwixt the kungs of Castile and Nauarre continued long, although by fits they had some rest, but it was a counterfeit peace, or a feate of warre. Logrogno and Aguiçejo were (by some accord made betwixt these Princes) as neuters betwixt Nauarre and Castile, in the hands of Ramir de Barea; but the city of Calaoira was held by a knight called Don Diego Ximenes, in the name of Don Alphonso, king of Castile. And for that the warres betwixt these Christian Princes were very dishonorable and preiudiciall to religion, whereof they carried the title, Pope Lucius the third then reigning, sent a Cardinall Legat into Spaine, to reconcile them, who vsed great diligence, but not with such effect, as he desired. The kings of Castile and Arragon had an interview, and he of Arragon past to Saint Iames, to visit the Apostles Sepulcher. This Legat did set downe an order betwixt these two kings, for the conquest of the Moores countrie, whereunto hee did animate these Princes, and assigned to Arragon, that which lyes from Valencia towards Cattelogne, and the rest to Castile: with which diuision the kings of Arragon (which came after) were not well content, so as they were faine to make a new diuision, extending the iurisdiction of Arragon, vnto Alicant: this happened since in the raigie of Don Pedro.

Arragon.

18 This king Don Alphonso of Arragon, hauing about that time held a Prouinciall Councell at Tarragone in Cattelogne, made a decree among other things, That from thenceforth the Notaries should not set downe the yeares of the raigie of the Kings of France, in any contract which should be made in Cattelogne; as they had till then obserued, but onely the yere of the Incarnation of our Lord Iesus Christ; which was, that they would no more acknowledge the foueraigntie of France, of whom Cattelogne and the Countie of Barcelone did hold and depend. This King D. Alphonso finding himself mightie, and hauing a good share on this side the mountaines, busied himselfe in the French warres, taking part with the factions, which were among the Noblemen of that nation, and yet was neuer in very good tearmies with Castile, but for his own profit: yet he maintained himselfe wisely in his countrie, and with reputation.

Portugall.
An. 1183.

19 Don Alphonso Henriques being very old, and at the graues brinke, thought what was fit for his soules health, as he had beene instructed; he procured in the yere 1183, to haue the bodie of Saint Vincent transported to Lisbone, the which they sayd, was in that countrie called Algarbo, on the holy promontorie, the which hath beene since called (by reason of this relique) Cape Saint Vincent, he was borne at Sarragossa. The king went twise in person to Cape S. Vincent, beeing 89. yeares old, for the remoting of this bodie, the which he placed in the Cathedrall church at Lisbone. This Prince was so religious, and so great a benefactor to the Clergie, as (besides the three Monasteries of S. Croix of Coimbra, of Alcousa, and of S. Vincent at Lisbone) hee built the great Cathedrall church of that cittie, and that of Ebora, indowing them with great reuenues. The queene Donna Malfada his wife, carrying the like zeale, did also build the Monasterie of Saint Dominike at Porto, the church of Saint Peter, the Monasterie of Leza, of the Order of S. Iohn, a League from the same cittie, and Saint Mary d'Agua Santa, Saint Saluator of Goandara, Saint Peter de Retes, Saint Mary de Gojos, and about Guymaranes the Monasterie of Acosta, with many others, to the number (as they say) of an 150. if they sayle not in their account. And for a testimonie of great charitie, they say, that these good Princes left a rent to the barke of Mexanfrío, vpon the riuer of Duero, to the end they should passe euery one without any fee.

Whilest they busied themselves about these workes of pietie, Aben-iacob great Miral-mumin of the Arabians, (being aduertised of the routs and ruine of his sectaries in Spain) past the streight in person with great forces of the Almohades Affricanes, where hauing ioyned with the Moores of Spaine, hee went to beseege Saint Iren, into the which Don Sancho the Infant of Portugall had put himselfe, beginning to make his Engines readie

A ready to batter it, where the beseege were likely to be in great danger: but the good old man Don Alphonso Henriques would not let the Infidels glorie, in that they had done him this affront in his old age, but hauing put his men in order, and being resolute, hee ledde them to succor his sonne, who had intelligence of the Portugall armie, the which (being fauoured by a furious salley which the beseege made) charged the Moores armie with such resolution, as they put them to flight, with great slaughter of their best men, and the losse of their king Aben Iacob, who being mortally wounded in the charge by a Portugall, dyed at the passage of the riuer of Tayo. This battell was wonne in the yere 1184. on S. Iohn Baptists day, fixe dayes after the Moores had begun the seerge. Aben Joseph his brother succeeded this Moore, and was the third King of the Almohades.

1184.

Portugal.

B 20 After this famous victorie, these Princes, father and son came to Coimbra, which was at that time the chiefe towne of the Realme of Portugall, and from thence to Porto, where the marriage of D. Theresa Infanta of Portugall, was concluded with Philip Earle of Flanders. Beeing returned to Coimbra, D. Alphonso Henriques fell sicke, whereof hee dyed, being 91. yeares old, hauing reigned with the title of a King about 46. yeares, and had succeeded in his fathers Estates, and held them 73. yeares. His body was interred in the Monasterie of S. Croix of Coimbra, D. Sancho his sonne was king after him in Portugall, surnamed the Builder of townes.

21 D. Fernand King of Leon, had a little before his death, put away D. Vrraca his daughter, by reason of proximitie of blood, their marriage beeing made without a dispensation from the Pope, who beeing (as they write) wonderfully prest by the King, to giue them leaue to remaine together, would neuer yeeld vnto it, notwithstanding that of her was borne D. Alphonso, who succeeded his father in the Realmes of Leon and Gallicia: they were cousins in the third degree. D. Fernand married afterwards with the daughter of the Earle Don Nugno, who liued little with him: then he tooke to his third wife D. Vrraca Lopes, daughter to the Earle D. Lopes, and sister to Don Diego Lopes de Haro, with whom he continued not long, for hee died in the towne of Benauent in the yere 1188. hauing had two sonnes by her called D. Sancho Fernandes, and D. Garcia. His bodie was interred at Compostella, in Saint Iames church, where as his mother D. Berenguela the Empreffe did lye.

D. Sancho the
2. King of Portugal, first of that name.
Leon.
Fernand King of Leon puts away his wife

D. Alphonso the 9. of that name, the 27. King of Leon.

22 AT the time of his death, it seemed there remayned no cause of quarrell, betwixt Leon and Castile, which was not decided and ended. His sonne D. Alphonso beeing troubled with continuall stormes and quarrels by his mother-in-law D. Vrraca Lopes, was retired into Portugall: so as at the time of his fathers death, he was absent, but being aduertised thereof, he came presently to Leon, where he was receiued and crowned king, without any contradiction: The King of Castiles Councillors were of opinion, that by the death of D. Fernand, their Prince had a good oportunitie offered, to bee reuenged of the wrongs which were done him during his nonage. If he had then any desire of reuenge the future euents will shew.

D. Alphonso
King of Leon

D. Alphonso surnamed the Noble, reigning then in Castile, was numbred for the 4. of that name, of those that raigned alone in Castile, whose posteritie was very great; for he had eleven children by Queene Elenor, daughter of England; the eldest was Queene Blanche, mother to the king S. Lewis of France: the second D. Berenguela who was queene of Leon, daughter to D. Alphonso the ninth. The 3. was a sonne named D. Sancho, who died in his Infancie: the 4. was D. Vrraca, Queene of Portugall, married to D. Alphonso the second of that name surnamed the Grosse: the 5. child was Don Fernand, who died also young: the sixt was D. Malfada, dead in Salamanca and was not married: the 7. D. Constance Abbess of las Huelgas de Burgos, a Monasterie built by her father. Then had D. Alphonso, and D. Elenora two daughters, who died young: and successfullie the Queene was deliuered of another daughter, called also Elenor like her selfe, who was wife to Don Iayme, or Iames, first King of that Name, and the eighth King of Arragon.

Castile.
Genealogie of Castile.

F f

In

was betwixt them; and perswaded him to separate them: but this Princeesse being thus retired, retired in great disdain into Portugal, where she liued the rest of her daies in the Monasterie of Ronces, built by her. The third daughter was Donna Sancho, a Nunne in the Monasterie of Saint Francis of Alanguer, built by her. The fourth, Donna Blanche, Lady of Guadalajara in Castile: and the fifth and last was D. Berenguela, who was not married, but did accompany her eldest sister Donna Theresa, when as she retired to the Monastery of Lorban: This King D. Sancho had familiarity with two Gentlewomen after the death of his wife: the first was called Donna Maria Aires of Fornello, by whom hee had one daughter called Donna Prieta; and D. Martin Sanchez of Portugall, who was Governour of the frontier of Portugall, and a great fauourite to Don Alphonso king of Leon his brother-in-law: he married Donna Olalla Peres, daughter to the Earle D. Pero Fernandes de B Castro. Don Sancho did marrie this Gentlewoman his friend, to a knight called D. Gil Ras- quez de Sonca, and tooke a second friend, whose name was Donna Maria Peres de Ribra, whom he loued much, and by her had Donna Theresa Sanchez, who was wife to Don Al-
phonso Telles, founder of the towne of Albuquerque, and had also one sonne called D.
Ruy Sancho of Portugall, and another daughter Donna Constance Sanchez, who built the Monasterie of Saint Francis at Coimbra. D. Ruy Sancho was slaine in a battaille neere U- ro Porto: so as the king D. Sancho had in all fiftene children; nine lawfull, and sixe B- ards, whereof there were seven sonnes and eight daughters. After the decease of his father, having raigned about foure yeares, when as they began to treat of a League against the King of Castile, whereof we haue made mention, certaine English and French ships being arrived at Lisbone, with many Knights and souldiers, which went to the holy Land, by the Streight of Gibraltar, being stayed there by foule weather, hee made vic of this occasion, and intreated these passengers to assist him at the siege of Silues, in the countrie of Algarbe: and about the same time there arrived eighteen other ships of war, which his brother-in-law Philip Earle of Flanders sent him, with which forces hee tooke Sylues, and did great harme vnto the Moores of that countrie. It was at that time when the Emperour Frederick Barbarossa, king Philip Augustus of France, and Richard king of England, called Corde Lyon, made their voyage into the East, that this towne of Silues was taken from the Moores, by the helpe of these strangers. This King Don Sancho built more townes, and peopled more countries then any of the kings of Portugall, whereby he purchased the name of Poblador, which is as much to say, as Builder, or peopler of Townes: Valencia of Minio, Torref-nouas, Monte Maior the new, Batellas, Penama- cor, Sortella, Penella, Figueira, Couillana, Folgacino, and Montemor, were his works, and with many other places; part of the which hee gaue to the Orders of Saint James and Auis, which began in his time in Portugall: to Saint James hee gaue Alcacar de Sal, Pa- mela and Almada: and to that of Auis, Valeillas, Alcanebe, Geromegna, Alcantade and Alpedrin, with the castell of Mafra. He recovered Yelbes from the Moores which they had taken from Portugall.

Castile.

An. 1194.

Port of Na-
uarre betwixt
Logroño and Nagera.

25 D. Alphonso king of Castile, against whom (as wee haue sayd) the other foure Christian Kings of Spaine had made a League, had not yet beene much annoyed thereby in the yeare 1194: wherefore hee thought rather to vndertake some warre against the Moores, then to defend himselfe against his neighbours, of whom he made shew to haue so little feare, as he would not leaue any thing which he had taken, or that were in con-trouersie: nay, he built a towne betwixt Logroño and Nagera, the which he called Na-
uarret, to the which he gaue many liberties and freedoms, as appears by his letters granted in an assembly at Carrion, in the yeare 1095. Notwithstanding all this, the Con-federats did not stirre: but Histories make mention, that D. Sancho furnished the Strong, king of Nauarre, who had newly succeeded his father Don Sancho the Wife, being deceased the yeare before 1194. and he of Leon, allyed themselves with the King of Castile, for the warre which he intended against the Moores of Andalusia: to beginne the which he sent for Chiefe and General of his armie, D. Martin Arch-bishop of Toledo, a Prelate much esteemed by the Historiographers of Spaine, by reason of his great vertues, honoured among others by Don Roderigo his successeur, who termes Don Martin Stok, the Diademe of the Church; his wisdom & prouidence, the peace of many; his tongue
 the

A the reformation of discipline, his hands, the releefe of the poore, and his armes, the persecution of Blasphemie, with other such Spanish elegancies, saying in the end, that the Church was happie which had such a Pastor: these are his very words. This Arch-bishop finding armes the fittest meanes to propagat the faith of Christ, made so furious an entry into Andalusia, as he left horrible marks throughout the whole Prouince, where he filled all with murder, ruine, fire and desolation, and then returned triumphantly, being laden with great and rich spoiles: but this expedition being suddenly made against the Moores, did afterwards bring more miserie and dishonor to the King and his Estate, then it had done profit or honor vnto the Bishop, who had shewed more rage and fury, then valour, reason, or warlike discipline.

B 26 The Arch-bishops exploit, did so incense Aben Joseph King of the Arabians, (bee-ing solicited by the Moores of Spaine) as hauing with great speed leuied a mighty armie of Africane Arabians, yea out of the regions neerest vnto the Negros, hee passed the Streight, and came into Andalusia, where he ioyned with the Moores of Spaine, and marched beyond the mountaine which they call Sierra Morena, against the Christians. King Don Alphonso the Noble, being aduertised of this great preparation, was come to lodge at Alarcos, a fort at that time (by reason of the situation) of great Importance, whether all his vassalls and men of warre of Toledo, Extremadura, and Castile came, where hee also attended supplies from Nauarre and Leon. The Moores marching with all speede, approached neere vnto Alarcos, the Christians campe being but weake, hauing not all their forces together: yet seeing the Moores collours flying in the ayre: the king Don Alphonso, and his Knights resolu'd not to keepe themselves within their rampars & trenches, but to charge the enemy valiantly, to the end they might haue the honor of such a victorie: but it fell out otherwise, for being come to handie-strokes, the lesser number, which were the Christians did valiantly, but the Moores being the greater, vanquished, and slue many braue men: among the which D. Martin Martinez the fourth master of the holy Knights of Calatrava dyed. The King D. Alphonso being sore wounded, saved himselfe by flight. The losse of this battaille was the losse of Alarcos, and of many Christians that were within it, who fell into the Moores hands, as many other Townes and strong places did, the Infidels seizing vpon the whole countrie, euen vnto the Ports of Yebenes, which is within fixe Leagues of Toledo. There are to be seene at this day, markes of this battaille, and of other encounters in those quarters, betwixt Ventas of Darasutan and Sa- bataile, in a plain called Maranga, where there are infinit heapes of stones, and many cross-ses, shewing, that in former times, there had bin much blood spilt in those places. Some charge D. Diego Lopes de Haro, saying, that he retired out of the fight too soone: others say, that hee did it expressly, and led many Knights of Castile with him, being discontented for that the King had compared the knights of Extremadura with them: saying, that they were as good horse-men, and did fight as well as the Castilians. Others accuse the king and his capitaines, that he made too great hast to fight, and had not attended the Naugarrois and Leonois, who were vpon the way, and made hast to ioyne with him: so as the fault of the one and the other, both of King, Capitaines and Knights, was to seek their owne glorie, and not that of God, nor the profit of the common-weale; and the best excuse they had, was, that they shewed themselves more valiant then wife. The kings of Na- uarre and Leon, being aduertised of this defeat, were not much troubled: for he of Na- uarre (without passing any farther) led his men home into his countrie, and the king of Leon sent backe his, the which did much discontent the king of Castile: for they abandoned him at his need, whereas if they had aduanced, they might haue stayde the Conquest, ruines and spoiles, which the Moores made after the battell: yea hee noted the little Ioue, and bad alliance of the King of Nauarre, who being entred into his countrie, would not vouchsafe to visit him, knowing that he was sicke of the wound, which he had receiued in the battaille. Don Alphonso king of Leon came to Toledo to see him, although hee loued him not much better then the king of Nauarre. All this hee dissembled for the present, and reserved the reuenge till a conuenient time.

Moores.

Defeat of Christians neere unto Alarcos.
1195.

D. Sancho the 21. King of Nauarre, the eight of that name.

27. THis King of Nauarre, which led succors to D. Alphonso of Castile, was Don Sancho the Strong, sonne to D. Sancho surnamed the Wise, who had succeeded his father, in the year 1194. as we haue sayd, hauing reigned three and forty years, seuen months and some dayes, he is interred at Pampelone, in the Cathedrall Church. This D. Sancho the sonne, at his comming to the Crowne, was aduised to proceed politiquely with the King of Castille, vntill he were well feded: and therefore King D. Alphonso, did build at his owne pleasure, the towne of Nauarret, in the country of Rioje, the which was disputable betwixt them, and vpon the frontier of Nauarre: the surname of Strong, was giuen him for his valour, but they did also call him the Retired, for that in his latter dayes hauing a Canker in one of his feete, (which made it to swell, and put him to great paine) he shut himselfe vp into the castell of Tudele, and would not suffer any to see him, nor speake to him but his ordinarie seruants. This was the 21. King of Nauarre in number, and the eight of that name, descended by the masculine line from the first King D. Garcia Ximenez, the which had continued in successors males 518. yeares, sayling in him by the death of the Infant D. Fernand his sonne, who dyed before his father.

*Deeds of the king D. Sancho
the Strong for the good of the Common-weale
and Religion.*

This Prince was much esteemed for his vertue, valour, Iustice, and gouernement, so as the Nauarrois held, he was the best King that had reigned ouer them. Among other testimonies he left of him, he turned the course of the riuer of Ebro, the which did runne by Mirepoix, and made it passe by Tudela, a towne which he did loue and frequent much: the which he did beautifie with a collegiall Church, of a fayre building: and richly indowd it: he fortified the places of his frontiers towards Castile and Arragon, and built new forts, as the castell of Treuigno, in the Prouince of Alaua: he enlarged the towne of Victoria: and in Rioje, la Garde, and Saint Vincent: and towards Guienne, (which the English then held) he fortified the towne of Saint Sebastian, and Fontenay in Guipulcoa, but it was for another. As for religious buildings, besides the Collegiall Church of Tudela, he made for his sepulcher, S. Mary the Royall at Roncevaux, a Colledge of Chanoines, and moreouer the Monasteries of Saint Mary de Hitero, and Saint Mary de Oliua, both of the Order of Cisteraux, whose abbots haue a place and voice, in the Estates of Nauarre, the which the Prior of Roncevaux hath in like manner, yet he was not very liberal, but in case of necessitie and workes of piety: wherefore hee gathered together greater treasures then any King in Spaine. By this his sparing, it may be, he lost the Prouinces of Alaua and Guipulcoa, which were ioyned to Castile. The iurisdiction of Nauarre was neuer so much restrained, as during the raigne of these two kings, Sanchez the father and sonne.

*Kings of Navarre & Leon invade Castile
A.D. 1196.*

This king of whom we speake, gaue himselfe occasion to Don Alphonso the Noble, to take armes against him: for seeing him much troubled to keepe his countrie from inuasion of the Moores, who were growne proud by their late victorie, and that hee kept his bed wounded: hee thought it now a fit time to recouer his lands of Rioje and Bureua, which his aduersarie kept from him: wherefore hauing layd a plot with the king of Leon his allye and confederate, he attempted warre against D. Alphonso the Noble, and entred into Castile in the yeare 1196. putting all to fire and sword, especially in the countrie of Soria and Almazan. D. Alphonso king of Leon, aduancing also into the Prouince of Campo did worfe, for he brought in the Moores of Extremadura, with whome hee was in League.

Arroz:

There is no doubt but Don Alphonso king of Arragon would have been a partaker in this Invasion of Castile, if death had not prevented him in the same year 1196. He died in Perpignan, having reigned three and thirty years, eight moneths, and some dayes, and was buried in the royal Monasterie of Poublette, which he had founded: whose sonne and successor Don Pedro, thought it more safe to leaue the alliance of the kings of Nauarre and Leon, to ioyne with Castile, in whose defence and preferuation he employed himself faithfully.

A faithfully againſt the two others : fo as D. Alphonſo the Noble ; had by this ſupport, meanes to ſtay the furie of his enemies ; and to keepe his countrey and frontier townes.

During these quarrels amongst Princes, the Clergy was not idle; for the same yeere D. Roderigo Bishop of Calaoorra, desirous to see the church of Saint Dominike de la Cal-fada (which Temple he had caused to be built) made an Episcopal seat, would needs place Chanoinns there: which caused great troubles; for this seemed an attempt against fa-thor Lopes: Abbot of the Monastery of Saint Mary the royal of Nagera, who pretended to be Bishop of Nagera. On the other side D. Roderigo maintained; that there was no other Bishop, having iurisdiction at Nagera, but hee of Calaoorra. The conten-tion was soe hot, that the King did commaund to embrace the cause, no other Bishop, having jurisdiction at Nagera, was able to resist the violence of the King, who was so much incensed by the rebellion, that he was great and drew neere vnto a scandale: but the King did so imbrace the cause, as information beeing made of the Abbots life and manners, hee was deputed by the Kings sentence from all Ecclesiasticall gouernment, and banished the realme of Calicut: this the King did by the aduice of the Bishops which held against the Abbot who being dislodged, was soone after followed by all the Monkes, whom the Bishop Roderigo chased away, not onely aspiring to the Episcopall title of Nagera, which was in this Monastery, but also to that which did belong vnto the Abbay: who in steed of Monkes, placed Chanoins at Saint Mary the royal: but the King disliking the violent course of this Prelat, restored the Monkes to their Monastery: and the Chanoins were removed to the church of Saint Dominike which was a signe of the future translation of the Episcopall see of Nagera thether, which was the marke whereat the Bishop of Calaoorra ayemed; but it was not so soone effected, remaying onely for the present a Colledge of Chanoins: for the which the Abbot and Monkes of Nagera, commenced sute against the Bishop of Calaoorra, the which continued long.

28 King D. Alphonso, being troubled by the Christians, armed and disarmed, both secular and Clergie; was also assailed in the yeere 1197. by the Miralmunin Aben Joseph, who came and laied siege to Toledo, causing his horfemen Moores, to runne as farre as Madrid, and Ahala de Henares, who ouer running the country, spoiled Ocagna Vcles and Cuenca, destroying all they found without the walles of townes and forts; but at that time the Arabians made other purchase, for seeing the strength of the city, and being aduertised of the great garrison and many Inhabitants which were within it, they returned into Andalusia by Alcaras, carrying with them an incredible number of Christians, of cattaille, and other spoiles: wherefore King D. Alphonso seeing himselfe freed from this danger, resolved to imploy the souldiars which hee had gathered together, and the alliance which hee had with D. Pedro King of Arragon, to bee reuenged of the Kings of Nauarre and Leon, who had spoiled his country during the troubles and calamities which he suffered by the Moores.

h, An. 1197.

Moore's Spoils
Toledo and Cassille

- D. Alfonso
King of Castille
in 1492
and Nani.

An. 1198.

The

The generall Historie of Spaine.

Lib. 10.

The Kings of Castille and Arragon, hauing not yet forces sufficient to resist so mighty an army, as that of Aben Joseph, kept themselves in the mountaines of Palomera about Auila, from whence they returned against the King of Leon, hearing that the Moores were dislodged, from whom they tooke Alba de Liste, and al that was in the way vnto Astorga, the which hauing ruined, they came & laied siege to Salamanca, but they tooke it not; only they spoiled and burned the country about it, and that of Alba de Tormes, carrying away the people, and leauing it desolate: in the end they tooke Montreal, and returned victors, finding not any one to make head against them. And such was the desire of King D. Alphonso, to bee reuenged of the Kings of Nauarre and Leon, as the better to effect his will, hee neglected the iniuries and spoiles hee had received from the Miralmunim, and made a truce with him: whereby hee gaue meane to this King of the Moores, to commit horrible cruelties in Portugal, in the yeere of our

An. 1199. Lord 1199.

Portugal.

The Moores
spoile & ruin
the.

This Realme of Portugal was at that time visited with many afflictions, for besides the spoiles committed by the Moores, there was an extreme famine, with a great plague, whereof many died for hunger, and many left their country, especially in the country of Braga and Porto; besides the Pope did interdict the whole Realme of Portugal, for the marriage of D. Theresa with the King of Leon her kinsman, the which was concluded without his dispensation, and therefore he would dissolue it. Aben Joseph hauing made a truce with the King of Castille, marched towards Portugal, where hee recovered Sylues in Algarbe and Alcazar de Sal; he ruined Cezimbra and Palmela, with other places, burning and spoiling all the champion country, and carrying away innumerable poore Christians prisoners. D. Sancho King of Portugal, could by no meanes resist this mighty Barbarian King, for beside the Moores forces, hee was prest by the warre of Leon: yet soone after he recovered Cezimbra and Pamela, and repaired them, but not in the same estate they had beene. The quarrel hee had with D. Alphonso King of Leon, was the breaking of the marriage of his sister D. Theresa; In this warre hee had better successe, it may bee, for that hee did affect it with more vehemency, beeing most commonly seene, that the hatred betwixt kins-folkes and allies is more violent, then that against strangers. He tooke by force from the King of Leon (beeing otherwise weak) the townes of Tuy and Ponteuedra in Galicia, which hee held for a time. After these things, the Miralmunim of the Arabians, beeing assured of the King of Castille, by the truce which hee had made with him, retired to Maroc in Affrike, thinking that the Moores of Spaine were sufficient to resist all the enterprises which might bee made by Portugal, Leon and Arragon.

D. Pedro the second of that name the seuenth King of Arragon, called the Catholike.

Arragon.

29 D. Pedro the new King of Arragon, tooke possession of his Realme, in the yeere 1196. by the death of his father D. Alphonso; hee was surnamed the Catholike, for that hee was too obedient to the Catholike church of Rome, and gaue much to Churches and Monasteries already built; hee built the Monastery of Escarpe, vpon the riuer of Cinca, of the Order of Cisteaux, not farre from Lerida. He had three sisters, the which were married during his raigne, as hath beene sayd. As for his brother D. Alphonso who had gotten the Earldome of Prouence, hee had to wife D. Mary Neece to the Earle of Folguaguier, from whom issued D. Raymond Berenger, who was Earle of Prouence after his father.

Marriages of
D. Pedro King
of Arragon.

There was an other Lady of the house of Folguaguier, who was married to the King D. Pedro, by whom hauing one sonne, called D. Raymond Berenger, she died soone after, and her sonne also: after which the King D. Pedro married the daughter of William, Earle of Montpellier, borne of that Princessse of Greece, which had beene made sure

Lib. 10.

The generall Historie of Spaine.

A to D. Alphonso his father. This second wife was called Mary; and for that shee was not very faire, he was soone wearie, and would haue put her away: but Pope Innocent the third then raigning, would not yeeld vnto it, for hee was a strickt obseruer and defender of the Ecclesiastical lawes. For this cause D. Pedro went to Rome, where the Pope did him great honour, and crowned him in the church of Saint Pancrace, with a crowne of gold, garnished with pearles and precious stones of great valour: where they say hee renounced vnto the Pope, the right of Patronage to the churches of his Realme, the which his predecessors had enioyed; and did so much forget himselfe, as to acknowledge his Kingdome to hold of the Pope, and to binde himselfe, and promise for himselfe and his successors Kings, to pay him a yeerly tribute of two hundred and fifty peeces of gold, called the Mahozemutins, of the name of the Miralmunim Aben Joseph Mahozemut, vnder whose coine they were stamped: these peeces were about six ryals, then current, to which acknowledgement the Noblemen of Arragon did not consent. The King being returned into his country he beganne to leade a dissolute life, and contemning his wife, he sought for those that were faire and pleasing vnto him, wherein hee wanted not men to follow his licentious appetite: wherefore the Queene his wife, who was verie holy, seeing that her husband, offended God, and that, not accompanying with her, it was to bee feared the Estates of Arragon and Montpellier would fall to a stranger, for want of issue borne of them, shee found meanes to abuse him with a commendable deceit: for vnderstanding by a groomme of his chamber, called Pedro Flaniam (who was sometimes a Minister of the Kings loue) that the next night he should bring him one of his Mistresses, shee wrought so with him, as hee brought her into the Kings chamber, in the concubines place, so as the King, (in this opinion) spent the night with her, but perceiving it in the morning, he was much displeased: yet considering the holy zeale of his Queene, and of those which had serued her in this action, hee was pacified, and tooke it in good part.

Submission of
D. Pedro King
of Portugal to the Pope.A commendable deceit of Queene Mary
of Hungary.

Soone after the Queene found her selfe with child, and at her time was brought in bed at Montpellier of a sonne, called D. Jaime, which they cal Diego in Castille, and Jaques in French, who was heire of Arragon and Montpellier, notwithstanding that Queene Mary had one brother by the fathers side, called William, who contended for the Earldome of Montpellier, and did often attempt to kill the Infant D. Jaime. This matter was long in question in the court at Rome, whether this Princessse went in person, as wel to oppose her selfe against her brother, as to end the processe which remained yet vndecided betwixt her and the King her husband, who fought stil to bee seperated from her by Hugo Tarrogia his Ambassador. There by the sentence of Pope Innocent, William was declared a bastard, and vncapable to succeed in the Earldome of Montpellier. After this sentence, the Queene thinking to returne into Arragon, fell sicke, and died at Rome, where she was buried, at the Vatican, in Saint Peters church, neere vnto the tombe of Saint Petronilla, daughter to Saint Peter as Authors write, and was put in the Catalogue of Saints. This Princessse had beene first married to the Earle of Cominges, by whom she had two daughters Mathilde and Petronilla.

Death of Queene Mary
of Arragon.

In the beginning of the raigne of this King D. Pedro, hee had a great quarrel with the Queene D. Sancha his mother, aunt to the Kings of Castille and Leon, for that the Kings Officers and Courtiers did not regard her as was fit, wherevpon shee seized vpon some townes belonging to her dowry. And for that it might breed great inconueniences, D. Alphonso the Noble, King of Castille, labored to reconcile them, for the which he and the King D. Pedro met in the towne of Ariza, where an accord was made betwixt the mother and the sonne, so as euer after they liued in peace. By this accord the townes of Ariza, Epila and Ambire, with their castles, were giuen by the Queene Dowager, vnto the King her sonne, and hee gaue vnto the Queene the townes of Tortose and Vzeon, with some other places in the principality of Cattelogne. There came to this assembly, D. Pedro d'Asagra, Lord of Albarrasin, who had beene much hated by the Kings of Castille & Arragon, but was then reconciled, of whom we haue made mention, this was in the yeere of our Lord 1200. at what time the marriage of D. Alphonso of Leon, and of D. Theresa of Portugal was dissolued by the decree of Pope Innocent the third, for that they

An. 1200.

Nauarre.

Descendants of the house of Champagne.

they were kinne-folkes in a degree which was prohibited by the church of Rome. 30 The house of Nauarre approaching neere its end, for want of heires males, it is fit we should prepare the Readers to the access which the descendants from women which are issued from it, haue had vnto that crowne, speaking some thing of the house of Champagne, into the which D. Blanche, daughter to D. Sancho the wife, and sister to this King D. Sancho the strong was married. The Earles of Champagne haue bene of great possessions in France, of an ancient and noble familie, as well of the house, as by their alliances and marriages with the greatest houses of Europe. In the nine hundred and ninth yeere, mention is made of Odon first Earle of Champagne, Brie, Blois, Chartres and Touraine, who was a turbulent man, and had great quarrels with Richard Duke of Normandy, whose daughter notwithstanding he tooke in the end to be his second wife: he made warre against Rodolphe or Ralph, the last King of Bourgogne, and was the cause why hee resigned his Scepter and crowne, to Conrade the Emperour, whose daughter Odon had taken to his first wife, and had Stephen and others by her.

This Stephen was Earle of Champagne, in the yeere of our Lord 1032. (after the decease of his father) and Lord of his other Estates by the succession of his brethren. Hee died in the holie warre in Syria, hauing begotten of his wife Ali or Adela, daughter to William the conqueror, Duke of Normandy, and King of England, Thibaud and other children.

Thibaud surnamed the great, was Earle of Champagne, in the yeere of our Lord 1101. hee did also enioy the Earledomes of Brie, Blois and Chartres, and was called the father of the poore; hee had to wife Mahault a Princesse of Germany of a great house, by whom he had Henry who was Earle of Champagne and Bry after him, in the yeere of our Lord 1151. besides other children.

This Henry surnamed the Big, the fourth Earle of Champagne, was in Asia with King Lewis the yong, and afterwards with Philip Augustus, where hee did great seruice to the cause; hee married Mary of France, daughter to Lewis the seventh called the yong; his first wife Elenor, Dutchesse of Guienne and Countesse of Poitiers, of this marriage it issued Henry and Thibaud, who were successiue Earles of Champagne one after another. Henry went to the warre of Asia, and marrying with the daughter of Almeric King of Ierusalem, widow to Conrad Marquis of Monterrat, was made King of Ierusalem, but returning into France, hee died without issue male. Wherefore his brother Thibaud the second of that name, seized vpon the country of Champagne, in the yeere of our Lord 1196. to the preiudice of the two daughters of the deceased Count Henry, and was the sixth Count Palatin thereof. It was this Thibaud which married D. Blanche, daughter to D. Sancho the wife, King of Nauarre, who had one sonne after the death of her husband, about the yeere of our Lord 1201. called Thibaud, as the father, who was Earle of Champagne and Brie, notwithstanding the pretensions of a sister, which was borne in their fathers life time, who contended for this succession, but in vaine. Moreouer by the death of D. Sancho the strong (of whom wee now intreate) without children, hee came to the crowne of Nauarre, by his mothers succession: A Prince greatly allied to the houses of France and England, whereof wee will treat more at large. But let vs returne to D. Sancho the strong, reigning at this time in Nauarre.

This Prince married with a French Lady, daughter to Raymond Earle of Tolouse the fourth of that name, who was called D. Clement: they hold that hee had not any children by her, wherefore, according vnto some Authors, hee left her, and married the daughter of the Emperour Frederic Barbarousse: notwithstanding this second marriage is doubtful: but as for the first, Garcia d' Eugui, bishop of Bayone, hath left in writing, that hee had one sonne named D. Ferdinand Calabasa, vho died in his fathers life time, with a fall of a horse, running after a Beare, and was buried in the Collegial church of Tudele. Hee had no other lawfull children, but mention is made of one bastard sonne, called William.

31 The ancient league of Castille and Arragon being reneued, betwixt the Kings D. Alphonso

A D. Alphonso the Noble and D. Pedro, they did arme to annoy the King of Nauarre, about the yeere of our Lord 1200. the which he foresceing, he sought to be supported by Ioraine Princes, and proceeded so farre, as hee did sollicit Aben Joseph Mazemut, to breake the truce which he had made for ten yeeres, with the King of Castille; some Authors affirming that D. Sancho went himselfe in person, into Affrike, to treat of the business with this Mahometan Prince: who notwithstanding that he would not breake his faith, yet hee presented him with a great summe of money and many rich Jewels. During his absence, the confederate Kings, entred by diuers waies into Nauarre (where hee had left for his Lieutenant General, a knight called Alphonso Fernandes of Guendulain) and tooke Ayuar and the valley of Roncal, which fell to the King of Arragon, and on the other side Miranda, and Insura, or Inzula, which places the King of Castille kept for himselfe, these two confederate Kings hauing agreed to diuide the conquest of Nauarre betwixt them: this was all they did for that yeere. As for the King D. Sancho, hee fell sicke on the waie of a pestilent feuer, the which in the end fell to be a canker in one of his feete, which continued with him all his life.

This indisposition being knowne in Spaine, it gaue courage to the King of Castille to pursue his good fortune, and to trie all meanes possible, to ioyne that Estate to his, presuming that the King D. Sancho (who had no children) could not liue long, and that he being dead, there should be no great opposition against him, for that D. Ramir, one of his brethren, was of the church, the other was young and absent, and the Earle of Champagne his brother in law, was either dead, or gone to the holy Land, but howsoeuer, hee was so farre off, as before hee should returne into France, to debate his title to the Kingdome of Nauarre, wherevnto hee had right, hee did hope to bee in possession.

Vpon this descigne hee leauied a new army, entred into Alaua, and ouerrunne all that Prouince, where in the end hee besieged the Towne of Victoria, the which was valiantly defended by D. Alphonso Fernandes of Guendulayn, who had put himselfe into it with many good souldiers of Alaua and Nauarre, and maintained the siege long, without any succors, or newes from the King D. Sancho, vntil that their victuals beganne to faile them. During this siege the Deputies of the Prouince of Guipuscoa, came to D. Alphonso King of Castille, making offer that if he would goe thither in person, they would yeeld vnto him, hauing long desired to bee vnited to the crowne of Castille, for that they were ouercharged by the Kings of Nauarre, whose fortunes they had followed seuentie seven yeeres. This offer was very pleasing vnto D. Alphonso, as a matter of great aduantage; wherefore leauing D. Diego Lopes de Haro to continue the siege of Victoria, he went in person to Guipuscoa, which Prouince put it selfe vnder his protection, and of the Kings of Castille, vpon certaine conditions, and deliuered into his hands the forts of Saint Sebastien and Fontaraby, with the castle of Velloaga, which is in the valley of Ojarzun, which frontierd vpon France, a fit place to assure him a passage, if need were, into Guienne, which was then held by the English, for that hee had married a Princesse of England. Besides these places they gaue him the castle of Athau, vpon the frontiers of Nauarre, which is now ruined, the castle of Achoros, Val du Leniz, and the castle of Arrasate, called at this present Mondragon, vpon the frontiers of Biscay, with the fort which was then built vpon the mountaine of Helosua, the ruines whereof are to bee seene at this day, which mountaine is in the Iurisdictiō of the towne of Vergara; and is otherwise called Ariznoa. Thus D. Alphonso King of Castille, obtained this prouince of Guipuscoa, without force, and so returned wonderfully content to the siege of Victoria, which sollicit D. Sancho their King, hauing spent all their victuals; who by daily messengers, did sollicit D. Sancho their King, aduertising him of their extremity; whereby they should be forced to fall into their enemies hands, if hee did not preuent it; but hee being ignorant of all that had past in his country, being absent, ill disposed, and without good countell, aduised them to yeeld vnto the King of Castille, vpon the best conditions they could.

Hauing receiued this answer, the besieged held out seuentene daies longer, attending if the King had not taken some better aduise, but seeing there came nothing from him

A Mahometan
Prince keeps his faith religiously.The King of Castille invades
Nauarre.Guipuscoa
yeilded to the King of Castille.

Victoria taken by the King of Castille.

him whereby they might hope of releefe, being extremely preſt with hunger and want of all things they yeelded the towne, the which for the ſituation and fortification was held impregnable. By the taking of Victoria, the King of Caſtile was maſter of that other Prouince of Alaua; the country of Araya yeelded vnto him; he tooke Irruina, Maragnon, Saint Croix and all the valley of Campeſo. King D. Alphonſo made this goodly conqueſt in the yeere 1200. part by force, and part by a voluntary yeelding, and did greatly diminifh the realme of Nauarre, although that ſome places ſubmitted themſelues againe vnder the obedience of the King D. Sancho, neither did the Prouince of Alaua euer receiue any law from Caſtile, except Victoria and Treuigno. To aſſure himſelfe the better of the Guipulcoans, and to gratifie them alſo, the King of Caſtile cauſed to bee re-edified vpon the ſea coaſt of that Prouince, the townes of Guetario and Morrico, the which hee did fortiſie, and indow with great preuiledges: after all theſe things, the King of Nauarre arriued at Carthagea, and ſlpt through Arragon into his country, bringing great treaſure with him out of Affrike, at what time D. Alphonſo had newly beſieged Eſtella, the which was freed from ſiege vpon the bruit of his coming, (ſo great power and reputation hath the name of a king that is preſent) but if he had ſtaied longer in Affrike his country of Nauarre had bene wholly loſt: hauing viſibly ſcene the great harme which the King D. Alphonſo had done him, hee ſent Ambaſſadors vnto him, to deſire him to reſtore him that which hee had taken from him in his abſence, againſt al law and iuſtice, and againſt the accuſtomed manner of making warre in that age full of loyalty: but the King of Caſtile entertained him with delaies and doubtfull anſwers.

Nauarre ſends
Ambaſſadors to Caſtile.

Caſtile.

32 Whiſt that D. Sancho conſiders of his loſſes, and of the beſt meanes to reſtaur him, the King of Caſtile great, mighty, and redoubted, being allied to him of Arragon, and hauing a truce for many yeeres with Aben Iſeph, hee beganne to reſtaur the ruines which the Arabians had made: he reſtored the city of Plaiſance, Bejar and other places of the country ruined: hee did the like to Mirabel, Segura de la Serra, Monſredo, Moya, and many other places of the realme of Toledo: hee alſo built Aquilar del Campe in Caſtile: and moreouer in Guipulcoa, hee built the towne of Caſtro d' Ordiales, Laredo, Saint Ander and Saint Vincent de la Barquera.

An. 1201.

Marriage betwixt Lewis of France and Blanche of Caſtile.

About the yeere 1201. there was a peace treated of betwixt John, ſucceſſor to Richard King of England, and King Philip Auguſtus of France, at Bourtauant in Normandy, by the which amongſt other Articles, a marriage was concluded betwixt the Infanta D. Blanche the daughter of D. Alphonſo King of Caſtile, and Queene Elenor, ſiſter to the King of England, with Lewis eldeſt ſonne to Philip, and heire of the realme of France: for the which, Ambaſſadors were ſent from both Kings into Caſtile, & they were made ſure by a Deputy for Lewis, in the city of Burgos, with great feaſting and ſtate, and the Infanta was conducted by the King her father, and other Noblemen of Caſtile vnto the frontiers of Guienne, where the Deputies for the French King did receiue her, for whoſe dowry there was aſſigned by King John her vncke, all the places which were in queſtion betwixt him and the French King, whereof the ſayd French King was in poſſeſſion, in the Dutchie of Normandy, Brittain and Aniou.

At the ſame time D. Alphonſo King of Leon, ſeperated by the authority of Pope Innocent, from D. Therſa of Portugal his wife, ſent to demande D. Berenguela, the King of Caſtilles other daughter: whereof (by reaſon of the diſcords which were betwixt theſe two Kings) the father made ſome difficulty, yet vanquiſhed by the perſwaſions and intreaty of Queene Elenor, who deſired as much to ſee her daughter weare a crowne, as a peace betwixt Caſtile and Leon, he yeelded vnto it, and theſe two Princes meeting to that effect in the towne of Vailledolit, the marriage was celebrated, aſſigning her for her dowry, the lands taken the yeere before from the king of Leon, except Carpio and Monreal, which remained to Caſtile. Of this marriage was borne the Infant D. Fernand, who ſucceeded in the Realmes of Caſtile and Leon. Thinke that the Popes diſpenſation was not obtained for this marriage: for being couſin germain remoued, children of the vnckle and nephew, Pope Innocent the third, did ſeperate them.

Caſtile.

In the yeeres 1202. and 1203. the ancient preuiledges granted by the Kings of Nauarre, vnto

A vnto Saint Sebaſtian and Fontarabie, townes of Guipulcoa, were confirmed and augmented by the Kings of Caſtile, and their iuriſdictions lymited, eſpecially of Fontaraby, by the riuers of Oriagun and Vidaſo, which diuides that Prouince from France, and by the mountaine Pegnadaya, by Legaca, by Belfa and the ſea; and by Hirun vranqu, which is at this preſent a great Bourgat at which time Queene Elenor was deliuered of her laſt ſon, who was called D. Henry, by reaſon of his grand-father by the mothers ſide.

To theſe contents was added a truce betwixt this King D. Alphonſo the Noble, and D. Sancho the ſtrong, King of Nauarre, for the concluding whereof, D. Sancho came in perſon, vpon aſſurance, to Guadajara in Caſtile, there it was agreed there ſhould be a ceſſation of armes betwixt the two Kingdomes, for ſiue yeeres, with reſtitution of ſome of thoſe places which the King of Caſtile had taken in Nauarre, and for the keeping of the truce, there were deliuered into the hands of certaine knights, named by both parties, the caſtles of Abueſio, Clauijo and Inuera, for Caſtile; and Iruirera, Inzula and Saint Adrian for the King of Nauarre: and for that the warre betwixt Nauarre and Arragon continued ſtill, the King of Caſtile tooke vpon him to reconcile them, and in the meane time cauſed al acts of hoſtility to ceaſe.

Theſe four Princes being at peace, he of Leon moued new troubles againſt D. Vrraca Lopez, his mother in law, with whom hee could neuer agree, ſeeking to fruſtrate her of her doury. And ſhe for her part did neuer ceaſe praſtiſing againſt D. Alphonſo, ſeeking to depole him from the royal throne of Leon, and to aduance the Infant D. Sancho her ſonne; for the which ſhe did continually importune her brother, D. Diego Lopez de Haro, Lord of Biſcay, intreating him to imbrace this buſineſſe, the which he had deſerred vntil that time, when as hee went to field to aide the Queene his ſiſter: but he was not the ſtrongeſt for D. Alphonſo King of Leon, being aſſiſted by the King of Caſtile, his father in law, chaſed him into Nauarre, from whence hee made roades into the territories of Caſtile, which made the two vnited Kings to goe and ſeek him in his owne ſtrength, where they defeated him in bataille, neere vnto Eſtella, where hee was forced to ſaue himſelfe, which towne was inueſted and, as it were, beſieged by the armies of Caſtile and Leon, yet they could not take it. Vpon this occaſion the four Kings of Caſtile, Leon, Nauarre and Arragon met together in Alſaro, whether alſo came D. Sancho, D. uager of Arragon, mother to the King D. Pedro, by the which the reconciliations and accords of theſe Princes were confirmed. D. Lopez being deſtitute of all meanes, hee retired in deſpight vnto the Moores pay at Valencia, and from thence to Maroc, where hee was accuſed to the counsell of the Miralmutin, that hee had mounted D. Pedro, King of Arragon, on horſe-backe, being ouerthrowne in an encounter, which he had againſt the Moores of Valencia, vnder whoſe pay D. Diego made warre, yet hee was abſolued.

Nauarre betwixt the King of Leon and his mother in law.

The pittifull death of the Infant D. Fernand, brother to D. Sancho King of Nauarre, a Prince well beloued of the Natarrois, ought to bee regiſtred amongſt the calamities which fell vpon that realme in thoſe daies. The feaſt of Saint Nicholas being celebrated with ſuperfluous bankets and ſports, in the yeere 1207. in the towne of Tudela, according to the cuſtome of Chriſtians, as this generous Prince did runne on horſe-backe armed, doing ſome exerciſes which hee had inuented, a hog paſſing through his horſe legges, made him to fall, in ſuch manner, as he bruſed his head againſt a pillar of ſtoane whereof hee died, thirteene daies after, being thirty yeeres old. Of this Prince, whom the Authors commend for a brave and valiant Knight, there is no mention made in the warre betwixt Caſtile and Nauarre: wherefore it is to be preſumed that the King his brother, doubting leaſt hee ſhould attempt ſome thing to his preiudice, during his abſence, had led him with him into Affrike, although hee loued him deere-ly. Thus are the affaires of this world mingled with pleaſure and grieve, loue and F iealouſie.

Nauarre.
An. 1207.

Death of D.
Fernand of
Nauarre.

Of the marriage which had bene made the yeere before, betwixt D. Alphonſo Infant of Portugal, ſon to the King D. Sancho then raigning, and D. Vrraca daughter to D. Alphonſo King of Caſtile, was this yeere 1207. a ſon borne called D. Sancho, as his grand-father by the fathers ſide, in whoſe life time this Lady was deliuered of an other ſonne,

G g

set downe. All these souldiars, were entertained, lodged and bountifullly rewarded A by the King D. Alphonso, according to euery mans ranke and dignity, giuing pay to all in general: to euery footman sixe pence a day, and to euery horse-man two shillings, which were worth a Marauidis and one third part of the money which was then current, and the boyes and women of these souldiars had pay accordingly, saith Gari-bay: the number of cartes to carry their baggage is made excessive, by the Archbi- shop Roderigo, reporting them to bee 60000. the which by others is reduced to the like number of beasts of burthen, and not of cartes. What soeuer it were, this army was one of the greatest which had beene seene in many ages, wherein the vnion and con- cord was admirable, seeing it consisted of so many nations, of sundry languages and humors. This armie parted in Iune, in the yeere of our Lord 1212. the conduct of the vltromontany, or beyond the mountaines (for so they called the strangers) was gi- uen to Diego Lopes de Haro Lord of Biscay, who was now reconciled to the King of Ca- stille, generall of the whole armie; they came to lodge at Malagon, about fourteene leagues from Toledo, the third daie; the place (being ill defended by the Arabians) was forced, and the garrison cut in peeces. From thence the Christian Kings adua- ced to Calatraua, which was come into the Moores power, and past the riuer of Guadiana.

Exploits of the Christians armes against
the Moores.

Many were of opinion, that they should not spend their time in the sieges of townes, where most commonly the best men are lost: notwithstanding the towne of Calatra- ua was battred, and so prest, as the captaine of the garrison, called Aben-Abir, or ac- cording vnto others Aben-Calis, after that hee had valiantly defended himselfe, yeel- ded vpon composition to haue their liues saued, the which was duly obserued by the Kings of Castille and Arragon, contrary to the strangers wil, who would haue had them all put to the sword. The Earle D. Diego Lopes de Haro, had the charge to conduct them to a place of safety, according to the composition. The towne was spoiled by the strangers and Arragonois, and then deliuered to the Knights of the Calatraua: at which place there grew some discontentment, by reason that their victuals for so great a multitude grew short, as it often happens, and therefore the greatest armies are not euier of greatest effect; for in an excessive multitude, there is euier confusion and disobe- dience, and it is impossible to provide for all necessities, so as often times many great preparations haue gone to smooke by these defects, and haue lost goodly occasions of gallant exploites: but God provided for it, for a great number of strangers, vpon this cause, returned into their countries, whereby the Spaniards purchased the more honor. The Archbishop of Narbonne with some of the nobility of his country and of the county of Poictou staid stil.

Great multitudes in armies,
are not euier of greatest effect.

D. Sancho king
of Nauarre
comes to aide
the King of
Castille.

The army parted from Calatraua, and came and camped at Alarcos, which place, being found abandoned, was manned with a good garrison; there D. Sancho King of Nauarre came and ioyned with the Kings of Castille and Arragon, bringing with him great troupes of souldiars, both of his owne subiects, and of other nations, especially of French, leauied by him, and voluntaries, being desirous to see this warre, hoping to winne honour and wealth if they liued, or dying to bee in the ranke of Martires, and to winne Paradice. The Histories make mention of D. Gomes Garces d' Agoncillo, stan- dard-bearer of Nauarre, D. Garcia Almoraid, D. Pedro Martines de Leet, D. Pedro Garces d' Aronis, D. Sancho Fernandes of Montagudo, D. Pedro Martines of Subica, D. Garcia of Milagro, D. Garcia Ximenes of Vartziz, D. William Roldouyn, D. Garcia Garces Martin of Milagro, D. Ximenes of Oilleta, and D. Ximenes d' Aybuar, chiefe Knights of Na- uarre, which accompanied the King of Nauarre to this warre, many forts and places uarre, which were held by the Moores in that countrie, were taken by the Christian Princes, who marched against Saluatierra, where they tooke a vew of their army, the which they lodged vnder the mountaine called Sierra Morena, at Guadalfajax: Aben Mahomad, who had succeeded his father Aben Ioseph Mahozemur, in the Empire of the Almo- hades of Affrike, being aduertised of this great preparation which the Christians made against him, and his sect, was past into Spaine, with great troupes both of horse and foote, being followed by other forces which came dayly out of Affrike into Andalusia;

A Andalusia; so as hee had gathered together about Iaen, one of the greatest armies that had beene euier seene since the first entry of the Moores, whilst that the Christian ar- mie was employed to recouer the country which lies betwixt Toledo, and the moun- taine which bounds Andalusia: the which the Moores seeing to bee lost they resolved to attend the Christians army in a place of aduantage, and to file the plaines, so as marching to Baeça, they seized vpon the passage of Lofa, in the fieldes of Tolousa.

The Christians (as it was the will of God) whilst their enemies were doubtful what course to take, past ouer the mountaine called Sierra Muradel, by safe and vnknowne waies, being guided by a huntsman and sheppard (whose Image is to bee seene in the great chappel of the Cathedral church of Toledo, cut in stone) and chased away some Moores which were in the castle of Ferral, neere vnto the rocke of Lofa, from whence after many difficulties and counsels, they made choise of a place fit to put themselves in battaille, as the Moores did in like manner. King Aben Mahomad, who lodged vpon a hill, where he might view his whole army, diuided into many squadrons; in that where the Kings person was were the most valiant Moores of the whole army, and they say hee caused that battailon to be compassed about with stakes, tied together with chaines, thus taking from them all hope of flight, they might be forced to fight with more resolution, hee himselfe was seated in a high throne vnder a rich pavilion, and in this equipage hee proudly offred battaille to the confederate Kings, the which (for that their men were weary with the rough and vneasey passage of the mountaine) they would not accept that day, which the barbarous King tooke for his aduantage, as if feare had kept the Christi- ans from fighting; writing to the chiefe townes of his dominions, that were neere, that he held the victory in his hands, and that within three daies hee should haue the three Kings his aduersaries at his command, notwithstanding that many of his captaines did assure him, that the Christians made shew rather to fight then to flie. The day following the Moores presented themselves againe in battaille, but the Christians kept themselves, within their forts and trenches: The 3. day which was the 16. of Iuly, both armies ioyned in battaille, where there was a furious fight, battailon against battailon, and squad- ron against squadron, with such obstinacy, as the victory was for many houres doubt- ful, euery one, both captaines and souldiers, struing to doe well, being seene and obser- ued by their Kings, and by the principal men of both parties; but in the end the Moores beganne to recoyle, and to goe to rout. Then did the Christians presse them so furi- ously as they put them to a shameful & lamentable flight & made an incredible slaugh- ter. King Aben Mahomad (being perswaded by his brother Aben Zeit) retired with great griefe, towards the towne of Iaen, there being no meanes to gather his troupes a- gaine together. The Authors of the Spanish History write (wherein it may be they ex- ceed) that there were 200000. Moores slaine vpon the place, and many prisoners taken, among the which they number about 35000. horse. Great was the riches they found in their campe, of tapistry, siluer plate, armes, horses, moyles, camels, gold and siluer coyn- ed, and other things of great price. Of the Christians, according to the Archbishop Roderigo, there died but 25. others say 113. but Beuter and other affirme, there were 25000. slaine of the Christians side; the which is not vnlikely, considering the resistance the Moores made, and the long time the fight continued. But it is a thing worthy obserua- tion, that notwithstanding the great multitude of dead bodies, which lying one vpon an- other, were like hills, after they had beene spoiled by the horse-boyes and peasants, there was little blood seene vpon the ground: the which is to be imputed to the dry configura- tion of the Arabians and Africans, Sothetie people, who (besides that they are dried vp with the heate of the sun in that region) eat those things which are of smal nourishment, and drinke nothing but water, so as they engender little blood, the which is pale & dis- coloured. The Kings performed the parts, not only of wise and circumspect captaines, but also of valiant soldiers. The constancy of King D. Alphonso was great, who was ne- uer seene to change colour, nor the countenance of an assured captaine, notwithstand- ing the diuers euents which we may thinke were represented vnto him in so dangerous a battaille; great was his valour and resolution, to expose himselfe to a shower of arrowes

Battle's memorable of Mur-
del and defeat
of the Moores.

Number of the dead.

which fel vpon his men, and to thrust himselfe into the presse, where hee saw they gaue A backe, to succour them: so as the Lords and Prelats which were in armes that day, had great labor to keepe him back, D. Pedro King of Arragon had his cuirasse pierced to the quicke, with a lance, but God preserued him. The King of Nauarre did also carry himselfe worthily; but there was a Chanoine Chanter of the church of Toledo, called D.
Mingo Piscal, who carried the crosse before the Archbishop D. Rodrigo (as it is the cu-stomes to carry before Primates) which did wonders: for hee past and re-past, and ranne through the Squadrons of the Moores with his crosse, and had no harme. The tombe of this Chanoine is to bee seene at this day, in Saint Lucies chappel, in the great church of Toledo. It is a pittie the Authors of these histories, haue not bene more iust vnto those valiant men which employed themselves that daie, to maintaine the Christians B estate in Spaine, and haue not written many particularities which happened during the fight, which should redound to the honour of families, and their posterities, and should serue as a spurte to generous mindes; wherein the Archbishop D. Rodrigo, is chiefly to be blamed, hauing bene present at that battaile. The victorious army pursued them that fled vntil night; and then they went to lodge in the enemies campe, where they found tents, victuals, armes and other riches in great abundance, & there they past the night, giuing thanks vnto God for such an important victory.

Diuision of the spoils after the battaile of Muradal.

Armeries of Nauarre, as
the Spaniards
report.

Then the King D. Alphonso thought it fit to diuide the spoiles, and to doe publicke honor, after the manner of the ancients, to those great personages, which had carried them valiantly in the battaile. He named for Iudge and distributor of these things, D. Diego Lopes de Haro, a Nobleman very expert in matters of warre: by whom the tent of the C Miralmumin of the Arabians was giuen to D. Pedro King of Arragon; the which was exceeding rich, yet others say it was allotted to the King of Nauarre for his part; to whom (for that hee with his men had first broken the fortification made with chains, about the Squadron where the great Miralmumin's person was in battaile) was adiudged all the bootie taken within the said circuit, in the which were many camels with their burthens; for which consideration some say, that the Kings of Nauarre carrie in their armes, chaines of gold in a field gueules. Of the rest of the spoiles which were sold without this fortification, there was a good part thereof giuen to the King of Arragon. D.
Diego Lopes did adiudge vnto D. Alphonso for his part, the honour of the victory, and to the other capitaines, knights and souldiers, what they could get. This diuision was allowed by the Kings and all the rest. Many haue thought that by reason of this victory King D. Alphonso tooke a castle Or, in a field gueules, which are the armes of Castille at this daie, inferring thereby, that the realme of Castille was a fort and assured rampar against the Moores, and Infidels their enemies; in whose blood the Tower seemes to bee planted, but there are priuiledges found in the treasury of Saint Dominike of Calçada
(the which Garibay reports that he hath seene) more ancient then this battaile, granted by this king, hauing a scale of lead like vnto the Popes, the which hath on the one side a castle; and on the other, the picture of a king on horsebacke, the which doth witness that before the battaile of Muradal, or Tolouse, they vsed this deuise, or blason in their armes; it is like that this King D. Alphonso vsed it first in his armes, but vpon what confi-deration, it is neither easie nor safe to iudge. The Christian Princes making vse of this happy victory, whilst the Moores were amazed and weake, tooke Bicles, Castro Feral, Bagnos and Tolouse: then they came to Bacca, which they found abandoned, the inhabitants hauing carried their wiues, children, and all they had to Vbeda, except some which were fortified in the Megida, the which they burned.

Then they marched to Vbeda, and tooke it by force, putting many of the Inhabitants to the sword, and making slaues of the rest, by the instigations of some Prelats which followed the army, the spoile whereof was giuen to the soldiars; the honor of the taking of Vbeda, is giuen to D. Lope Ferencio de Luna, an Arragonois; as they went on stil conquering vpon this sect of Mahumetists, it pleased God to stay the Christians army: for it began to be ful of diseases, the which in the end were contagious: wherefore these kings were forced to returne with their campe, and re-passing the mountaine, or Sierra More-na, by the same mount of Muradal, they came to Calatraua, where they found the Duke

A Duke of Austria, whose name was Thibaud sonne to Leopold, who being desirous to bee at this battell, was come into Spaine with two hundred Knights; but it was too late, wherfore he returned into Germany by Arragon: there the Kings parted with great shewes of loue. He of Arragon meaning to entertaine the peate with Don Sancho of Nauarre, with all sinceritie, he restored vnto him foureene castels and places of strength which he had taken from him. The King D. Alphonso being come to Toledo, where hee was receiued with great triumph by the Arch-bishop Don Rodrigo; it was obtained, that from that time the memorie of that great victorie obtained against the Moores, in the playnes of Tholousa; should be euery yeare celebrated on the sixteenth day of Iuly, vnder the title of Triumphus crucis, the which is obserued at this day, especially at Toledo; whertas they B hang vp and display that day in the great Church, many Guidons, Ensignes and Standards of the Moores, which had bene taken then, or others which do represent them. The chiefe men which did accompany the King in this battaile, were Don Rodrigo Ximenes Arch-bishop of Toledo, and Primate of Spaine, Don Rodrigo of Sigüenza, D. Tello of Palaenza, D. Menndo of Ofma, D. Pedro of Auila, D. Domingo of Plaisance, all Bishoppes, with other Prelates, all which did serue, either for counsell or for armes. D. Pedro Arias, or Arias, Master of the Order of Saint James, D. Rodrigo Diaz, master of the Calatraua, D. Gomes Ramires Prior of the Templers, D. Gutierrez or John Gelmirido Prior of S. John, with many Commanders and Knights of their Orders. Of Secular men; D. Diego Lopes de Haro, and his eldest sonne D. Lope Diaz de Haro, of whom it is written, that hauing some feeling, for that his father had absented himselfe out of Castile, after that he had fought at Estella against the king D. Alphonso, and also for that the losse of the battaile of Alarcos was imputed vnto him, he came and cast himselfe at his feet, a little before the battell, beseeching him to carry himselfe so well, according to the hope which hee had of him, that he might not be hereafter called the sonne of a traytor: wherewith the father being incensed, layed vnto him: It is more to be feared, thou wilt be called the son of a whore:
for no man will call thee the sonne of a traytor: which answer the father made vnto the sonne, as the Earle D. Pedro sonne to D. Denis king of Portugal writes in his booke of the Genealogies of Spaine, for that the mother of Don Lope Diaz, a woman of a weake brayne, being fallen in loue with a man of Burgos, which, they say, had bene a blackesmith, or Lock-smith, went out of Spain, and wandred through the world with this man, in a disguised habit. With D. Diego Lopes was also D. Pero Diaz his other sonne, D. Sancho Fernandez de Canamero, D. Martin Nugnes de Hinojosa, and Don Trigo de Mendosa, kinnesmen or allyed to the house of Haro: moreouer, the Earles D. Fernand de Lara, D. Aluar Nugnes de Lara, Don Gonçalo Nugnes, D. Lope Diaz de los Cameros, Ruy Diaz de los Cameros, and his brother Don Aluar Diaz, Don Pedro Arias of Toledo, Gonis Peres the Asturian, D. Garcia Ordóñez, John Gonçalo of Vzero, D. Gonçalo Gomes, D. Gomes Ma-rigues, D. Gil Manriques, D. Alphonso Telles de Meneses, and his brethren, Fernand and Ruy Garcia, D. Rodrigo Peres d' Auila, William Ginez, D. William Peres and his brethren, Nugno Peres de Gusman, Gonçalo Yuanes of Quintana, who was afterwards master of the Calatraua, Don John Gonçales, and Don Gonçalo Ruiz and his brethren, Don Ray Peres of Villalobos, Suero Telles, Don Fernand Garcia; and many others of the Realmes of Ca-stille and Toledo. Those which accompanied Don Pedro king of Arragon of greatest Nobilitie, were, Don Garcia Frontin Bishop of Tarassone, and Don Berenguer elect of Barcelone, with other Clergie men: and of Knights, Don Garcia Romeu, Standard-bearer royal of Arragon, Don Ximen Cornel, Aznar Pardo, Don William of Peralta, Don Michel of Luezea, D. Sancho Earle of Rossillon, vncle to the King, and Don Nugno Sanchez his son, Don Lope Ferrerch de Luna, Arnand of Alafcon, or Arsal of Atagon, William Aguillon of Tarragona, Don William of Cetrera, Berenguer of Petra Mola, Don William of Cadona, Raymond Foulques Earle of Ampurias, Don Pedro Abonet, Don Rodrigo of Liça-na, Don Pedro Maca, Don Ariorella, and Don Arsal de Fores. The Arch-bishop of Bourdeaux came out of Franco, and the Bishop of Nantes from Brittanie, D. Remold Archbishop of Narbone, and Thibaud of Blazon, Bishop of Poitou, issued out of Castile: There were many Noblemen and valiant Knights out of Leon and Portugal. Don Alphonso king of Castile did reward the Nobilitie of his countrie with honours and liuings; according to

Feet of Tri-umphus crucis
in Spaine, a monument of the victorie of Muradal.

Portugal.
Death of Don Sancho king of Portugal.

to euery mans degree. As for Aben Mahomad, King of the Moores Almohades, after this notable losse, he cared no more for the affaires of Spaine, but passed sodenly into Africke, fearing that the brute of his defeate would breed some innoation in his kingdom of Maroc, beeing not yet so well assured, but there remayned some feeling of the Almorauides gouernement: wherefore knowing how much a route or losse of a battaile may preiudice the reputation of a King, with a nation that is desirous of change, as the Arabians, he posted speedily into Africke to preuent it.

36 D. Sancho king of Portugall, whilst these things past betwixt the Christian Princes and the Moores, died in his kingdome, the which he had held 27. yeares, beeing 58. yeares old, more broken with trauell then with age: a wise and well aduised Prince, but much crost with aduersities, notwithstanding he gathered together great treasures, and therefore is somewhat taxed of couetousnesse, which is the greatest cause of the ruine and dishonour of kings. They write, that he had at the time of his death in the castell of Lisbon, and in the Monasterie of Alcabaça, Saint Croix of Coimbra, and other places where his treasure lay, about 500000. Markes of gold (it may be they should say Marauidis of gold) and a thousand foure hundred markes in siluer coyned, besides many other Jewels: and yet his expence was great. Drawing neere his end, he disposed thereof, giuing by his testament vnto his eldest sonne 200000. Marauidis of gold, and to either of his other three children 80000. Marauidis of gold, and 250. Markes of siluer, to his Bastards 7000. Marauidis of gold, and certaine Markes of siluer. The rest he ordained should be employed to charitable vses, as to build and indow Monasteries and Hospitals, to redeeme captiues, and to make Chalices, Crosses, and such like ornaments. He also ordained to haue the bridge of Coimbra, and the house of Saint Ladre, built, neither did he forget the Apostolike Romaine Sea, for he did bequeath vnto Pope Innocent the third, an hundred Markes of gold, and there was not any Church in his Kingdome, but tasted of his bountie. He was interred in the chappell of Saint Croix of Coimbra, neere vnto the Queene Donna Aldoncia his wife, from whence he was afterwards remoued into the Arch of the great chappell. In the same Monastery are buried D. Henry, D. Sancho, Donna Blanca, D. Berenguela, and D. Constance his children.

D. Alphonso the 2. of that name, the third King of Portugall.

1212.
Genealogie of
Portugal.

After him D. Alphonso his son held the scepter of Portugall, who was then about 27. yeares old, and was crowned in the city of Coimbra. And for that he was big, fat, and vnweldie of his person, they surnamed him the Grosse: he was already father of two children, D. Sancho, and D. Alphonso, whereof the second married Matilda, heire to the Earle of Bologne in France: besides these he had by his wife D. Vrraca of Castile, Don Fernand, who was Lord of Serpa, and married to the daughter of the Earle D. Fernand of Lara, of Castile, called D. Sancha Fernandes, from whom issued a daughter, which was Queene of Denmarke, into which Realme D. Elenor daughter to this king D. Alphonso was first married. Besides these lawfull children, the king had company with a Moore, of whom he begot D. Alphonso Martines. D. Alphonso at his first entrance, had great iars with his sisters, for that hee would haue taken from them the lands which his father had giuen them for their portions: whose quarrell D. Alphonso king of Leon did imbrace, and sent his sonne D. Fernand, accompanied by D. Martin Sanchez (brother to these Ladies) for his guide, being very young, with an armie, who took from the king of Portugall, Valencia of Minio, Melgaçõ, Hulgofo, and other places: this war was afterwards ended by the commandement of Pope Innocent, who threatened to censure the kings of Portugall and Leon, if they made not a peace, to take armes against the Moores, who were enemies to the true Catholike Religion: from whom, about that time, and as the armie of Castile was dissolued after the battell of Muradal, D. Pedro king of Arragon tooke Castellabid and Ademus, which are in the Realme of Valencia.

Arragon.

37 Wee haue sayd before, that this king had a sonne by his wife, vnthought of, who was called Iaime, this Infant was much enuied, and his life sought by his Vncles of either side, who wished there had issued no heire from Don Pedro and Donna Mary Countesse of Montpelier, that they might haue succeeded to their Estates: a murtherous and couetous desire, which did chiefly possesse Don Fernand Abbot of Montarragon. Wherefore they did breed vp Don Iaime carefully; and as much as they could out of danger: the king his father was aduised to send him into France, to be kept by some Noble man his friend, where hee might be more safe then in Spaine: wherefore hee gaue him to Simon Earle of Montfort to bring vp, in whome he had great confidence, but hee abused him: for warre beeing attempted against the Albigeois, in the which the Earles of Tholoufa were engaged, Don Pedro king of Arragon, and the Earle of Montfort grew enemies, and were in armes one against another, the Earle beeing made Generall against them of Albi, and their adherents: and the king Don Pedro fauouring the Earles of Tholoufa, father and sonne, who had married his sisters. The euent was, as the Histories of Spaine report, that the Earle of Montfort (who had conceived a great hatred against the Earles of Tholoufa) hauing then great forces from the French king, vnder colour of making warre against the Albigeois, which were fallen from the Church of Rome, hee entered in hostile manner into the Earles countrie, whereof the king of Arragon beeing aduertised by his brother-in-law, hauing vntill then taken part with the Earle of Montfort, in this quarrell of the Albigeois he turned against him, hauing first aduised him, but in vaine, and caused the Pope to admonish him, that vnder the pretext of warre against the Albigeois, who were declared Heretickes, he should not reuenge his priuate quarrels. D. Pedro beeing passed into France, and meaning to beseege Symon of Montfort in the castle of Muret, which place he meant to abandon, there happened a furious skirmish among them, where as the king of Arragon was slaine vpon the place, and with him Don Acnar, and Pedro Pardo, father and sonne, Don Gomes de Luna, Don Michel Luesia, Michel Rada, and many other Noblemen of Arragon: the Earle of Montfort retired safe with his men. Such was the pittifull end of this King Don Pedro, in September 1213. hauing reigned happily, and in great reputation, eightene yeares, three moneths, and 20. dayes: his bodie was carried to the Monasterie of Sixena, founded by the Queene his mother. The Albigeois warre continued, the end whereof you may see in the Histories of France. They were people which opposed themselves against the Popes Supremacie, and humane inuentions, brought in to the Christian Religion, taught first by one called Amaury in the towne of Alby, and thereabouts; against whom the Pope incensed Christian Princes.

D. Pedro king
of Arragon
slain in France 1213.

In this action Dominicke a Chanoine of Osma did great seruice to the Romish Church, beeing brought into France, by D. Diego his Bishop, whom the Pope did send his Legat for that effect. The Vniuersitie of Paris did also condemne the opinion of the Albigeois: but Dominick relying not much vpon disputations and reasons, perswaded all Princes and their subiects to armes, as beeing the most expedient meanes, for the which he was canonized, and put in the catalogue of Saints. It was he which brought in the Order of preaching Friars. Our French Histories say, that Don Pedro fauoured the Albigeois; and yet those of Spaine giue him the title of Catholike. In his time beganne the Impost for Beeues and other cattell in Cattelogne, which was after his returne from the battaile of Muradal, as well by reason of the great expences of the warre, as for the great summes disbursed, for the marriages of Don Pedro's three sisters.

Dominicke of Osma author of the Order of Iacobins.

Don Iames the first of that name, the eighth King of Arragon.

38 Don Iames, or Iaime his sonne was then in the power of the Earle of Montfort in the towne of Carcasone, the which did much trouble the Arragonois and Castellans, who laboured all they could to haue their Prince, but it awayed little: wherefore Pope Innocent the third was forced, at the sute and instance of the Estates of Arragon and Cattelogne, to send a Cardinall, called Peter of Beneuent, into Languedoc, to whome the Councell of S.

John delatran under Innocent
the third.

Processe for the Primacie
of Spaine.

great concourse of Prelates from all parts of Christendome. Whither there went D. Roderigo Ximenes Arch-bishop of Toledo and Primate of Spaine: the Arch-bishop of Braga, the Bishop of Vic, and other Prelates of Spain. There were about 300. at this assembly, which did exercise chiefe dignities in the church, besides others innumerable of all estates, they did chiefly treat of the meanes how to uphold the Christians estate in Palestina, or the holy Land: then of the rights of Patronage and reception of fruites and reuenues of Churches by lay men. The Archbishoppe Don Roderigo preached with the Popes leaue, in the assembly, very learnedly in Latin, according vnto those times: and for that that language was not well vnderstood by all that were there present, he expounded the substance of his Sermon in Italian, Germane, French, English, Castilian, and Biscain, or Nauarrois which was his naturall tongue, for the which he was much commended and esteemed, as Garybay saith, next to Doctor Blaz Ortiz, which done, and the Councell freed of the affaires which touched the generall of Christendome: the Arch-bishop D. Roderigo complaind of the contumacie and disobedience of the Arch-bishops of Narbone, Tarragone, Braga, and Saint Iames, who would not acknowledge the Primacie of Toledo: to proue the which he produced many priuiledges of the holy Apostolike see, especially of these Popes, Vrbain, Gelasius, and Honorius the 2. Lucius the 3. Adrian the 4. and Innocent the 2. granted to the Church of Toledo, and the Prelates thereof, as Primates of Spaine. He alledged many ancient Councils celebrated in Spaine, and iustified the equitie of his cause, by many ancient Histories and authentical Records. The Pope desired to heare the parties interrested: wherefore the Archbishop of Braga being present, answered for himselfe: for him of Tarragone who was absent, the Bishop of Vic, one of his Suffragans presented himselfe, both which denied the Primacie. They of Narbonne and Saint Iames were excused, being absent. And for that the Archbishop D. Roderigo Ximenes was prest to returne into Spaine, the processe remained for that time vndecided, yet he obtained from the Pope many great prouisions, which were both profitable and honorable, as to be Legate of Spaine for ten yeares, with power to make legitimate to the number of three hundred, with other ample faculties: right to choose and establish Bishops in all the townes which should come into the Christians power, and that the Church of Seuille in that case should acknowledge the Primacie of Toledo, without any sute: and that the Arch-bishop thereof should dispose of all other Ecclesiasticall dignities, in places conquered, or to be conquered. This Archbishop D. Roderigo Ximenes, hath written the Historie of Spaine in Latine vnto his time, and in like manner that of the Moores or Arabians since Mahumet.

The end of the tenth Booke

The

THE ELEVENTH BOOKE of the Historie of Spaine.

The Contents.

- C 1 Troubles for the government of Castile, during the minority of the King D. Henry the first. Insolencies of the Lord of Lara.
2 Pretensions of the house of France to the Crowne of Castile.
3 D. Fernand the third of that name, ninth king of Castile, who was also the 30. of Leon.
4 Moores in Spaine fall from the Miralimumins, or kings of Affricke, diners petty Potentates of that Sect erected in Spaine.
5 Warre betwixt the king of Leon, and him of Castile father and sonne.
6 The Order of Monkes of S. Dominicke: the first planting of them in Spaine.
7 Separation of the Knights of Alcantara, from them of Calatraua, and their habit.
8 D. Raymond Berenger Earle of Prouence, of the house of Cattelogne, his marriages and children.
D 9 Order of Merced, instituted in Arragon.
10 Order Seraphique of the Monkes of S. Francis.
11 Peopling of Monkes of this Order in Portugall, S. Anthonie of Padoua a Portuguez.
12 D. Sancho Capello, the fourth king of Portugall, second of that name.
13 Warre of the Castilians against the Moores.
14 Aben Mahumet king of Seuille.
15 Conquest of the Ilands Baleares, by D. James king of Arragon, the first of that name.
16 Re-union of Leon with Castile, by the death of D. Alphonso the ninth, under Don Fernand his sonne aboue-mentioned.
E 17 Title of the Kings of Ierusalem, vsurped by the Kings of Naples, and why.
18 Impatience of Thibaud Earle of Champagne, by the which D. Sancho king of Nauarre, his grandfather, is moued to make an vniust accord with the King of Arragon.
19 Thibault the first of that name, 22. King of Nauarre.
20 Zeit Aben Zeit King of Valencia, becomes a Christian.
21 Expedition of Don James King of Arragon, against Zael Tyrant of Valencia a Moore.
22 Exemption of Cattelogne, from the Soueraignty of France by accord.
23 Exploits of the Castilians against the Moores of Andalusia, and the taking of Cordoua.
24 Beginning of the Realme of Granado, by Mahumet Aben Alamacar.
25 Raigne of Thibault King of Nauarre, his marriages and manners, his voyages into Affricke.
F 26 Conquest of Valencia by D. James King of Arragon.
27 Vniuersitie of Salamanca instituted by Don Fernand king of Castile 28 Realme of Marcia gotten by the King Don Fernand the third, and his other exploits against the Moores.

H h

29 Raigne

- 29 Raigne of D. Sancho Capello, King of Portugall, and the receiving of his brother Don Alphonso Earle of Boullen.
 30 Learned men first admitted into the Councell of Castile, the bookes of the law, called las siete partidas, Chanceries, and courts of Parliament established.
 31 Seige of Senile, and taking thereof, death of the King D. Fernand.
 32 Death of D. Thibault king of Navarre.

The Continuance and Descents of the Kings of Spaine
mentioned in the eleuenth booke.

Castile and Leon.
9. D. Fernand. 3-30.
united the 2. Realmes.

Portugal. | Navarre.
4. D. Sancho. 22 Thibault I.
Capello 2.

Granado and the beginning under
1. Mahomet Aben
Alhamar.

Troubles during the minority of D. Henry king of Castile.

The young king delivered into the hands of them of Lara.

HE Arch-bishop D. Roderigo Ximenes being returned into Castile, found the affaires wonderfully troubled by the praefises of D.
Fernand Nuges de Lara, D. Aluar Nuges, and D. Gonçalo Nuges, his breethren, sonnes to the Earle D. Nugno de Lara, who (as their fathers and Vncles had done during the Nonnage of the king
D. Alphonso the Noble) would haue the person of the young king Henry in their custodie, by which means they should haue all au-thoritie and prerogatiue in the gouernement of the state. These Noblemen, who were great and mightie, wrought so, as they had what they pretended, by the meanes of Garcia Laurens, who had the gouernement of the Prince, and in whom the Queene Regent did rely much. They corrupted him by gifts and promises, so as hee counselled the Queene D. Berenguela, and caused the Prelates, and other Noblemen of the Realme to allow thereof, that the king should be put into the hands of these Noblemen of the house of Lara: whereunto Don Roderigo Ximenes the Arch-bishop did also consent, so as they did homage, and did sweare faith and loyaltie in the hands of the Q.
Regent, not to attempt nor change any thing in matter of State, were it in peace or war, without her counsell and consent, whom they should honor and respect, as it was fith: they should defend her, her estates and goods in all occasions, vpon paine to be held guiltie of high treason. These promises being made by the Lords of Lara, the king D. Henry was delivered into the hands of the Earle D. Aluar Nuges: but they did not performe what they had promised, for as soone as they saw themselves seized of the Kings person, and therefore reuerenced and feared, they began to pursue many great personages and rich men with all violence, so as some were forced to flie. Moreover, falling vpon the liberties, goods, and reuenues of the Clergie, they made their profit of them: whereupon they were excommunicated by Don Roderigo Deane of Toledo, Vice-gerent or Substitute to the Arch-bishop, the which did reclaime them from these insolencies, especially against the Clergie and Churches, whereof they promised to become Protectors.

But

- A But for that it is a hard matter to restraine great men, when they are once giuen to tyranny, these Earles of Lara turned against lay-men, which enioyed spirituall liuings, whom they did vex and spoile of their reuenues, so as they grew odious to all sorts of men, and they began to be moued, and to repine much at their excess. D. Aluar who had beene newly made Earle of Auila, called an assembly of the Estates in the Kings name at Vailledolit, whither came certaine of his confederates, great men of Castile: but D. Lope Diaz de Haro, sonne to D. Diego Lord of Biscay, D. Gonçal Ruiz Giron, and his breethren, D. Roderigo Ruiz, D. Aluar Diaz de los Cameros, and Don Alphonso Teles de los Alenescos, with many other Noblemen of the Kingdome, detesting this tyrannie, exhorted the Queene to complaine of the extorsions, miseries and calamities, which the people and whole Realme suffered by their meanes: according to which aduice, she did write to the Earle Don Aluar Nuges, putting him in mind of the faith and homage which hee had sworne to her, and admonishing him to gouerne better: wherewith D. Aluar being incensed, he did all the wrong he could vnto the Queene, and in the end dispossest her of all that the King her father had left her for her portion, yea he grew so insolent, as he commanded her to depart the Court; the which this poore Princeesse was forced to do, retiring with her sister D. Elenor, who was yet a mayd, to Oreilla, where they remayned vntill the death of D. Henry their brother. This violent contempt was not concealed from the young King, who began to complaine, demanding to be deliuered againe vnto the Queene D. Berenguela his sister, but it was in vaine: for he himselfe being forced and resisting all he could, was led from place to place, as it pleased the Earle Don Aluar: and which was more, he was forced by him to marry D. Malfada Infanta of Portugal, daughter to the King D. Sancho, without imparting it to the Prince, nor to the Princeesses of the bloud; not to any but to his owne faction: which marriage hee beganne to broach at Palencia, where they were made sure, and suddenly being come to Medina del campo, hee caused them to lye together, whereat the Queene D. Berenguela was so moued (being not made acquainted with this treaty) as she wrote vnto Pope Innocent the third, aduer-tising him that the married couple were so neere akin, as according to the ordonances of the Church, they could not be ioyned together without scandall, by whose meanes the Pope did separate them: whereupon D. Malfada (who was a very faire Princeesse) returned into Portugal very much discontented, as well for the breach of the marriage, as for that Don Aluar would presume to marrie her, the king D. Henry being an infant. They were cousins in the fourth degree by an vnequall line, wherof the Infanta had the better. Some Authors report it after this manner, that the Queene D. Berenguela hauing sent one to Maqueda, where the king was, to carry him newes of his Estate, the Earles of Lara hauing intelligence thereof, caused him to be apprehended and put in prison, and hauing counterfeited letters, to some priuate men of base condition, from the Queene, as if she would haue proceured them to poyson the king, they caused this prisoners processe to bee made, who was for that cause hanged: yet not any one did beleue, that euer the Queene D. Berenguela, would practise such a trecherie, but held it to be a fraud, deuised by the Earle D.
Nugno, and D. Aluar his sonne. Wherefore the Inhabitants of Maqueda beganne to mu-tine, which made the King and his Gouernors to go to Hueté: where being arrived, a Knight called Roderigo Gonçales of Valuerde, who had charge from the Queene D. Berenguela, to steale away the king. Don Fernand de Lara layed hold of him, and carryed him prisoner to Alarcon.
- This made the Earles of Lara to keepe a more streight guard about the King, whome they conducted to Vailledolit, and there beganne the warre against them, which held the Queenes partie. Montalegre in the which Don Suer Teles Giron remayned, was besieged and taken: and then ouer running and spoyling the country, Don Aluar de Lara, chiefe of this warre, came to Cartion, then to Villana of Alcor, who hauing suddenly surprized Don Alphonso Teles de Meneles, without the fort, being ill accompanied, his men vnthorsted and disarmed some of Don Alphonso's troupe, and thought to take him prisoner, but he fled into the fort being wounded, where hee was besieged by the King in person, and the Earle Don Aluar, but not able to take it, they retired to Palencia, where the king was lodged in the bishops Pallace.

Factions in Castile.

D. Aluar de
Lara spoiles D.
Berenguela the Queene Regent of her authority and
estate.

Marriage first made of the K.
D. Henry.

ciuit warre in Castile.

H. II. 2

All

All things (say they) past before the marriage, which was then concluded in Palence. A
 It being accompanied, the king would go against D. Lope Diaz de Haro, and passing by Burgos, whereas his sister the Queene D. Berenguela was, he went on, and did not see her, and so came to Calaoorra, which fort was taken by Garcia Zapata, from Ruis Diaz de los Cameros, and his brother Aluaro Diaz. The king being afterwards returned to Burgos, the Queene his sister began to write, and to sollicite the Pope to dissolue this marriage, which was the cause why D. Aluaro dispossessed her of her lands & reuenues, vnder the kings name and authoritie, which she could not resist. Moreouer, the Historians say, that Don Aluaro did pursue a second marriage for the King D. Henry, with Donna Sancha Infanta of Leon, daughter to Don Alphonso by his first wife D. Theresa, by the which it was agreed that after the death of the king D. Alphonso, the king D. Henry should succeed him in the Realme of Leon, and in the meane time he should giue vnto his father-in-law, the vse and possession of Saint John de la Mota, whereof a Knight called Sancho Fernandes should bee Gouvernor, and answerable for it: the Earle D. Aluaro thinking to fortifie himselfe with the support and fauour of the king Don Alphonso, by the granting of this place, although he repented him afterwards, giuing him in exchange Tiedra in stead of S. John, and aboue 10000. Marauidis of gold, all to annoy the Queene D. Berenguela, and to disinherit the Infant D. Fernand of Leon his sonne and heire to the Realme, who was with her: for Tiedra did belong vnto the Queene, who was constrained to giue the place vnto the king Don Henry her brother, who demanded it. And then she sent the Infant D. Fernand vnto the king of Leon his father: which done, she retired to Orellana, and the king to Palence, from whence D. Gonçalo Nunes de Lara, brother to the Earle D. Aluaro, was sent with good troupes of horse and foot, against D. Lope Diaz de Haro, who was towards Miranda of Ebro well accompanied: but as they were readie to fight, certaine religious men came betwixt them and parted them: so as the Earle D. Gonçalo returned to the king and D. Lope vnto the Queene, who was soone after beseege by the king her brother, and the Earle of Lara in Orellana, but not able to take it, they left it to go to Frechilla, where they razed the houses of D. Roderigo Gonçales Giron, and then they returned to Palence.
 The Queene had in the meane time sent to demand succors, from the king of Leon, sometimes her husband, the which he granted, but the seege being raised, there was no neede to send any. These things are written by many Authors very doubtfully and diuersly: how fouer it were, the realmes of Castile and Toledo did indure much miserie by the wicked and tyrannous gouernement of the Earles of Lara, the which had an end by the suddaine and miserable death of the king D. Henry, whom they held in their power, and whose au-thoritie they did abuse impudently. This young Prince being at Palença, lodged in the bishops pallace, as they suffered him to play with certain young children of Noble houses, who serued him and were about the same age, sporting with them freely, and more inconsiderately then was fit for one of his quality: one of them whom they hold to bee of the house of Mendoça, cast a tyle from the top of a tower, which falling vpon the couering of an house, beat downe another, the which fell vpon the kings head, wherewith hee was so grieuouly hurt, as he dyed the eleuenth day after, in the yeare 1217. hauing rained two yeares, nine moneths, and 15. daies, in great trouble: his bodie carried to Burgos and layed in the Monasterie of las Huelgas, nere to his brother D. Fernand, where they do euery yeare vnto this day, make an aniuersarie for his soule. Such was the end of D.
Henry, by the which D. Berenguela recovered her authoritie, and reigned with her sonne
 D. Fernand, the which she had by Don Alphonso king of Leon, by the diligence and force-fight of the Noblemen of Castile, fearing lest the French should leaze vpon the Realme, by reason of the pretenfions of the Infanta D. Blanche, the eldest daughter of Castile, maried into France, to Lewis sonne to Philip Augustus, who was mother to the king Saint Lewis.

Death of D.
Henry king of
Castile.

Interst of the king of France
to the crowne
of Castile.

D. Fernand F

A

D. Fernand called the Holy, the ninth king of Castile, and third of that name.

THE death of the King Don Henry, was very grieuous to the Earles of Lara, who sought to keepe it secret for some dayes, but it was in vaine: for the Queene D. Berenguela was presently aduertised, who instantly dispatched D. Diego Lope de Haro, and D.
Gonçalo Ruis, to Toro in the countrie of Leon, to bring the Infant Don Fernand, who was there with the King his father. And for that she feared lest the King Don Alphonso of Leon, being aduertised of this death, should attempt something vpon the Realme of Castile, the Ambassadors had charge to conceale it, and to saue that the Queene was stil molested, and readie to be beseege by her enemies, vpon which pretext they should demaund the Infant her sonne with some succors of souldiers, the which the Ambassadors did wisely effect, bringing D. Fernand to Orellana, where hee was proclaimed king of Castile, Toledo, and Nagera in the open field, vnder an Elme, by the Noblemen which were there present: and presently marched towards Palencia, where as the King, the Queen his mother, with their whole traine, were receiued with great honour by Don Tello the Bishop. From thence they came to Duegnas, which place they were constrained to force, so as the warre began to grow hote: which the Prelates and Noble-men of the countrie laboured to prevent, but in vaine: the Earle D. Aluaro refusing to quit his authoritie, and to lay downe armes, vntill he had the person of the new King Don Fernand in his power;
 as he had had that of D. Henry: but the memorie of his bad gouernment distasted euery man: so as they were so farre from satisfying his desire, as they were all ashamed to haue beene so ill aduised, to giue the authoritie and gouernement of the Realme, to such violent persons as them of Lara: wherefore they sought how to haue the king obeyed by Armes, to the great ruine of the countrey. The King and Queene-mother past on with their troupes to Vailledolit, and so to the riuer of Duero: from thence they went to Coca, where they shut the gates against them: wherefore they came to Saint Iust, where they receiued two aduertisements: the one was, that they should not go to Auila nor Segouia: the other, that the Infant Don Sancho Fernandes, brother to Don Alphonso king of Leon, borne of D. Vrraca Lopes was comming against them with a mightie army:
 whereupon they turned backe towards Vailledolit, where they found some alterations against the Queene and her sonne, practised by them of Lara, whom by her wisdom she pacified. There hauing assembled the Noblemen which had charges and dignities within the Realme, she intreated them to aduise what was fit for the peace and publike quiet, offering to do any thing which they should counsell her. They who knew her to be a wise and discret woman, were of opinion, that she should raigne as lawfull heire of Castile:
 but she desiring more the good and greatnesse of her sonne, then her owne, renounced the royaltie, in the presence of them all, & resigned it wholly vnto her son Don Fernand, the which was a worthy act, and commended of all men. Whereupon the King was conducted vnto the Church of Saint Mary the great, and there with a generall applause and consent was confirmed King, and the oath taken of either side, the King being scarce se-uenteene yeares, whose raigne was happie and full of all good.

4 The Moores of Spaine, subiect to Aben Mahomad, Miralumin of Affricke, seeing themselves destitute of his ayde and support, after the losse of the Battaille of Muradal, (as it doth often happen after such inconueniences and losses) grew to haue a bad conceite of their King Mahomad, and did beleue, or made shew to beleue, that the battaille was lost by his fault: wherefore all such as had any charges and gouernements revolted and erected many petty Kingdomes in Spaine. Among them, the first and chiefe was the Miraluminis owne brother called Zeit Aben-Zeit, who by others is called Zetta Buzzeit, who leazed vpon the towne of Valencia, & the Iurisdiccions therof. A cousin of his called Aben Mahomad, when as the Christians army, infected with the plague, returned into Castile,

H h 3

Castile,

Fernand the third proclaimed king of Castile.

Moores.

The Arabians
in Spain reiect
the Miralumi-nins of Affricke.

Gouverneurs Monks make themselves Lords of their governments.

1217.

Castile.

The King of Leon enters with an armie into Castile against his son
D. Fernand.

D. Aluaro de Lara takes whereof followed a peace
in Castile.

Castile, seized upon Baeça, who had the cittie of Cordoua also at his deuotion, with many other places in Andalusia, and on the confines of Toledo; whom many Moores followed, for that he was descended by masculine line from Abdelmon, the first king of the Almohades, and came of Abdalla one of his sonnes: these two had yet some colour to hold that which their grandfather had conquered in Spaine. But at Seuille there did rise a mightie Moore, called Aben Lalle, vnder whose power the townes of Ecchia, Carmona, Xeres, and others of Andalusia did subiect themselves. In Murcia and Granado, there was one named Aben Hut, made himselfe King, beeing of the race of those Moores which had raigned in Sarragossa. In this sort the other Moores made themselves masters of townes and Prouinces in Spaine, where they had bene set for Gouvernors, all which did enter into league with the aboue-named as the mightiest, giuing an end in Spaine to the Empire of the Almohades, and Kings of Maroc, two and fiftie yeares after the passage of Abdelmon. This was the last diuision betwixt the Moores of Spaine and Affricke, the which were neuer more vnited vnder one Crowne, notwithstanding that there haue many times troupes and armies past out of Affricke into Spaine against the Christians, to succor those pettie Kings of the Moores which raigned there, whereas the Kings of Maroc might hold some sea-townes and forts giuen them by the Kings of Granado, to fauour their descents: yet they neuer after had any great power nor Empire there. From these new erected estates, which were not yet very well vnited, the King of Castile (as we haue sayd) had taken the strong citie of Alcaraz, and he of Leon, that of Alcantara, in the yeare 1213. Since a truce beeing made betwixt the Christians and Moores for some yeares, these Infidels had leysure to settle themselves, and to fortifie their places.

In the yeare 1217. Don Masheo Bishop of Lisbon, beeing leader of the armie of Portugal, tooke from them Alcaçar de Sal, beeing assisted by strangers, which were going into Syria, and by the Prior of the Templers, and Prior of Saint Iohn. These strangers were English, French, and Flemings, hauing a fleet of an hundred sayle, beeing moued therunto by the admonitions and decrees of the Councell of Saint Iohn de Latran, held by Pope Innocent the third, which was the fifth expedition made by publike decree and Councell, by the which Andrew king of Hungarie was named Generall of the Christians armie in the West, notwithstanding Iohn Earle of Brenne went in his place.

Returning to Castile, the young king Don Fernand, his mother, and all the Castilians, were much troubled after they had chosen him, for that the King D. Alphonso his father, beeing discontented that D. Berenguela had by policy gotten away his sonne, and seemed to distrust him, and withall being desirous to vnite that realme to his of Leon and to be called Emperour of Spaine, he came into Spaine with a mightie armie: whereupon they sent Don Maurice Bishop of Burgos, and Don Domingo bishop of Auila to beseech the King not to disquiet his sonnes Realme, of whose good he should bee rather glad then sorrie: but he was thereby incensed the more. King Don Alphonso marching on as farre as Burgos, spoyling all where he past, found the citie well garded by Don Lope Diaz de Haro and other Noblemen, who were well accompanied: wherefore seeing there was no meanes to enter, he returned, doing all the harme he could. About this time the Queene D. Berenguela, parting from Vailledolit, came to Palencia, whereas the Noblemen about Segobia and Auila came to offer her their seruice. The Castilians beeing freed from the feare of King Don Alphonso, the new Kings army was ledde to Mugron, where the battery was begun: during the which the Queen returned to Burgos, to the funeralles of her brother Don Henry, the which by her Order were very stately. Mugron beeing taken, and the Queene come to the campe, with the souldiers which were at Burgos, they marched against Lerma and Lara, which places were taken by force. Beeing returned to Burgos, the army was led along the riuer of Oja, whereas the townes of Villorado, Nagera, and Nauarret yeelded vnto the King, but not their castles. In the meane time the Lords of Lara, laboured to make a generall rebellion against the king, so as the Princess: being forced to return to Palencia, there was an incounter vpon the way, where D. Aluaro was taken and led prisoner to Burgos, who was afterwards deliuered vpon condition that he should yeeld vnto the King, all the places and garrisons which were held and maintained by his men at arms, belonging to the Crowne, especially Amaya, Tariego, Cerezo

A Cerezo, Villafranca of the Mountaines of Oca; the tower of Vilhorado, with the castles of Nauarret, Nagera and Pancoruo, the which was done: D. Fernand his brother did also yeeld Castroxeris, and Orcejon. By this meanes there was a peace betwixt the king and the Noblemen his subiects whom hee receiued into fauour, suffering them to hold their Offices and Governments: but it was a peace of fixe monthes onely, for seeing themselves out of credit, they rebelled againe, against whom the king sent some troupes, which forced them to retire to Leon: By reason whereof the warre reuiued betwixt Castille and Leon, but not too hotly: for there was presently a truce made, the Earle D. Aluaro falling sicke, whereof hee died at Toro, hating first made a vow to take vpon him the habit and order of Saint Iames; wherefore they buried him at Vcles. Presently after D. Fernand de Lara his brother retired into Affricke, where hee was well entertained in the court of the King of Maroc; but hee died soone after, hauing caused himselfe to be carried to a Bourge inhabited by Christians, called Elbora, neere vnto the city of Maroc. Drawing neere his end, he tooke vpon him the habit of the Order of Hospitalliers, thinking it would serue to mitigate his offence, in which habit his bodie was carried into Castille, and buried in the Commanderie of Pont de Hitero, in the Bishoprike of Palencia, by the care of Donna Major his wife, D. Fernand and D. Aluar his sonnes.

6 This age brought forth new Orders of religion, contrary to the precedent Orders of Monks; for whereas these could not bee satisfied with temporal wealth, which was giuen them by Kings and Noblemen, as it were in emulation one of another, those rejected all riches, making profession to be poore, and not to possesse any thing. The first was that of the preaching friars, which are called Iacobins in France, the Author whereof was that Chanoine of Oisma, which came out of Spaine into France, with his Bishop, to maintaine the authority of the church of Rome, against the Albigeois and their adherents, being pronounced heretikes by Pope Innocent the third, as we haue sayd: the vow and profession of this Order was, to preach against those which should stray from the faith. This Order was allowed and confirmed by Pope Honorius the third: Dominike was borne at Calaruega; and not at Calaroga, nor Calahorra; it is a Bourgin in the Diocese of Oisma, betwixt Aranda of Ducto, and Saint Domingo of Silos, and is at this day a Monastery of Nunnes of that Order, the which was built by King D. Alphonso the eleventh, or last of that name, where they doe shew his fathers house and the font where he was baptized.

The confirmation of his Order was presented by him, in the yeere 1218. vnto the King D. Fernand; hee himselfe hauing obtained it at Rome; and in truth the sea of Rome is much bound to these preaching friars, who haue bene one of the chiefe supporters thereof, the King D. Fernand as an obedient sonne to the Pope, receiued the Order and the Author with great reuerence, and caused the Monasteries of Saint Croix of Segobia, and of Saint Domingo the royal at Madrid, to bee built. Dominike dying some time after at Bolonia, Pope Gregory the ninth, did canonize him, in the yeere 1223. there were other friars of this Order Canonized by Popes, as one Manes, Gil, Anselme, Pelagius and Michel.

7 At the same time the Knights of the Order of Alcantara were diuided from that of Calatraua, beeing alike, and subiect vnto it, from which time they had their distinct maisters. D. Alphonso King of Leon, who had instituted this order, was a meanes that Alcantara, with all that this order did hold in the realme of Leon, was giuen to Saint Iulian del Pereiro of Portugal, which was of the same order of Cisteaux, vpon condition that the maister and Order of Pereiro and his successors should remaine vnder the obedience, and be subiect to the site of the Maisters of Calatraua. So in the yeere of our Lord 1219. this order had it's beginning and distinct maisters. Their habit was first a hood, and the Nouices at this day carry a hood of white serge or flamine, and when as they receiue the communion, euery one weares a white cloake. Since they haue taken a greene crosse, in fauour and at the instance of D. Fernand Infant of Castile, sonne to Iohn the first, who was afterwards King of Arragon, in the yeere 1411. as shalbe sayd. Such was the deuotion of that age, ferul of such things.

D. Fernand

Death of D.
Aluar and D.
Fernand de
Lara.

Order of preaching friars.

An. 1218.

Conuents of the Order of Saint Iohnnike built by
the King D.
Fernand the 3<sup>d</sup>.

An. 1219.

Habit of the Knights of Alcantara.

D. Ferdinand
King of Castille
marries the Emperour of Germany's daughter.

An. 1220.

Arragon.

Contentions in
Arragon.

Raymond Ber-
enger Earle of Provence
father to five Queenes.
8

D. Fernand King of Castille, being freed from D. Aluaro, and D. Fernand Nuges de Lara, which did trouble his realme, he began to raigne in peace; and being now of age fit to be married, the Queene D. Berenguela his mother, with the aduice of such as shee knew to be faithful, began to treat a marriage in Germany, with Beatrice, daughter to the Emperour Philip, and cousin to the Emperour Frederic the second King of Naples and Sicile. The Germans say, that she had beene married to Otton Duke of Saxony, who was Emperour after Philip; so as she must of necessity haue beene a widow. To this effect D. Maurice Bishop of Burgos, and D. Pedro Abbot of the Monastery of Saint Peter of Arlanca, with the Prior of the Order of Saint Iohn were sent Ambassadors wel attended, who concluded this marriage, notwithstanding that they held them foure monthes without any resolution: this Princeesse was sent into Spaine through France, whereas Philip Augustus, then rainging, did her much honour throughout his whole realme, causing her to bee conducted vnto Guipuscoa, from whence the Noblemen of Spaine which were deputed to receiue her, conducted her to Victoria, whereas the Queene D. Berenguela met her, and did accompany her to Burgos: this Princeesse did please D. Fernand, for she was exceeding faire. Three daies after her arriual, the King was made Knight, and did arme himselfe in the Monastery of Las Huolgas, and then he married D. Beatrice the last of December 1220. Of this marriage issued many children, whereof the eldest was Alphonso, who succeeded in the two Realmes of Castille and Leon: the second was D. Frederic, the third D. Fernand; the fourth D. Henry, the fifth D. Philip, the sixth D. Sancho, the seventh and last D. Manuel. Hee had also two daughters, D. Elenor, who died and Infant, and D. Berenguela a Nunne in the Monastery of Las Huolgas.

The yeere following 1221. the marriage was concluded betwixt D. Elenor, the King of Castilles aunty, and D. James King of Arragon, who was then but thirtene yeeres old, which argues falsehood in some which haue written that this King before hee married this Princeesse, had contracted a secret marriage with D. Theresa Gil of Bidaura, daughter of D. Iohn of Bidaura, of whom hee begot two sonnes, the one called D. Pedro, who was Lord of Aierbe, and the other D. Iaime Lord of Xerica, the which hath no great ground in nature, considering the King was very young, and we must beleue that the acquaintance he had with this Lady, either as a spouse or a friend, was ten yeeres after, when he was diuorced from D. Elenor. He was in a manner constrained to make this alliance with Castille, hauing need of D. Fernands assistance, by reason of the troubles he had in his country, which grew through the bad and tyranous gouernment and ambition of his vncl'es: the which wee must relate and fetch farther off. This Prince had beene drawne, as wee haue sayd, out of the hands of Symon Earle of Montfort, and conducted into his realme of Arragon, where there was great contention betwixt the Estates, and the Earles of Roussillon, the father, and sonne to D. Fernand, and the Abbot of Montarragon, the Kings vncl'es, who in stead of gouerning the realme, would haue wrested it from him: notwithstanding by the fidelity of the Estates and their authority, together with the diligence of the Cardinal of Beneuent the Legat, right preuailed, and the Infant D. James was acknowledged for lawfull King at Lerida, as I haue sayd, where the Princes contending did not appeere. There were three Gouernors appointed, two in Arragon, which were D. Pedro d' Abones, and D. Pedro Fernandes d' Agra, whose Gouernments were distinct by the riuier of Ebro, and the third in Cattelogne.ouer all the which D. Sancho, Earle of Roussillon, was appointed superintendent. There it was also concluded, that D. Raymond Berenger, Earle of Prouence, a young Prince of nine yeeres of age, sonne to D. Alphonso, should be with the King, vnder the same tutors aboue mentioned, the which was put in execution: but the Earle soone after, about the yeere of our Lord 1216. escaped from them, and retired into Prouence, where hee married the daughter of Thomas Earle of Morienne, named Beatrice, who was mother of five Queenes.

To prevent the continual practises of the Earles of Roussillon, and of D. Fernand, vncl'es to the young King, it was resolved, about the yeere 1217. that hee should bee declared of full age, being then but tenne yeeres old, according vnto some, the which the Earle

A Earle of Roussillon did wonderfully contradict: yet after great contention, he quitted the Regency, in the yeere 1218. by the authority of the Estates assembled to that end at Tarragone, whereas the Earle receiued certaine places in fee of the King. At this time the authority of the Magistrate (called the Iustice of Arragon) was great, for the defence of the publike liberty.

The yeere following 1219. all the continent of Spaine was afflicted with a great drought (wherevnto it is very much subiect) as well through want of raine, as for that the springs were dried vp; so as there followed a great dearth, and pestilent diseases. These calamities were accompanied with troubles and ciuill seditions, by the rebellion of D. Roderigo Lizana, a man of great authority and power, who being incensed for some pretended wrongs against Lope d' Albero, hee surprized him in his house, and shut him vp in a fort of his, from whence the King deliuered him by force; his commandements, nor the decrees of his counsell preuailed nothing. D. Roderigo despayring to finde grace with the King, retired to Albarrazin, to D. Pedro Fernandes de Agra, whether they sent troupes of souldiers to besiege them, who could not force the place, being strong both by nature and art: notwithstanding D. Roderigo and D. Pedro Fernandes, acknowledging their fault, obtained pardon of the King. In these sieges they vsed an Engine of battery made at Huesca, which did cast great stones, making one hundred and fifty shot in a day and a night, with great ruine.

These things happened in the yeere 1221. whilst they treated of the marriage of the sayd King D. James, with D. Elenor of Castille, the Mediators whereof were D. Symon Cornet, William Cernaera, and William Raymond of Moncade, hee which married Garfinde, the heire of the country of Berne: for the accomplishing whereof, the parties met at A-greda, where they were made sure, and the contract of marriage drawne, greatly to the Queenes aduantage, from whence they went to marry in the city of Tarrassone. Of this marriage D. Alphonso was borne, who died before the father: This marriage was not firme, for being made without a dispensation from the Pope, being cousins in a prohibited degree, it was dissolved by Pope Honorius the second after some yeeres, and the Infanta sent home into Castille; yet some say that shee professed herselfe in the Monastery of Saint Mary de la Vega.

D 9 A little before this, King D. Iaime, had instituted the Order which they call our Lady of the redemption of prisoners, otherwise de la Merced, by the counsell of his confessor friar Raymond of Pegnasfort, or Rochefort, who set downe the rules for the religious of this Order, vnder that of Saint Augustine. Their profession and chiefe vow was to goe into the Moores country, to redeeme Christians that were prisoners, and if any one for want of money could not redeeme a Christian slaue out of the hands of an Infidel, and did see him by ill vsage in despaire or otherwise in danger to renounce the Christian faith, they were bound to put themselves in the slaues place, and to serue for him vntill they had paid his Maister the price agreed vpon, which was a rare charity. The first brother of this Order, was Peter Nolasco of Barcelona, or Francis according vnto some; who receiued the habit in the chiefe church of that towne, with great solemnity, in the yeere 1218. by the hands of friar Raymond the maister thereof, the King D. James being present. This habit was white, as they carry it at this day, with the armes of Arragon and Cattelogne, which are, a crosse argent, and foure bends gueules in a field Or. The Order was since confirmed, in the yeere 1230. at the request of the King D. Iaime and purchase of the master, D. Raymond of Rochfort, by Pope Gregory the ninth, he who confirmed the Order of the friars Mineurs, instituted after that of the preaching friars, by the Seraphicall father Saint Francis vnder the Order of Saint Augustine, but somewhat changed: the Author of this Order was wonderfully persecuted by the enemy of mankind, enuious (say the Spanish Authors) of the great good which should come vnto the Catholike church of Rome, by the erudition and piety of the religious of that Order. This father of Franciscan friars, came into Spaine, during the raigne of D. Fernand King of Castille, of whom wee write, who receiued him with great reuerence, and did build many goodly conuents of that Order, and by his example other Kings did the like.

Order of Merced.

Order of St. Augustin.
10

11 Five of the Brethren of this Order, not yet allowed nor confirmed by the Pope A (the which notwithstanding florished in Portugal, in the latter time of King D. Alphonso the grosse) were desirous to passe to Maroc, there to preach the faith of Christ, but they prospered not; for the King of the Arabians, offended with the habit, countenances, and importunity of these friars, slue them all with his owne hand, by reason whereof they were put in the ranke of blessed Martires, according to their Legend. Of this cruel execution was an eye witnesse D. Pedro of Portugal, brother to the King, who caused their bodies to bee brought to Coimbra, where they were buried in the Monastery of Saint Croix.

They say that these Monkes parting from Portugal, had prophesied to the Queene D. Frraca, that shee should die in the yeere of our Lord 1220. as it happened. In the B time of the same King D. Alphonso florished that religious man whom they call Saint Anthony of Padoua, who notwithstanding was borne at Lisbon; and for his great knowledge, according to the time, was called the arke of the holy Scripture. Hee being a Chanoine of Saint Croix at Coimbra, had so great a feruency to serue God, as he became a friar of the Order of Saint Francis, changing his name, which was Fernand into that of Anthony; hee was a Doctor and a professor in diuinity, and did read in the vniuersities of Toloufa, Bolonia and Padoua, where he died; of whom Portugal and all Spaine glory much. As for King D. Alphonso surnamed the grosse, hee hath not ministered much matter to write of his actions: for his raigne was short, and himselfe in disposed of his person. Hee died in the yeere of our Lord 1223, being but eight and thirty yeeres old, whereof hee raigned eleuen. His body lies in Alcouaga, neere vnto C that of the Queene his wife.

D. Sancho Capello the second of that name, the fourth King of Portugal.

Surname of Capello.

12 D. Sancho his sonne, called Capello, raigned after him. He was sixteene yeeres old when he began to raigne, & was crowned in the city of Coimbra. His surname D of Capello came by reason of the habits which hee ware wide and long, like a Clergy man. It may bee hee ware some great cap or hat, as the Portugals doe at this day, who will haue all their apparel very wide and easie, euen their buskins of Spanish leather, which are rustled downe to their heeles, saying that it doth not become a gentleman to carry them straight and smooth.

This Prince was more courteous, affable, and a louer of peace then was fit for a commander that will keepe his subiects in awe. Wherefore hee was contemned by his subiects, and held for a couard and base minded, so as they attempted many things insolently and audaciously, against all right or reason, without respect of Prince, or Iustice, the which was ill administrated in his time, his basenesse yelding to the malice E of his subiects. Hee married with D. Mencia Lope de Haro daughter to the Earle D. Lope Diaz de Haro, Lord of Biscay the fourth of that name: a Lady of great beauty and an excellent spirit, but not much pleasing to the Portugals, for the King tooke her, being a widow against their likings, and besides shee bare him no children: wherefore they vsed great meanes in the court of Rome to dissolue this marriage.

Amongst all the Kings of Portugal, as well those which went before, as which followed, hee onely was childlesse, for hee neither had lawfull children, nor bastards. D. Mencia Lopes did gouerne him in such sort, as no respect of the publike good of the Realme, nor the exhortations, intreaties, nor admonitions, made vnto him by the Noblemen, and religious persons, who were then much respected, neither yet any F other meanes whatsoever, could moue him to bee diuorced from her, wherefore they spake it publicly, that shee had bewitch'd him, what happened you shall vnderstand hereafter.

Returning

A Returning to the affaires of Castille, the King D. Fernand hauing solemnized his aunts marriage, after all the feasts and sports he found himselfe engaged in new troubles, procured by D. Fernand Ruiz Dias de los Cameros, who had newly crost himselfe to passe into Syria, to the holy warre; for the performing of which voiage, it may bee his purse was not very well furnished, wherefore hee beganne to taxe and spoile the Kings country, which was vnder his command, for these conclusions hee was cited to appeere in court, at Vailledolit, where hee did in some sort iustifie himselfe.

Afterwards being pricked in conscience for these outrages, being also by nature in constant, feareful, and with all ill aduised, hee absented himselfe, wherefore the King seized vpon all his goods. D. Fernand Ruiz seeing that they proceeded against him with B all rigour, fortified himselfe in certaine castles, from the which hee did much trouble the Kings affaires, so as in the end hee was forced, to compound with him and to giue him money.

By this accord, hee yeelded vp the places which hee held, and receiued foureteene thousand peeces of gold: After him Gonzalo Peres, Lord of Molina did rebel, being moued therevnto by D. Gonzalo Nagues de Lara, who beganne to ouerrunne and spoile those parts which lay neere his houses, like an enemy; not ceasing, for any admonitions or threats made vnto him in the Kings name, vntill that hee was forced to goe and besiege him in Molina; notwithstanding by the means of D. Berenguela the Queene mother, hee was restored to the Kings fauor, and the souldiers were drawne from before C Molina. But D. Gonzalo Nagues de Lara, who for feare of punishment was retired into the Moores country, demanding pardon also could not obtaine it: wherefore hee liued the remainder of his daies, which were but short, at Baeca in Andalusia, where hee died miserably, as his brethren D. Aluaro and D. Fernand had done, worthy in truth of great punishments, for their rash and seditious enterprises, being greater and more eminent then all the other Noblemen of the realme. The King being freed from this care, and the realme in some quiet, D. Maurice Bishop of Burgos, an English man borne, beganne in the yeere of our Lord 1222. to set his hand to the building of the great church of that city, according to the fashion wee see it at this day, the which was finished in his time. The Episcopall seat was before at Saint Laurence. The D Archbishop D. Roderigo caused them also this yeere to worke about the building of the chiefe Church of Talauera, the which was indowed with foure dignities, and twelue Chanons, and at the same time the Churches of Vailledolit and Olma were built by a Bishop of Olma, who had bene Secretary to the King D. Fernand. The church of Padron the Bishops lodging, and the bridge which is vpon Minio were also then built, by the care and charge of D. Laurence Bishop of that place.

It was also about the beginning of this yeere 1222. that D. Ramir Infant of Nauarre, brother to the King D. Sancho the retired, was made Bishop of Pampelone, of whose charity Authors write with admiration, that hee gaue all he had vnto the poore, and the more his riches did abound, the more hee gaue. E In all the time after the marriage of the King D. James, and D. Elenor of Castille, vnto the yeere 1228. when as the warre of Majorca was attempted, the realme of Arragon was troubled with continual seditions, procured by the Infant D. Fernand, the Kings vncke, being exceeding ambitious, who hauing entred into League, with D. Nugno of Arragon his cousin, sonne to D. Sancho Earle of Rosillon, D. William of Moncada (a little before enemies, but now growne friends, vpon this occasion) Pedro d' Ahones and others, tooke vpon him againe the Regency of the realme, by force, in the yeere 1223, and distributed amongst his fauourers and confederats the chiefe dignities of the realme, holding the King and Queene, in his power: but a while after the King escaped from Tortosa, and retired to Hucra or Horta, where hauing conferred with the Nobility, hee raised an armie, with the which hee entred the territories of the Moores of Valencia and Murcia being tired with ciuill tumults, so as hee forced Azebut or Zeik King of Valencia to promise him tribute, and in like manner him of Mureja, which was the fifth penny of their imposts. In this warre many commanders of the League, intermeddled, contrarie to the Kings liking. Amongst others, D. Pedro d' Ahones discontented

Fernand Ruiz, Diaz de las Cameross, a cousin and a rebel.

D. Gonzalo Peres
Lord of Molina, and
D. Gonzalo
Nagues de Lara rebel in Castille.

An. 1223

Nauarre.

Arragon.

Marriage of
the King D.
Sancho.

D. Pedro de Abenafian.

discontented that the King had made a truce with the Moores, sought to breake it, and did often lead troopes of souldiars into the territory of Valencia, spoyling all he found: so as the King hauing often aduised and intreated him to containe himselfe, but in vaine hee commanded they should take him prisoner, but D. Pedro seeking to defend himselfe, being pursued by the King and others, was slaine by D. Sancho Martinus de Luna, with a lance: the which did put all the townes of Arragon (being already infected) into open rebellion against the King: who marched presently with his army into the countries of Sobrarbre, and Ribagorça, whereas the houses, lands and subiects of D. Pedro were, the which he wasted all he could.

The townes of Saragossa, Huesca and all the rest, except Calatajub, followed the Infant D. Fernand, and the Noblemen of his faction, as defenders (sayd they) of the public liberty, the chiefe of the Saragossans, was their Bishop D. Sancho d' Abomes: brother to D. Pedro, that was slaine. On the other side the Kings army was led by D. Blasco Alagon, and Arias de Luna, who did much annoy them of Saragossa and others. In the end, the mildnesse, patience and dissimulation of the King D. James, surmounted all these alterations and mixtures, who could so winne the Princes and Noblemen, being much troubled to maintaine this warre, as they all submitted themselves vnto him; by whose example the townes were quiet, yet the citties of Saragossa, Huesca and Iacca made a league amongst themselves, for the defence of their lands and iurisdiccions against theeves and robbers, and remainders of ciuill dissensions, and erected a Magistrate, holding a forme of Iustice, like vnto that which they call Hermandades in Castille, yet without any preiudice to the Kings royal prerogatiue.

Moores.

13 In Castille whilest that the King D. Fernand was busie to suppress his owne subiects, and to dispose of the affaires of old Castille, the Inhabitants of Cuenca, Huete, Alarcon and Moja, being gathered together, made a roade into the territories of Valencia, from whence they brought a great booty. This was an aduice giuen by D. Belenguella the Queene mother, and the prelates of Castille, to the end they might breake the truce which was betwixt her sonne and the petty Kings of the Moores, thinking it high time the King should goe to the warre, and that it was the dutie of a Catholike Prince to pursue these Infidels, with what right soeuer. Wherefore the King animated by this counsel, gathered his army together, and marched into Andalusia, where at his first entry, Aben Mahomad, King of Baeça, made himselfe his vassal, sending to meet the Christians army, when it was at the passage of the mountaine called Puerto del Muradal. Afterwards they came to Quesada, whereas many Moores were slaine, and many taken, the townes of Laca, Teua and Palhes were abandoned by the Moores, the castles of Escameler and Espulei were razed, whereof the two last were yielded by composition. From thence D. Lope Dias de Haro, was sent with D. Fernand Coci, Maister of the Order of Saint James, and D. Gonçal Tuannes, maister of Calatraua, to Bitoras, whereas there were certaine bands of Arabians of Affrike, whom they defeated, bringing away many prisoners. D. Rodrigo Ximenes the Archbishop and Primar did accompany the King in this expedition, who after these happy exploits, returned to Toledo, whereas the Queene attended him.

Arragon.

In the meane time D. James King of Arragon, being discontented that the Castellans had attempted to inuade the Moores vpon the marches of his conquest, according to the diuision which had bene made by the Popes order, entred into Castille by his frontier, where he did some spoile towards Soria, and therefore the peace was like to breake betwixt these two Kingdomes: yet the King D. Fernand being come to Cuenca, the two Kings were reconciled, and had a friendly interview there, yet the King of Castille, to the preiudice of Arragon, had receiued Zeist Abenzit King of Valencia to fealty and homage, as his vassal, who being terrified with the great power of the Christians, and moued by the example of the King of Baeça was come to the King D. Fernand to Cuenca.

Moor.

An. 1224. In the yeere 1224. there was a new army raised, and led into Andalusia, which committed great spoiles, and tooke Andujar and Martos, with many forts and castles of small fame, finding no resistance in field.

And

A And in the yeere 1225. the Christians army was lead againe into the Marches of Andalusia, being drawn thither by their good successe, the King affecting nothing more then this Moorish warre, wherein he tooke exceeding delight. In which expedition Xadar was taken, and other inestimable harmes done vnto the Infidels. Of the fruits of this war the Knights of Calatraua, had Martos, for them and their successors: then was there in Spaine, Legat for Pope Honorius the third, John Abbatiss Villa, Bishop, Cardinal Sabina who perswaded the King of Castille, not to suffer the Moores in quiet, but to presse them whilst they were wauering: wherefore in the yeere 1226. the army of Castille assembled at Toledo, was lead into Andalusia, where they tooke from the Moores Saint Esteuan, Exnatoraphe, and the Tower of Albepe, or Albezo, and besieged Iacn, which they could not take, for the towne was great, and well fortified with men, and all things necessary for the warre. In it was D. Aluar Perez de Castro, a banished man of Castille, with 150. horse Christians.

An. 1226.

Christians in pay with the Moores against the King of Castille.

Exploits of the Christians against the Moores.

Wherefore the king D. Fernand, rayling his siege went to Priego, where there were many knights of the Almohades lodged, who were very rich; the towne was taken by assault, & soone after the castle yielded by composition. After which, the Christians tooke Loxa, & hauing taken great spoiles, and many prisoners in those places, they came and camped at Alhambra, which was a strong place, seated vpon a steepe rocke: but the Moores were so amazed, as without any resistance they abandoned their goods and fled to Granada: whereby it seemes, that that part of the fort of Granada, which is called Alhambra was built and peopled by these Moores; for after that time the towne of Granada, began to be wonderfully peopled with Moores, which were chased from such towns & places as the Christians did win in Andalusia. The fort of Alhambra being spoiled, the Christian army did ouerrun the champion country of Granada, turning and destroying all they found, with great slaughter of the Moores, amongst the which there died a famous capitaine, called Harippus, a great enemy to the Christians, & who had done them much harme the yeeres before. The Christians approached so neere vnto the city of Granada, as the Moores fearing to be besieged, or that they wold spoile their goodly building there abouts, compounded and did homage to the King D. Fernand, deliuering him 1300. Christian captiues, which they held. This composition was treated by Aluar Perez de Castro, about mentioned, whom the King D. Fernand receiued then into grace.

Granada and Alhambra.

D And thinking he had done ynough, he returned with this victorious army to Toledo. D. Rodrigo Ximenes did not willingly loose any one of these voiajes, yet he could not bee present at this last, by reason of a sicknesse, which surprized him at Guadalfajar, so as hee gaue his troups to D. Dominke Bishop of Plaisance, with power to execute his Episcopall charge in the campe. So did the Prelats in those daies labour in the Lords vineyard, as many doe also in this age. The Garrisons left by the King at Martos, Andujar, and other places of the frontier, amongst the which was D. Aluar Perez the commander, & the maister of the Order of Calatraua beganne to spoile the territories of Seuille, whereas there reigned a mighty Moore, called Abullalle or Aben Lalle, who hauing drawne a great number of soldiars out of Seuille, Xeres, Carmona and Eccia, came and charged these Christians, who were neither amazed nor weake; wherefore they did not onely withstand the Moores valiantly, but did wholly defeat them, so as there were 20000. slaine vpon the place, yet the Moores hauing repaired their forces, besieged the castle of Garces, and notwithstanding that the Christians, which were nere, did attempt to succor it, and that the King D. Fernand with D. Lope Dias de Haro, with many other knights, did aduance to raise the siege, yet the place was taken: wherefore the King D. Fernand came to Exaladulla, whether the King of Baeça came vnto him, being accompanied with 3000. horse Almohades, and Alarabes, and a great number of foote, offering both himselfe and his men to doe him seruice. He was welcome to the King, and entertained

Moores of Seuille defeated.

F with all signes of friendship. These Princes being together, they made an accord, by the which the King of Baeça promised to deliuer vnto the King of Castille, the castles of Saluatierra, Burgalhinar, & Capilla; vpon condition the King of Castille should take him & his country into his protection, & defend him against all men for assurance of the deliury of which places, it was agreed that the castle of Baeça should be presently giuen in 14 Aben Mahomad King of Baeça, puts him selfe vnder the protection of the King of Castille.

ii

pawne

pawne to the King of Castille, the which he should yeeld vp againe, when hee should be in possession of the sayd three castles. Burgalhinar was presently deliuered; and 15. daies after Saluatierra (yet with some difficulty) received a garrison of Castille: but Capilla, a place in the Archbishoprike of Toledo, strong by nature, being built vpon a rocke, would not obey, wherefore three months being spent in treaties and parles, and nothing concluded, the King returned to Toledo, leauing the frontier well manned; and winter being past, he came and laied siege to Capilla, being stil seized of the castle of Baeca: this place was obstinately defended by the Moores which were rebels to Aben Mahomad, who furnished the campe with victuals from Cordoua, whether he was retired, shewing him selfe faithfull in al things to the King D. Fernand. In the end Capilla was yeelded, vpon condition they should depart with their baggage, and then the King returned to Toledo, sixe weekes after his departure. Soone after hee had newes that the Moores, subiects to Aben Mahomad, incensed at the submission which hee had made vnto the King of Castille, and that hee had sent victuals vnto the campe before Capilla, were rebelled against him, and had forced him to flie to the castle of Almodauar del Rio, whereas thinking to enter, he was preuented and slaine by two Moores, who had carried his head

Traitors iustly punished.

An. 1227.

Troubles in France for the Government.

Baeca Castle
besieged by the Moore.

Great church of Toledo built by the Archbishop D. Roderigo.

Arragon.
An. 1228.

This happened in the yeere 1227. at that time died Lewis the eighth, the French King, father to Saint Lewis, and husband to the Queene D. Blanche of Castille. This Lady by the will of the King her husband, was left Regent of the realme of France, during the minority of the King her sonne, who was but twelue yeeres old: wherewith many Noblemen of France being discontented, banded against her, to dispossesse her of the gouernment; thinking it vnworthy the name of the French, and ominous for their Estate, to be gouerned by a woman, especially a stranger. The chiefe of the conspirators were Philip Earle of Bologne the Kings vnckle, Peter Duke of Brittan, Hugh de la March, Robert d'Euereux, Raymond of Toloufa, and Thybauld of Champagne, who was King of Nauarre: but the Queene, who it may be found they had more regard to their priuate interrests, then to the publike good, resisted them courageously, being supported by other Noblemen of France, so as from words they fell to armes. Vpon this occasion the King D. Fernand was solicited to succor the Queene D. Blanche his aunt, against the Rebels, whereof he excused himselfe; although hee seemed to be much grieued for her distresse: But hee was then so engaged in warre against the Moore, as it was impossible for him to deuide his forces: but you must obserue that by the right of succession the realme of Castille did belong vnto her, the which D. Fernand did hold, so as there was little loue betwixt them. Afterwards all succeeded to the Queenes desire in France, who made frustrate her enemies defeignes, as the French Histories report, gouerning the realme, and breeding vp her sonne vnder the discipline of the religious of Saint Domi- nique and St. Francis, who were then in great credit. The King of Baeca being slaine as we haue sayd, new difficulties did arise for the King of Castille, for the Moores of Baeca being aduertised thereof, they presently put themselves in armes, and began to assault the castle, the which was garded by the maister of the Knights of the Calatrava: who whilst hee defended himselfe valiantly, aduertised the King of his distresse, who posted thither, hauing in his company, D. Aluaro Peres de Castro, & other knights. The brute of his coming did strike such a terror into these mutinous Moores, as they dislodged before they saw him, and fled to Grenado, as they also of Martos did: they coniecture that these did people the Albaycin of Grenado: the King put D. Lope Dias de Haro, Lord of Biscaia, in garrison into Baeca, & into Martos D. Aluaro Peres de Castro, and D. Tello Alphonso de Meneses and others in other places, and so returned to Toledo, whereas that yeer the Archbishop D. Roderigo Ximenes, began to build the great church, as it is at this present, different fro that form it was of before, when it was a Mosque for the Moores.

15 In Arragon the expedition of Majorca was decreed 1228. this Island was held by the Moores, and their King Abobibe, whom others call, Retabormhe, who did incessantly spoile the sea, and the coast of Spaine, without any pretext, and did impudently mocke

A at the King of Arragon when hee complained of the thefts and robberies committed by him or his men. For this cause, at the Estates assembled at Barcelona, & they consenting and requiring it, according to the customes and preuiledges of the Arragonois & Catalans, a war was resolved against this King of the Moores, and the Majorkins: for the which there were 155. vessels of al sorts prepared, the which transported the army to Palombara: the chiefe commanders were, D. Berengaire Paloux, Bishop of Barcelona, D. Nugno of Arragon, Earle of Rossillon, William of Moncade, Lord of Berne, William Raymond of Moncade his cousin, Geoffry of Rocabertin, Oliuer Thermes, William of Saint Martin, Gerard Cernillon, Raymond Allemand, William of Clermont, Hugues Mataplane, William of Saint Vincent, Raymond Belloc, Bernard Centillas, William Palafogio, Berengaire of Saint Eugene, and other great and valiant Noblemen of Arragon and Cattelogne: the first which leaped to land, was one named Bernard Argentone. At their first aboard the Arragonois were incountried, and sharply repulled by the Moores, with the losse of the Lord of Beany, of D. Raymond his cousin, Hugues of Mataplane, and many other knights and good souldiars which were slaine vpon the place: but when as the whole army was landed, and had better meanes to discouer both the enemies and the country, the Moores were beaten backe into their towne, and besieged: the which was with great diligence and fury battered & assaulted; notwithstanding the siege was long and difficult: for it continued fiteene monethes, til in the end after much toile and losse, the city of Majorca came into the power of the Arragonois, hauing bene valiantly and obstinately defended by the Moores: the King Abobibe, & a son of his, and many Moores were slaine in this warre, and the city of Majorca forced: the spoile thereof was diuided by the Bishops of Barcelona and Lerida, by the Earles D. Nugno of Rossillon, D. Ponce Hugues of Empurias, D. Pedro Cornet, and Symon Vrrera: but whether they shewed themselves partial in this diuision, or for some other occasion, the soldiars mutined, and spoiled the tents and baggage of these Bishops and Noblemen: al the Island being won, except some mountaines and forests, whether the remainder of the Moores which had escaped were retired, Majorca was made subiect for the spirituality, to the Bishop of Barcelona, but in such sort as it should haue a particular bishop, which was then named by the King: which bishop being dead, the nomination should belong to the bishop and Chapter of Barcelona, who sayd this right had bene long due vnto them. The first that was named to this dignity, was D. Raymond Torelia: an other. son of the King of Majorcas, was a while after baptized, and was named James; he married a lady of the family of Alagon, daughter to D. Martin Rouland Alagon: from him is descended the house of Gottorio, so called of the place which was giuen in fee to this Prince of the Moores, by the King D. James; his sonne was Blasco Gottorio, and of him was begotten Michel Peres Gottorio. They of Minorca being terrified, by the taking of Majorca, offered tribut to the King of Arragon; and not long after D. William Mongers conquered the Island of Yuifa, sometimes called Ebufus and the Islands of Fromentaria and Cabrera, yeelded also through feare. They hold that there were in armes in these Islands, during this warre, about 40000. Moores footemen, and 50000. horse. The Earldome of Vrgel hauing bene long in sute, betwixt William of Moncade, Lord of Bearn, together with Ponce Cabrera, & Arembixis, daughter to Armingal, the last Earle of Vrgel, in the end, sentence was giue other side, who was married to D. Pedro of Portugal, son to the King D. Sancho the first, to which married couple, the King D. James did afterwards giue in exchange of the Earldome of Vrgel, the Islands of Majorca and Yuifa, to hold them during their liues, and many places in Cartelogne in propriety. Notwithstanding the county of Vrgel returned sometime after to D. Ponce de Cabrera, and the Islands Pyticeus, Yuifa and Fromentaria, were giuen in fee to the Archbishop of Tarragone.

In the same yeere 1228. D. Tello Alphonso de Meneses, and other captaines Castillans, commanders of the garrisons vpon the Moores frontiers, went to field, and ouerran the territory of Seuille about Baena, Lucena & Castro del Rio: and Aben Lalle, King of Seuille, assailed the Christians, towards Biouras, Baeca and Martos, seeking to diuert them which foraged his country: the King D. Fernand arriuing, the Moore fainted, and made himselfe his tributary, promising to pay him three hundred thousand Marauidis of gold.

Li a

The

Estates of Arragon made warre and peace and al Leagues, another. H. Surtis

Majorca taken from the Moores.

Nomination of the Bishop of Majorca.

Moores

King of Seuille a Moore, tributary to the King of Castille.

Aben Hut
King of Mur-cia, and his
the sect of Almohades, in
Spaine.

The death of Aben Mahomad King of Baeca, gaue way to the raigne of Aben Hut A who was of the race of the Kings of Saragossa, and enemy to the faction of the Almohades: this King seized vpon the fort of Ricor, in the realme of Murcia, and tooke occasion of their religion, publishing that that which the Almohades had brought in, was false, and inuented by wicked, turbulent and mutinous persons, whose rash impiety the soueraigne God had shewed was displeasing vnto him, by their vnfortunate cuents in the late warres of Spaine: wherefore they must returne to the simple beliefe of their aunccestors, and reiect that prophane Almohade, with his King Abdelman, and their followers. Vpon this quarrel hee intituled himselfe King of Murcia, and beganne to persecute the sect of the Almohades, so as all hee could get into his hands, he put to a miserable death; hee caused the Mesquites or Mesgides to bee purified, and washed, with exorcismes and superstitious ceremonies, as hauing beene poluted and violated, in seruing the new sect of the Almohades.

So vnder collour of restoring the ancient beliefe and knowledge of the law of Mohamet, hee was wonderfully followed, and was respected, feared and honoured, as King in the realme of Murcia and part of Andalusia, the country of Granado, Almery, Cordoua and Eccia: yet hee found Zael who made head against him, a Moore who had newly vsurped the realme of Valencia, and chased away Zeit Aben Zeit, for that they sayd hee had laied a plot with the Pope, and the King of Arragon, to become a Christian, and that hee had had conference to that end with the King D. James at Calatajub, whither hee had also carried his sonne. This Zael was sonne to Modof and Nephew to King Lobo: Aben Lalle King of Seuile made the like resistance, yet Aben Hut troubled them all, and tooke from them a part of their countries, so as hee became the most powerfull of all the Kings of the Moores in Spaine, beeing otherwise a bountifull Prince, and a good Iusticer. The new sect of the Almohades was thus rooted out by him, and the ancient interpretation of their Alphurcan restored in Spaine, eighty and one yeeres after that Almohad had past.

Leon.

Yet the first attempt he made against the Christians, succeeded but ill; for D. Alphonso King of Leon, being in the country of Extremadura, where he had made warre, whilst that D. Fernand his sonne did ouerrunne Andalusia and their tooke the townes of Badajoz, Caceres and others, this King of the Moores presumed to dislodge him from Merida, before the which hee was camped, to which end hee came towards him with a mighty army: King D. Alphonso notwithstanding that hee was very old, gaue him battle, and defeated this King of the Moores, forcing him to saue himselfe by flight: and returning to the siege, he tooke the towne of Merida, in the yeere 1229. which was the last of his exploits: for being now very old, and much broken, he died soone after, in the yeere 1230. at Villanoua of Sarrio, hauing reigned forty and foure yeeres in Leon Galicia and the Asturies: whose body was interred at Saint James.

Castille and Leon united.

16 The King D. Fernand who was then in Andalusia, at the siege of Daralferza, being aduertized of his fathers death, tooke counsell of the Noblemen which were with him in the army; who were all of opinion, that hee should goe with all speed into the realme of Leon, which by hereditary right did belong vnto him, before his sisters children did seize thereon, who pretended an equall right with him: for so had the King D. Alphonso ordained by his will, to preiudice his sonne D. Fernand, whom hee had alwaies hated and pursued to the death; yea a little before hee died, hee sought to marry his daughter Donna Sancha to D. James King of Arragon, who by the decree of Pope Honorius the third, had put away D. Elenor of Castille his wife. Don Alphonso offering to giue in dowry with the Infanta the Realmes of Leon, Galicia and the Asturies, after his decesse, to deprive the King of Castille his sonne, but his death prevented the effect: wherefore the king D. Fernand following this good counsell, came to Toledo, to passe from thence into Leon; vpon the way, hee met with the Queene D. Berenguella, his mother, at Orgaz, who came to hasten him, and returned with him to Toledo: from thence hee went with speed into the territories of Leon, where hee was receiued and acknowledged in all places where hee past for their lawfull King, vnto the city of Toro, which did him all the honour hee could desire, hauing sent their Deput-

D. Fernand
King of Castille
takes possession of the realme
of Leon.

A Deputies to meete him vpon the way, in the which hee was proclaimed King of Leon.

In the beginning the other townes and castles did not allow of this election of them of Toro, by reason of the Infants D. Sancha and D. Dulce or Douce, who would in the confidence which they had in their cause, dispute their interest and put it to the trial of law: but all well considered D. Alphonso will tooke no effect; for D. Fernand was sonne and right heire to these realmes before the daughters, who were forced to agree with their brother, and had 30000. doubloons euery yeere during their liues. This accord betwixt the King Don Fernand and the Infantes of Leon his Sisters, was wrought and concluded betwixt the Queenes D. Berenguella the Kings mother, and D. Theresa, mother to the Infants: after that the King had beene crowned in Leon, the chiefe city of the Kingdome, in the presence of the Bishops D. Iohn of Oneydo, D. Rodrigo of Leon, D. Nuño of Astorga, D. Martin of Salamanca, D. Michel of Citè Roderigo and D. Sancho of Coria. By this accord the King D. Fernand did peaceably enjoy the Realmes of Leon, Galicia, & the Asturies, hauing reigned thirteene yeeres in Castille, the re-union of which Estates made this yeere, 1230. 73. yeeres after their last diuision, hath remained firme euer since, without any further leperation. From Leon, the King came to Beneuent, whereas the Infantes his sisters met him, and there did ratifie the accord made by the two Queenes, renouncing all pretensions to the layd Realmes, and to the testament made by the King D. Alphonso their father. Then the King went to visit the Prouinces, Townes and Forts of his Kingdomes, where without any contradiction he was receiued & intainted with great ioy and acclamation of the people, as it was fit.

This death of the King of Leon, tell out happily for D. Fernand, to couer his retreat from Daralferza, with some honourable pretext. In the meane time they made light skirmishes, with the taking and recouering of castles, vpon the frontiers of Toledo and Andalusia.

In the yeere of our Lord 1231. Quelada was recouered by the Christians, and for a reward of their valour, in recouering thereof, was giuen to the church of Toledo, but it was afterwards lost and recouered againe diuers times. The King of Castille continuing his warre, there was established vpon that frontier, that which they call

D Adelantamiento of Castilla, by the taking of Pilos, Toya, Lacra, Agozino, Font Julian, Tour de Lago, Higuera, Maulula, Arcola, Dos Hermanas, Villa Montin, Niebla, Castilla, Concha and Chelis, all which places were by prodigality and inconsiderate zeale (altogether vsed in those religious times) giuen (in a religious acknowledgement to the Apostolike See) by the King D. Fernand to the Archbishops of Toledo, the which hee haue enioyed vnto the assumption of the Cardinal D. Iohn Tanera to the Arch-bishoprike, who gaue this country to the Marquis of Camaraça, whose successour Don Iohn Martinez Silesio Cardinal, had by reason thereof great and earnest sute against the Church of Toledo; but notwithstanding that the Church had diuers sentences (by reason of the great sway the Church of Rome bore at that same time) in its fauour, yet could they neuer gette possession of any of those places, for certaine speciall reasons which are not specified.

17 At that time the realmes of Naples and Sicile were held by the Emperour Fredrick the second, who married Yoland, the onely daughter of Iohn de Brenne, who called himselfe king of Ierusalem (which is the reason why the Kings of Naples and Sicile haue euer since intituled themselves Kings of Ierusalem) by which alliance they vniued the titles of Naples, Sicile and Ierusalem, which the descendentes of this Noble Princeesse haue carried.

F This Iohn de Brenne beeing chosen chiefe Generall of the Westerne succours, which by the procurement of the counsell of Latran went into the Country of Syria, and obtained amongst them the first and soueraigne degree, and was called King of Acre or Prolemaide: yet hee did neuer hold the city of Ierusalem: but hauing neede of greater forces to resist the Turkes and enemies of our faith, hee was forced

An. 1231.

Adelantamiento to of Castilla
giuen to the Church of Toledo.

to returne againe into Europe to sollicite the Christian Princes to assist him. Bee-ing arrived into Italie, hee married his daughter as wee haue sayd, and then passed into Sapine, in the yeere of our Lord 1232. to visit the sepulcher of Saint James, which was a pilgrimage of greatest merit after that of Ierusalem. Passing through Castille, hee was receiued with great honour by the King D. Fernand, who in confirmation of their friendship, gaue him D. Beyenguela, his sister by father and mother in marriage.

Nauarre.

The Realme of Nauarre was at that time but ill gouerned by reason of the Kings solitary life, who was retired and did not speake with any man, but his household ser-uants, and would not heare of any affaires. This mischief was increased by the death of D. Ramir his brother, Bishop of Pampelone, who by his authority and respect might something haue restrained them that would haue troubled the state, were they home-bred or strangers: wherefore about the yeere of our Lord 1231. D. Lope Diaz, Lord of Biscay, who had some lands in the souerainty of Nauarre, prouoked and supported by D. Fernand King of Castille, hee found an occasion to commit some spoiles in the Kingdome.

Impatience of Cont. Thibault of Champagne
to arrange.

18 On the other side Thibault Earle of Champagne, pretending right to the sayd realme by his mother D. Blanche, daughter to the King D. Sancho the wife, had secret practises and Intelligences in Nauarre, to bee admitted to the Regency of the realme, during the life of King D. Sancho the retired: whereof hee being aduertised, after great negligence, in the end hee beganne to discouer it, to his great prejudice, wherefore being much discontented at these attempts, both of the King of Castille, and of the Earle of Champagne, he resolved to frustrat both of their pretentions, and to bere-uenged, especially of the King of Castille; he therefore gaue D. James King of Arragon to vnderstand, that hee had some matters to impart vnto him, which would redound greatly to his profit: and therefore he intreated him to come to Tudele, excusing himselfe that hee had not come vnto him, by reason of the indisposition of his person:
The King of Arragon sayled not to come to Tudele: and for that the King of Nauarre could not stirre out of his chamber, hee entered into the castle, where they conferred together.

The King D. Sancho complayning much of D. Fernand King of Castille, that not content to hold the Lands which his predecessors had wrested from him, had againe inuaded and spoiled his country, hee demanded his aduice and helpe to bee reuenged:
and hauing in like manner discouraged of the disobedience and little respect of Thibault
Earle of Champagne, who had attempted to play the King in Nauarre in his life time, hee concluded, that if hee would make a firme alliance with him, and betwixt Nauarre and Arragon, to inuade the realme of Castille, and not to cease vntill they had forced the King D. Fernand to restore the Lands of the riuer of Oja, Bureua, Alaua, and Guipuscoa, or being conquered, to yeeld him the fruits and reuenues thereof, and to pay the charges of the warre, hee should bee content to harken to a mutuall donation of both realmes, very profitable for the King of Arragon, and his sonne D. Al- phonso: which was, that the suruiuor should inherit both Kingdomes of Nauarre and Arragon. The King D. Jame liked well heereof, for hee was in the floure of his age, and his sonne also likely to liue, whereas the King D. Sancho was about threescore and eight yeeres old, and moreouer hee was so fat, and full of humors, and so tormented with a canker, as hee expected hourly to leaue this world. This Accord being made betwixt them, they concluded that the troupes of both Realmes should bee ready against the next yeere, and should meet at the Rendezuous in May. The King D. San- cho desired nothing more then to recover the Prouince of Guipuscoa, imagining that since the separation thereof, the realme of Nauarre had lost one of the chiefe commodities which a country may haue that lies vpon the sea.

Mutual accord
betwixt the Kings of Na-
uarre and Arragon.These a chief. commodity to a country.

The Noblemen and chiefe of the King D. *Sancho*s counsell at this accord were D. Garcia Almoravid, D. Sancho Fernandes of Montague, D. William Baudouin, and D. William Iustice of Tudele, which is a principall dignitie. These and other Noblemen, with the Deputies of the Townes of Nauarre, signed the conuen-

A conuention and accord betwixt these two kings: the which the Noblemen of Arragon, which held the chiefe charges, did in like manner: among the which are named D. Pedro
Fernandes & Agagra Lord of Albarazin, Athon de Foces, L. Steward, William de Moncade, Roderigo Lizines, Artal de Lune, Simon Vrrca, Blasco Maza, Pedro Reyes Iustice Maior of Arragon, and Pedro Sanches Secretarie of State in Arragon. For the defraying of this warre, D. Sancho was forced to employ his treasure, which was very great: for hauing liued long in this solitary life, hee might easily gather together, hauing no cause of expence. He therefore deliuered to the king of Arragon, an hundred thousand solz of gold, that is to say, Crownes or Ducats, in loane, and aduance, and had in pawne, Herrera, Peg- na reronda, Ferclon, and Faxine: and as he was wise and very iudicious in matters of war, B he disposed what should be done in the beginning: but the loue of his treasure spoiled all besides at such time as the army was to march against Castile, newes came vnto the king of Arragon, that the Iland of Maiorca had rebelled: wherefore being more carefull to keepe his owne, then to take from another, he made vse of those souldiers which hee had leauied for the warre of Castile, and led them into Maiorca, so as the king of Nauarre found himself too weake to attempt any thing against Castile, whereas the Earle D. Lope
d' Haro was in armes to fight with him at the passage. He was of opinion that the King
D. James had mocked him, so as falling into a great rage, hee would breake the accord which they had made. King James was aduertized of all that he sayd and did, by some Knights of Nauarre, which were false vnto their Prince, and discontented with this strange and disdainfull manner of liuing, of the which D. Pedro Ximenes of Valtierra was one. The warre
C of Maiorca being soone ended, the king Don James returned to Tudele to excuse himselfe, and to offer satisfaction hereafter, yea to furnish 2000. horse, with other forces for the warre of Castile, but the King Don Sancho would by no meanes enter into conse-rence with him. Moreouer, Don Garcia Almoravid and Don John Peres de Barzan, captaines of the armie, which was vpon the frontiers of Castile, being in fight of the ene-mie, were reduced to th at extremitie by Don Lope Diaz de Haro, as they feared euery day they should be forced to fight, he neglected both them and all they did: and they write, that a Gentleman being sent from them to acquaint the king with the estate of their affaires, and to demand two hundred horse of Supply, with the which they should be able D to giue battell vnto the Castillans, he attended foure dayes, and could neither haue entry nor audience. This strange and disdainfull behauiour caused the king Don James to returne into Arragon much discontented, whereupon the Castillans spoiled Nauarre, the which he might easily haue preuented, whereupon he grew wayward, and insupportable euen to his household seruants, who could not please him. This waywardnesse and distemperature, together with the burthen of a repleate and ill-disposed bodie, his long incurable diseale, together with his many yeares, brought him to his graue, in the yeere 1234.
E hauing reigned nine and thirty yeares, nine moneths, and ten dayes. He was buried in the royall Monasterie of the Chanoins of Saint Mary of Roncevaux, the which hee himselfe had caused to be built.

Spies in the Kings CounsellStrange behauour of Don Sancho the Grosse in his age.

1234.

D. Thibault first of that name, the 22. King of Nauarre.

17 The Nauarrois sent into France to Thibault Earle of Champagne, the sonne of D.
Blanche, sister to the deceased king, to aduertise him of this succession, and to aduise him to make halt, before that Don James King of Arragon should seaze thereon, in ver-tue of the pretended rights, by reason of the mutuall donation past betwixt the two kings
F at Tudele, and also by meanes of the intelligences which he had within the Countrey:
wherein the Earle was nothing slouthfull, for hauing many partizans in Nauarre, who had aduertised him of all that had past betwixt the two kings, and in the end of the death of his vncl. The Ambassadors found him already in order, and ready to march towards Nauarre, where hee arrived happily, for the well effecting of his desseigne, by reason of some

Thibault Earle
of Champagne
obtains the Realme of Na-
uarre.
Arragon.

Zeit King of Valence buyth
and.

Warre in Va-
lence against
the Moors.

An. 1236.
Estates at Mon-con for the war of Valence.

some lets which restrained the King Don James, the which were more fitting for him to A care for, then to pursue the donation made vnto him in prejudice of the right heire of that Crowne, without any reason or proportion, by a king troubled with violent passions both of body and mind. But it is very certaine, that the king of Arragon did little respect it: yea some haue written, that without any difficulty, he discharged the Nauarrois (they requiring it) of the oath, fealty and homage, which they had sworne, when as the contract betwixt him and the deceased king D. Sancho, was past at Tudela: others say, that afterwards he gaue all his pretensions and right to D. Pedro his sonne, to pursue it when opportunity did serue, as a matter whereof there was but small hope. Thus D. Thibault Earle of Champagne, was receiued, proclaimed, and crowned King of Nauarre, to the great ioy and content of all good Nauarrois. B

The king of Arragon was then by the aduice of all his faithfull Councillers, entred in- to the conquest of the Realme of Valencia, having a fit opportunity offered, by reason of the diuisions which were in the kingdome, betwixt the factions of Zeit Aben Zeit, and Zael or Zaen, which were both strong. This Zeit Aben Zeit seeing himselfe pursued, hee made open declaration of that which he had long before designed, and making himselfe vassal to the king Don James, he became a Christian, and was called D. Vincent de Belluis. He afterwards married a Lady called Dominick Lopes of Saragossa, of which marriage was borne a daughter called Alda Fernandes, who was married to Blaise Ximenes d'Arenos.

21 The warre of Valencia being resolved, the Generall of the army vnder the king was D. Blasco Alagon, by whose valour and diligence Morelia was taken; a place which was held impregnable: Penicane was also besieged, and with great difficulty taken: Penicola, Chiuert, Ceruera, Polpes, Alcalaarena, Albufera, Almenara, Vxo, Noles, Castro, Alfandecho, Paterna, Bulla and other places, some by force, some by composition, and partly by the meanes and intelligences which Zeit had, and by the fauour of such as held his partie, came into the power of the king D. James, so as by degrees hee enuironed the city it selfe, cutting off their victuals and all other commodities. In these expugnations they did then vse rammes, moouing towers with many stages, and other sorts of engines. The resistance of the Moores which held Zaens partie was very great: neither were they abandoned of their friends, nor of the kings raising in Africke, for twelue galleies, and fixe vessels called Zabres of Tunes, shewed themselves often, as if they would land, or assaile the places held by the Arragonois along the coast, but without any effect. The Estates of Arragon and Cattelogne were assembled at Moncon in the year 1236. for the continuance of this warre, and the conquest of Valencia; without the which it was not lawfull for the king to vndertake any matter of importance. The President at these estates was Pedro Perez Iustice maior of Arragon, where there assisted D. William of Montgrin, co-adiutor to the Arch-bishop of Tarragone, the Bishops of Barcelona, Saragossa, Vic, and Tortosa, the Master and Prior of the Templers and Hospitaliers, Friar Raymond of Pegnafort, a most famous Iacobin, Roger Bernard Earle of Foix, and Don Fernand the kings vncler, D. Ponce Cabrera Earle tutelarie of Vrgel, D. Pedro Vgo Earle of Ampurias, D. Nugno Sanchez Earle of Rossillon, D. Gerard Vicount of Cabrera, D. William of Cardona, D. William, and Pedro of Moncada, Berenger Puquert, William and Berenger Anglesol, Bernard Portella, Hugues Mataplans, sonne to Hugues, Galferand Pinos, William of Laquila, Raymond of Peralta, Peter Vicount of Villemuir, Raymond VVilliam Odena, Berenger Erille, and William Ceruera, all Knights and Noblemen of Cattelogne. And of the realme of Arragon, D. Pedro Cornel Lord Steward, Bernard William, Garci Romeo, Simon Vyrea, Artorella, Artal de Lume, Blasco Alagon, Roderigo Lizana, Blasco Maza Berenger, Gombaid Entenza, Simon de Foces, Assalit Gudalis, Fortun Verga, Simon Lueza and others. The meanes to defray this warre, besides the Croisados, pardons and indulgences, were ordayned to be leuiud vpon the people, by the Imposition of a custome called Morabetine and the exaction of the Imposst for cattell. In this assembly it was decreed, that all peeces of gold and silver coyned, should be of one goodnes and weight, in Arragon and Cattelogne: to the obseruation of which Edict for coynes, all were bound to sweare, that were about 14. yeares old. During the siege of Valencia many Noblemen, and common fouldiers strangers, French and English came to D. James his campe.

The

A The Authors of the Arragon Historie write, that the Kings army, at the hottest of the siege, might bee 60000. foot, and a thousand horse, (meaning Knights and Masters) followed according vnto the Order and Discipline of warre in those dayes, by their vassalls, besides the forces at sea. This warre was long, and the siege troublesome: yet it was attempted, battered and assaulted, and the Moores within it brought to so great extremity, as Zaen the Vsurper of that Principallitie, being not yet well settled nor assured of the peoples wile, abandoned it, and retired to Denia. The citie was yeilded the 28. of September, 1238.

Valencia tak'n
by the Arrago-
nois.

The King Don James had in the year 1232. bene diuorced from D. Elenor of Castile his wife, and yet had declared D. Alphonso their son, the lawfull heire of the realmes of Arragon and Maiorca, the lands of Cattelogne, Vrgel, Montpellier, and others: appointing for Governors of his youth, the Bishop of Tarragone, the Masters or Priors of the Templers and Hospitaliers, and William Ceruera: ordaining, that he should be bredde vp at Moncon: and if he should chance to die, then did he substitute vnto his Realmes and Seigneuries, Don Fernand of Arragon his vncler, and Don Raymond Berenger Earle of Prouence his cousin. Notwithstanding the king Don Pedro during this warre of Valencia contracted a new marriage with the daughter of Andrew king of Hungary, named Violant, by whom he had a sonne called D. Pedro, who was king, after him, of Arragon and Valencia, and Prince of Cattelogne: he had moreover the Infant Don Jaime, who was king of Maiorca and Minorca, and Earle of Rossillon and Montpellier, and a third called C

Genealogie of
Arragon.

Don Sancho, who was Arch-bishop of Toledo, and Primate of Spaine. Hee had also fixe daughters by her: D. Isabell married to Philip the third King of France, sonne to Saint Lewis: D. Violant who was Queene of Castile and Leon, wife to D. Alphonso the ninth: D. Constance married to Don Manuell brother to the sayd D. Alphonso, King of Castile, D. Mary and D. Elenor who dyed young. The dowrie of Queene Tolant or Violant, as Surrites writes, was ten thousand Markes of silver, and two hundred of gold, for her mothers rights, for the which the Duke of Austria became answerable. Moreover, a portion of the County of Namur in Flanders, and the lands and rights which her Predecessors had enioyed in France, with certaine places which she did then possesse in Hongarie, and others that were fallen to her in Bourgogne, by her mothers right and succession.

Dowry of 2.
Tolant.

D Princeesse was conducted to Barcelona in the year 1235. by the Bishop of the five Churches, and a kinsman of his called Cont Denis, who remained in Arragon, and was the Author of the noble family of Denis, which is vnited to that of Vrraz, hee had two sonnes Amour and Gabriel Denis. Don Pedro the eldest son of Queene Tolant, was married young to Constance, daughter to Manfroy, bastard to the Emperour Frederick the second, whom they called Prince of Tarentum, which was a degree to attaine vnto the succession of the Realmes of Naples and Sicily, and by the marriage of his daughter Isabell with Philip the Hardy, sonne to Saint Lewis the French king, the Kings of Arragon obayned (as the histories of Spain report) a full freedome of the Principallitie of Cattelogne, and Earldome of Barcelona, to enioy it from that time in full proprietie and Soueraignty, without acknowledging themselves any more vassalls to the Kings of France: the which was done at Clermont in Auvergne, whereas both Kings met in the year 1260. In recompence the King of Arragon did also quit for his part the rights of Soueraignty which he pretended to Carcaffone, Rhodes, Beziers, Locate, Albi, Amillaire, Nismes, Saint Giles, and other lands in France, the which he assigned in dowrie to his daughter D. Isabell, with the reuenues of Carcaffone and Beziers: and moreover, he quit all right which he could pretend to the Earldome of Prouence, Folquaquier, Arles, Auignon and Marseilles, in fauour of Queene Marguerite of France.

22.
Cattelogne
freed from the Soveraignty of France.

Dowry of 2.
Isabell.

The death of D. Sancho king of Nauarre, the beginning of the warre of Valencia, and the second marriage of D. James King of Arragon, happened all in the year 1234. by reason whereof, and to giue order for the affaires of the Infanta D. Elenor, whom he had put away, by reason of the strict allyance which was betwixt them, according to the Popes decree, there was an interview of this King of Arragon, and of Don Fernand king of Castile, in the Monasterie of Huerta, vpon the confines of Castile; where it was accorded, that the Infant Don Alphonso, whom Don James had by Donna Elenor, named King of Arragon,

Accord betwixt the Kings of Castile and Arragon for the diuorce of
2. Elenor.

The King of Aragon as kepe pardon of the Pope.

Arragon, if he had liued, should remaine in the custodie of the Queene his mother, to A whom for an increase of her dowrie, the towne of Hariza was giuen, to enioy it during her life, but in case shee should marry againe, then should it returne to Arragon. These and other things being friendly accorded betwixt the two kings, they parted with great loue, to make warre against the Moores, euery one apart. Some haue left in writing, that D. Thersa of Bidaure, with whom the King D. James had had familiar acquaintance, before he married the Queene D. Yolant, and had children by her, sued him vpon a promise of marriage before the Pope, where she lost it for want of proofes, and D. Yolant was declared his lawfull wife. There the Bishop of Girone then the kings Confessor (having vnderstood by his confession of this matrimoniall promise) had reuealed it vnto Pope Innocent the fourth, but to what end he did it, it is vncertaine: but his testimonie alone was not allowed. The king being wonderfully incensed against the Bishop, hauing sent for him into his chamber, caused his tounge to be cut out. For this outrage committed vpon the Bishop, notwithstanding that he were faultie, hauing reuealed the Kings confession, the Pope made great complaints, being at the Councell of Lyons, and in the end did interdict all the Realme of Arragon, and excommunicate the king D. James. To free them from this interdiction, and to get absolution, the king sent the Bishop of Valencia vnto the Pope to carry his excuse, and to make an humble petition, wherewith the Pope being somewhat pacified, he yeelded to send two Legates into Arragon with full power. Hauing assembled a Synode of Bishops at Lerida, they caused the king to come thither, who confessed his fault vpon his knees before these Fathers, with great submission and teares: who gaue him absolution, vpon condition, that he should cause the Monastery of Bienface, neere vnto Tortosa to be built, (the which hath bene since a Conuent of Chartrous Monkes) and to indow it with an hundred and forty pounds of siluer of annuall rent. And moreover, that he should endow the hospitall of Saint Vincent of Valencia, with foure hundred pounds waight of siluer by the year for the nourishment of the poore: and that he should giue a Prebendarie to the great Church of Girone, for the maintenance of a Masse-priest: Then fell he to the loue of this ladie againe, and entertained her during the life of his Queene D. Violant.

Castile and Moures.

23 As for the king D. Fernand, he was affronted with the power of king Aben-Hut, who was mightie: but seeing his forces increased by the succession of the Realmes of Leon, which were fallen vnto him, he was in hope to effect his desseignes. Wherefore he assayed him towards Baeca which he held, and went and layed seige to Vbeda, a neere towne, strong, and well fortified, yet he prest them in such sort, as the Garrison compounded to depart with their liues: into the which the king D. Fernand entred the same year 1234. in the which his fortunes were seasoned with some bitterness, according to the condition of humane things: for he lost the Queene D. Beatrix his wife, who died in Toro in the kingdome of Leon: her body was carried to the Monasterie of las Huelgas of Burgos, and buried neere vnto the king D. Henry. Vpon this subiect the king D. Fernand came into the territories of Leon: during his absence the garrisons vpon the frontier tooke certaine Moores Almogaueres (for so they call their Mortepaiez) of the citie of Cordoua: and for that they were in quarrell with the Inhabitants thereof, they were easily corrupted, promising to giue entry to the Christians into the citie of Cordoua. The plot being layd, and all things disposed accordingly, there came a good troupe of Christians in the night with ladders, the which they planted vnto the wall neere vnto the tower and Bourg, called Axarquia, where by the helpe and fauor of those Moores whom they had wonne, Aluaro, Colodro, and Benoit of Bagnos entred first, being well followed by their companions, without any discouerie of them of the towne, who slept without feare or apprehension vntill the morning, when as they saw the Christians had seized vpon the tower, and there did fortifie themselves, attending succors from Don Aluar Perez, whom they had sent vnto being at Martos, vpon their entry: and as men expecting some great resistance, they had also sent to aduertise the King Don Fernand of their enterprize and happie successe, to the end he should approach neere to fauour them. The Moores of Cordoua seeing themselves surprized, went to armes, and besieged the Christians in this tower, where they defended themselves: the combate was furious, and often

Cordoua surprized by the Christians.

A often renewed, euery one doing his best indeauour, wherein they spent some dayes, yet could they not chase the Christians out of the tower, which they had intrenched from the rest of the towne. In the meane time, the king D. Fernand aduanced with all speed, giuing order for the rest of his forces to follow, and passing by Extremadura, neere vnto Bienguerencia, the Governour a Moore, furnished the kings armie with victuals as it past, yet being summoned to deliuer the fort vnto the king, he made answer, that when he had taken Cordoua, it should be at his commandement, and in the meane time he would keep it: Wherefore the king of Castile passed on, and arriuing at Cordoua, hee found that D. Aluaro Perez de Castro, and other Captaines and souldiers in great numbers, were already come to succour his men. King Aben-Hut being aduertised of all these things, and of D. Fernand's arriual with small forces, although there came great troupes afterwards, thought it fit to preuent him, if he could, or at the least to strike some terror into the Christians, and force them to retire from this seige. He had in his armie which lay about Ecija, a Christian Knight, a banished man called D. Laurens Suarez. Hauing imparted his desseigne vnto him, he resolved to send him one night vnto the campe, vnder colour of seeking to recouer the kings fauour: but it was to espie, and to discouer vnto him the true estate of the Christians armie. This Knight hauing obtained a passport, came vnto the campe, and spake vnto the king, doing the contrarie to that which he had in charge: for he discouered vnto the King D. Fernand, all the Moores desseignes, and what forces hee had: wherefore being assured from the king, of his grace and fauour, he retired to Aben-Hut, to whom he concealed what he had seene and vnderstood, telling him that the Christians army was much stronger then it was indeed. Wherefore king Aben-Hut durst not attempt that which he had resolved, and thinking that they of Cordoua would hold good for a time, he resolved to employ his forces to succour king Zaen, who was prest by the king of Arragon towards Valencia, thinking after that he had repulsed the Arragonois, to returne fortified with Zaen's forces, and cause the Christians to retire from before Cordoua. Being arriued at Almeri, to imbarke his army, a vassall of his, whom hee did much esteeme, called Aben Arramin, inuited him to supper, where he so feasted him, as being drunke, he cast him into a great vessell full of water, and there drowned him: whereupon the army disbanded, and D. Laurence Suarez whom king Aben-Hut had ledde with him, retired to the king of Castile, who receiued him graciously, notwithstanding that he had betrayed him who had entertained him during his exile. This death of this Moorish king, being generally knowne, especially at Cordoua, the besieged despayred of succors, so as they yeilded the citie vnto the king of Castile, the sixt moneth of the seige, in the year 1236, which was 522. yeares after that it had bene first taken by the Moores. The king Don Fernand caused a crosse to be set vpon the tower of the great Mesquide, in token of our redemption, and neere vnto it the standard of Castile, which Mesquide was purified (being one of the goodliest buildings in Spaine) and made the Cathedral Church, of the which Don Lope de Histero of Piquerga was made bishop: The king did indow it with rents and reuenues like the rest, and so did the Arch-bishop Don Roderigo in his returne from Rome, where he had bene during the seige, and was not at the taking thereof, to his great griefe, but affaires of greater Importance had kept him absent: in the meane time Don John Bishop of Osma was his Vice-gerent and Chancellor to the King. There the bells of Saint James were found, which the Alhagib Almançor had taken away in the year 975. and placed them in this great Mosquée, making them to serue for lampes, which the king Don Fernand caused to be transported to their ancient mansion. The affaires of this great citie, which had bene the chiefe of the Moores estate, were ordered by the king, both for religion, Iustice, and for the guard and safety thereof, with great care. Don Tello Alphonso de Melnes, was made Governour of the citie, and Don Aluar Perez de Castro of the whole frontier.

D. Laurens
Suarez betrays
king Aben-Hut
who had entertained him in his exile.

Cordoua yielded 1236.

D. Lope de Histero
first Bishop of Cordoua

The

The kingdome of Granado.

BY the losse of Cordoua and the death of king Aben Hui, the Moores were wonderfully dismayed and voyd of Councell: wherefore they returned to their old course every one respecting his priuate interest: so as the Infidels estate was dismembred into many parts. Aben Hudiel among others, seized vpon the Realme of Murcia, Zeit and Zanbe ing yet in warre, and contending for the realme of Valencia. In the country of Algarbe, whereof Niebla was the chiefe citty, Aben Isom raigned, who had for his successor Aben Amarin, and then another called Aben Mosad. Those of Seuille would haue no king, but onely a Governour: where one Axastaf was in great authoritie, and it was he which lost it. But about all the power of Mahomad Alienagmar or Aben Alamar was great; so called for that he had a red face: who from a shepherd hauing followed armes, had attained to the chiefe places of honour, and was in such credit by reason of his valour, force, and stature, as in these tumults, the Inhabitants of Arjona, where he was borne, chose him for their king, and then other people submitted themselues vnder him especially the townes of Iacn, Baeça, which was ill garded, and Guadix, and in the end the citty of Granado, which he afterwards made his royall seate, and the chiefe of all his country and Seigneuries. This was the first king of Granado, whereas vntill that time there was no kingdome: it was erected at such time as Cordoua the chiefe cittie of all the Moores Estate in Spain was made subiect vnto the Christians.

25 Whilest that the king Don Fernand is busie at this honorable enterprize of Cordoua, and D. Isime or James king of Arragon, at that of Valencia, which was nothing inferior, Thibaud the new king of Nauarre had meanes to settle his affaires without any difficultie, for he found all the Estates of the Kingdome willing to obey him. At his reception he did sweare and confirme the liberties and priuiledges of the country, the which he did also augment. This was the beginning of the second masculine line of the Kings of Nauarre, the first ending in D. Sancho, the which since D. Garcia Ximenes had continued 518. yeares. Successions of States and Soueraignities falling to women against all lawe and presidents of well ordered kingdomes, in the first ages, is the cause that strange and vnknowne Princes, of diuers humors, come to raigne ouer Nations, which sometimes haue succeeded well, but very often great troubles and inconueniences haue followed. At this time the Nauarrois were not vnfortunate, to haue a king of the French nation, who was a meanes to augment the power and dignitie of that Crowne, by many accessories from France: his mother D. Blanche daughter to the king D. Sancho the Wife, and sister to the last Sancho, was the first which brought the succession of women into Nauarre, although he did not raigne, beeing dead before the king Don Sancho the Strong her brother. D. Pedro Ramires of Pedrola, Bishop of Pampelone, among others did faithfully maintaine the rights of this king Thibaud, who was called the Elder, to distinguish him from his sonne and successor, being also of the same name: of whose deedes wee haue no great instructions out of histories, onely we haue gathered out of some writings and records tending to other ends, that which we shall relate of him. He was thrice married, as the Spaniards write. First, he had to wife a Lady of Lorraine, daughter to an Earle of Metz, frō whom he was diuorced by the Popes authoritie hauing no children. His second wife was daughter to Guichard Lord of Beauieu, who it may be was the 3. of that name: from which marriage issued Blanche, who was married to Iohn Duke of Brittanie, furnished thered. Thirdly, he married Marguerite daughter to Archembaud one of the Earles of Foix (it may be there is some error in the name, for there is no mention made in the Histories of that time, of any Archembaud of Foix) of whom he begot Thibaud and Henry, who succeeded one after another in the Realme of Nauarre, and one daughter called Donna Leonora, and Don Pedro Lord of the house of Muruçal, which is now ruined neere vnto Mendegorria, so called in the Biscaine tongue, which signifies a redde mountaine.

All

A All these marriages, or at the least the two first, were before his coming to the crowne of Nauarre, which was in the 33. yeare of his age. The manners of this Prince are commended by the Spaniards, saying, That he was liberal, modest, a great builder, louing musicke, curious of matters belonging to tillage, by reason whereof he planted his country of Nauarre with many sorts of vnknowne frutes, the which he caused to bee brought out of France: so as there is yet a kind of Pearre of Nauarre, which they call Thibuatinas, or Thibaudines: he was a great catholike, and zealous of the Romish Religion: the castell of Treuas was of his building.

Disposition of King Thibaud.

In his time there was a great sūre ended betwixt the blacke Monkes Benedictines, and those of Cisteaux, for that the deceased king D. Sancho, would haue changed the ancient Monkes of Saint Sanneur of Leyre, and placed them of the Order of Cisteaux there, the which he could not effect, being violently oppugned by the Benedictines: who during the raigne of king Thibaud lost their cause: but notwithstanding that they were condemned and dispossessed, yet they gaue it not ouer, vntill they were restored to their auncient possession; the which was after the death of Thibaud the second, Henry his brother raigning, to whom they bound themselves to pay 600. charges of corne yearly, vntill they had deliuered the summe of 8500. Maraudis of gold. Finally, to end the new instances which were daily made by the one or the other, D. Sancho Archb. of Toledo, Infant of Arragon, and he of Tarragone, hauing authority from the Apostolike see of Rome, commanded the Monkes of S. Benedict to perpetuall silence, and restored them of Cisteaux to the possession: and after the death of the king D. Henry, the Governour of Nauarre freed the Monkes of this tribute, for the discharge of the Kings conscience, as an excessiue & vniust Imposition: Thus the Cistercian Monkes of S. Bernard, remained in quiet possession of the Monastery of S. Sanneur of Leyre. By reason of the contentions of these Monkes, there were many letters, remembrances, and records of this Monasterie lost, the which did serue much in those times for the illustrating of matters of Nauarre. The Christian affaires in Syria being ill managed, and their estate in those parts declining much, Pope Gregory the 9. caused a Croysado to be preached throughout all Christendome, by the Monkes of the Orders of S. Dominick and S. Francis: wherefore many Princes and great Personages of France and other countries intolled themselves, of which expedition Thibaud king of Nauarre was the chiefe. The Noblemen and Knights Christians, desiring to passe their troupes by sea, could not be accommodated by the Commonweales of Genoa and Pisa, who were then very strong in shipping, by reason of the mutuall warre they had together, to the great preiudice of Christendome. The Venetians in like manner troubled with the affairs of the Empire of Greece, gaue them no meanes to performe this voyage. Wherefore king Thibaud and his troupe were forced to take their way by land into Syria, where beeing arriued at Antioch, after infinit toyle, hauing to incounter with hunger, diseases, and want of all things, besides the enemy, who had seized vpon the passages in the streights of Mouit Taurus, he found that two parts of his souldiers which had come out of France, Nauarre, and the frontiers of Germany, were wanting, beeing either dead by the way, or slaine by the Turks: the remainders of these poore Christians arriued at Acre, which is the ancient Ptolemaide, where they began to make war against the Turks with small successe. A litle before this expedition, the Emperor Frederick the 2. had bin in Palestina: and as if he had had no other occasion to make this voyage, but ambitiously to seeke to ioyne the vaine tide of king of Ierusalem, to the rest which he carried of many kingdomes, he entred the citty of Ierusalem without any resistance, hauing purchased the fauor of Corradin Sultan of Egypt: and hauing caused himselfe to be crowned there, he returned presently into Italy, hauing made a truce with the Infidels. He left some Germane souldiers in those countries to supply the garrisons, who had no good correspondency with the king of Nauarre nor his men, neither could they euer draw any succors from them, for that they held the French to be affected to the Pope, with whom their Emperor had had great quarrels: wherefore they were forced to make war alone. And the more to crosse K. Thibauds good fortune, it fell out that many Noblemen which came in his company disbanded, and returned home, among the which was the Duke of Brittanie: so as the king D. Thibaud, after many vnfortunate Iocounters, was forced to returne by sea into the west.

Thibaud the king of Nauarre goes into Syria.

Rarity of the Emperor Frederick the 2.

K k

Beeing

1238.
Arragon.Valence taken Peopling of Valence.

Being arrived in France, he made some abode there to visit his lands, and then he past into Nauarre. Don Thibaud king of Nauarre made not this voyage in the company of Saint Lewis the French king, as some write: but some yeares before, being in the yeere 1238, where as that of S. Lewis was ten yeares after, or twelue, as some asseme, as it appeares by the histories of France.

26 In the same yeare 1238, the city of Valencia, hauing beene long besieged by Don Jaime King of Arragon, and reduced to great necessitie, was yeelded vnto him by Zaen the Moore, who had vsurped that Principalltie, who retiring to Denia, left it without men or goods, leading with him about 50000. Moores, who carried with them (according to the composition) their gold, silver, armes and all their moueables: so as that citie which was held one of the richest and most stately of all Spaine, was to be peopled anew, if they would keepe it: wherefore there were chiefe men appointed by the king D. James, to distribute the houses and buildings, lands, and possessions to the new Colonie, which was sent out of the countries of Cattelogne and Arragon. These were D. Berenger Palatiol Bishop of Barcelona, D. Vidal Canelia Bishop of Huesca, Don Pedro Fernandez d'Acagra, and Don Symon d'Vrraca, knights: who disposed of the places vnto those that should people this great city, according vnto euery mans ranke, dignity, and merit.

There were 380. heads of families, among other men of marke, or old souldiers, (hauing faithfully and valiantly carried armes, as well at this sege, as in former warres) then to this effect inrolled, to hold the first place and prerogative among the Inhabitants thereof, and there were priuate lawes made for them of Valencia: yet the Gentlemen of Arragon, who were appointed for this new Colony, did insist, that they and their inheritors might enioy the priuiledges of Arragon, the which did afterwards breed troubles and dissensions betwixt them and the rest of the people. The Episcopall see was restored to this city, and D. Ferrier of S. Martin was the first bishop, being made subiect to the Arch bishop of Tarragone: notwithstanding that in the Goths time, that church did acknowledge the Metropolitan of Toledo. D. Roderigo Lizana was made the first Viceroy of Valencia, by the king D. James: there were many Christian families found in it, who did exercise their religion in the church of S. Sepulcher, called at this day S. Bartholomew. It was then of a round forme, and but weakly walled, at this day it is enlarged and made square, and hath 12. gates, where as it had but 4. The chiefe city of this realme being now in the power of the king of Arragon, he soone recovered all the other places and forts, which was a goodly conquest, and a great increase to his other Estates. The other places continued peopled with the ancient inhabitants, who were contented to liue vnder the king of Arragon, enioying their religion.

Castile.

Conuersion of
the Moors.

The affaires of Spain being in this estate, D. Fernand king of Castile, after the death of D. Beatrix his wife, married a French Lady called Jeanne, daughter to Symon Earle of Ponthieu, who was somewhat allyed to the house of Castile, by the mothers side; for that her mother, wife to Cont Symon, called Mary, was daughter to Adella Countesse of Ponthieu, grand-child to king Lewis the 7. and D. Isabella of Castile, daughter to the Emperor D. Alphonso. This Lady was very mild, and greatly beloued and honored of the Spaniards. The king had by her the Infant D. Fernand, surnamed of Ponthieu, one daughter called D. Leonora, and another son, whose name was D. Louis. The marriage being consummated, the king led his new spouse through the townes of Castile and Leon, whereas great honours were done vnto her. In the meane time he disposed of all necessarie prouisions vpon the Moors frontiers, where they were continually annoyed by their incursions, to prevent the which, the Gouernor D. Aluaro Perez de Castro, a wise and politick Captaine, omitted not any thing that might concerne the duty of his charge. The Moors were so insolent vnder their new king Mahomad Aben-Alhamar, as D. Aluaro Perez was forced to come in person to confer with the king at Aillon, and to acquaint him with the affaires of that frontier: where the Moors were the stronger, and had a little before his departure, besieged Martos, the which (without the succors which D. Tello Alphonso de Meneses brought) had bin taken, and in it his wife, whom he had left there. Whereupon the king commanded he should be supplied with all things that were needfull: but as this knight returned into Andalusia, he dyed at Orgas, in the yeare 1239, whose losse was great: and at the same time there

A there dyed also D. Lope Diaz de Haro, another valiant and wise knight, leauing one sonne, heire of the teigneurie of Biscay and other lands, called D. Diego Lopes the 3. of that name. The good successe which the kings of Spaine had in their conquests, made them and their subiects the more superstitious. They of Arragon shewed great deuotion at that time, to an image which was found during the war of Valence, to the which there was a Monastery built at Puig, and it recommended to the Monks, called de la Merced. Then was the Episcopall seate of Calaoarra remoued to S. Dominick de la Calçada, by the procurement of D. Iohn Perez the bishop, who spared not his paines to go to Rome, where he obtained what he pretended from Pope Gregory the 9. the holy Father prouiding, and giuing power vnto the Bishop to taxe his Diocesses, for the defraying of his charges. If this touched the glory of God, or the edification of his church, let the wise iudge: but this did not hold, for some yeares after the church of Calaoarra was restored to her former dignitie, and yet that of S. Dominick remained a Cathedral, being in former time but a Collegial, yet one bishop holding both vnto ourtime. At that time there liued a Doctor called Hugues Candido a Iacobin, of whom Spaine makes great account. After the death of D. Aluaro de Castro, the king of Castile, hauing led an army in person into Andalusia, and giuen order for the safe keeping of the city of Cordoua, he tooke partly by force, partly by feare, and partly by accord, the city of Ecija, and the townes of Estepa, Almodoual del Rio, Sierrefilla, Lucena, Luque, Porcuna, Cote, Moron, Castellar, Marchena, Coeros, Cabra, Osuna, Baena, Monrquilar, Tenexir, Ballar, Bute Morgu, Pardal, Cafrá, Ornachuelos, Mirabel, Fuentequemel, Moratilla, and S. Ella, most of which places the knights of Calatrava, they of S. James, and the Prelates obtained from the king, and was giuen to the Noblemen and knights. The kings affaires were much aduanced by the taking of a Moore Almohade, who had past out of Affrick into Spaine, to challenge that which the kings of his race had enioyed there. Caid Arrax then reigned at Maroc, being grand-child to Aben-Mahomad the Greene, borne at Buxaf, who dyed while his father liued.

Townes and castles taken from the Moors.

In the yeare 1240. a truce was made betwixt the king of Castile, and Mahomad Aben-Alamar of Arjona, who reigned in Granada. Vntill this time Don Roderigo the Archbishop and Primate hath written the historie or Chronicle of Spaine. The title which Don Fernand king of Castile gaue himselfe at that time, was, king of Castile, Toledo, Leon, Galicia, Cordoua, and Baeca, leauing that of Nagera, and other small places, for the which he tooke those of the great townes which he had conquered from the Moores. Hee gaue the like titles to the Queenes his mother and wife, as it appeares by that which was written of him in Latin the same yeare, as the custome was then: where particular mention is made of the infants D. Alphonso and D. Frederick, D. Martin Gonzales of Mijancas, being Merino Maior of Castile. Besides the Art of warre, wherein the king was very expert, he was also very careful to maintaine Iustice in his kingdomes, with all other good government, by reason whereof, he transported vnto Salamanca the Vniuersity which D. Alphonso his grandfather had instituted at Palenca, as a place more commodious for the good of all Spaine, and in a country more fertile, and abounding with all things necessary, to which Vniuersity this king, his sonne D. Alphonso, and others their successors, haue giuen great reuenues, priuiledges, and exemptions, so as it is thought there is no Vniuersitie in the world where as the professors haue greater pensions.

Vniuersitie of Salamanca.
27.

Whilet that he busied himselfe in these good and honorable actions, hee had some troubles by the meanes of D. Diego Lope de Haro, who was retired into his country of Biscay, discontented with the King, yet after some little warre attempted against him, by the Infant D. Alphonso, the king was aduised not to estrange from his seruice a Nobelman of so good a race, from whom the kings of Castile had receiued so good seruices in their wars against the Moores: wherefore D. Diego Lope was receiued into more fauor then before.

The truce made with Mahomad Aben-Alamar, expired in the yeare 1241, wherefore the Infant Don Alphonso was sent vnto the frontiers of Andalusia: being arrived at Toledo, hee found the Ambassadors of Alboaguis, or according vnto some, of Aben-Huaci King of Murcia, who went vnto the King Don Fernand, to offer him the Realme of Murcia, whome hee caused to returne backe, marching himselfe with them to receiue this realme, which was voluntarily offered vnto him, hauing in his company Don Pelayo

An. 1241.

K k 2 Perez

Murcia deli-uered to the king
of Castile.

Perez Correa, Master of the Knights of Saint James. The conditions were, that the king Alboarguis should remaine vassall to the king of Castile, and that the reuenues of the Realme of Murcia should be equally diuided betwixt the two Kings, and that the fort of Murcia should be deliuered into the hands of the Infant Don Alphonso, and they should compound with the Captaines which held the other places, the which was put in execution, with them of Alicant, Elche, Orihuela, Ceruillan, Alhama, Aledo, Ros and Cieca: but they of Lorca, Carthagea, and Mula, would not hearken to this composition, whereunto they were afterwards forced. Thus this Realme was vnited to Castile without any paine or danger, whither the king came in person, and was receiued with great ioy and honour.

Arch-bishop in question for the primacie.

An. 1242.

At that time Don Roderigo Arch-bishop of Toledo was excommunicated by Don Pedro of Albalate, Arch-bishop of Tarragone, for that he had past by the Iurisdiction of his Arch-bishoppricke, carrying his crosse, as Primate of Spaine, for which dignity he of Tarragone did contend with him. The cause being pleaded at Rome before Pope Gregory the ninth, he declared by a decree giuen at Saint Iohn de Latran, in the yeare 1242. the sentence of the Excommunication against the Arch-bishop D. Roderigo to be void.

By reason of some losse which Don Roderigo Alphonso of Leon the kings bastard brother had vpon the marches of Andalusia, the king D. Fernand, and the Infant D. Alphonso marched towards the frontier, where diuiding their forces, the king remained in Andalusia, and the Infant tooke the way to Murcia. The king began to ouer-runne the countrie from Andujar towards Arjona and Iaen: he tooke Arjona, Pegalier, Montijar, and Cartejar, he caused his brother Don Alphonso, Lord of Molina, to enter into the Realme of Granado, who spoyle the champion countrie: and approaching nere vnto the cittie, he made a shew as if hee would beseege it, enterdayning his troups about it vntill the king came in person to ioyne with him: where he had an encounter with King Mahomad Aben-Alhamar, who made a sally with aboue eight hundred horse, and great numbers of foote Moores, who were defeated; But after that the King resolved to retire to Cordoua, being not strong enough for such an enterprize. Towards Murcia the Infant Don Alphonso went to beseege Mula, which was his first exploit, for hee had not yet beseeged any place, the which hee tooke, and did much annoy Carthagea and Lorca. King Fernand being aduertised that the Moores came to put victuals into Iaen, and to fortifie it, he sent his brother Don Alphonso to meet them, who not onely repelled them and hindred the victualling, but also spoyle the whole countrie round about. In the meane time the King was come to Pozuelo, betwixt Toledo and Cordoua, to see the Queenes D. Berenguela his mother, and D. Ieanne his wife, which was the last fight betwixt the sonne and the mother. Having spent some dayes there in feasting and pleasure, the Queene-mother returned to Toledo, and the king came to Andujar with the Queene his wife, whom he led to Cordoua, and there left her, whilest that he cared for the warre, especially for the seege which he meant to lay to Iaen, spoyleing the countrie about it, as he also did about Alcala de Benfaide and Illora, running euen vnto the gates of Granado, from whence he returned a victor to Martos. There he found Don Pelayo Perez Correa, Master of the knights of Saint James, who counselled him to inuest Iaen without any further delay: the which he did, and prest it with such fury, as the king of Granado had no time to succour it: who to preuent greater dangers, which he feared to fall vpon him by this warre, resolved to let the king Don Fernand vnderstand, that hee desired to make some good accord with him, if he would grant a safe-conduct to come vnto him, the which was granted: whereupon he came vnto the campe to kisse the king of Castiles hand, who entertained him courteously, so as they were good friends, and made an accord, that the city of Iaen should be deliuered into the king D. Fernands hands, whome the king of Granado should acknowledge for his superior, and come to all assemblies in Castile, and moreover should pay him 150000. Marauidis of gold for a tribute: others say 300000. being the moiety of the reuenues of the Realme of Granado in those daies, for which was esteemed to be 600000. Marauidis of gold, accounting euery Marauidis for 108. deniers, and euery denier for a Marauadis at this day: so as the reuenues of Granado did amount to 64800000 Marauidis, which make 172800. of gold, at 375. Marauidis a peece.

Iaen deliuered to the king of
Castile.

A King Fernand did promise him for his part ayde and succor against a mighty family of the Moores, his capitall enemies, called the Oyselmels. These conditions were faithfully performed of either part, and by this meanes Mahomad Aben Alomar remained peaceable king of Granado. The king Don Fernand hauing thus compounded with him, he turned his forces against the king of Seuille. The city of Iaen (as some searchers of Antiquities do beleue) is the ancient Mentiça, an Episcopal seate in the Goths time. The same dignitie was restored, and the Mefguide made a Cathedrall church by the king D. Fernand, in the yeare 1243. who continued there eight moneths, for that it had bene taken in Winter, and for that it did behooue him to giue order for many things, for the preferuation of his new conquests in that countrie, as also for the distrust hee might haue of the King of Granado, his new ally, whom notwithstanding he had no cause to doubt, being very faithfull. From Iaen he came to Cordoua, where he was aduised to assaile Carmona, whither king Mahomad came to serue him with five hundred Genets. Hauing spoyle the countrie, the two Kings came against Alcala de Guadajaira, which place by the king of Granados meanes, yielded: from thence certaine fore-runners were sent to a place called Axarafe of Seuille, being led by the Master of the Knights of Saint James: and others vnder the conduct of the King of Granado, and the Master of the Knights of Calatraua, were sent towards Xeres. The King being in the mean time at Guadajaira, he had newes of the death of D. Berenguela his mother, whereat he was much grieved, so as the warre of Seuille grew somewhat cold, yet he was so farre imbarcked, as he durst not abandon the frontier to come into Castile. The king of Granado had leaue to returne into his country, the King Don Fernand remaining very well satisfied of him.

Whilest matters passed thus in Castile, all was in combustion in Portugal, by the negligence and basenesse of the king Don Sancho Capello, who was wholly giuen to his wifes humors, being hated of the Portugals, and he himselfe disliked for her sake: for many malefactors and insolent persons were supported by her, who grew daily more audacious in their excesse, without any feare of Iustice, which was troden vnder foote, for their respect. For these considerations (the Queene being also barren) all the Noblemen of the kingdome desired to haue this woman separated, and sent out of Portugall: for the effecting whereof they made great instance at Rome: but neither exhortation, admonition, commandement nor censure could preuaile: for the King did so doat of D. Alencia Lopes, as hee would not leaue her, which the Portugals perceiuing, some of them presumed to seaze on her in the city of Coimbra, & conducted her into Galicia, from whence she neuer returned more into Portugall. Not content herewith (as excesse and insolencies were familiar and ordinarie among them) laying aside all respect and reuerence which they ought vnto their Prince, they sought to depose him from the royall dignitie: whereby it appeared that the whole subiect of the troubles did not consist in the Queene Donna Mencia, but in their ambition and priuate desseignes: for their chiefe desire was, to haue Don Alphonso the Kings brother, who was married to Matilda Countesse of Bologne, and liued in Picardy, aduanced to the royall throne in his place.

Queene of Portugal expected
by his subjects
for her infan-
cies.

E The newes of these tumults being published in Arragon, Don Pedro Infant of Portugal, who was Earle of Vrgel, and Lord of Segorue, intreated the King Don Iaime to send Ambassadours into Portugall to perswade the Noblemen and States of the Countrie to receiue him for Gouvernour, as a Prince of Portugall, who being affected to the good and quiet of the Countrey, would order the affaires, to euery mans liking and content: The which the king Don Iaime did, but it was in vaine, for most of the Portugalls were so affected to the Earle of Bologne, as the Ambassadours of Arragon were forced to returne suddenly.

It was therefore resolved that the Earle Don Alphonso should be called: and to the end that matters might passe with some colour of Iustice and lawfull Order, they sent the Arch-bishop of Braga, the Bishop of Coimbra, with some Noble-men of the Countrey, to Pope Innocent the fourth, who had begunne a Councell at Lions, who did authorize this fact of the Estates by his Apostolike power, and named Don Alphonso Earle of Bologne, Regent of Portugall, leaving the title of King to his brother Don Sancho Capello.

D. Alphonso
called to be Regent in Portu-gall.

*D. Sancho King
of Portugal
abandons his realm in revires into Ca-
stille.*

*6. 8. 10.
1245.*

Booke found in Spain.

An. 1246.

Arragon.

Some write, that the Earle came to Lions, to kisse the Popes foote, and accepted from A his hands the charge of Gouvernor of Portugal, and afterwards at Paris he fware the Articles and capitulations which were made in that behalfe: from whence he went into Portugal with the Popes Briefes, where he was received by the subiects but not by D. Sancho, who would not obey the Popes commandement, but retired into Castile. The Authors do not agree well about the time of this retreat: some saying, that it was during the raigne of Don Fernand: others attribute it to the time of D. Alphonso his sonne, which is the most likely: wherefore continuing to treat of the affaires of Castile in D. Fernands time, we will afterwards returne to the Estate of Portugal.

The year 1245. was the last of the life of Don Roderigo Ximenes Arch-bishop of Toledo, a Prelate of great esteeme among the Spaniards. He dyed in his returne of a voyage from Rome, vpon the confines of Castile and Arragon, in the Monasterie called Our Lady of Huerta or Horta, where he was interred: famous for his doctrine, good life, great experience, and rare eloquence, according to the time, and especially for his hatred against the name of the Mahumetists and Moores, to whom hee made warre with all his power, spirit, body, and wealth: he was a fauourer of the rents and priuiledges of the Clergie, the which he did much augment in Spaine, especially in his owne Sea, and built and peopled many places which had bene ruined. Don Iohn the second succeeded him in the Arch-bishopricke of Toledo, Primacie of Spaine, and Chancelorship of Castile. About the end of Don Roderigo Ximenes dayes, mention is made of a Booke found by a Jew in a stone, in the which it was contained, without any shew of ioyning together: it was written in three languages, Hebrew, Greeke, and Latin, the which made mention of three worlds from Adam vnto Antichrist, shewing the nature and disposition of the men of either world: and in the beginning of the discourse of the third world, it contained, that the Sonne of God should be borne of a Virgin, and suffer for the saluation of mankind: and (the which seemed more then wonderfull) it was written in this booke, that it should be found during the raigne of Don Fernand. Whether this were a thing done of purpose, or accidentall, by this strange inuention, rather then for that which the Booke contained, this Jew was moued to become a Christian at Toledo: for hee might haue learned the coming of the Sonne of God in Isay, and other bookes of the old Testament, and in the Gospell, if he would haue read them.

In Segobia there was a stranger accident of a woman Jew, who had a great deuotion to the Virgin Mary in secret, who beeing wrongfully accused by her husband of adultery, as by the order of law she was ready to be cast downe from a high rocke neere the town, she recommended herselfe to the blessed Virgin, who preferuing her in the fall, layd her at the foot of the rocke without any harme. This Jew beeing ill instructed in her religion, and worse in that of the Christians, published this miracle vnto the people, and was ledde with great admiration vnto the church of S. Mary the great in Segobia, where beeing baptised, she was named Mary that leaped from the rocke: these are the tales of Friar Alphonso d'Espina in his booke called  Fortalitium fidei.

The King Don Fernand hauing a great desire to chase the Moores of Seuille, about the year 1246. prepared an armie at sea in Biscay and Guipuscoa, whether hee sent a Captaine of great experience, called Raymond Boniface, borne at Burgos, inioyning him to be at a prefixt time vpon the coast of Andalusia, that he might at one instant beseege the citie both by sea and land. In the meane time he so annoyed the towne of Carmona, as he forced them to some submission: hee tooke Constantine, the which he gaue to the city of Cordoua, and to the towne of Reyna, wherewith he endowed the knights of the Order of Saint James, the which is at this day a goodly Commanderie. The towne of Lora hauing yielded for feare of a seege, the king gaue it to the Order of Saint Iohn of Hierusalem: he afterwards tooke Cantillana by force, where there were about seven hundred Moores slaine: Guillema yielded by composition, so as they sped well for that time, but rebelling afterwards, it was razed. Hereupon the king fell sicke, which stayed the course of his victories, for that he could not be in person in the army, the which is of great importance: yet Alcala del Rio was taken after a long seege, and a great resistance.

The king hauing recouered his health, they treated a marriage betwixt the Infant Don Alphonso,

*Marriage of the Infant of Castile with
D. Violant of
Arragon.*

A Alphonso and D. Violant Infanta of Arragon, daughter to the King D. Iaime, and the Queene D. Violant his second wife, the which was consummated in the towne of Vailledolit, whether the Princeesse was brought this yeere 1246. By this marriage all quarrels betwixt these two Kings were reconciled: for the King D. James held himselfe wronged by him of Castile for many respects, but especially for that hee had assisted and supported his sonne D. Alphonso, who had conspired against him some yeeres before, with the Nobility of Arragon and Valencia, for that the King D. James, hauing in the yeere 1243. propounded vnto the Estates, assembled at Daroca, to allot portions vnto his children which he had by diuers ventures, that he might leaue them in peace after his death: he had assigned vnto D. Alphonso the eldest, the crowne of Arragon, and to D. Pedro, which he had by Queene Violant, the Principality of Cattelogne: which Pronince notwithstanding he would restraine by the riuer of Sigro, leaving by that meanes the towne of Lerida, in Arragon, whereat the Castellans seemed to be much discontented, and the Infant D. Alphonso more, who would not haue this principality dismembred from the crowne; this businesse being referred vnto the Estates which were held sometime after at Barcelona, the limits and iurisdiction of Cattelogne were extended vnto the riuer Singa, so as Ribagorça and Pallars were contained in Cattelogne: notwithstanding the King persisting to leaue D. Pedro his younger sonne heire of that Prouince, the Infant D. Alphonso conspired with D. Fernand his great vncl, D. Pedro of Portugal, D. Pedro Fernandes d'Aragra, D. Iohn Gonçal of Heredia, and drawing vnto him all the Nobility of Arragon and Valencia, he had taken armes, and being aided and fauored by D. Fernand King of Castile, he had caused great troubles in Arragon, the which the King hauing by good counsell somewhat pacified, hee was this yeere reconciled to the King of Castile, by meanes of this marriage, many Noblemen of both Kingdomes hauing bene mediators therein, yea and some learned men, whereof there were many in Castile, for this King D. Fernand was the first of the Kings of Castile, which did honour his counsell of Estate with learned men, choosing twelve, which were well read in the law, who did alwaies accompany him, the which was initiated by many Kings his successors.

By these graue and learned men, was then begun, by the Kings commandement, the bookes of the lawes of the realme, called Las Siete partidas, the which was finished in the time of D. Alphonso his sonne: a worthy worke, copious and full of variety: this assembly of learned men was continued for a time, and then changed, mingling sometimes church-men amongst them, and knights that were not learned, for the affaires of the Estate. In the end they did conuert it into a Chancery, whereas suites were decided, the which was as a court of Parliament following the King, and afterwards it was diuided into two Courts or Chanceries, one seated at Grenado, and the other at Vailledolit, as we see in our time. In like manner D. James King of Arragon, caused the lawes and customs of Arragon, to be reduced into writing; as it were in one body, hauing til that time benee obserued by tradition, which volume was confirmed by the Estates held at Huefca, in the yeere. 1247.

The King being at Alcala del Rio, he was aduertised that his Admiral Raymond Boniface, was come into the mouth of the riuer of Guadalquivir, with threene ships of warre, which had bene set vpon by twenty Moores ships of Seuille, Ceuta and Tanger, whom the Christians had vanquished, taken three ships, broken and disarmed the second, and sonke one, the rest hauing recovered the sea. Of which danger the King hauing intelligence before, and that there was a fleet of Moores at sea, which attended his army, hee had sent some troupes of horse and foote vnto the sea coast to fauour them, if they should bee forced to run on shoare: but they arriued after the victory: these threene vessels keeping the mouth of the riuer, the land army came and camped about the city of Seuille, in the mouth of August 1247. not without great and bloody skirmishes against the Moores, who fallied out vpon them which made the approaches, especially towards the sea, vsing withall many politike stratagems to fire the ships which lay at anchor within the riuer, which attempts the Admiral Raymond Boniface did valiantly withstand, and repulsed the Moores, so their great losse and shame.

*30 Learned men
first admitted into the counsell of castile.*

Castille

*Las Siete partidas containing the lawes
of castile.*

*Seuille besieged.
An. 1247.*

31

The

The beginning of this siege was so prosperous for the Christians, as the garrison and A Inhabitants of Carmona, being but sixe leagues from Seuille, resolved to yeeld themselves to King Fernand, supposing that if they did protract it any longer, they were vndone. The city being enuironed, and all passages stoppt, so as there could no victuals enter, they were daily in fight both by land, and sea, where the Moores were most annoyed, and therefore they had a great desire to burne the navy, but they found good resistance. Hee amongst the commanders which did most feats of armes, was D. Pelayo Perez Correa, maister of the Order of Saint James, and of the Knights Garcia Perez de Vargas, of Toledo.

Whilst they were busie about this siege of Seuille, the Infant D. Alphonso of Castille was in the realme of Murcia, where he sought to take the towne of Xatua, which is not farre from Valencia, hauing already seized vpon Enguerra; but the King D. Jaime, his father in law, crossed his conquests, saying that he attempted vpon his right, for that Xatua and other neighbour places belonged vnto him, according to the last lymitation. And for that the Infant D. Alphonso did not retire his forces, the King of Arragon tooke Villena and Saix in the country of Castille, the which were held by the knights of Calatrava; and from the Moores he tooke Capdetes and Burgarra, places belonging to the conquest of Castille. These differences being like to cause greater troubles, some great personages interposed themselves, procuring the father in law and the sonne to meet at Almizra, where they reconciled them: yet the King of Arragon shewed himselfe very strict against D. Alphonso, refusing to giue him leaue to conquer Xatua, the which hee promised to hold in doury of his wife Isabel. There they did assigne the lands which should belong to either Realme, appointing for the frontier to Murcia against Valencia, Almanza, Sarazul, and the riuer Cabriuel: and to Valencia, Castralla, Biar, Saxona, Alarch, Finestrat, Torres, Polop, La Meule lez d' Aquas, and Altea, with their confines. The mediators of this accord were the maister of Saint James, the Prior of the Templers, and D. Diego Lopes de Haro, who returned with the Infant D. Alphonso of Castille, and all their troupes, to the campe before Seuille, where the King of Granada arriued also, wel accompanied, and there were some succors sent from the King of Arragon; at this siege there were great and dayly skirmishes, especially about a bridge of boates which was betwixt the city, and the Bourg of Triana, vpon the riuer of Guadalquivir, the which in the end was broken by the Christians, hauing taken the oportunity of a great and violent winde, in the which they let slippe two great boates, the which came with such violence as they brake the bonds wherewith the bridge was tied: the which did wonderfully amaze the Moores.

This great city was so straightly besieged as they began to want victuals, and therefore doubting they should not be able to defend it long, they demanded a composition, the which was granted them vpon these conditions. That the city should be deliuered vnto the King D. Fernand, and that all the Moores that would should depart, with their goods, to whom there was left for a retreat the townes of Saint Lucar, Aznalfarache and Niebla: and for that they should haue time to depart, the King nor his garrisons should not enter but a month after the making of this accord, and in the mean time the fort or castle of the city should be deliuered vnto the King. According to these Articles there went out of Seuille about a 100000. Moores of all ages and sexes, which past into Affrike, besides such as remained in Andalusia and Granada. Thus the King D. Fernand got this goodly great city in the yeere 1248. hauing continued his siege sixteene monthes: it was not commanded by any King, but only by a Gouvernor called Axatuf.

The first thing the King did was to provide for matters of religion: He went in a sollemne procession to the great Mesguide, the which was censed and hallowed, and a Masse song by D. Gutierre clea Archbishop of Toledo, successor to D. Iohn deceased D. Raymond Lozano was chosen Archbishop of that church, the king resolving to enrich it with great reuenues like vnto the rest. The greatest personages which were at this siege with the king D. Fernand, were his children, D. Alphonso, D. Frederic, and D. Henry, D. Gutierre Archbishop of Toledo, hee of Saint James, called D. Iohn Arias, D. Garcia confines of Murcia and Valence.

Seuille yielded to King Fernand.

An. 1248.

A D. Garcia Bishop of Cordoua, D. Sancho Bishop of Coria, with other Prelats and Clergy men, as D. Pelayo Perez Correa the foureteenthmaister of the Knights of Saint James, D. Goncalo Tanes of Quintana, the fiftenth maister of Calatrava, the maister of the Alcantara, the Priors of the Templers and of Saint Iohn, with a great number of their Knights. Of secular Noblemen, there were D. Diego Lopes de Haro, Lord of Biscay, D. Pedro Nunez de Gusman, D. Goncalo Goncalves of Galicia, D. Pedro Ponce of Leon, D. Ray Goncalves Giron, Arias Goncalves Quixada, D. Alphonso Telles de Meneses, D. Gomes Rais de Manganedo, D. Roderigo Aluarez of Toledo, D. Roderigo Froles, D. Fernand Yanes, Ray Goncalves, first Alcaide or captaine of Carmona, Garcia Perez de Vargas, of Toledo, D. Laurence Suarez, and Diego Martines Adalia: all these were in the Land army. In that B at sea was Raymond Boniface Admiral, with many knights and Squiers of Biscay and Guipuscoa, with whom there ioynd many mariners and souldiers Basques, from about Bayonne in France: all that had done the King any seruice in this warre, were rewarded according to their merites and callings, much land, and many houses were giuen to the Nobility, wherein the Clergy was not forgotten. And for that the city was vnpeopled, the King inuited people from all parts, with gifts, preuiledges, and great immunities; so as it was loone full of inhabitants.

Soone after this prize, the King sent part of his victorious army against some places of strength thereabouts, the which were made subiect vnto him, some by force, and some by a voluntary composition, as Medina Sidonia, Alcala, Bejel, Alpechin, Aznalfarache, Arcos & Lebrixa and others towards the sea. By this conquest the King D. Fernand was free from all warre behinde the limits of his Prouince, for hee ment to entertaine peace and friendship with King Mahomad of Granada, who had alwaies carried himselfe faithfully towards him: wherefore he began now to conceiue in his imagination the conquest of all Affrike, and resolved to passe the Straights in the spring, with a great army, against Caid Arax, Miralmumin of Maroc, but death preuented him, in the city of Seuille, newly conquered, in the yeere 1252. hauing reigned in Castille about fife and thirtie yeeres, and in Leon one and twenty. There were present at his death, his sons, D. Alphonso, D. Frederic and D. Henry, D. Alphonso Lord of Molina, the deceased Kings brother, and the Archbishop D. Raymond. Hee gaue many admonitions to his sonnes, touching concord and the publike peace, recommending the Queene Donna Ieanne very straightly vnto them.

This King was reputed a Saint among the Spaniards, but he is not canonized by the Popes, yet he was a great fauorer of the Sea of Rome, and of all the Clergy in General, whom he advanced to honour and riches, as much as any of his predecessors. He did wonderfully persecute the Albigeois, who discovered themselves in the countries, burning them aliue, and he himselfe setting fire to them. In his raigne and during the life of D. Iohn Archbishop of Toledo, Saint Lewis King of France imparted vnto the church of Toledo, some of the singularities which he and others had brought from the holy land, from Egypt and other places; as, of the wood of the true crosse, one of the thornes of our Sauours crowne; of the Virgin Maries milke: a peece of the purple robe wherewith Christ was couered, some of the towel wherewith he wiped the Apostles feet, of the sheet wherein he was buried, and of the toys wherewith he played when he was little, with other such likes, whereof the Princes, Arabians and Turkes, yea and they of Constantinople, made rare presents vnto the French, who (about all other Christians) did reuerence these things, and did afterwards distribute them to other nations. These goodly Jewels were received by the Spaniards with great deuotion, and of this subiect there is a letter found written, by that King Saint Lewis, in Latin, to the Chapter of Toledo, with a seale of gold, giuen at Estampes in the yeere 1248. The death of the King D. Fernand was much lamented by the Christians, and by the Moores also of Granada, who did mourne with great teares and lamentations after their manner.

32 Soone after the decease of D. Fernand, died Thybauld King of Nauarre, the first of that name, in Iuly, in the yeere 1253. in the towne of Pampelone, leauing the realme to his sonne Thybauld the second. After his returne from Syria, he had great troubles and difficulties with the Nobility and commons of his Realme, or that held in fee of him, whom

Death of D. Fernand King of Castille.

Nauarre.

whom he desired (as it was needfull, beeing new come and a stranger) to content, the A which he did by his wisdom great patience and dexterity. Those which crost him most were D. William Vicont of Sola, D. Raymond Arnaud Vicont of Tartax, and D. Gaston of Moncade, Lord of Bearn, who made great complaints of the King; but he gaue them the best satisfaction he could. To the Vicont of Tartax, he gaue Ville-neue, with all the land of Miexa, and Hostaures, and to the rest he gaue other things, so as he pacified them all.

The King had great controuersie with D. Pedro de Gasolas Bishop of Pampelone, for the rights and immunities of his church, the which proceeded so farre, as the Bishop presumed to excommunicate the King, and did not onely interdict his owne Diocese of Pampelone, but the whole realme of Nauar, where by reason of his pretensions and B controuersies, there was no Masse nor Mattins sayd, but whereas the King did force them, from the which they did appeale: and in the meane time the Bishop kept at Nauardun in Arragon: from whence going sometimes forth, the King caused him to bee taken and put in prison as a traitor, but it was too hardy an attempt, the people could not endure it, so as he was forced to set him free. These stormes continued three yeeres, whereas the Spaniards lay all the blame vpon the King. In the end by the mediation of Noblemen, Knights, Prelats and some good religious men, the King and the Bishop were reconciled. The King acknowledged his fault, and the interdiction was taken away, and some affirme that he went in person to Rome to demand absolution, the which he obtained of Pope Innocent the fourth. As we haue sayd, this King died in the yeere 1253. and was buried in the great church at Pampelone. About the same yeere there C died also D. Blanche of Castille, Queene mother to Saint Lewis King of France, leauing vnto her sonne a good title to Castille (if he would haue followed it) and to his descendants: she was buried at Saint Denis neere Paris.

The end of the eleventh Booke.

THE

THE TWELFTH BOOKE

of the Historie of Spaine.

The Contents.

- 1 D. Alphonso the tenth King of Castille and 31. of Leon, the 5. of that name in Castille and the tenth in Leon, or the 11.
- 2 D. Thibaud the second of that name, 23. King of Nauarre. Contentions betwixt him and the Kings of Castille and Arragon.
- 3 Fealty and homage done by the King D. Thibaud to him of Castille, which the inhabitants of Pampelone refuse to subscribe.
- 4 Marriage of D. Alphonso King of Castille, unlawfully sought and broken.
- 5 Exploits of King D. Alphonso against the Moores.
- 6 Factions in Germany for the Empire, and the choosing of D. Alphonso King of Castille to the Imperial dignity.
- 7 D. Alphonso the third of that name, and fifth king of Portugal, his unlawful marriage in Castille, and leauing his lawfull wife, the Popes Censures and interdictions.
- 8 Continuance of the raigne of Thibaud, second King of Nauarre, and his marriages.
- 9 Politique exercises, restauration of townes, priuat studies, and other Acts of D. Alphonso King of Castille, called the wise.
- 10 Negligence and inconstancy of D. Alphonso in the pursuit of the Imperial dignity: indiscretion of Saint Lewis King of France, to quit his interest to the realme of Castille.
- 11 Portugal exempt from all fealty and homage to Castille and Leon, the occasion of great tumults, and conspiracies against King D. Alphonso the wise.
- 12 D. Henry the Grosse, first of that name, the 24. King of Nauarre.
- 13 D. Alphonso King of Castille cast from the Imperial dignity.
- 14 Persecution of the Albigeois in Arragon and Cattalogne.
- 15 D. Ieanne daughter to the King D. Henry, heire of the realme of Nauarre, giues place to Philip the faire, King of France, and therefore is accounted the fine and twentieth King of Nauarre.
- 16 Ciuill dissention in Nauarre, for the gouernment against the French, and their partisans: impieties, murders, cruelties, and the punishments of such excesse.
- 17 The fruitlesse and pernicious voyage of D. Alphonso king of Castille into France. A conference betwixt the Pope and him.
- 18 Enterprises of the Moores vpon the realme of Castille; a continuance of the Estate and Empire of the Arabians in Mauritania.
- 19 Death of D. Fernand de la Cerde the elder of Castille, which was the cause of great troubles in that country.
- 20 D. Pedro the third of that name and ninth King of Arragon: his marriage with Constance the daughter of Manfroy, bastard to the Emperor Frederic, by reason whereof the Arragonois pretend right to Sicile and Naples.
- 21 The children of D. Fernand de la Cerde, reiectd from the succession of the crowne of Castille

- Castille: disnulling of the right of representation: the Law of Toro, contrary unto it.* A 22 Building of the great fort of Alhambra, of Granado and of the two forts of Malaga.
 23 D. Denis the first of that name, the sixth king of Portugal.
 24 Abominable league, and other practises of the Infant D. Sancho of Castille, so dispossesse his father.
 25 Enterprizes of Castillians and Arragenois against Nauarre.
 26 Homage forced by D. Pedro King of Arragon, from his brother D. James, for the Islands of Majorca and Minorca, and other lands of his portion.
 27 Massacre of the French in Sicile, called the Sicilian eun-song, D. Pedro king of Arragon usurpes the Island from the house of Anjou, and the warre which ensued.
 28 Conspiracy in Arragon called the union against the king D. Pedro, for the defence of their preiudges, and the authority of the Magistrate, called the Iustice Major of Arragon. B
 29 Censures against the Infant D. Sancho of Castille, and his rebellion against the Pope. The fathers curse upon him and his posterity, not vaine, the death of D. Alphonso his wife.

Continuance of the royall houses of Spaine mentioned in this twelfth Booke. C

CASTILLE. LEON. NAVARRE. PORTVGAL. ARRAGON.

- |                          |  |                    |                 |
|--------------------------|--|--------------------|-----------------|
| 11. D. Alphonso. 10. 30. | 23 D. Thybaud. 2.                                      | 5. D. Alphonso. 3. | 9. D. Pedro. 3. |
|                          | 24. D. Henry. 1.                                       | 6. D. Denis. 1.    |                 |
|                          | 25. D. Jeanne, and in respect of her Philip the faire. |                    |                 |

D. Alphonso the eleuenth of that name, the tenth King of Castille and thirty one of Leon.

Castille.

THe Moores of Spaine were reduced to that extremity, as they did all obey the Kings of Castille and Arragon, as their vassalls, euery one in their iurisdiction, the yeere that D. Alphonso the eleuenth came vnto the crowne: but they continued not long in this Estate, for as liberty is the most pleasing of all things, when as they found any subiect of alteration they embraced it. Yet in the beginning they kept themselves quiet, seeking to confirme the alliances which they had made with the King D. Fernand deceased: and for that King Mahomad of Granado shewed himselfe ready to doe this homage, the King D. Alphonso, who was alwaies bountifull, abated him 50000. Marauidis of gold of his yeerely tribute, beeing in the city of Seuille, where hee was proclaimed and crowned King of Castille, Leon &c.

The first Ordonance he made, was to decry the money which was then currant, called Pipions, in place whereof he caused an other peece to be coyned, which they named Burgaleses,

A Burgaleses, euery one being ninety deniers, six deniers making a solz, and fiftene solz a marauidis of gold, so as the Burgalois and the marauidis in gold were all one in value. This change of money made all things deere in Spaine, whereupon the King did much augment the Estates fees and ordinary pensions of his followers. The first alteration which happened in the Moores countries, was in Tareda, but they were easily suppressed, for the petty King of that place, called Amet, was so amazed, as hee quit the place vnto the Christians, and fled into Affrike.

We haue sayd before that King D. Alphonso had married D. Violant daughter to D. Jaime or James King of Arragon, by whom hauing no children in six yeeres they had liued together, he intended to leaue her: whereupon hee sent into Denmarke, to treat a marriage betwixt him and Christienne, the Kings daughter, attending the returne of his Ambassadors at Toledo, where he was againe visited by King Mahomad of Granado. The King of Arragon hauing some intelligence of this diuorce, which D. Alphonso pretended to make, was much discontented, and in a maner ready to proclaime war against Castille, if he had not bin diuerted by some noblemen and great personages of his realm, notwithstanding their subiects, vpon the frontiers, did for a long time spoile one another, & their was a league also made betwixt Arragon and Nauarre, which did incense them more.

Thibaud the second of that name, and three and twentieth King of Nauarre.

C
 2 This league was to defend the realme of the young Thybaud the second, who had succeeded his father in the yeere 1253, being not yet 15 yeeres old, whose gouernment, and the Regency of the realme was in the hands of Marguerite of Foix his mother. The Histories of Nauarre say, that the King of Arragon came in person to Tudele to visit the Queene widow, and King Thibaud her sonne, whereas they made an offensive and defensiu league: the King D. Jaime offering vnto the widow and to this Pupil, whatsoever hee could doe, or they demand, alwaies reseruing the rights which he pretended in Nauarre, the which he would end friendly, when as King Thibaud should be come to age, and in the meane time it was agreed that being of full yeeres, he should marry D. Constance or D. Sancha, daughters to the King of Arragon, and if King Thibaud died, then should D. Henry his brother marry one of them: the King of Arragon promising moreouer not to marry his daughters into the house of Castille, without the consent of Queen Marguerite: she promised also for her part, to do her best endeauor that the King her son should not marry with any of the daughters of Castille, lawfull, nor bastards, especially of King Fernands second marriage. In this league was comprehended the French King, and the Emperour, by Queene Marguerite: and the King of Arragon would insert a condition, that this present league should be allowed and confirmed by the Popes authority, within a certaine time, and great penalties and censures set downe by him, for them that should breake it. The Queene mother was assisted by D. Garcia Almoravid, D. Sancho Fernandes of Montagu, D. Garcia Gomes of Agoncillo, D. Gonzalo Yuanes of Bazan, D. Corbaran of Leet, D. Martin Garcés of Eusa, D. Pero Gonzales of Morentiu, D. Martin Gonzales of Morentia, D. Guerero Siere, Symon Gros, D. Pedro Ximenes of Valtierra, and D. Lope Arceiz, Deane of the Collegiall church of Tudele, who did all solemnly sweare to obserue the Articles of this league. The company beeing gone from Tudele, the King of Castille was presently aduertised of the league which they had made; whereupon hee sent many companies of horse and foote vnto the frontiers of Nauarre, pretending that the realme did belong to him, and that hee would pursue his right by armes. On the other side Queen Marguerite the Regent, manned the townes & forts ioyning vpon Castille with good garrisons, being also succored by the King of Arragon; so as the Castillians passed no farther at that time. In the meane time King Thibaud grew to be full 25 yeeres old, wherefore they thought it fit to declare him of age, & to crown him, the which was done in the yeere 1254, in the great church of Pampelone, where

League confirmed betwixt Nauar-
re and Arragon.

where he did sweare to obserue and augment the preiudges of the country. Being in A possession of the government, he would haue the alliance and league which his mother had made with the King of Arragon newly confirmed, for the effecting whereof, the two Kings met in the church called our Lady of Montagu, where they did capitulate: and it was sayd that the King D. Jaime should defend the realme of Nauarre against al, and that not any one of the two Kings should make any peace or truce without the consent of the other, for assurance whereof, especially of the aboue mentioned marriages, there was deliuered in pawne, for King Thibaud, the forts of Gallipienço, Arguedas & Monreal: and for Arragon, the castles of Rueda, Sos and Vncastillo: which places should remaine in the hands of certaine knights of Nauarre, who notwithstanding should be discharged by the King of Nauar of the oth which they did owe him, and with his consent should take B an oth to the King of Arragon, with a reseruatiō and promise to yeeld the places to him against whom the other had made the offence: all this was promised and sworne by both Kings, and the chiefe of their subiects; for the King of Nauarre, by D. Sancho Fernandes of Montagu, Senechal of the realme, D. Garcia Almoraid, D. Gil of Rada, D. Gonsalo Tuanes of Barzan, D. Martin Ximenes of Ayuar, Fernand of Leet, Ramir Perez of Artonis, D. Corbaran of Leet, D. Arital of Luna, D. Pedro of Varillas, and other knights, with six Bourgeses of Tudela: and for the King of Arragon, D. Alphonso Infant of Arragon, D. Garcia Bishop of Tarrassone, D. Garcia Romco, D. Pedro Cornet, D. Symon de Foffes, D. Frederic Lizana, D. Pedro Martines de Luna, D. Sancho d' Antilla and others. In this league were comprehended and named by the King of Nauar, the King of France C and his brethren, and by the King D. Jaime, Charles Earle of Prouence, brother to the French King. This being concluded betwixt these Kings, the warre grew hot and furious vpon the frontiers of Nauarre and Castille; where the King of Arragon did more willingly assist, for that the same year the Moores of the country of Valencia being rebelled to the number of 60000. vnder one Alardrac their leader and captaine, the King of Castille did support and aide them vnder hand, vpon a secret hatred which hee bare vnto the King D. James: yet by the diligent endeauors of some great personages, there was a truce made for some months, during the which the King D. Jaime being come into Nauarre, D. Diego Lopes de Haro, Lord of Biscay came vnto him, and made himself his vassal, being discontented with the King of Castille, which was no smal aduantage for the D affairs of this league against Castille: for D. Diego was a braue & valiant captaine. King D. Alphonso pretended the realme of Nauarre by ancient right from his predecessors, or at the least that D. Thibaud should doe him homage, as the king D. Garcia Ramires, and the kings D. Sancho, his sonne and Grandchild had done to King D. Alphonso the eight, Emperor of Spaines, and to other Kings of Castille; the which King Thibaud refused, al- leading that it was a forced acknowledgment, without any reason, and that he was so far from submitting himselfe to the Kings of Castille, as he pretended to recouer the ter- ritories of Bureua, Rioja, Alaua, Guipuscoa, and other lands in old Castille which the predecessors of D. Alphonso had vsurped of the crowne of Nauarre: these were the causes which made these Kings enter into warre, who (the truce being expired) went to field E with their forces: the Nauarrois and Arragonois assembling the body of their army about Tudela; and the Castillans towards Alfaro and Calaterra.

Castillans ar-
mes against the Nauarrois and Arrago-
nois.

The Kings of Castille and Arragon lead the contrary armies, and were so nere one vn- to the other, as they expected the houre when they should ioyne: but there were many good men which laboured to preuent this disorder, amongst Christian Princes, so nere allied: The King D. Alphonso gaue him of Arragon to vnderstand, that it was an vnwor- thy thing, and beyond all expectation, to see him that was his father in law, carry armes against him, hauing done him no wrong; wherefore he intreated him not to hinder him in his iust pursute of the right which he had to the realme of Nauar, which the Earle Thi- baud detained from him. The King D. Jaime answered, that he could not in conscience, nor duty, abandon the defence of a yong Prince, which was recommended vnto him, whose F affaires he esteemed as his owne. Many Prelats and men of great authority hauing employed themselves in vaine to make a peace betwixt these Princes, a simple gentle- man of Carrelogne, borne at Befalu, of the house of D. Violant Queene of Castille, preuailed

A preuailed more then al the rest. This gentleman came to the King of Arragon, and per- swaded him with such liuely reasons, as he yeilded to a peace. Hauing done this good office with him, he did the like to the King of Castille, and was so happy in his negotiati- on, as they promised to confer personally together of their disputes and quarrels: where- fore certaine Tents being pitched in a plaine betwixt both armies, the three Kings met, and embraced one another louingly, where they feasted each other, and made a good ac- cord before they parted. Yet notwithstanding the league made betwixt the Kings of Nauarre and Arragon, and the courage which the yong King Thibaud did shew, he yeel- led to doe homage to the Kings of Castille, as his predecessors had done for the realme of Nauarre, for the King of Castille thinking that he had won the King of Arragon, his B father in law, by this enterview, the which in truth did auail him much, for that the Queene Donna Violant his wife was there present, he demanded of King Thibaud the hardest conditions he could, desyring nothing lesse then to make an accord with him: but nothing being refused, they compounded, King Thibaud remayning vassal to the King D. Alphonso: and it was sayd that he should entertaine a Lieutenant in the court of Castille, and that whensoever the King of Nauarre should bee called vpon any occasion of warre, he should be bound to come and serue himselfe in person, or by his sayd Lieu- tenant with two hundred horse. The yong King yeilded to all these conditions, ei- ther for that he was not able to resist his aduersary, or else doubting that the King of Arragon was wonne, or it may be in consideration of the publike quiet; besides hee C did no new thing, but what his predecessors had done before him: yet D. Sancho Fernandes of Calcante, and other knights of Nauarre dissuaded him from it, the like did the Inhabitants of the Bourg of St. Sernin of Pampelone, who after that all the Pre- lats, knights and commonalties of the realme had approued this peace, they still disa- lowed it, and would not subscribe, wherevpon the King did punish them by fines, as mu- times, yet his choller being past, some few daies after he considered that those of Pam- pelone were good and faithfull subiects, louing his honour and greatnesse, and that they had resisted his will by a true zeale, and loue, which they bare vnto the crowne of Nauarre, so as he caused their money to be restored vnto them againe, wherevpon there grew a custome which continued, that in matters concerning Castille, this Bourg did D not set to their scale.

Enterview of the Kings of Castille Arra-gon and Nauar-
re.

King of Nau-
arre consel-
seth himselfe
vassal to him
of Castille.

Inhabitants of Pampelone refuse the humage which they are to him of Cas-till.

Castille.

D. Alphonso
second marriage preuen-ted by his brother.

Genealogie of
Castille.

4 The diuorce which D. Alphonso King of Castille pretended to make, as we haue sayd, from the Queen D. Violant, could not take effect, for that the cause of sterility, which he objected against her, did cease, being the wil of God she should be with child, in the yeere 1254. and yet the Ambassadors which were sent into Denmarke, had wrought so, as they brought the Princessse Christienne to Toledo, wherewith the king D. Alphonso was wonderfully troubled, so as not knowing how to couer this fault, D. Philip his bro- ther presented himselfe vnto him (being Abbot of Vailledolit, and Cuenca Rubia, and designed Archbishop of Seuille, for which cause he had beene brought vp in studie, and had remained sometime in the Vniuersity of Paris) and demanded this Princessse in marriage. It greued the King much to giue D. Philippe a portion, yet finding no better meanes to satue this disorder, hee caused him to marry her, and in fauour of this marriage allotted him great rents and reuenues, but it was short and vnfortunate; for this Princessse Christienne thinking her selfe contemned and scorned, was so op- press with griefe as shee pined away and died. Thus the marriage of D. Violant of Ar- ragon with the King D. Alphonso remayned firme; to whom afterwards shee gaue an ample off spring. Her first child was D. Berenguela, then D. Beatrice, D. Fernand, surnamed de la Cerde, D. Sancho who was King after the father, D. Pedro, D. Iohn, D. Jaime or James, of all which wee will hereafter make ample mention, and in the end thee had Donna Isabell, and Donna Leonora: Besides these lawfull children, F the King had D. Alphonso Fernandes, whose mother is yeknowne, and D. Beatrice, begotten of D. Mayor Guillen of Guzman, daughter to Don Perez of Guzman, in which familie the Kings of Castille haue often found Ladies for their seruice: This daughter D. Beatrice was Queene of Portugal. The same yeete of our Lord 1254. there came vnto the Archiepiscopal dignity of Toledo, and Primacy of Spaine, one called L1 2 D. Sancho,

D. Sancho, whom the Spaniards hold to bee an Infant of Castille, sonne to the King D. A. Fernand deceased, and brother to this Alphonso, but it is not verie certaine. D. Pascal successor to D. Gutierre, had bene Archbishop before him. The same yeere there arrived at the Court of Castille, Edward, sonne and heire to Henry the third, King of England, who according to the custome of those times, was armed and made knight, by the King D. Alphonso.

Moore.

As for the Moores, they were, as wee have sayd, diuided into petty States, except Granado: all which had done homage to D. Alphonso King of Castille. In Algarbe there reigned in this quality Aben Mosad, who held Niebla and Xeres: a Lady a Moore ruled at Lebrixa, or Nebrissa, and Arcos: Murcia was held by Mahomet Aben Hudiel, and other places by other captaines and Lords, which did al hold of the King of Castille, to whom notwithstanding, when occasion serued, they shewed no great loyaltie: wherefore in the yeere 1256. King D. Alphonso dispossessed al these petty Kings, & he received Xeres of the frontier, by a voluntary yeelding, where D. Nugno de Lara was made Governor, and Garcia Gomes Carillo, a hardy knight, his Lieutenant. Arcos and Lebrixa, following the example of Xeres, yeelded also to D. Henry the Kings brother, who was sent thither from Xeres. The yeere following 1257. the King came into Algarbe, where he tooke the towne of Niebla, and appointed lands about Seuile for King Aben Mosad, and many rents in that city, so as by this meanes he had al the rest of the country of Algarbe: that is, the townes of Gibraleon, Huelma, Serpa, Mora, Alcabin, Castro, Martin, Taura, Faro and Laule, al held by Moores, who did not in any sort acknowledge the King of Granado, with whom D. Alphonso entertained firme friendship, so as hauing ordained an Annuity in the city of Seuile, for the King D. Fernand deceased, the which was celebrated yeerely in the Cathedral church, King Mahomet Aben Alhamar, sent many of his chiefe Moores thither, with a hundred footmen, carrying so many great torches of white waxe, the which they set about the dead kings tombe.

All matters betwixt Nauarre and Castille, were in outward apparence quiet, but the effects shewed this yeere 1257. that peace betwixt Princes, is most commonly entertained by no other bond, but their pleasures and commodities, without any respect of accords, othes or promises: for the king of Castille hauing raysed a mighty army, vnder collour of some doubt he had of the Moores, caused it to turne head towards the frontiers of Nauarre, to make some notable breach there, before they suspected him. Wherefore the two Kings, D. James of Arragon and D. Thibaud of Nauarre, went sodainely to armes, and soone after D. Henry Infant of Castille, the Kings brother, and D. Diego Lopes Dias de Hare, sonne to D. Diego Lopes Dias, who was dead a little before, at the bathes of Bagnerets, came vnto the King of Arragon, being at Estelle, with whom they made a league against Castille, the Infant making great complaints against the King D. Alphonso. With the young Lord of Hare, there came D. Diego Lopes de Mendoza, Michel Inigues de Saaça, Inigo Ximenes of Nanclores, Sancho Gonçales of Heredia, Ruy Sanches of Landa, which were all principal Noblemen of the Prouince of Alaua: Lopes of Velasco, Gonçalo Gomes of Agüero, Lopes Garcia of Salezar, Lopes Inigues of Orozco, Sancho Garcia of Salzedo, D. Gonçales of Cauillos, great Noblemen in the Mountaines, who came al with D. Diego Lope Dias their Lord, & did there homage to the King D. Jaime, promising to follow him against all Princes wheresoeuer he would lead them. The affaires standing vpon these termes, likely to breake out into an open combustion, those which loued peace labored in such sort, as the Kings of Castille & Arragon had an interview at Soria, where a new accord was made.

Nauarre.

And for that the Estates which king Thibaud had in France, that is to say, Champagne & Brie, required his presence, or of some great personage, Queene D. Marguerite went thither, but she died in the towne of Prouince, from whence she was carried to the Monastery of Cleruaux, and there buried: for this cause the king was forced to go himselfe, wherefore he recommended his country of Nauarre to the king of Arragon, and left a French knight for Seneschal and Governor thereof, his name was Joffry of Beaumont, of whom the Nauarrois made no great account, and lesse of the king of Arragon, to whom they would yeeld no obedience, so as there began to be a breach of friendship betwixt

A twixt the Nauarrois and Arragonois, in the yeere 1257. at which time D. Gil de Rada, a knight of Nauar, did homage to the King D. Jaime for his castle of Rada, for him and D. Maris de Leer his wife. The Seneschal seeing the cōsūry, which was committed vnto him, ready to fall into a combustion, came vnto the king D. Jaime, who was at Barcelona, and obtained of him an assurance of peace, for a certaine time betwixt the two Estates.

The King of Castille finding himselfe in peace with all his neighbors, both Christians and Moores, he tooke care for the good gouernment of his subjects, who at that time made great complaints, for that by reason of the altering of the value of coines, al things were growne exceeding deere, which thinking to preuent, by setting a certaine price vpon al wares that were sold, he wrought a contrary effect; so as the death increased, wherefore he disannulled that law, and gaue them free liberty to sell their victuals & wares at their pleasures. About that time there was great trouble in the Empire of Germany, betwixt Conrade sonne to Frederic the 2. King of Naples and Sicile, and William Earle of Holland, both which carried themselves as Emperors. The death of Conrade happened, who (as the Italians write) was poisoned by Manfroy his Lieutenant and bastard brother, who vlturped the realmes of Naples and Sicile, which the Popes would draw vnto them, since Frederiks time, and exclude the house of Soane: notwithstanding that Conrade left Conradin his son and heire, in whose preiudice Manfroy made himselfe king, sugieling that he had newes of his death in Germany, hauing in the meane time corrupted some to poison him, as he had done the father, but they failed him their vowed seruice. William Earle of Holland had bin chosen Emperor by the practises of Popes against Frederic who held that title vnto his death, which was soone after that of Conrad: for hauing war against the Frisons his rebels, he was defeated by them and drowned in a Marsh. He being dead, the Electors of Germany were diuided, some struing to haue a Prince of Germany chosen; according to the lawes of the Empire; and the others (it may be corrupted with money) sought to haue some forraigne Prince placed in the Emperiall dignity, that he might pacifie the troubles and rümults which did afflict Germany, and Italy. Two Princes were then vpon the file: Richard sonne to Lohn King of England, and brother to Henry the third, then reigning; and D. Alphonso King of Castille. Conrad Archbishop of Cologne and Lewis Count Palatin of Rhin Electors, practised by the English man who was present, did chose him King of the Romans, where vnto the Archbishop of Mentz consented: But Adolph duke of Saxony, the Archbishop of Treues, and the Marquis of Brandenburg, disallowing of this Election, they named the king of Castille, who was absent, who being aduertized of this Election by a sollempn Ambassage, yet would he not go into Germany, hearing that Richard would force obedience by armes, & that the war was hotter among the Germains then before, wherefore attending the euent, he kept himselfe within the city of Toledo.

7 The same yeere of our Lord 1257. D. Sancho Capello King of Portugal, whom they had deprived of the gouernment of the realme, to giue it to his brother D. Alphonso of Bologne, came into Castille, to King D. Alphonso the wife (according to the most certain Authors) intreating him to aide him in the recovery of his dignity, and to punish his rebellious subjects, who had made his brother their King in his life time: wherevnto the King of Castille was well affected: but a priuat respect made him to abandon the cause of the afflicted, for the Earle of Bologne, Regent of Portugal, knowing that his brother made this pursuit, intreated King D. Alphonso by his letters, not to trouble him in the charge wherevnto he had bene called by the Estates of the realm, for lawful considerations, the which had also bin allowed and confirmed by the authority of the Romain sea. That if he would forbear to annoy him; he promised to marry D. Beatrix his bastard daughter, which was then of age to be married, & would be diuorced from the Countesse M. hault his wife, & moreover did reuiue the ancient homage which Portugal did to Leon. These offers made king D. Alphonso to open his eares, who entertayning the king D. Sancho with good words, concluded the marriage of D. Beatrix, with the Regent his brother, to whom he gaue in doury the country of Algarbe, newly taken from the Moores. This vnion of the realm of Algarbe to that of Portugal, was the cause that from that time the kings of Portugal carried in their armes, a border guenles semed with castles or

Castile.

6 Factions in Germany for the Empire.

Impiety of Manfroy Frederiks
bastard.

Richard of England chosen Emperor.

Portugal.

D. Alphonso of Portugal
leaves his lawful wife the Countesse of Bologne, to marry with Beatrix of Castille.

D. Sancho Capello spoiled of the realme of Portugal.

without number, the which were since reduced to the number of seuen. The King D. A Sancho Capello being out of al hope to raigne in Portugall, died soone after in Castille, where for that short time he was entertained in a royal Estate, by D. Alphonso King of Castille, whose case was like vnto his some few yeeres after; for he was dispossessed by his owne sonne D. Sancho, where it was happy for him to haue preferred the friendship of the Moores: for there was not any Christian Prince, that did either fauor him or aide him. Whilst that the King D. Sancho of Portugal liued, the city of Coimbra resisted D. Alphonso his brother, and would neuer acknowledge him for Regent; and much lesse for King. And the writers of Portugal say, that the newes of the Kings death being published; he which commanded within the towne, whom some call Fleet, demanded a passport to goe vnto Toledo, to informe himselfe, he began to sigh, and to lament the aduerture of this Prince, and to protest of his loyaltie vnto him, and of the affection of the citizens of Coimbra, and laying the keyes of the city vpon his hands, he sayd, that seeing he had receiued them from him, with the charge and government thereof, he deliuered it vp vnto him againe: and then resolving to acknowledge King D. Alphonso for his lawfull Prince, and to draw the citizens therevnto, he returned into Portugal.

D. Alphonso the third of that name, the fifth King of Portugal.

Marriage.

BY the death of King D. Sancho Capello, which was the fifth yeere of his age, hauing B raigned foure and thirty yeeres, leauing no children, the realme of Portugal fel to D. Alphonso his brother, without any dispute, who was crowned King in the city of Lisbon, in the yeere 1257. and being married to two wiues, hauing no lawfull cause of diuorce from the first, he was the cause of many troubles and miseries to the realme of Portugal, for the preuenting whereof he had beene called. He had children by the Countesse Mahault: Fernand, who accompanied his mother into Portugal and there remained, and Robert who succeeded his mother in the countie of Bologne. Fernand, whom some call Peter, lies in the Monastery of Saint Dominike of Lisbon which this King built.

The Countesse his mother led him with her, when as being aduertised of this second marriage she came into Portugal, to know the cause why she was thus abandoned. She landed at Cascais, a sea towne at the mouth of the riuer of Tayo, fise leagues from Lisbon, and from thence sent to intreat, exhort, and to summon the King her husband of his duty: for want whereof she made the protestations ordayned by the Canons in that cause: but she could haue no other reason nor answere from the King, but if it were lawfull to breake the lawes, it was for a kingdome; and that if he thought to augment his dominions by marrying againe, he would euery day take a new wife. These were the fruits of her voyage, and D. Alphonso shewed himselfe so rigorous vnto her, as hee would not vouchsafe to see her, nor to heare any counsell that was giuen him by his seruants, who had a regard to Iustice, & feared God more then him; wherefore this poore Countesse returned, and left this sonne in Portugal: being in France, she made her complaints of the disloyalty of her husband to the King Saint Lewis, and sent some to doe the like to Pope Alexander the fourth, that by his Ecclesiastical censures, D. Alphonso might be forced to leaue D. Beatrice, and take the Countesse his lawful wife againe. The Pope did what he could, exhorting, commanding, yea and excommunicating the King, and interdicting his realme, but D. Alphonso was so obstinate as he suffered the realme of Portugal to remaine interdict ten or twelue yeeres, as long as the Countesse liued. During the which time the Portugals had leisure to forget that which they had learned in religion, when as the King finding himselfe free, he was absolved by Pope Clement the fourth, retayning D. Beatrice without any let, who in the meane time brought him foure children, the Infant D. Denis, so called for that hee was borne on Saint Denis day, in Continuity of D. Alphonso King of Portugal.

Genealogie of Portugal.

A in the yeere 1261. who was king of Portugal and Algarbe: the Infant D. Alphonso who was Lord of Portalegre, Ronches, Murban, Castile de Vide, and other lands, and had to wife D. Violant daughter to D. Manuel of Castile, sonne to D. Fernand the third, and two daughters D. Blanche, who was a Nunne in the Monasterie of Lorban, and afterwards Abbesse of Saint Mary de las Huelgas of Burgos, and D. Constance. Besides these lawfull children, this king D. Alphonso had one bastard sonne called Fernand Alphonso of Portugall, and one daughter whose name was D. Leonora of Portugall, married to an Earle called D. Gonzalo. Whilst he stood excommunicated, he made warre against the Moores which remained in Algarbe, in the yeere 1260. and chased them out of Faro, Laule, Algezir, and Albofera, and augmented his dominions therewith. Hee built the towne of B Castro of Portalegre and Extremos: he repayed Veja, and other places which had beene roined by the Moores. He did not leaue to build Monasteries and religious houses during the Interdiction: for he finished that of the preaching Friars of Saint Dominike at Lisbon, and did build that of Saint Clara, of Saint Iren, and others: he gaue great almes, and did many charitable deeds, to expiate the sinne which he intended, by the taking of a second wife, not beeing separated from the first. Moreover, to ease the people, and to haue greater store of fruites in the country, he caused certaine barren and waste ground to be tilled: neither did he forget to maintaine Iustice, punishing theues and malefactours, whome his brothers carelesnesse had made insolent. To conclude, although he were defective and blemished in his marriages, yet was hee a profitable Prince for his country.

1260.

Religious houses built by D. Alphonso during the interdiction.

C Whilst these things passed in Portugall, and that the warre continued in Germany Castile, against the fauourers of Richard elect king of the Romanes, D. Alphonso king of Castile sent an Ambassage of certaine Cleargi-men to Pope Alexander the fourth, the which were D. Dominicke bishop of Auila, D. Garcia bishop of Sylues, and Iohn Alphonso Archdeacon of the church of Saint Iames, learned men, and of great authoritie, who demanded assignation of the time of his Coronation, and also to contradict the election of Richard, who did not care to prosecute his right by iustice, but by force and armes. Attending the euent of these troubles, and the returne of his Ambassadors, D. Alphonso king of Castile ordered some things touching the policie of his Realm, he decayed those sorts of money which he had coyned, called Bourgalois, and caused others to be made, which they called blacke pence, and in old Spanish, Prietos, fiteene of which were worth a Maraudis of gold: and he made other lawes which were profitable to the Common-weale. Whilst he was busie about these things, and irresolute of his voyage into Germany, hee had another crosse which stayed him more: for his brother D. Henry a turbulent Prince, and an enemy to all quiet, committed many insolencies at Lebriza, where he did remain; tending to open rebellion: wherefore he sent D. Nugno de Lara from Seule to suppress him, by whom he was vanquished, and forced to fly to Valencia, from whence the king Don Iaime caused him to dislodge, for that he would not discontent his sonne in lawe: wherupon he past into Affrick to the King of Tunes. This Prince foure yeares after crost into Italy, and was made Senator of Rome (which is the chiefe dignity of that city) and grew to haue great authority and credit in the estate of Italy, in the time of Pope Clement the fourth, who was successor to Vrbain the fourth.

8 The king of Nauarre, who was come into France, finding his affaires in great disorder, sought to settle them, & to maintain his rights in the Counties of Brie and Champagne, beeing in controuersie, the which he preferred by the fauour and authority of the King Saint Lewis: and moreover a marriage was made betwixt him and Isabel of France, the kings daughter, at Melun, whom he led into Nauarre. D. Iaime king of Arragon was the mediator of this marriage, who in a manner at the same time gaue his daughter Isabel in marriage to Philip the Hardy, sonne to the king Saint Lewis, and heire to the crown of France, promised vnto him long before. King Thibaud had not any children by this Princeesse, wherefore his brother Henry succeeded him in the Realme of Nauarre. He had one bastard-daughter called D. Marquise, whose mothers name was D. Marquise Lope de Rada, who we may coniecture was allyed to that Gil de Rada, who it may be for this iniurie left Nauarre, and retired into Arragon, where he did homage to the King D. Iaime for his castell of Rada. This daughter was afterwards married vnto Don Pero Fernandes Lord

Nauarre.

children of king Thibaud the 3.

castile.

compiler of
the lawes of Spaine.Tables Astrono-micall of Don
Alphonso.

Lord of Ixar, sonne to the King D. Iaime, and to D. Theresa Gil of Bedaura, whom he had A secretly married, as we haue sayd.

9 It was at that time that by the commandement of D. Alphonso king of Castile, many learned men laboured to reduce into one body, the booke of the lawes of Castile, commonly called las siete partidas, which the King D. Fernand had caused them to begin, and which since hath beene augmented by the succeeding kings, with many ordonances, the which was reviewed againe by Pero Lopes Alcocer, Doctor Escudero, Pero Lopes Arrieta, and in the end by Bartholomew of Aricena, Lawyers: these are the lawes by the which the Realmes of Castile and Arragon are gouerned, and the administration and practise of Iustice in those countries.

This King Don. Alphonso giuen to study, it may be more then was fit for a Prince B which had so great a kingdome to gouerne, caused also those famous Astronomical tables to be made, which carry his name, hauing drawne into the city of Toledo a great number of men learned in the Mathematickes and Physickes, as well of his owne countries, as out of Affricke and other parts, both Christians and Arabians, where he comprehends a certaine supputation of the heauenly motion of the starres, and planets, and of their aspects and incounters, setting downe for a rule and fundamentall point of all astronomical account, the situation of Toledo, where he consumed an infinit treasure. Hee did beautifie these goodly Sciences of Physicke and Philosophie, causing the writings of the Arabians, and other Ancients to be put into more familiar tongues: whereby he deserves, that thankfull posteritie should maintaine a commendable memorie of his vertue: yet he is to be blamed, for that these honest exercises did so rauish his spirits, and hindered the care he ought to haue had of the affaires of State, that hee shewed himselfe so slacke and negligent, as thinking to be Emperor, he found himselfe not onely excluded from that dignity, but also dispossessed of his owne Realme; hauing reaped no other fruites of his studies, but the vaine surriame of Wise and Learned. Which doth admonish Princes to preferre action before contemplation, yet ioyning the one to the other with moderation. He left some markes of him in the Prouince of Guipulcoa, in the town of Mondragon, the which was so called by him for certaine causes, whereas the auncient name was Arragate: and did indow it with great priuiledges, whereof the letters are to be seene at this day, Giuen in the towne of Exnatorafe, called at this day, as the Spaniards say, Adelantamiento of Caçorla, which are the most ancient letters which are to be found in the Castilian tongue in all Spaine: for vntill this Kings raigne, all records, instruments, and publike writings were made in Latin: but he brought in the Castilian style, in all sorts of writings, causing many bookes, yea of the holy Scripture, to be translated into that tongue, whereby it was much beautified. In this priuiledge there are many assistants or witnesses named, as well of his owne Realmes, as strangers: which shewes, that his Court was frequented (as if hee had beene peaceable Emperour) by Princes and Noblemen of the Empire, which are there named his Vassalls: as Hugh Duke of Bourgogne, Guy Earle of Flanders, Henry Duke of Lorraine, Lewis Earle of Beaumont, and other Princes holding their Lands and reuenues in fee of the Empire: Many Princes of the Moores are there also named as Vassalls to this King. In the same qualitie are named in this priuiledge, Gaston Lord of Bearn, Guy Vicount of Limoges, who (it may bee) had some fees in Spaine, or depending of the Empire. Many also are named in this priuiledge as Benefactors: Queene Violant, his children Don Fernand, and Don Sancho, according to the custome of the Kings of Spaine: and of witnesses a great number.

This king Don Alphonso did also cause a collection of the Histories of Spaine to be made, the which is read at this day, called a generall Chronicle. Beeing by reason of these things in great reputation, and esteemed among strangers, by the report (as it is likely) of learned men, whome he did cherish in all countries. The Sultan of Egypt, a Turke which reigned then, called Anandaxuer, sent him presents of cloth, and beastes of Egypt, Lybia, Ethiopia, and other neighbor Countries strange vnto the Spaniards, the which were requited by him with other gifts.

Beeing thus respected by Barbarians afarre off, hee was contemned by them which

A which held their lands, dignities and liues of his bountie: for in the year 1261. there beeing an assembly at Granado, of all the Princes Moores, which held any lands in Spaine, they made a league together, and conspired all against him, and without any long delay, beeing long before prepared, they went to field and forced the townes of Xeres, Arcos, Bejar, Lebrixa, Medina Sidonia, Rota and Saint Lucar, king Mahumet Aben-Alhamar of Granado beeing the chiefe, against whome Garcia Gomes Gouvernour of Xeres defended himselfe valiantly, but it auayled not. This reuolt did much annoy the elect Emperour Don Alphonso, yet hauing sent some troupes of horse and foote, the Moores which were dispersit in the Christians countrie, were soone suppressed.

The Realme of Valencia had beene subdued by the king of Arragon, so as that time D. B Simon de Foffes beeing Vice-roy, there was no alteration in those parts by the Moores: yet this Prince was neuer in good quiet with his subiects, by reason of the importunitie and contumacie of his eldest sonne Don Alphonso, who did continually stirre vp new tumults, vpon colour of portions betwixt him and his brethren: a question which had bin handled, but not decided in many Assemblies of the Estates, and by Iudges appointed by them during D. Alphonso's life-time. He died about the year 1260. soone after his marriage with Constance daughter to Gaston Lord of Bearn. In the year 1261. the marriage of the Infant D. Pedro was consummated (who then tooke the degree of the eldest) with Constance daughter to Manfrey Prince of Tarentum, soone after the celebration of the marriage of his sister D. Isabel with Philip of France, at Clermont in Auvergne. After

C which solemnities the question for the Infants portions was reuiued, with as bad successe as it had beene when Don Alphonso liued: for Don Pedro could not indure that any thing should be dismembred from the Crowne, nor that any lands or titles should be assigned to his brethren, but would haue them to depend wholly vpon him, the which the King their father did not hold fit for the quiet and tranquillity of the Realme, knowing wel the rough disposition of Don Pedro, who was cruell and inexorable: wherefore notwithstanding the protestations of Don Pedro, which were ordinarie, refusing to allow of Order in that respect, but by constraint, and to obey the king his father. It was decreed, that after the decease of the king Don Iaime, the Infant D. Pedro should succeed in the realme of Arragon and Valencia, and should haue by the same right the Principalltie of Cattellogne, limited from the riuer of Singa vnto Cap de Crux. That Don James the younger should haue, with the title of a King, the Ilands of Majorca, Minorca, and the Pityules, and moreouer the Counties of Rossillon, Colibre, Conflans, Cerdagne and Vallespire, with the rights of Montpellier, with charge to acknowledge the Soueraigntie of Arragon for these Segneuries vpon the maine land: but Don Pedro did complaine wonderfully at this portion which was assigned to his brother D. James. There were other quartels pretended by the Nobility of Arragon, complaining that the king D. Iaime did breake their priuiledges and liberties: by reason whereof they made many leagues and factions. The matter beeing debated in the Estate of Sarragossa, and then at Exea, in the year 1265.

E there were orders made for the pacifying of those troubles: As not to giue any honors or militarie fees to any but to Gentlemen of race, and borne in the country. That no Gentleman should be subiect to the tribute of cattell, nor to any other. That in all controuersies which the Nobility might haue against the king, or among themselves, the Magistrate, called the Iustice Maior of Arragon, should be Iudge, beeing assisted by the Councill. That the King should not giue the fees and military rewards, affected to them that do him seruice, as a recompence of their vertue and valor, to any of his lawfull children, who by right haue their portions in the realme. In this assembly of the Estates the King was solicited by the Pope to roote the Moores out of his Dominions, the which was hard to effect, neither was it done.

The warre in Germany began to grow cold by the absence of Richard, who for want of F money was forced to dissolue his army, and to go into England, to make a supply, whereas he found his brother Henry engaged in ciuill warres, whereby he stayed there, and neuer returned into the territories of the Empire: so as Don Alphonso by his delays lost many good occasions to effect his desseignes. Approching neare vnto the Moores frontiers with a great army, he built a castell in the territorie of Alarcos, which hee named Villa

An. 1261.
Moores.

Arragon.

Death of D.
Alphonso 3m.
sant of Arragon

castile.

An. 1263.

Villa Reall, and since called city Reall by the king D. John the second. The place where A it was built, was before called Pozuello of Saint Gil. Leaving all care of the Empire for a time, he made violent warre against the Moores of Granado, Murcia, and other confederates, so as Mahomet Aben-Alhamar was forced to flee to Aben Ioseph Miralumin of Maroc for succors, who sent a thousand genets or light horse Arabians into Spain, in the year one thousand two hundred sixty three, which was the first succors which past into Spaine since that the kings of Maroc had abandoned and lost it, one and fifty years after the rout in the fields of Toloufa, or Muradal in Andalusia. The towne of Xeres was recovered by the Christians, and manned with a great garrison: Bejar, Medina, Sidonia, Rota, and S. Lucar were in like manner taken, as also Arcos and Lebrixa, from whence the king chased the Moores and planted Christians. Port S. Mary was built, and other small exploits of warre done whilest the good time lasted. Winter comming on, the king dissolved his army, the which was exceeding great: for he had called all such as had in former times bene at the warre, and had horse and armes, exempting them of the village of Martiniega, from the Custome of cattel, and other Tributes and Impositions, besides their ordinary pay. The king with some Noblemen stayed at Seville: during this warre which was in the year 1264, his father-in-law D. Jaime of Arragon met with him in Alcarras, with good troupes of souldiers, to second him against the Moores of Murcia, the which with their king was reduced vnder the obedience of the king of Castille, the year following 1265.

An. 1265.

Moores.

The king of Granado was so ioyfull of these succors which were come vnto him out of Africke, and gaue such great intertainment to these Arabians, at his subiects charge, as many began to murmur against him, in so much as the Captaines of Malaga and Guadix, of friends became his enemies, and many of his followers holding themselves lesse esteemed then these new come, conceived a great hatred against him, so as hee began to feare a revolt of his subiects. And for that he would not be engaged in two wars at once, one ciuill, another forraine, he laboured to make his peace with king D. Alphonso, coming vpon assurance vnto him to Alcala de Bencaide, and there sware his fealty and homage anew, in the presence of Mahomet Alamir his son, promising to pay him 250000. Marauidis of gold for a yearly tribute, and renounced the alliance of Aben Hudiel king of Murcia. Wherefore king D. Alphonso did more easily subdue him, who yielded with all his townes, demanding pardon for his offence, the which he obtained by the intercession of the king of Granado newly reconciled: his life was saued, and some rents assigned him, but his royal dignity was taken from him, in the which the king of Castille placed another Moore, called also Mahomet, brother to Aben-Hut, who had bene slaine in Almerie, to whome he gaue the third part of the reuenues of that Realme. As for the Captaines of Malaga and Guadix, D. Alphonso had promised vnto the king of Granado by this last accord, not to fauor them against him, the which he kept at that time, & did procure a truce betwixt them for a season. During the which Mahomet Aben Alhamar came vnto D. Alphonso at Murcia, to intreate him againe (the truce being expired) not to support these two Captaines, which had rebelled against him: wherein the king of Castille dissembled, refusing to promise him directly, for he had an intent to bridle him by this meanes, and in the end to ruine him. Whereupon the king of Granado returned discontented: being in his country, he sought to corrupt the captaines of the king of Castiles forts, which were neere vnto him: namely, Don Nugno Gonzales sonne to the Earle Don Nugno de Lara, who was discontented for the wrongs and grieuances which his father Don Nugno de Lara, and his Vncle Don John Nugnes had receiued from the king, perswading him to rebell against his Prince, with assurance that he would fauour him, and would giue him succors vpon all occasions.

Castile.

During these actions king D. Alphonso, Emperor elect, had newes of the death of Richard his competitor, who had bin slaine in England, at the seige of a towne of smal consequence, being greatly sollicitated by his partisans and fauorers to go into Germany, assuring him that he should be receiued without any contradiction: but he excused himselfe, either for that he wanted courage or mony, or else being stayed by the aduertisements he had of the king of Granados practises: yet he called a Court in the city of Burgos, to con-

A ferre of this voyage with the Estates of his countries, who did exhort him to march, yea offering him money, whereof he had then need, but there was no meanes at that time.

He had sent Ambassadors into France, for the marriage of his son D. Fernand surnamed de la Cerde, with the eldest daughter of the king S. Lewis, called Blanche, as her grand-mother, in the end of the year 1267: this Princeesse being not full ten years old, according to some Spaniards, and the supputation of Garrybay himselfe, who makes profession to be a great obseruer of times. By this marriage was decided a great controuersie betwixt the house of France, and that of Castile, for the succession of the Realms of Castile and Toledo: the which by right, and the custome receiued of the succession of the elder, did belong vnto the king S. Lewis: for that after the decease of the king D. Henry the first, who dyed without children, being slain with a tyle which fel vpon his head, the succession came to his eldest sister D. Blanche, mother to this S. Lewis, and not to D. Berenguela the yonger mother to king Fernand the 3. whom she had by the king of Leon. But the Spaniards disdaining to be gouerned by a stranger, did easily frustrate this right, through the carelesnes of the king S. Lewis, choosing D. Fernand his cousin germaine for their King. In fauor therefore of this marriage made betwixt D. Fernand de la Cerde, son to D. Alphonso the wife, K. of Castile, and D. Blanche daughter to the king S. Lewis, he did quite renounce all the right and interest which he and his successors kings of France might pretend to the crowne of Castile and Toledo, transferring it to Don Fernand and to D. Blanche his spouse, and to their heires. This accord was made in France betwixt the king S. Lewis his counsell, and confirmed by him, and the ambassadora of Spaine, with whom the Princeesse was sent thorough the country of D. Thibaud, who had married Isabel her sister some ten yeres before.

An. 1267.

Marriage of
D. Fernand
with Blanche daughter of France.

S. Lewis quits
the right he pretended.

Nauarre.

The Princeesse and her conductors were honourably intertained by the Nauarrois, although that they and the Castilians were no great friends: yet for that shee was their Queenes sister, they spared not any thing that belonged to duty and honesty. D. Thibaud was then in France, during his absence there were many things done in Nauarre by excess, or through the error of Gouernors, or the policy of neighbor Princes. One of the principall knights of Nauarre called Gonzalo Tunes of Batzan, retired to the king of Arragon, and made a fort vpon the frontiers betwixt Arragon and Nauarre, which hee called Boeta, from whence he made great spoiles in the country of Nauarre. Notwithstanding the friendship which was betwixt the kings of Arragon and Nauarre, yet there wanted no grieuances and subiect of quarrels betwixt them. One of the most apparent pretensions, which the king D. Jaime had, was, that he sayd, that to succor the king D. Thibaud hee had made great expences, whereof he would be rembourfed: making alwaies vse therof when there happened any disorder. The summe which he demanded was so great, as neither K. Thibaud nor his brother Henry, who reigned after him could ever acquit it. About that time, or soone after was the passage of the Princeesse Blanche into Castile, whom the king D. Alphonso her father-in-law receiued at Logroño: the king D. Thibaud arriued in Nauarre, where he labored to set some good order in his affairs, and to prepare all things necessary for his voyage beyond the sea, which he pretended to make with the king S. Lewis his father-in-law. He did somewhat repaire the breach of friendship which had bin betwixt the K. of Arragon and him, and renewed the accord with him of Castile: and hauing left his brother Henry Erle of Ronay, for Gouernor in Nauarre, he came into France, leading with him D. John Nugnes de Lara, eldest son to D. Nugno Gonzales de Lara, and many other knights of Nauarre and Castile. He also led Q. Elizabeth or Isabel with him, whom he left gouernesse of his Counties of Champagne and Brie, and then he parted with the king S. Lewis his father-in-law, who embarked at Marfeilles, with his whole army in May, 1269, to go into Syria: but he was forced by foule weather to land in Sicily, from whence hee past into Africke, tooke Carthage, and besieged Tunes: but the issue of this expedition was vnfortunate, as we may read in the Histories of France.

An. 1269.

Arragon.

F Some moneths before D. Jaime, or James K. of Arragon, moued with the like zeale to make war against the Infidels in the East, and to free himselfe of a vow which he had made, had embarked himselfe, but he was driuen back by a storme to Aiguemortes. Hee had by reason of these enterprises, familiaritie, and treaties with the great Cham or Emperor of Tartaria, sending a Bourger of Perpignan, called Alain, Ambassadour vnto him. He consulted sulted of the voyage at Toledo in an assembly of Princes where hee did protest to go in A person, although he were very old. King D. Alphonso promised money, Michel Paleologue Emperor of Constantinople offered ships and victuals by his Ambassadors, but he could not put it in execution. Yet his children D. Pedro, and D. Fernand proceeded in their voyage, and arrived in Palestina, where they stayed not long. At their returne they landed in the Iland of Sicily, then enioyed by king Charles the first brother to S. Lewis, from whence they receiued great honour and good vjage: there the infant D. Fernand was made knight by the hands of king Charles, whereat D. Pedro his brother took occasion to hate him, and neuer after loued him. As soone as K. Thibaud was gone out of Nauarre, whether hee neuer more returned, the king D. Jaime forgetting not the right he pretended to this realme, made donation and transport thereof to D. Pedro, resigning all his interest to him, by vertue of the mutuall donation made betwixt him and the last king D. Sancho the Strong.

Castile.

In Castile there was nothing but feasting, for the new marriage of the Infant D. Fernand, at the which (being as statly as any had beene scene in Spaine) there were present D. Jaime of Arragon, Philip eldest son to S. Lewis king of France, Edward eldest son to the king of England, who had beene armed knight by the king D. Alphonso: D. Pedro Infant and heire of Arragon, and Mahomet king of Granada, not yet proclaimed an enemy with other Princes Moores: the king D. Alphonso himself, Emperor elect, his brethren and children, with his vncl D. Alphonso de Molina, and a great number of Prelats and Noblemen of his countries, and of France, England, Italy and other places: whither also came the Lords of Lara, D. Lope Diaz de Haro, and other mal-contents, who did then conferre with the king of Granada, and concluded a dangerous league with him. Of this marriage were C born the Infants D. Alphonso and D. Fernand de la Cerde, of whom we will make mention in the discourse of this Historie.

The feast being ended, D. Alphonso Emperor Elect, began to thinke afresh of his passage into Germany, whither they called him by ordinary messages: but whether feare or necessity did hinder him, he could not begin it. It may be the quarrels of Germany seemed too dangerous vnto him, being also loth to charge his subjects with the expences, for the conducting of an army into Italy and Germany: for that his prodigality had exhausted his treasure, and emptied his coffers. For besides the great expences which hee had made in searching out the Mathematickes and other commendable things which amounted to so great summes of mony, as a Spaniard writes, that for the compiling of the work which they call Tabulas Regis Castille, hee spent more then the revenues of S. Peters patrimony could amount vnto in ten yeares. He gaue at one time an hundred and fifty Kingdoms of siluer to the Empreffe of Constantinople, who came vnto him to Victoria, to beseech him to ayde her, to redeme the Emperor Baudwin her husband, prisoner among the Turkes, from whom Michel Paleologue detained the Empire. And withall it is likely, that he spared not any mony to practise the Germaine Electors, by whom hee had beene chosen: together with the feasts, triumphs, gifts and presents of his sons marriage: and the promise for war which it behooued him to make, to defend himselfe against the trecherie of the Moores, and of those that were vnited vnto them. All which things kept him so low, as he had neither meanes nor courage to pursue that which he had ambitiously affected. The rebellion of D. Lope Diaz de Haro, Lord of Biscay, the fist of that name, who had beene made king during the fore-sayd marriage, and of D. Nugno de Lara, and others, may in some sort excuse him. These with other their confederates were entred into a secret league with Mahomet Aben-Alhamar king of Granada, who for his part had openly broken the truce with the captaines of Malaga and Guadix, vassals to the king of Castile, annoying them all he could by open force: wherefore king D. Alphonso came to Seuille to oppose himselfe against this king of the Moores, and to prevent the designes of these conspirators, calling an assembly there of all his knights and other his faithfull subjects. Having a great army readie, and an occasion being offered, hee did assaile and suddenly take the town of Cadiz ill garded, and the Iland which was vnder the protection of the King of Maroc, where the souldiers got great spoiles: but for that there wanted people, he left it still in the Moores hands. This was in the yeare 1269.

Portugal.

The King being at Seuille, D. Denis infant of Portugal came vnto him, being well accompanied

A accompanied by the Noblemen and Knights of the country, who befought his grandfather to make him knight, and moreover, that he would discharge the Realme of Portugal, of the homage and vassalage it ought to the king of Leon. King D. Alphonso was desirous to gratifie this young Prince, sonne to his daughter D. Beatrix: but thinking it would be taken ill by the Noblemen his subjects, hee aduised the Infant to propound it in an open assembly, the which he called to that end. The demand being made in the name of Don Denis, who was yet a child of eight yeares old, by a Knight of Portugal, the opinion of D. Nugno de Lara (who had not yet declared himselfe) was, that by no meanes he should diminish the authority and greatnesse of his Crown, the which he should do, if he did quit this homage to the king of Portugal, and that in any other thing he was of opinion, the king should gratifie his grand-child D. Denis: wherewith the king seemed discontented against the Earle D. Nugno: wherefore the rest seeing that he would haue it so, they aduised him to do it. Whereupon the Realme of Portugal was freed from all homage and obedience due to the kings of Leon and Castile, this yeare 1269. And D. Denis being made Knight by the king, he returned ioyfull to his father, who about the same time was absolved, and the generall Interdict, in the which the Realm had beene for twelue yeres space, taken away by Pope Clement the fourth.

17th aduise
of D. Nugno de Lara.
11.

This prodigality with some other reasons, did much discontent the Noblemen of Castile: and made the Earle D. Nugno to run into open rebellion, for that the king had taken it ill, for deliuering his opinion freely in open Councell. After these things audience C was giuen to the Ambassadors of the Miralmumin Aben-Ioseph, who were come to complain in their Masters name, for the taking and sacke of Cadiz, and to demand reparations: but they were sent home with good words. King D. Alphonso being parted from Seuille to come into Murcia, being at Villa Reall, he was abandoned by his brother D. Philip, the Earle D. Nugno de Lara, D. Lope Diaz de Haro, and other Noblemen & Knights which came into Castile, to put the League in execution which they had made with the king of Granada against their king, and to seeke to draw others vnto them, making the ground thereof to be the dismembring of Portugal from the Crowne of Leon: which league was renewed in Lerma. Many other Noblemen and knights ioyned with them, the chiefe whereof, besides the Infant D. Philip, the Earles D. Nugno de Lara, and Lope Diaz de Haro, were D. Estevan Fernandes, D. Fernand Ruis de Castro, D. Ximen Ruis de los Cameros, D. Jean Nuges, and D. Nugno Gonçales de Lara, children to the Earle D. Nugno, D. Aluar Diaz, D. Diego Lope de Haro, brother to D. Lope Diaz, D. Lope de Mendoça, D. Gil Ruis de Roa, D. Aluar Diaz de las Asturias, and D. Roderigo Rodrigues de Saldagne, all discontented with K. D. Alphonso: some for one cause, some for another.

The first thing they did, after they had sborne the League, was to send the Infant D. Philip into Nauarre, to see if he could draw D. Henry the Regent of that Realme to ioine with them, for the interest he had to pull downe D. Alphonso, who detained so many Provinces belonging to the Crowne of Nauarre, the Confederats promising him (yet without any such intent) to ayde him in the recovery thereof. If hee would fauour them with the forces of the Realme which he had vnder his command, where they pretended to stay, and there assembled all forces, friends and meanes. The Regent Don Henry hauing duly considered of the consequence of this enterprise, being wife and well aduised, excused himselfe, that he was but Lieutenant to his brother, to whom hee must yeeld an account of his gouernement, and that he desired nothing more, then to restore him his Realme in the same estate that he had deliuered it him, without attempting to trouble his Estate by any new enterprises, vpon a vaine hope of bettering it. Don Philip returned into Castile with this answer, being frustrate of his expectation. Soone after D. Henry had newes of the death of his brother K. Thibaud, which hapned in the town of Trapani in Sicilie, in his returne from the voyage of Tunes, whereas the king S. Lewis was also dead, and the army forced by pestilence, and other discommodities, to returne, hauing done nothing of consequence.

17th aduise
of D. Henry of Nauarre to the Confederats
of Castile.

M m

D. Henry

D. Henry the Grosse, first of that name,
24. King of Nauarre.

DOn Thibaud hauing held the Crowne of Nauarre 17. yeares and about foure moneths, and dying without any lawfull children, Don Henry his brother succeeded him in the yeare 1271. he was surnamed the Grosse, for that he was exceeding fat. And although the common opinion be, that fat men are most commonly of a soft and mild disposition, yet this was of a fower and froward conuersation; the which he did especially shew to Don Armingol Bishop of Pampelone, whom he did afflict much. D. Isabel the Queene Dowager who was in France, when as D. Thibaud her husband dyed, receiued his bodie (the which was carried with that of the King S. Lewis) and caused it to be buried in the Church of Prouins: and whether it were for the griefe of her husbands death, or some other infirmity, she liued not long after him. The Confederates of Castile, seeing Don Henry receiued king of Nauarre, sent to Don Philip againe, to sollicite him to ioyne with them in league. The new king Don Henry made answer, that seeing he was now absolute, and was not to make accompt of his actions to any one, hee was very willing to receiue the Confederates into his Realme, and to assist them with all his power: but vpon condition, that they should in like manner come with all their forces and friends, to put him in full possession of the lands of Bureua, Rioje, Alaua, Guipuscoa, and others, the which king D. Alphonso had vniustly vsurped and detained, belonging to the crowne of Nauarre.

Answer of the king of Nauar to the Confederates of Castile.

This demand seemed great and difficult to the Infant Don Philip; and as one which had not reiected all loue of Brother or Country, he refused this alliance which would be so deare and burthensome, and therefore he made answer, that neither he nor his companions had any such power, as to accomplish that which he demanded, confessing freely that he would not do so great wrong vnto the King his Lord, as to dispossesse him of so great a country. The king Don Henry hearing this answer, would not enter into their League, being loth to breake the accords which Nauarre had with Castile, but vpon great aduantage: wherein he did wisely not to incense so mighty an enemy against him. Don Philip returning into Castile, met with his Confederates, to whom he related what he had done, the which they allowed.

Castile.

King D. Alphonso was wonderfully perplexed, during these practises, employing all his friends to pacifie and to diuert these conspirators from their enterprize. First he sent Don Henry Perez of Arana with letters of credit vnto them: the king went in person to Valencia with Queene D. Violant his wife, to intreate the king D. Jaime her father to mediate an accord for him, or to keepe him from ioyning with the Confederates: with whom Don Henry Perez labored in vaine, aduertising the king of all that past, as many of the Councell of Castile did in like manner: wherefore after many messages of either side, and many fruitlesse negotiations, which did rather kindle the fire then quench it, king D. Alphonso was forced to come to Burgos. The Confederates did not onely sollicite the king of Portugal to enter into their league, but also Aben Ioseph k. of Maroc, promising a safe access and all fauor against this Prince: the which was discovered by a letter written by this Morish king in the Arabian tong to the confederates: In the meane time the king of Granada began to make open war against Castile, ouer-running the country of Andalusia with the horsemen which he had out of Affrick: against whom he sent the Infant D. Fernand de la Cerde. D. Alphonso being come to Burgos some of the rebels came vnto him vpon passport, where there were diuers conferences, the king shewing himselfe tractable in many things, for the desire he had to go into Germany: but all preuailed not, notwithstanding that there was an assembly of the Estates at Burgos for this pacification, the which was held without the towne, for the safety of the Conspirators, who reiecting all treaties of peace, retired to Granada, their troupes committing infinit spoiles where they past without any respect, loue, and charity of their country, yea in the country of Guadix, whereas the Captaine a Moore was enemy to Mahomet Aben Alhamar: and they say, they entred into Granada with about 5000 cattel, and many carts laden with spoile which they had taken.

Mahomad

Mohomad Mir, the second King of Granado.

WHile these fugitiue Knights were at Granado, the king there dyed, which was in the yeare 1273. hauing reigned 36. yeares, and some moneths. By their support and assistance, his sonne obtained the Crowne, being also called Mahomad as his father, but surnamed Mir Almus-Lemin, otherwise Abedialle & Aboabdike, and Alamir Aben-Azar: for after the death of Aben-Alhamar there were great diuisions vpon the election of a new king: some demanding a younger brother to this Mahomad Mir, who was called Ioseph Aben Alhamar, others would haue one of the Captaines of Malaga or Guadix, desiring thereby to make them leaue the alliance of the king of Castile, to the end they might vnite all the Moores of Spaine. For the fauour which the Christians did herein to Mahomad Mir, he caused a pallace to be built, which was called the pallace of D. Nugno. Such as had held the party of Ioseph Aben-Alhamar escaped, and retired with him to Malaga, from whence he went & spoiled the country of Granado: But the knights which were with king Mahomad, hauing assembled some forces, went against them, and defeated them neere vnto Antequera.

Monet.
An. 1273.

King D. Alphonso was come neere vnto Toledo, alwaies negotiating a peace, for the which they assembled the Estates againe at Auila, whither came D. Fernand Ruiz de Castro and Roderigo Roderiques de Saldaigne, who abandoned their companions. Nothing being concluded, the King resolved to make war with all violence: he came to Requena, whereas D. Jaime king of Arragon should meet him. During his aboad there, he had intelligence from his Agents in Germany, that the Electors, tyred with his delayes, and desiring to settle a good peace in Germany, had proceeded to a new election in the person of Rodolphus Erle of Habsburg and Holfacia, against the which his said Agents had objected many things, and protested in his name of nullity. These newes did much trouble king D. Alphonso, who was engaged in these ciuill dissensions, the which he then resolved to compound, at what price soeuer, to the end he might go into Germany to recouer his imperiall authority by armes, the which he had let slip by negligence. Wherefore hee sent the Queene D. Violant his wife to Cordoua, with some of his Councell, to treat a peace with the king of Granada, and with his owne rebellious subiects, and likewise with the Miralumin Iacob Aben Ioseph, who threatened to passe into Spaine. He intreated and coniuured the king of Arragon to ayde him to subdue them, if they wold not yeeld to reason, the which he promised, and he sent Ambassadors presently into Italy to Pope Gregory the 10. to make new protestations against the Election of Rodolphus, and to lay open vnto the Pope his pretensions and reasons. The Ambassadors were Friar Aymar a Iacobin, & Fernand of Zamora, Chancellor to the king, and Chanoine of Auila, who deliuered their charge in open Consistorie: yet the negligence and little regard which the king their master seemed to haue of the Empire, did make good the election of Rodolphus, so as they returned into Castile, without any effect.

13.

Pope Gregorie hauing afterwards called a Councell at Lyons, whether he came in person for the reformation of Christendome, especially for the reconciling of the Greeke Church with the Romaine or Latin, and in like manner to relecue them in the East, who went to ruine. He aduised king D. Alphonso, and admonished him by the Bishop of Astorga, to desist from his pretension of the Empire, where hee should do nothing but spend, and thrust himselfe and his kingdome into open danger, without any hope of benefite: which aduice could not please the King, who being aduertised that the Queene, who was at Cordoua, had brought the king of Granada, and the Noblemen Confederats to some reasonable conditions, he came to Seuille, whither all the Noblemen came with the Queene, and the Infant D. Fernand, where as an accord was made. The Noblemen and Knights were restored to the kings fauour, and to their goods and honours.

Councell at Lyons
under Pope Gregory
the tenth.

Accord betwixt D. Alphonso and his rebellious subjects.

An. 1274.

The King of Granada promised to pay a yearly tribute of 300000. Maraudis of gold to him of Castile, and did pay him a great summe of ready money: the which D. Alphonso demanded to make his voyage into Germany, whereof he still dreamed. There was great dispute touching the Capitaines of Malaga and Guadix, for king Mahomad would have D. Alphonso wholly to abandon them. but in the end the Queene D. Violant procured a truce for them for a year. Thus the conspiracie made against D. Alphonso was dissolved in the year, 1274. the which had continued almost five yeares. Hee that wrought best effects in this negotiation of peace, and that tooke most paines was Gonçal Ruiz of Atienza, a gallant Knight, and a faithfull servant to the king D. Alphonso. There is no doubt, but this Prince, by his inconsiderate bountie, his negligence in great affaires, and contempt of his subjects and Councillors, was the cause of great troubles and divisions, which were both preiudicial and dishonorable vnto him, although that conspiracies can not be excused.

Many Princes came to the Councell of Lyons, and many sent their Ambassadors: namely, Michel Paleologue Emperour of Constantinople sent Germain Patriarke of Constantinople, George Acropolite, and Theophanes Metropolitan of Nicea in Bithynia, with charge to make a shew to desire an Accord betwixt the Greeke and the Latine Churches: but in effect it was to diuert, by this goodly pretext, the Armes of Baldwin his aduersarie, and of Charles King of Naples and Sicily, who pressed him, and to assure his Estate which hee had gotten by vniust and violent meanes.

Arragon.

Thither went Don James king of Arragon in person, who came to do his filiall submission vnto the Pope: yet the king being desirous to be crowned in this Councell, by the hands of Pope Gregorie, (a Ceremonie whereof he made great account) he refused him, vnlesse he would acknowledge himselfe Vassall to the Church of Rome, and pay the arrerages of the Rent which the deceased King Don Pedro his father had promised: the which the King Don James would not do, holding it an vnworthy thing, so to debase the greatnesse of his Crowne, and restrain the libertie of his Realme in any sort. Wherefore seeming to haue some feeling thereof by his words, and making his merits knowne vnto the Church, by so many victories gotten against the Moores, in regard whereof, they should do him honour, hee returned very much discontented to Montpellier.

Troubles in Arragon.

Both this yeare 1274. and some others before, the Realme of Arragon and Cattelogne had bene in continuall tumults and rebellions, the Nobilitie opposing themselves against the king, vpon colour of breach of their priuiledges and liberties, besides the continuall practises of the Infant Don Pedro against his brother Don Fernand, who drew the Nobilitie and Townes of Arragon into pernicious factions: Don Pedro proceeding so maliciously, as the king Don James their father was forced to take the gouernement of the Realme, and the managing of affaires from him: the which hee did in an open assembly of the Estates called to that end at Exea, in the which were condemned for contumacie, Don Artal of Luna, Lopes Ortis Sentia, Symon of Ahones, Diego Gurrea, and Pedro Ortis, by the sentence of Roderigo Castellol, holding then the Magistracie of Iustice Maior of Arragon: by reason whereof, and of these seditions and quarrells, hee was afterwards slaine by Bertrand Canelis, and Don William Raymond Odens smothered in the water, by the commandement of the Infant Don Pedro, who accused his brother Don Fernand of treason, and practises against the life of their father: whereof diligent information was made, and Don Raymond Foulques, Vicount of Cardonne, Don Pedro Verga, Galferand de Pinos, and other Noblemen were pursued, both by reason thereof, and for that they refused to do their due seruices and obedience vnto the king, in his warres, voyages, and expeditions, as feudataries are bound, whereuppon they were deprived of their fees and military honours, according to the custome of Spaine, by the which Places and States were giuen to be held in fee, vnder the Soueraignie of the Crowne, vpon condition to yeeld them vp vnto the king being demanded.

It did auail them nothing to obiekt the priuiledges of Cattelogne, which were: That

A That the Nobility might quit the kings obedience in case of controuersies and sutes, especially if there were question of their liberties, and to protest it publicly. To compound which troubles the Estates were assembled againe that yeare 1274. at Lerida, and Iudges appointed by them: but the disorder was so great, as the king incensed with a rash and inhumane fury against his son D. Fernand and his confederates, he gaue him o-uer in prey to his brother D. Pedro, who besieged him in the Castell of Pamar, took him, and caused him to be drowned in the riuer of Singa, and obtained his goods and spoile, for the execution of this cruell act. D. Fernand had married Donna Aldoncia of Vrrera, by whom he left a sonne called Don Philip Fernandes, which was the stemme of the noble house of Castro in Arragon.

Don Pedro of Arragon drowns his brother.

B These disorders were seconded by the proceedings of the Inquisitors Monkes, against them that were suspected to fauour the opinion of the Albigeois, condemned by the Popes. This Commission was affected by Friar Raymond of Begnafort a Iacobine abouementioned, and giuen to Friar Pedro Cadrieta, and William Colonico of the same Order, who inquiring of this crime with great vehemency, did many exploits in Cattelogne, namely, in the Diocesse of Vrgel, where they tooke out of the graue the bones of Araud of Castellbon, and of Ermeinde, or Brunicende his daughter, Grandmother to Roger Bernard Earle of Foix, deceased a litle before, and caused them to be publicly burnt, condemning their memorie. Such was the estate of Arragon after the returne of the king D. James from the Councell of Lyons.

C D. Henry king of Nauarre newly come to the Crowne, was to dispute with D. Pedro infant of Arragon, for the right which he pretended, to the Realme of Nauarre, as Cessionarie to D. Jaime his father: but it fell out happily for him, that there grew so great diuision betwixt the father and the sonne: by reason whereof the Infant D. Pedro entered into familiarity with the king of Nauarre, that he might be fauoured by him in his enterprises: and the better to encourage him, he sent a knight vnto him called D. William of Cruillas, to make an accord betwixt them for this pretended right, whereof the king D. Henry made no great account, yet he gaue him good words, and intainted this young Prince, still keeping Don Jaime in feare, that they would agree to his preiudice, which was a good meanes for the king of Nauarre to be assured of him: for D. Jaime fearing this league should take effect, preuented his sonne, and sought D. Henrys friendship, making a truce for many yeares with him, during the which they should not talke of right, pretensions; nor of any reall nor personall actions. So King Henry the Grosse inioyed his Realme quietly, by the discord of others:

Nauarre.

This king was married before he came to the Crowne, being but Earle of Ronay, to Jeanne daughter to Robert Earle of Arthois, Brother to Saint Lewis: so as hee was allyed to the Royall houses of France and Spaine. The king had Don Thibaud by this marriage, whome the nurse let fall out of a Gallerie, in the towne of Estella, and slue him: some say, it was his Gouernour, who let him fall vnadvisedly, and was so grieved, Generality of Nauarre.

E as hee cast himselfe headlong after the child, and slue himselfe: Hee had no other sonne, Wherefore the masculine line of the Earles of Champagne in Nauarre, ended in this king, hauing continued but forty yeares. Hee had besides one daughter by his wife called Donna Jeanne by her mothers name, who came to inherit the Realme of Nauarre with the Counties of Brie, Champagne, and other Estates of her Father. The Spanissh Authours write, that the King and Queene, her father and mother, caused her to be receiued and declared Queene in the Estates of Nauarre being but two yeares and seuen months old, which was a meanes to vnite Nauarre to France for some yeares. This King Don Henry being Lieutenant in Nauarre for Don Thibaud his brother, being yet vnmarried, had the company of a Lady, the heire of the house of Lacarra, of whom hee begate a sonne, whome he named Henry as himselfe. Being growne, he was much fauoured by the kings which succeeded his father, and obtained the dignitie of Marthall, or chiefe Commander of armes in Nauarre: They hold, that the noble family of Henriques in Nauarre, Lords of Ablitas, is descended from him. D. Henry the Grosse reigned only three yeares, 7. moneths, and 17. dayes. He died in the city of Pampelone in the Bishops palace this yeare 1274. and was interred in the Cathedrall church.

Family of Henriques of Nauarre Lords of Ablitas.

There is no particular mention of his deedes, nor of his gouvernement in Nauarre, but that he brake an vnion made in the time of the king D. Sancho, betwixt the Bourgers and inhabitants of Pampelone, from that time diuided in Nauarriere, a Bourg, the reason that moued him thereunto, is not set downe, but that it it was preiudiciall to the Cittle.

D. Ieanne heire
of Nauarre.
15.

D. Pedro San-
ches de Montagu,
Lord of Calcant,
Regent in
Nauarre.

The heire of Nauarre transferred into France by her mother.

Realme of Na-
uarre, seized
by the kings of Castile and Ar-
ragon.

Donna Ieanne the onely daughter and heire to the king D. Henry, remained in the power of the Estates of Nauarre, beeing onely three yeares old: presently there grew great troubles among the Nauarrois, as well for the gouvernement of the Realme, as for the bringing vp of the Infanta. The gouernement of the Realme was in the hands of Pero Sanches de Montagu, Lord of Calcant: but for the bringing vp of the Infanta D. Ieanne, who was then in the custodie of the Queeneher mother, there was great dispute in an assembly called to that end in the city of Pampelone. Some would haue her deliuered to the king D. Alphonso: and of this number was Don Garcia Almorauid: against these Don Pero Sanches of Montagu, Don Armingol Bishop of Pampelone, with many others, were of opinion, that she should be put into the hands of D. Iames king of Arragon: but the Queene her mother desired she might come into the hands of the French, demanding Philip king of France to be tutor to her daughter and Realme. In these debates which were neither gouerned by modestie nor reason, the Queene (feearing lest some inconuenience should fall vpon her daughter and her selfe, beeing assisted by the Noblemen and Knights which were of her faction) stole away in the night, and carried the Infanta (who was the cause of all the quarrell) with her into France, where shee was courteously intertained by King Philip the third then reigning, her cousin germaine. The Nauarrois hearing of her departure, disputed no more for the daughter, but applied themselves wholly to the vnions which were made betwixt the kings of Arragon and Castile, either of themselves, or receiued King of Nauarre, vpon fauour of the rights which they pretended to haue.
C

Don Iaime of Arragon was first aduertised of the death of the King Don Henry: wherefore hee sent Ambassadors presently vnto the Estates, intreating them not to hinder him in the possession of the Realme which did of right belong vnto him, nor onely by reason of the adoption and donation which the king D. Sancho the strong had made vnto him, but by a more ancient title: for that (sayd they) the kings which had held the Realme since D. Alphonso the Warrior, had vsurped it by force, and were intruders without any lawfull title, to the preiudice of the Kings of Arragon. Moreouer, he let them vnderstand, that there was due vnto him by the deceased kings of Nauarre, 60000. markes of siluer, which did augment and better his pretension to the sayd Realme: for which considerations the Ambassadors required them to receiue the king D. Iaime, or D. Pedro for their king, which they should best like of, promising them all good vsage. On the other side, king D. Alphonso desiring that his sonne D. Fernand de la Cerde should obtaine this realme, renouacing the ancient rights which he pretended thereunto, and without any other request, he gaue him an army to seaze thereon. It fell out that these two pretendants demanded ayde and support one of another, to recouer that which they both desired.

The Noblemen and Deputies of the Estates, seeing the great danger which did threaten the Realme by these diuisions, resolved to send the Bishop of Pampelone, and the gouernour, to Sos, to accommodate their affaires in some sort with D. Pedro of Arragon, who came thither, where they agreed, that in regard of 60000. markes of siluer, they should stand to that which should be set downe by Don Sancho Arch-bishop of Toledo, and brother to Don Pedro, who was held to be a Prelate of a good conscience, and as for the rest, they should vse no force of either side, but all peaceable meanes: whereupon they made truce for a certaine time. The Ambassadors beeing returned, the place of the Nauarrois assembly was changed to Puente la Reyna, whether came the chiefe Prelates, Noblemen, and knights of the Realme, and the Deputies of the Townes of Pampelone, Tudele, Estella, Olite, Sangüessa, Puente la Reyna and others of the same iurisdiction.

There in the presence of this honourable Assembly Don Garcia Ortiz of Aqagna, one of

A of the Agents for the Infant of Arragon, required to haue the King D. Iaime receiued for King of Nauarre, making a large relation of his rights, with promises and asseuerations that it should redound to the great good of the Realme: whilst they are thus busied, D. Fernand de la Cerde, Infant of Castille, entred the country in armes, where he had many knights of his party: Comming therefore by the country of Oja hee past Ebro, and besieged the towne of Viana, but finding it well garded, hee left it, and came to Mendaia, the which he tooke, and afterwards won the tower of Moreda, and committed great spoiles finding no resistance in fields. This force offered by the Castilian, made them incline more to Arragon; and to the end they might preuent the danger which did threaten them, they sent the Bishop D. Armingol againe to the Infant D. Pedro, being at Tarassone, although he were a Castilian; yet was hee not of D. Fernands faction, and with him were the Gouernor D. Gonzalo Yuaues of Batzan, and his sonne D. John Gonzalez of Batzan, D. Gil Balauin Gouernor of Tudele and D. Martin Gaces of Vnca. These Deputies gaue him to vnderstand from the Estates, that they should be very glad if hee had any good interest to the realme of Nauar, and that they desired much to know from him, what good alliance they might now treat together. To whom D. Pedro made answer that he desired there should be a promise of a marriage betwixt the Infanta D. Ieanne, and his eldest sonne D. Alphonso: and if that he should die before shee came to full age, then shee should marry with D. Iaime his second sonne, and if the marriage could not be accomplished with the Infanta, that it should then be with some one of her cousin germans, issued from the daughters of King Thibaud the first, especially of the Duchesse of Brittan. He offered to giue them his sonne D. Alphonso, to assist them in the gouernment of the realme: he did withall lay open vnto them the right which his father D. Iaime had to the realme of Nauarre, and the cession which had beene made vnto him, concluding, if these things were not pleasing vnto them, that they should aduise to receiue him for their King within a yeere, deliuering the whole realme freely vnto him.
C

The Ambassadors being returned with this answer, the assembly was put off to O-
D
lite, where hauing consulted of their affaires, they made an accord with the Infant of Arragon, according to the Articles which follow. That the marriage betwixt D. Alphonso of Arragon his eldest sonne, and the Infanta D. Ieanne should take effect: and if shee should die before the consummation, the Estates should seeke to marry him to one of her cousin germains, daughter to John Duke of Brittain; and in case D. Alphonso should die before the consummation of the marriage, the Infanta, or one of her cousins, should be giuen to him of D. Pedros sonnes which should be next heire to the crowne of Arragon. And whereas the Estates of Nauarre, could not for some lawfull let accomplish it, then they should pay vnto D. Pedro, a hundred and forty thousand Markes of siluer, for the expences hee had beene at in the defence of the realme of Nauarre, and that out of the reuenues of the crowne, besides the 60000. markes which were already due, making in all the sum of 200000. markes, as it was currant at that time, payable within one yeere after the sayd let, accounting from Easter day: which accords should not be any preiudice to the rights and pretensions which his father D. Iaime and he had to the realme of Nauarre, wherein the Estates promised to be fauourable vnto them, and to aide them all they could. These promises were made and sworn by most of the Noblemen and Deputies assembled in the yeere 1274. vpon paine of high treason if they failed, except in regard of the marriages, for that the Princesses were not in their power.

But D. Garcia Almorauid and others, who were otherwise affected, did not allow of these accords, neither would they consent, nor swear them, which caused great troubles and diuisions within the realme, neither did any of these Articles take effect, for that Philip King of France, tooke the realme of Nauarre into his protection, and made his sonne King, to whom hee married the Infanta D. Ieanne, frustrating the King of Arragon; for the Queene D. Ieanne widow to D. Henry, beeing retired into France, with the Infanta her daughter, heire to that crowne, and being aduertised of all that had past in the assembly of the Estates at Olite, was so incensed, as shee deliuered her daughter into the hands of King

Accord betwixt the Estates of Na-
uarre and D.
Pedro of Ar-
ragon.

Nauarre under the protection of the French.

King Philip, who receiued both her and the realme of Nauarre into his protection, and caused her to be brought vp with his two daughters, Marguerite and Blanche, whom he had had by his second wife, Mary of Brabant, being also very young. This Infanta D. Jeanne was tall, beautiful, and of as good a grace as any Princeesse of her time, wherefore King Philip married her very yong, by a future promise, to his sonne Philip, surnamed the faire, who succeeded in the realme of France.

Eustache of Bellemarche Governor of Nauarre.

16 The Estate of Nauarre standing vpon these termes D. Garcia Almoraid, a great enemy to the Gouernment of D. Pedro Sanches of Montagu, Lord of Calcante, and a fauourer of the Castilian faction, tooke occasion to enter into quarrell and to trouble the realme, vpon certaine iarrs which were betwixt the Inhabitants of Pampelone, who had bene long diuided and in mutiny one against the other. Those of the quarter, called Nauarriere would haue made certaine fortifications against the Bourg, but they were hindred by the Gouernor, who thought that such barres betwixt the Inhabitants of one towne would be the very nurfes of hatred and sedition: Wherefore D. Garcia taking vpon him to support the Inhabitants of Nauarriere, the realme grew into such factions, as there was nothing but Insolences, murther, thefts and such like disorders committed; to remedy the which the Estates were againe assembled at Pampelone, whereas disagreeing who should gouerne the country, they resolu'd to send into France, to beseech King Philip to send them a Nobleman to supply the place of Viceroy, for their Princeesse, who was vnder his Gouernment. King Philip sent them a knight, who was wife and very vertuous, called Eustache Beaumar, or Bellemarche, who was receiued and respected, in whose hands the Estates did sweare fealty vnto their Queene, whose person he did represent.

This knight by his wisdom and milde courtes did soone reduce the realme to a quiet peace, D. Jaime King of Arragon, being icalous that the French did thus set footing into Nauarre, and being out of hope of the marriages which were concluded with his sonne D. Pedro at Olite, he beganne to demanda the other point of the Capitulation, which was to deliuer him the Realme, and that the Estates should assist him with their forces to recouer his rights, the which being not accomplished, a warre began betwixt Nauarre and Arragon. The pacification made within the realme by the French viceroy, continued not long, for some knights, enemies of all rest, began vnder hand to accuse, and to speake seditious words against their Gouernor, saying, that it was an ignominious thing for the Nauarrois to be gouerned by a stranger, seeking to draw the people of Pampelone into a muteny. Moreouer hauing practised some gentlemen of Castille, neere vnto the frontiers of Nauarre, making them to enter the country in hostile manner, to the end they might draw the Gouernor into armes, and to haue means in some incounter or charge, to dispatch him. The French Gouernor seeing the affaires troubled towards Castille, came to Estella, hauing giuen commandement to all knights and souldiers to come thither with their armes and horses, where he was aduertised of the treason which was plotted against him: wherefore in the night time he returned to Pampelone, where hauing complained in open council of this treachery and rebellion, he did wonderfully amaze the confederars, but especially the chiefe actors, seeing their mallice discovered: wherefore as it often happens that the wicked, being reproched of their wickednesse, grow more impudent and mad, these conspirators were so rash, as they commanded him to retire into France, saying, there were men ynough in Nauarre, better able to gouerne then he: to whom the Gouernor answered, that he doubted not of the sufficiency of the Noblemen of Nauarre, and that for his part hee had not affected that charge, but it had bene imposed vpon him by King Philip his Lord, who was Tutor and Protector of their Queene and her realme; wherein they (who were priuat persons) should not hinder him, neither was he resolu'd to obey them: notwithstanding hee would assemble the Estates, and if it were sayd by a common consent that he should retire into France, he would obey, so as they gaue him a discharge, and testimony of his administration, otherwise he could not with his honour shew himselfe before his King, the which he esteemed more then his life.

The assembly being called at Pampelone, there was nothing concluded, for they found

A found not any iust cause why they should refuse the Gouernment of this French knight: wherefore after many disputes, and seditious speeches vsed by the confederats of D. Garcia Almoraid, the chiefe Author of this disorder, they departed, and presently went to armes: so as the Gouernor was constrained to fortifie himselfe in the Bourg of Saint Sernin: the Inhabitants whereof promised to assist him; and to die at his feet, rather then to suffer him, who was Lieutenant to their Soueraigne Princeesse, to take any wrong, whether also D. Corbaran of Bidaure retired. Against this Bourg, they of Nauarriere banded for the other faction, D. Garcia Almoraid being their head: committing all acts of hostility, one against the other, which choller and the fury of a barbarous multitude could inuent; so as neither the authority, admonitions nor intreaties of Prelats, and other great personages, which seemed Neuters and Meadiators of peace, preuailed any thing, but did rather adde oyle to this fire.

They did labour much to make a truce for forty daies, which did but giue them means to fortifie themselves, to commit all the cruelties which ensued, for the mutines of Nauarriere during the truce drew in, by the means of the Bishop Pampelone, great supplies of strangers, with the which the truce being expired they attempted the Bourg: but seeing they could not force it, they went into the Vignes of the aduerse partie, the which they cut and pulled vp by the rootes; and not satisfied therewith, they murdered all the little Infants which they of the Bourg had put forth to nurse in those villages, beating out their braines (with a most barbarous inhumanity) against the stones and walles, adding to these impieties, many iniurious words against their aduersaries, to the dishonour of their Queene.

Moreouer this brutish people hauing intelligence that D. Pedro Sanches of Montagu, who in this last tumult had bene opposite to the Gouernor Eustache Bellemarche, would reconcile himselfe vnto him, they came in the night into his lodging, and murdered him cruelly. Such insolencies did the Inhabitants of Nauarriere commit against the Maiesty of God and their Queene: wherefore they drew a heauy Iudgement vpon them: for the French King being aduertised of their rebellious actions, vpon the discovery of their conspiracy, was wonderfully offended: wherefore he raised a great army, meaning to punish those which had carried so little respect vnto his greatnesse, and had bene the cause of the ensuing miseries, which army he himselfe would lead into

D Nauarre, in the yeere 1276, but being arriued at Saluaterre in Bearn, and forced to stay there some time, by reason of the abundance of snow which had fallne, and stoppt the passages of the mountaines, he was so sollicitated by them that were not well pleased with this voyage, as he resolu'd to returne, giuing the floure of his army to Charles (the Historics of France call him Robert the second) Earle of Artois, to conduct it into Nauarre, who crossing the mountaines by Iacca, came by Sanguessa to Pampelona, refusing to passe by the Valley of Roncal, for that the Inhabitants held the party of them of Nauarriere: To whose succors there were certaine bands of Castilians entred into the realme, who would haue retired, when as they heard of the coming of the French, but being charged in the reereward, they lost some men, and as they retired slowly, the French and Nauarrois of their party charged them againe, wherevpon they turned head, but they were defeated and put to flight, with great losse. And for that during the fight the Nauarrois cried often vnto the Castilians, Aqui tornais? that is to say, doe you returne? and that this demand was often heard; they say that the hospitall which was builded to bury them that were slaine in this incounter, was for this caused named Aqui tornais, and so continues vnto this day. The Earle of Artois besieged Nauarriere, the which he prest in such sort, as D. Garcia Almoraid, who was within it with many of his confederates, fearing they should not bee able to defend it, got out in the night, abandoning those miserable wretches to the punishment which they had deserued. These commanders retired to the castle of Sar, from whence the French dislodged them, forcing them to flie into the Island of Sardinia.

The Inhabitants of Nauarriere finding themselves in the morning without captaines, were much troubled, and like men which were better theues and mutines then souldiers, they beganne to cry out for mercy, and to craue pardon of the Earle of Artois, who seeming

D. Garcia Almoraid chiefe of a faction.

Pampelone diuided into two factions.

Bishop of Pampelone a fauourer of the seditious.

D. Pedro Sanches de Montagu murdered.

An. 1276.

Earle of Artois sent into Nau. to punish the rebels of the realme.

D. Garcia Almoraid abandoning the rebels.

Nauarriere of Pampelone ruined.

Seuerer punished.

Castile.

Pope ratifies
the election of Rodolphus.

seeming to pity them much, whilst he entertained them with words on the one side, hee A caused the walles and forts which were vnmanned to be assailed on the other, so as the souldiars entred sodainely, and made a cruell butchery of this wretched people, neuer ceasing to kil whilst that day lasted, and when night came they fel to the spoile, committing such excesse and violences, as victory, hatred and fury doth sugiest to insolent fouldiars: and not content to haue slaine the men, and taken their goods, without respect of holy or prophane, they extended their rage euen vnto the houses and buildings, which they did ruine and burne: wherewith the other quarters of the towne were indo-maged, the fire flying from one to the other, doing great harme to them that had not offended. The Chamber of accounts was fired, where there were many titles, letters and ancient Records of the realme of Nauarre burned: the rest which could bee saued, B was carried to the castle of Tiebas, whereas the Treasor and Chamber of accounts of Nauarre hath continued long. The fury beeing ended, those which had escaped the sword, were condemned, and publicly executed as traitors: not any one escaping the seuerity of that sentence, but such as the innocency of their age excused, and all their goods were confiscated.

Thus Nauarriere of Pampelone was ruined by a iust iudgement of God, in reuenge of the brutish cruelties; which these mutines did vse against innocent age, in the villages, against the city, and other their insolencies and rebellions. For the murther committed vpon the person of D. Pedro Sanches of Montagu, Lord of Calcante, and other their insolencies, there were called in question and accused before the Estates of Nauarre which were called to that end, D. Goncal Inigo, John Ingalbiz and his sonne, Symon of Varriz, Michel Garces of Varriz, Garcia Perez of Ligoani, Pedro Ximenes of Sabalca, Symon Perez of Opaco, Ineque Gil of Vrdauiz, Sancho Iniques of Vrdaniz, Goncalso of Arbiçu, and Ruy Gon-gales his brother, Sancho Perez of Aguerre, & Ochoa Perez his brother, John of Armenda-riz, John and Sanches the Biscain, al which appearing not, their cause was more hainous, hauling for their aduerser parties, Ruy Peres of Echales, Fernand Perez of Echales, Michel Perez of Subica, and Pedro of Aybar. By these proceedings and excutions, the rest of mutines were terrified, and the realme remained in peace.

17 During these actions in Nauarre, D. Alphonso King of Castille, made preparation to march, with an intent to desposse the Emperor Rodolphus, who had beene chosen to his preiudice, notwithstanding that he had beene perswaded by many of his friends not to make any more account of the Empire, seeing the occasions which might haue fauored him were lost: yea Pope Gregory being come to the council of Lyons, considering the miseries which might come to Christendome, if D. Alphonso should wilfully pursue his pretended right, hee sent one vnto him, called Fredul Abbot of Lunel, afterwards Bishoppe of Ouiedo, to perswade him to rest satisfied with his royall Estate, and not to trouble himselfe any more with the affaires of the Empire, seeing that by the consent of all the Electors, Rodolphus had beene crowned in the towne of Aix La Chappelle. And to make him beleue that hee gaue him fatherly counsell, hee dispensed with him to take the tenth of all the reuenues of the Clergy, for fixe yeeres to make warre against the Moores. But D. Alphonso being obstinate, hee thought that if hee went to see the Pope, he might draw him to set downe some order betwixt him and Rodolphus, so as both might intitle themselves Kings of the Romans: wherefore hee told the Abbot of Lunel, that he desired to passe into France, and to conferre personally with his Holinesse, in some commodious towne, either Montpellier, or where hee pleased.

The Pope hearing this answer, perswaded, himselfe that D. Alphonso had no great desire to be Emperor, wherevpon without further deliberation, hee ratified the Election of Rodolphus, with the consent of the whole consistory, in a conuocation at Lyons, calling him King of Romans, and commanding all the Princes and Prouinces of the Empire, to obey him: aduising Rodolphus to passe speedily into Italy, to receiue the crowne of the Empire. It may be he had regard to the diuersity of humors betwixt the Germans and Spaniards.

D. Alphonso hauing in the meane time seized his affaires, with his Nobility, and giuen

A giuen order for the government thereof (not caring to seeke any truce with Aben Joseph King of Maroc, holding it would be dishonorable, which notwithstanding was the cause of great mischief, as we shall see) he went from Toledo, to goe into France, to the Pope, yet was he aduertised, that he had proceeded to the confirmation of Rodolphus. He was accompanied by D. Manuel his brother, the Queene D. Violant the Infants D. Sancho, D.
John, D. Pedro and D. Isime his children, with many Noblemen and Knights of Marke, of Castille, Leon, and his other dominions. He left the government of the realme to his eldest sonne D. Fernand, and the Moores frontier, to the Earle D. Nugno of Lara. Hee had giuen order to haue a fleet prepared of many ships, in the ports of Asturia, Gallicia, and Andalusia, the which coasting along Spaine, Languedoc and Prouence, should attend him at Marceilles, being furnished with many souldiars, and great store of victuals;
B sending with it the superfluous horses and baggage of his traine. D. Alphonso marching through the country of his father in law D. Isime, he came to Tarragone where he was honourably entertained by him, then they arriued at Barcelona, about Christmas, in the yeere 1275. D. Alphonso stayed there with his traine six weekes, being often aduised by the King of Arragon, not to proceed, giuing him many great and considerable reasons: but there was no means to diuert him from this voyage, beeing so farre aduanced.

Being come to Perpignan, hee stayed some time to conclude of the time and place of their interview; the towne of Beaucaire was chosen, and the Archbishop of Narbonne had commandement to goe and meet him, and to conduct him. Hee left the Queene his wife and his children at Perpignan, except D. Sancho whom he sent into Castille, by the aduise of the King of Arragon; and crossing Languedoc hauing the Archbishop for his guide, he arriued at Beaucaire, whereas the Pope met him with some of the chiefe Cardinals, the council of Lyons being ended. D. Alphonso treated of many matters with the Pope, but he could not obtaine any thing that hee propounded. He shewed him the nullity of Rodolphus election by many reasons, complainyng greatly of his corfirmation, making a great instance vpon that point in vaine; but the Pope wanted no excuses. Then he laied open to the Pope the reasons he had to the succession of the house of Suabe after the death of Conradin King of Naples and Sicile; and Duke of Sua-be, who was inhumainly beheaded by the French at Naples, in the yeere 1269. who ha-
uing left no lawfull children, the succession of the house belonged to him, in the right of his mother D. Beatrix, who was the right heire of that Dutchy, whereon Rodolphus had to his preiudice seized: besides he complainyng of the French King, who had in-truded, and seized vpon the realme of Nauarre, which by ancient rights belonged to the house of Castille, whereof he produced some reasons to iustifie his saying, but all was in vaine: finally he besought the Pope to be a mediator for the deliuey of D. Henry his brother, who since the battaile, and defeat of Conradin, was prisoner in the hands of Charles King of Naples and Sicile. D. Alphonso propounded many other things vnto the Pope, but without any effect: So as he spent the whole spring and part of the Sommer
E in this negotiation, vntill that the Pope leauing him much discontented, returned to Rome, yet hee still vsed the title and armes of the Empire, vntill that he was forced by censures to leaue them, the Archbishop of Seuille hauing charge to intimate them vnto him.

18. King D. Alphonso being buised in this vaine pursute, the Moores his confederats and vassals of Spaine, called in Aben Joseph Miralmumin of Affrike, thinking they might not onely shake off the Christians yoke, but make some notable breach in the Estates of Leon and Castille, the King being absent, or at the least they should seize vpon Andalusia;
and for that wee haue often made mention of this King Aben Joseph, it is needful we should relate what he was, and treat some thing of the Moores Estate in F Affrike, for that those of Spaine haue had their support from them. The Miralmumin Aben Mahomad the old, of the race of the Almohades, beeing dead, after he had lost the battaile of Muradal, we made mention that his Grand-child called Caid Arrax, reigned, who was the sonne of Buxaf, dead before his father Mahomet. This Caid Arrax was the fifth King of Affrike, of the race of the Almohades, whose Empire extended from the West

An. 1275.

Pope and is.
Alphonso
King of Castile met at Beaucaire.

Complaints & request of D.
Alphonso to the Pope, but in vaine.

Moors.

Kingdome of Tremessen.Kingdome of Fez.Almorada the first Miralmin of Maroc.Budebuz the seventh King
of Maroc.Jacob Aben Ioseph first King Merin at Maroc.

West Ocean vnto Egypt. There were many Admirals, or Gouernors vnder him, ruling A the Pröuinces; among the which Gomaranga Aben Zein, of the Linage of Abdalues, held that of Tremessen, who behauing himselfe couetously and violently in his gouernment, fell in disgrace with his King Caid Arrax, so as carrying himselfe rebelliously, the King came and besieged him in a castle called Tremezezir, whereas a Moore, cousin to Gomaranga, going out of the fort slue the Miralmin, seeming to yeeld vnto him, and shewing him a place whereby the castle might be taken. The army amazed at the death of their King, was instantly set vpon by the garrison of Tremezezir, being led by Gomaranga, and put to flight, by which victory the Moore did appropriate that Pröuince vnto himselfe, causing himselfe to be called King of Tremessen, and this was the beginning of that Kingdome.

At the same time there was in the city of Fez, a family of Moores, called the Benataxes and Merines, which descended from a famous Moore, called Merin, who had bene a Christian and became a Mahometist. The chiefe of this house at that time, was called Bucar Aben Merin, and gouerned the city of Fez, vnder the Miralmin Caid Arrax; after whose death, and the defeat of his army by Gomaranga, before Tremezezir, this Bucar Aben Merin fell vpon the Almohades, which had escaped, and gathered them. felues together about Fez, whom hauing put to rout, he carried himselfe for King of Fez, imitating that which his companion Gomaranga Aben Zein had done in Tremessen, and giuing a beginning to this new Kingdome. A brother of his called Jacob Aben Ioseph, C vnturped (in the same troubles) the Principality in Ribat: so as the Estate of the Almohades reigning in Maroc, was then much decayed. These being aduertised of the death of Caid Arrax, and of the tyrannies aboue named, did presently aduance a kinsman of his, to the royall seat, his name was Almorada, who was the sixth Miralmin of the race of the Almohades. He was no sooner crowned King, but he went to field with an army, to punish these rebels which had intitled themselves Kings in their gouernments: First he came and assailed Bucar Aben Merin, the new King of Fez, but he was repulst, and vanquished by him; so as the race of the Merins kept the possession of Fez, and of the territory, in the plaine country, or Algarue, as the Moores call it. So as Bucar dying a peaceable King, his sonne Hiaja reigned after him, vnder the tutelage of Jacob Aben Ioseph, his vnkle, for that he was then very young, but he liued not long; wherefore Jacob Aben Ioseph remained heire of the realme of Fez, and was much esteemed and feared amongst the Moores, being called (as an honour) the old or elder of the Merins. This Moores good fortune was not so bounded for Budebuz nephew to Almorada king of Maroc, being rebelled against him, and retired to Fez, he gaue him an occasion to get the realme of Maroc, and to ioine it vnto Fez. Budebuz intreated Jacob Aben Ioseph, to aide him against his vnkle, promising to giue him all that he held of the realme of Fez, vnto the ruler Natab.

Jacob Aben Ioseph gaue him such succors, as Almorada being amazed, durst not attend him within Maroc, but fled, being pursued by certaine horsemen which Budebuz sent after him, whom they ouertooke and slue, carrying his head to the King of Fez: wherefore Budebuz was peaceable King of Maroc, the seventh and last of the Almohades. Finding himselfe settled in his Kingdome, he would haue mocked Jacob Aben Ioseph, who had helped him to attaine this dignity, not caring to performe any promise, but threatened to take Fez from him, by reason of which Ingratitude, there beganne a cruell waire betwixt them, the which hauing continued three yeeres, at the last it was ended, by the defeat and death of King Budebuz, being slaine in battaile, of whose Estate Jacob Aben Ioseph seized, giuing an end to the raigne of the Almohades, and a beginning to that of the family of Merin in Affrike, about the yeere of our Lord 1270. It is this Jacob Aben Ioseph, which we haue sayd, had sent one thousand light horses Arabians into Spaine to Mahumet Alhamar King of Granado, vnder the conduct of a capitaine with one eye, of great authority: with whom D. Alphonso the wise, King of Castille, hauing not vouchsafed to treat of a truce, when as he went in France to court the Pope, Mir Almuz who had succeeded in Granado, and hee conspired together, to the preiudice of Castille, and all the Christians in Spaine: for this King of Granado being discontented with the

Accorde

A accords which he had made at his first entrance, in the which he could not procure King Alphonso to abandon the capitaines of Malaga and Guadix his enemies, he feared that these Moores which had bene enemies to his father and him, would attempt some thing against his realme; and therefore he resolted, at what price soeuer, to ruine them. And for that it was a meanes to imbarke him in a warre with the King of Castille, hee did solicit Jacob Aben Ioseph to vndertake the enterprise of Spaine, as his predecessors Kings of Arabia had done, offering him the townes and ports of Algezire and Tariffe, for his descent, whereof the Miralmin did willingly accept, finding himselfe assured in his Estate, and mighty in rich and armes: but it happened that they of Malaga and Guadix, seeing that the truce, which they had with the King of Granado, was nere expired, and doubting they should haue warre, and not be releued by the forces of Castille, by reason of the Kings absence, they held it the best course to reconcile themselves to the King of Granado, as in like manner the capitaine of Comares did, who was of the same league.

Notwithstanding the Miralmin hauing leauied great forces to passe into Spaine, sent some troupes of Moores to receiue the townes of Algezire and Tariffe, according to the accord, the which were deliuered vnto them: so as he stayed not long to come himselfe in person to Algezire, whereas afterwards he past his troupes to the number of seuentene thousand horse: The two Kings met in the country of Malaga, whereas they concluded to make warre against the Christians; the African King towards Ecclia, and he of Granado by Iaen: This passage was contrary to the expectation of the Christian Princes, for the Miralmin, who could not make so great a leauy of horse, without knowledge, made a shew as if he would goe against one of his subiects which was rebelled, and had by stealth taken the towne of Ceuta; and the better to dissemble his designe, hee had sent to intreat the King of Arragon to assist him in this warre with tenne Gallies, and some ships of burthen, and with fise hundred horse, to whom hee promised good entertainment. Don Fernand de la Cerde Viceroy and Lieutenant generall in Spaine for his father, did not descouer that these forces were prepared for Castille, vntill they had past the straight, being then at Burgos, hee was aduertised of the League betwixt these Moorish Kings, and of the reconciliation of them of Malaga and Guadix with the King of Granado, all which inconveniences grew by the Kings absence, wherefore, both of himselfe, and at the instance of Don Nugno de Lara, who was at Cordoua, hee made the speediest preparation hee could, to oppose himselfe against the violence of these Infidels.

Don Nugno knowing that the Miralmin tooke the way of Ecclia, drew neere vnto that quarter, with lush forces as he could gather together: but finding the passage stoppt, hee was forced for to fight with the Moores, where after a long fight hee was defeated and slaine, yet most of his men which escaped entred by night into Ecclia.

E The victorious Moores hauing found the body of Don Nugno, cut off his head and sent it to Mahumet King of Granado, who was glad of this victory, but very much discontented for the death of the Earle Don Nugno, who had bene the cause that hee reigned, wherefore hee sent his head to Cordoua, to bee buried with his body. The like misfortune happened to Don Sancho of Arragon Archbishop of Toledo, who hauing gathered together all the souldiars of Toledo, Guadalajara, Madrid and Talauera, presented himselfe vpon the frontier, where hee encountered the King of Granados army, inuading the Diocesse of Iaen, where hee was slaine and his army put to route. His body, head and hand, where he ware the Pontifical Ring, beeing separated, were recovered from the Moores, and brought to Toledo, where they were buried with great sorrow of all the people, taking it for a mournfull presage for the affaires of Spaine: D. Gonçalo, Bishop of Burgos succeded him in this dignity, and was afterwards made Cardinal, the first amongst all the Bishops of the Church.

They write that the Archbishop Don Sancho did not die fighting, in the charge, but that beeing taken, there grewe debate betwixt some capitaines Moores, some struing to lead him to the Miralmin Jacob Aben Ioseph, and others to King Mahumet, and

N n

that

The King of Maroc passeth
into Spaine.D. Nugno de Lara vanquished by the Moores and slaine.Rout and
death of D.
Sancho of Arragon Archbishop of Toledo
by the Moores.

Emperor Henry the sixth sonne to Frederic Barbarossa Duke of Suabe, in the realmes of A Naples and Sicile. And the better to assure him the royall title, he caused him to marry Constance Neece or lawfull daughter of Roger, who was a professed Nunne in the Monastery of Saint Mary, or as some write at Saint Peters of Palermo, dispensing with her vow and profession, by his papal authority, by whom the Emperor Henry had Frederic, who was afterwards Emperor, the second of that name. Henry sought long to dispossesse Tancred, but it was in vaine. He being dead, his sonne Roger reigned little, after whose decease, Queene Sibille caused an other sonne called William, to be presently crowned, being very yong, whom the Emperor Henry found meanes to circumvent, vpon collour of making some good accord with him: and hauing by policy drawne him to Palermo, without entring into any conference, he caused him to be gelyt, and sent him into Germany, with his three sisters. By this meanes the Normands command in Naples and Sicile, fell into the hands of the house of Suabe. After the death of Henry, Frederic his sonne being Emperour, and duke of Suabe, succeeded in these realmes, the which hee enjoyed, notwithstanding many crosses which the Popes gaue him, against whom Gautier of Brene, husband to Queene Sybille, who had escaped out of prison, led an army, but hee was taken and slue himselfe in prison. Frederic had by many wiues many children: by Constance of Arragon, Henry the elder, duke of Suabe, and King of Romans: by Jolant of Brenne, daughter to the King of Ierusalem, Conrad, also duke of Suabe, and King of Romans, after the decease of his brother, and moreover by testament King of Naples. By Mahaut, or Isabel, according vnto some, daughter to Iohn King of England, he had Henry the yonger, who was King of Sicile by Testament, and by a concubine Manfroy, Conrad and Henry succeeded after their father Frederic, respectively, in the realmes of Naples and Sicile. And for that they were young and absent, Manfroy was appointed to be Gouvernor of these Estates by the Emperor, in his brothers names. Against whom Pope Innocent did chose the King of Englands brother to be King of Naples and Sicile, but he neuer past into Italy. By the practises of Popes, these realmes were in great combustion, so as Manfroy was obeyed but by the lesser part. Wherefore Conrad King of Romans was forced to passe into Italy, with a great army, by meanes whereof he reduced these realmes vnder his obedience, who was afterwards so transported with a desire of raigne, as he caused his brother, Henry the yonger, to be slaine at Saint Felix, in Basilicata, and Frederic his Nephew, sonne to the elder Henry, to be poysoned, hauing inuited him to supper: for which parricide God suffered that hee himselfe should die of poyson, which Manfroy his bastard brother gaue him.

Sicile and Naples in the house of Suabe.

Parricide committed by Conrad.

Manfroy's parricide.

Charles of Anjou made king of Naples and Sicile.

By these deaths the realmes of Naples and Sicile came by lawfull succession to Conradin, brother to Frederic that was poysoned, sonne to Henry the elder. But Manfroy who had gouerned in an others name, and tasted the sweet of command, resolved then to keepe these realmes for himselfe, sending men into Germany to dispatch Conradin, if it were possible, were it by poison or otherwise: in the meane time he held his authority of Lieutenant or Viceroy, against the Popes attempts: and after a while faigning that Conradin was dead, he clad himselfe in mourning, and making a great speech in an assembly of the Noblemen and States of the realme, seeming to bee very sorrowfull for the death of his Nephew, he perswaded them to chooe him King of Naples and Sicile by a generall consent, where he reigned thirteene yeeres: and the better to maintaine himselfe, he made a league with the Venetians and other Potentates of Italy: Against whom Pope Vrbain the fourth, called out of France Charles brother to Saint Lewis, Duke of Anjou, and Earle of Prouence, who had married D. Beatrix of Arragon, Proprietary of that Earldome, according to the Arragonois, who was inuested by him in the realmes of Naples and Sicile, in the yeere 1262. with charge that hee should expel Manfroy, and pay a rent vnto the Church as feudatarie. Charles, by the perswasion of D. Beatrix his wife, who was iealous to see her two sister Queenes, the one of France, the other of England, yndertooke the voiage of Italy, where his inuestiture was confirmed, and he crowned with his wife, at Rome, at Saint Iohn of Latran, by Pope Clement the fourth. Then passing on against Manfroy, who came to incounter him, both armies met about

A about at Bencuent, in the yeere 1266. whereas Manfroy was slaine in bataille, and his men vanquished; so as Charles remained peaceable King of Naples and Sicile. The body of Manfroy was not buried in holy ground, for that he stood excommunicate, but in a field nere vnto Beneuent, from whence he was afterwards transported vnto the confines of Campania, his wife and children, being taken by the French, died in prison. Some yeeres after Conradin (the right heire of these realms) past into Italy, being perswaded by many Italians of the Gibeline faction, who hauing incountred the French army neere vnto Arezzo, vanquished it: wherefore marching boldly on, hee had a second incounter with King Charles his army, neere vnto Alba, the which was vnfortunate for him; for his army was not onely defeated; but himselfe taken prisoner (thinking to saue himselfe, in a disguised habit) and carried to Naples, whereas King Charles by a detestable inhumanity (thrust on by Pope Clement) in the yeere 1269. cut off his head, with that of his cousin Frederic Duke of Austria, and of many Noblemen of Naples and Sicile, which had followed Conradin party. By these meanes the Popes gaue these realmes vnto the French, and called them the two Sicilles, the one on this side, the other beyond the Far. Henry brother to D. Alphonso King of Castille, Lieutenant of Rome, was partisan to Conradin in this warre, and was taken, as hath bene sayd.

Manfroy vanquished and slaine by the French.

If the Sultan of Egypt, a barbarous Prince, hauing the King Saint Lewis, and his brother Charles prisoners, had intreated them in like manner, the French would haue held it very strang. But God powred forth his vengeance vpon the French some yeeres after, in the Island of Sicile, whether they called D. Pedro King of Arragon, who had succeeded D. Jaime his father, in the yeere 1276. who without delay caused himselfe to be crowned in Saragossa, by D. Bernard Olluelia Archbishop of Tarragone: but before he receiued the crowne, he made protestation, that he would not be bound to any submission, nor promise, which D. Pedro his Grandfather had made vnto the Pope, or the church of Rome, to the preiudice of the liberty of his realme, to the end they should not pretend that hee was their Legee-man, or vassal.

In the same assembly of Estates of Saragossa, he caused the oath to be confirmed to his son D. Alphonso, to raigne after him, as heire presumptiue, and for that at his coming to the crowne, he had not assembled the Estates of Cattelogne at Barcelona, according to the ancient customes, there to promise and sweare the obseruation of the rights, lawes and priuileiges of the country, the Noblemen of Cattelogne, being long inured to tumults, they made a league and conspired with the townes, for the preservation of their liberties: the chiefe of which conspiracy, were D. Roger Bernard Earle of Foix holding many fees, and much land in Cattelogne, Arnold Roger Earle of Pallars, Ermengaud Earle of Virgel, and Aznar his brother, Raymond Foulques Vicont of Cardone, Bernard Roger Eril, Raymond Anglesol, and William Raymond Ioffe, whereof we will hereafter make mention: But wee must returne into Castille, where we haue left King D. Alphonso the wise much troubled, for the disorders which had happened during his absence.

E 21 Being arriued at Toledo, euery man repaired thether, and especially the Infant D. Sancho, who had made truce for two yeeres with the Moores. Thether came also D. Lope Diaz of Haro, who was so hardy, as to deliuer a message for them all, that it would please him to declare his sonne D. Sancho his successor in the realmes of Castille, Toledo, Leon and other places, seeing hee had already giuen some proofes of his vertue and valour against the Moores, and that he was the eldest of his sons lyuing: to whom the King made but a cold answer in the beginning, but hauing afterwards assembled the Estates in the towne of Segobia, by the counsel of the Infant D. Manuel his brother, he resolved to gratifie D. Sancho, whom he made heire of the crowne after his decease, and in this quality hee was receiued by them all. Thus D. Alphonso and D. Fernand, the children of Don Fernand de la Cerde, were put from the royall succession, which did belong vnto them by right, although that some excuse this fact of D. Alphonso, laying that there was no law at that time which did binde him to leaue the realme more to one then to an other; as since there was made and receiued in the time of D. Fernand the fifth, in the city of Toro, where it was decreed vpon this difficultie that the children of the elder brother deceased,

Castille.

An audacious speech of D. Lope Diaz de Haro.

D. Alphonso reuokes the children of D. Fernand his eldest sonne from the succession, and gives it to D. Sancho.

deceased, should in that respect be preferred before the vncke, representing their fathers A person.

The Queene D. Violant, and D. Blanche widow to D. Fernand, were so discontented with this resolution of the Estates of Segobia, as taking his young children with them, they went out of the country of Castille, to D. Pedro King of Arragon, brother to the Queene D. Violant. Many Noblemen and townes of the Realme did also hold it to bee very vniust, foreseeing many great miseries which would ensue, if the children did liue. King D. Alphonso finding this discontentment, came to Burgos, where transported with choller, he caused his brother D. Fadrigue, or Frederic, to bee smothered, without any forme of iustice, and commanded that D. Symon Ruiz of Haro, Lord of Los Cameros, should be burned in the towne of Treuigno, for that they had assisted the Ladies in their B retreat into Arragon, the which terrified euery man. He sent also to D. Pedro King of Arragon, to complaine that he had receiued these Princesses, and the children; whereof he excused himselfe with good words.

cruelty of King D. Alphonso.

An. 1278.

The Queene D. Violant weeping.

Alhambra of Granada.

22

Portugal.

During this enterprize the Infant D. Sancho caused the Queene his mother to returne into Castille, to whom it was tedious to liue out of that Realme, where shee had some Mignons, as Histories report, who tax her of adultery: and he procured D. Pedro King of Arragon, to detain the children of D. Fernand de la Cerde, his Nephewes, prisoners in the castle of Xatua, to the end they should not carry them into France, to King Philip the 3. their mothers brother: who after she had done her vttermost endeauor for the deliuerie of her children, in the end she came to the King her brother, to implore his aide and protection. The siege of Algezire was vnfortunate, for the army at sea was in a man- ner all lost, by the ambushes of the Miralmumin, who victualled the place; and as for that at land, there died so great a number of men as they were forced to rise, for the King of Maroc was vpon the passage, and came to Algezire, where the truce was renewed, not comprehending the King of Granado, who fortified the city of Granado that yeere, and there made that famous fort, which is called Alhambra, as statelie a building as any is in Spaine. The capraine of Malaga being againe revolted, and come vnder the protection of the King of Castille, began two forts which defend that city, called Alcazara and Gebralfaro.

In the yeere 1279. the Infant D. Sancho and the King D. Pedro had an interview betwixt Requena and Bunol, whereas they made a league, from whence the Infant returned to his father being at Badajos, whether also the rest of his children came, and there they resolved to make warre against the King of Granado: and therefore he sent away D. Sancho to assemble his forces in Castille, hauing in the meane time a desire to see D. Denis sonne to his bastard daughter, to whom he sent to intreat him to come to Badajos. He was a very gallant Prince, whose Estate King D. Alphonso his father had begun to set vp the yeere before, giuing him 40000. pounds of currant money yeerely: but this yeere 1279. he had the whole realme, by the decease of King D. Alphonso his father, who was buried in the Monastery of Saint Dominike of Lisbon, which he himselfe had built. This King Alphonso had reigned two and twenty yeeres, and died seuentie yeeres old. Ten yeere after his body was transported to the Monastery of Alcouaça.

D. Denis the first of that name, and the sixth King of Portugal.

23 The King D. Denis his sonne was seuentene yeeres old when he began to raigne, and was surnamed the builder, for that he made many goodly buildings in his realme,

A Realme, as well holy, as prophane, Churches, Monasteries, Towers, Ports of the sea, and whole townes, wherof mention is made, that he did build and re-edifie, to the number of foure and fortie. At his comming to the Crowne, and before, there had bene some discontentment betwixt him and his mother D. Beatrix, daughter to D. Alphonso king of Castille, the which (it may be) did stay him from going to him to Badajos: for being come to Yelbes vpon the confines of Portugal, three small leagues from Badajos, he fell into a sudden distrust, and turned head, wherewith the King his Grandfather was much discontented.

King Don Alphonso thereupon parted from Badajos, and came to Seuille, where he had newes that the Infant D. Sancho came towards the city of Iacn, with great troups of soldiers from Castille, Leon and Toledo. Wherefore he sent him those men he had, where there were certaine skirmishes rather to the Christians losse then the Moores. Beeing at Seuille, there came certaine messengers vnto him from Philip of France, to bee a meanes for the deliuerie of the children of D. Fernand de la Cerde, who were detained at Xatua, and for other affaires. There it was concluded, that the two kings should meet at Bayone in December, in the yeare 1280. The king of Castille came thither with his children, and Philip the French king came to Salueterre in Bearne, where by Mediators it was concluded, that the realme of Iacn should be giuen to the children of la Cerde, the which they should hold in fee, and do homage to the king of Castille, and the Infant D. Sancho: but he being aduertised of that which his father had concluded, would not consent thereunto, so as by his meanes they returned without any effect, even touching the warre against the Moores, for the which there had an vnion bene propounded betwixt the kings of France and Castille, to inuade and conquer Affricke with their vnited forces, but it was left vnresolved. Beeing returned, D. Sancho made an enterprize vpon the king of Granado, but his men were charged by the Moores neere vnto Moclin, who slue aboute 2800. whereas Gonzalo Ruiz Giron master of S. James, was fore hurt, and died within few daies after, to the great griefe of D. Sancho, and many others: whereupon he entred into the territories of Granado, where he made a wonderfull spoile, euen to the city gates.

The yeare following 1281. there was an interview betwixt the king D. Alphonso, the infant D. Sancho, and D. Pedro king of Arragon, at a place called Campillo, about Agreda, where there was a League (sworne betwixt them against all Princes, and there were townes and castles deliuered for assurance of either side: yea they concluded to make war against Nauarre, and to diuide the conquest betwixt Castille and Arragon: it was at such time as the king D. Pedro plotted the warre of Sicily, whereof wee shall make mention. King D. Alphonso being alterwards come to Burgos, he married his two sonnes, D. Pedro to the daughter of the Earle of Narbone, and D. John to the daughter of his sonne-in-law, will am of Montferrat, to whom he gaue two millions of Marauidis of the money of those times. The Infant D. Sancho did afterwards meet with D. Pedro at Tarraffone, where they renewed their contract, but it tooke no great effect. The Realme of Castille beeing in great want, there was a decree to make copper money, and some peeces of siluer.

24 About the end of the yeare 1281. the king being importuned to release the children of his sonne D. Fernand, did somewhat relent, sending D. Fredalo Bishop of Ouido to the French king, vnder colour to send him vnto the Pope to procure a Croysado against the Moores: but the Infant D. Sancho was aduertised of all, and beeing discontented, that his father had disguised this businesse, he came to Cordoua, and made a league against his father with Mahomad Mirk. of Granado, who promised to pay him the third of the reuenues of his Realme for a tribute. Then did D. Sancho begin a miserable pursuit, the which he neuer ceased, vntill he had driuen his aged father, with griefe and heauinesse, into the graue: who indeed had worthily deserued all the miseries which fell vpon him: for he shewed himselfe wilfull in his conceptions, and many times without iudgement in his prodigality without reason, and tractable to his owne losse: sharpe and very seuer vnto those which did not applaud his actions, but sought to perfwade him to the contrarie. And he was to vniust in his iudgements (as appeared by his grand-children, the sonnes of D. Fernand de la Cerde) as it was an admirable thing, so many imperfections should bee found in a king so studious: yet it did not besit a son to be the scourge of his fathers vices.

D. Sancho of Castille makes a league with the Moores to dispossesse his father.

The

Portugal.

The new King of Portugall, who would not trust king D. Alphonso his Grandfather, A was now in quarrell with his brother, called also D. Alphonso, whome he pursued with Armes, but aswell this controuersie, as that he had with his mother, were pacified by the meanes of Don Sancho of Castile, and of Don Pedro King of Arragon, to whose daughter called Don Isabel, borne of the Queene Don Constance, daughter to Manfroy King of Naples this Prince was married, which marriage was celebrated at Troncofo, in the yeare 1282. with royall pompe, about that time Don Sancho burst forth into open rebellion against his father. This King Don Denis did afterwards enter into league with Don Sancho, who drew vnto his seruice D. John his brother, besides D. Lope Diaz de Haro, Diego Lopes his brother, Ramir Diaz, D. Nugno de Lara, Don Pedro Aluares of the Asturias, Fernand Roderigo of Cabrera, and many others, which were out of the coun. B trie since the death of the Infant Don Fredericke, and of Symon Ruis de los Cameros.

Castille.

D. Sancho takes upon him the regency and refuseth the title of King.

The Infant Don Sancho was so well beloued, as in a short time all men followed him, leauing the king D. Alphonso poore and miserable. The conspirators beeing assembled at Vailledolit, they were all of opinion, that D. Sancho should intitle himselfe king of Castile, and of the other dominions which his father had enioyed: but he shewed himselfe so newhat modest, saying, that he would not do his father that wrong, to intitle himselfe King during his life time: but would rest satisfied to be tearmed Infant of Castile, the eldest and heire of those Realmes. So D. Sancho carried great respect vnto the king his father, in words and vaine titles, but he made himselfe king in effect, ordaining lawes both for peace and warre, disposing of Captaines and Gouernors, and of the treasure at his owne will: the king D. Alphonso beeing driuen to that extremity as hee was forced to send his royall Crowne, with Jewels of inestimable value, in pawne for 70000. doubloons to Jacob Aben Ioseph Miralmumin of Maroc, complaining vnto this Infidell king, of the wrongs he had receiued from his sonne and subiects who were Christians. They say, that king Jacob beeing a Barbarian, did heare of D. Alphonso's afflictions with teares in his eyes, and shewing this royall Crowne vnto his Knights, he sayd, That he did willingly embrace this occasion, to succour a King of an ancient race, with his person and goods against the impietie of a wicked sonne: giuing so good an answer vnto the King D. Alphonso, as he was much esteemed and commended of all men. Necessitie and indignitie did so transport D. Alphonso, as he accepted the Moores offer, intreating him to passe the streights with his forces, the which he did: In the meane time D. Sancho married D. Mary daughter to D. Alphonso, Lord of Molina, his great vnckle, brother to the king D. Fernand the third, who seeing himselfe supported by the kings of Arragon and Portugal, came to Cordoua, where by the aduice of the Noblemen and Knights of Castile that were present, and by a decree pronounced by the mouth of D. Manuel, in the name of the whole Nobilitie, the king D. Alphonso was depriued of all his Realmes: the causes they pretended, were the death of D. Fredericke and of Symon Ruis, obseruing no forme of Iustice, nor any orderly proceeding: the breach of the rights and priuiledges of the Nobility, and the waisting of the treasor. D. John Nugnes de Lara, nor D. John Nugnes, and Nugno Gonzales his children, D. Aluaro Nugnes, D. Fernand Perez Ponce, with many others, would not assist at this assembly, nor consent vnto this act ofso pernicious a consequence. E

The Miralmumin Jacob Aben Ioseph past at Algezire, with great troupes of horse, and the two kings had an interview at Zahara in Granado, whereas he of Maroc arriued first. The manner of this interview is worthy obseruation, for the humanitie and courtesie which this mightie Moorish King vsed to a Prince of a contrarie Religion, sometimes his enemy, and deiected from his dignitie. Hee caused a great and rich Pauillion to be set vp in the open field, in the which were two seates made like thrones, the one beeing higher and more eminent then the other: and hauing placed the chiefe Noblemen of the family of the Merins (from whence he was descended) at the entry, he commanded them all to kisse k. D. Alphonso feet, and that they should not suffer him to light from his horse before he were neere vnto the Pauillion, where beeing arriued, King Aben Ioseph and hee embraced one another like breethren, and so entred into the Pauillion holding hands. The royall and magnificent ceremonies which they vsed in their sitting downe, were great and long, either struiuing to giue the more honorable place vnto the other: but in the

Humanity and modestie of the Moorish king.

A the end the king of Castile was forced to sit in the highest, the king of Maroc saying: It was reasonable that D. Alphonso, a king descended of kings, and borne of a king, should be set aboue rather then himselfe, whom God by his mercy had aduanced to that dignitie of late time.

These Monarkes beeing set, they conferred of their affaires, and hauing resolved, king D. Alphonso returned to Seuille, to gather together these small forces which were faithfull vnto him. The Moote marched with his army towards Osuna and Estepa, and then came to Eccia, where the two kings ioyned, and hauing taken Castro, they presented themselves before Cordoua: but the Infant Don Sancho had entred into it the night before with great troupes of horse, where as they spent twenty dayes in vaine, without any memorable act done by either side. Rising from thence, the king of Maroc, with the consent of D. Alphonso, did ouer-runne the champion country, and going through the pace of Muradal, he entred into the fields of Montiel, destroying all he incountred, and finding no resistance. Returning towards Eccia, D. Alphonso parted from Seuille to go and meet him, according to the king of Maroc's desire. Beeing come vnto the campe, king Don Alphonso grew into so great a distrust, vpon reports, or some other vaine imagination, that the king of the Moores would stay him, as he parted by night in great haste, and returned to Seuille. The Miralmumin beeing much discontented at this ielousie, sent vnto him to excuse himselfe, and to assure him that he neuer had any such thought, intreating him to send him his troupes, the which he would entertaine, and so enter into the countrie of Granado against king Mahomad his enemy, hauing conspired with Don Sancho his sonne, whereunto D. Alphonso yeilded, and sent him a thousand horse, who presently receiued pay: but growing suddenly into a ielousie that they would leade them into Affricke, they abandoned the Miralmumin, and sent him the remainder of his money. The King of Maroc seeing these proceedings, grew discontented, and returned into Affricke, yet nothing estranged in his affection to pleasure D. Alphonso. D. Fernand Perez Ponce of Leon, Commander of these thousand horse, durst not returne to king D. Alphonso, hauing no lawfull excuse to haue abandoned king Jacob Aben Ioseph: but whilest he intertained himselfe about Cordoua, there was an oportunitie offered which did deface this blemish.

D It was strange, that these thousand horse did charge ten thousand which sallyed out of the city, the which were assembled from all the parts of Spaine for Don Sancho, and defeated them. Wherefore returning to Seuille they were well receiued: D. Sancho (who was then absent from Cordoua) was much discontented at this route, and did so sharply rebuke his men for their rashnesse, daring to present themselves against his fathers Standard royall, the which he did euer greatly reuerence. Thus Don Sancho did honour the Images and royall ensignes, but not the king his father: who beeing much incensed with the continuall vexation of his sonnes rebellion, who had vsurped his Realmes, hee pronounced in the presence of many men of marke, both Clergie and Secular, in the Cittie of Seuille, about the end of that yeare 1282. the curse of God and his vpon D. Sancho, a sonne, sayd he, disobedient, rebellious, and a parricide, declaring him incapable and unworthy to raigne: depriuing him of his succession and inheritance, and discharging the subiects, as much as in him lay, from all oath and homage which they had done vnto him. This act was done with great solemnitie and maiestie, but they were but words, which D. Sancho did not much esteeme; who at the same time returned to Cordoua, and conferred with the king of Granado at Priego, to whome hee restored Arenas, and renewed their League.

In the yeare 1283. D. Sancho beeing come to Carceres, to Pont d'Alcantara, and to Ledesma, he forced the Infant D. Pedro his brother to hold his party, who notwithstanding had a great desire to follow his fathers, who intended to giue him the countrie of Murcia, with the title of a king. He did the like to the Infant D. John, who aspired to haue the kingdome of Leon for himselfe, all which was forced. Many knights which followed these Princes, and which were well affected to king D. Alphonso, escaped, and passing thorough Portugal came to Seuille. The towne of Agreda reuolted and followed the kings partie, the Infant D. Sancho beeing come against it, he had newes that Alasin d'Arbar, Gouernour

D. Alphonso
dislikes the King of Maroc

Hypocrite of the Infant D.
Sancho.

An. 1282.
Curse of the father vpon D.
Sancho.

1283

Gouernor of Treuigno, was also reuolted, and had receiued Don John Nuges de Lara, A with a great boote which he had taken in the territories of Burgos, into Treuigno, from whence he made roads, and did annoy his people. D. Sancho sent D. Lope Diaz de Haro against them, who made them to keepe within their fort. Thus was the warre managed betwixt the father, and the sonne in Castile and other places depending.

25 During the which D. Pedro king of Arragon, had giuen libertie to his soldiers vpon the frontier, who were daily in skirmish against the Nauarrois, especially they of Sos and Filera, against the Inhabitants of Sanguesa; and they were so incensed one against another, as they could not be pacified: yet the diligence of Eustache Bellemarche, Gouvernor of Nauarre, made them to lay aside armes, and to conclude a truce for a time. Bellemarche returned into France, and in his place a Knight called Guerin of Amplepuis, B gouerned the Realme of Nauarre. Philip the third King of France, being Protector of this Realme for his Neece Queene Jane, had also occasion to thinke of the affaires of Spaine, for that the children of D. Fernand de la Cerde, borne of his sister D. Blanche, had not only bene deiectioned by the King D. Alphonso from the right of succession to the Crowne of Castile, which did belong vnto them, as children to the eldest sonne, but also these two young Princes, D. Alphonso and D. Fernand de la Cerde, were kept prisoners in the castell of Xatua by the king of Arragon: and moreouer being aduertised, that besides the Arragonis attempts in former times, their king had made a new accord at Campillo with D. Sancho of Castile, where among other things it was concluded, that they should inuade the Realme of Nauarre at their common charges, and diuide the conquest equally. C Moreouer, that at another enterview betwixt D. Sancho of Castile, and D. Pedro of Arragon, the Infant had resigned vnto D. Pedro all the right he pretended to Nauarre, promising neuer to make warre there without his liking to the end he might bee the more freely assisted with the forces of Arragon, to dispossesse his father. King Philip was wise, and of power to preuent all these practises, all which he made frustrate in regard of Nauarre. Yet he did in vaine sollicite the kings of Castile and Arragon for the deliuerance of his Nephewes, who were at Xatua. He sent good troupes of horsemen into Nauarre, for the guard of the countrie, and to be ready vpon all occasions.

Practises of the Castilians and Arragonis against Nauar.

The factions betwixt the Nobilitie of Castile (some holding the partie of King Don Alphonso, others that of Don Sancho his sonne) fell out happily for the French and Nauarrois in many things: for Nauarre serued for a retreat to all those that were in disgrace with Don Sancho. Many of the chiefe of Castile, and other places depending, came and ioyned with the troupes of France and Nauarre, and making roades into Castile, did alwaies keepe the Realme of Nauarre in reputation, and made the forces to be redoubted, the which changed many Gouvernors in a short time: for after Eustache Bellemarche and Guerin of Amplepuis, William of Broede was sent thither, and then Iohn of Constans L. of Dompierre, Marshall of Champagne, in the yeare 1283. when as among other Noblemen of Castile, there fled into Nauarre Don Nugno de Lara, Don Pero Alvarez of the Asturies, Don Ramir Diaz, Don Fernand Ruis de Cabrera, and Don Fernand Ruis de Saldagne, who ioyned with others which made themselves strong in the Countrie, which were the Infant Don Laine of Castile, Don John Nuges, Don Aluar Nuges and others, all being assisted by the troupes of France and Nauarre, they made roades as far as Toledo, with great ruine of the country and people, for the French King hated Don Sancho, as an vlturper of his Nephewes right, neither was he lesse enimie to Don Pedro King of Arragon, as well for the detention of his nephewes, and his practises with Castile, as for that which had happened in the Realme of Naples, betwixt the Arragonis and the French, as you shall heare.

These spoilers being a competent armie of foure thousand horse, and great numbers of foot, returning towards Toledo, had a desaigne to enter into Arragon, and to assaile Tarrasone, whereof Don Pedro being aduertised, who kept a garrison of three hundred horse at Logroño, for the defence of Castile, he sent to intreat the Infant Don Sancho to march thither, and to succour him against the French and Nauarrois, who came to destroy his Realme of Arragon, the which he did presently: so as being ioyned with the king Don Pedro they saued Tarrasone: yet the Arragonis lost the castell of VI, the which

A which was wel defended by Ximeno of Artieda: they also lost Lerida and Filera, the which were giuen in gard to them of Sanguesa: Baylo and Arbujs were ruined, and the French and Nauarrois past vnto Verdun. Vpon their returne, the army of D. Pedro and D. Sancho attended them, where as they could not auoyd the battaile, which the French presented them: but the Knights of Castile which did accompany them, told them that they had willingly ouer-runne the country, and done their indeauors in all assaults, but to charge their lances against Don Sancho, it was not their intention: that is to say, to spoile towns, & to ruine poore innocents, who had no interest in great mens quarrels, they did it willingly, yet wold they not attempt any thing against the heads, who might giue them impunity for all their insolencies, and could take reuenge of them, if they shewed themselves too eager enemies. So the troupes of France and Nauarre returned towards Pamplone, from whence some of the Noblemen of Castile went to D. Sancho, hauing made their peace.

26 The King D. Pedro finding himselfe in this danger, it made him to seeke a peace with Nauarre for some moneths: for he had many questions to decide with his Noblemen and Knights of Arragon and Cattelogne, who complained much of his fower disposition, and his tyrannous manner of gouernement, insulting ouer the greatest, yea against his owne blood, contrarie to all lawe and nature. For wee reade, that there were scarce two yeares expired, after the decease of his father, when as hee forced his brother Don Janez, to whom the Ilands of Maiorca and Minorca, with other places adjacent, had bene giuen by testament, with the title of a king, to hold them of him, as fees depending of the Crowne of Arragon, and therefore he caused him to take an oath and do homage, as also for the Counties of Rossillon, Cerdagne, Conflans, Vallespierre, Colibre, Omelades, Carlades, and for the rights of Montpellier: with promise for himselfe and his descendants Kings of Maiorca, to come to the Estates of Barcelona being called, and to deliuer the city of Maiorca, the towne of Perpignan, and the castell of Cerdagne, vnto the Kings of Arragon, whensoever they should demand them, in regard of which submissions and promises, the king Don Pedro did confirme these lands and portions to the king Don Janez his brother: for the which he would haue the Earles of Foix and Empurias, D. Dalmis of Rocabertin Vicount of Castelnau, Raymond of Vrgio, William Canet, Bernard Hugo Serrallongue, Dalmis of Castelnau, Ponce Zagardia, Arnaud Corsaccio, William Sans, with the Deputies of the Ilands of Maiorca and Minorca to become cautions. Sometime after picking a quarrell against the Nobilitie of Cattelogne, and their priuiledges, this king Don Pedro did so furiously assaile the Earles of Foix, Vrgel, and Pallars, with the Vicount of Cardona, who were the most apparent, as hauing besieged and taken them in Balaguer, he detained them long in a miserable prison, especially the Earle of Foix, whom he intreated vnworthily in the castell of Siurana. Moreouer, a little before this last warre of Nauarre, hee had attempted and executed great matters against the French, reigning in Italy, hauing employed the men and meanes of Arragon and Cattelogne, to the great discontentment and oppression of all his subiects, and hee was newly returned out of France, whether the warre of Naples and Sicily had drawne him, vpon the occasion which followeth.

Arragon.

Injustice of D. Pedro as against his bro.

27 The French hauing conquered Naples and Sicily, vnder Charles the first brother to Saint Louis, they committed many vnaccustomed insolencies among these nations, against the honor of women, with other exactions and spoiles vnder colour of Iustice: by reason whereof (as also by the iust iudgement of God, to whom without doubt the cruel deaths of Conradin, and of the Duke of Austria, whose heads King Charles had caused to be cut off, by the pernicious counsell of Pope Clement) the Sicilians did sollicite D. Pedro King of Arragon to pursue the right which he had vnto these Realmes, as husband to Q. Constance heire thereof, being daughter to king Manfroy, promising to ayde and assist him with their persons and goods: he which did most labour in this poursuite was called Iohn de Proculla or Prochida, borne at Salerne, Phisition to the deceased King Manfroy, who by his perswasions induced the king Don Pedro to affect this conquest: for the effecting whereof, he first made a secret league with Pope Nicholas the third, and with Michel Paleologue Emperour of Constantinople, obayning from the Pope a promise of Inuestiture

Insolencies of the French in Sicily.

Inuestiture of the Realmes of Naples and Sicily. Martin the 4. beeing Pope after the de- A cease of Nicholas, the king sent Hugh Mataplana a Carolan to Rome, to sound his disposition, touching the confirmation or renewing of this League, and to intertaine him (for Martin was friend to Charles King of Naples) and to disguise the cause of his Ambassadors voyage; he had charge to moue the Pope and the Consistorie, to canonize Don Friar Raymond of Pegnafort according to the aduice of a Prouinciall Councell held a litle before at Barcelona, by the Prelates of Arragon and Cattelogne. In the meane time D. Pedro did arme forty galleys with many ships, the which he caused to passe along the coast of Affricke vnder a colour of restoring Bouqueron king of Constatine in Affricke, who was expelled by his brother: and the better to couer his enterprise, the Ambassador besought the Pope to take the Realme of Arragon into the protection of the Church, B whilst that the king D. Pedro should be absent in the warre of Affricke, and to demand leaue to exact a tenth of his Cleargie. The king was demanded by the Ambassadors of France, the reason of this great preparation, with offers, that if it were against the Inf-dels, King Philip their master would ayde him with all his forces, and withall protesting, that if it were to preiudice Charles king of Naples, he would take it ill: to whom he made no other answer, but that he had meanes sufficient to end the warre which hee had vnder-taken, without employing any others. To Arnaud Roger Earle of Palliars, who demanded of him, in the name of the whole Nobilitie, whether he meant to leade them, he made a sharpe answer, that if his left hand presumed to inquire too curiously of that which the right intended to do, he would cut it off. So the army parted from Tortosa, beeing follicited by Nicholas Copula and Raymond Portella.

Sicilian euessong.

In the meane time the French were slaine thorough out all the townes of Sicily, with such rage and hatred against the nation, as whereas they knew any women to be gotten with child by the French, they opened their wombes, and flue both mothers and children, for that they would not leaue any of their seed in the countrie. Onely one Frenchman called William Porcelos Gouvernor of Galataphimia was let go vntouched, for the good opinion they had of his modestie and temperance. And then D. Pedro arriving at Palermo, he caused himselfe to be crowned King, in the yeare 1281. King Charles being desirous to be reuenged of this iniurie, he led an army against Messina, but he was repulsed into Calabria, without any effect. The king of Arragon left Queene Constance his wife in Sicily with three children: D. James who was king of Sicily, D. Frederick and D. Tolant, D establishing a Councell of Estate, whereof the chiefe were Willyam Galseran a Cattelani, Alain Leonine, holding the place of chiefe Iustice of Sicily, and chiefe author of their rebellion against the French, John Prochids, and Roger de Loria his Admiral, to whom hee appointed an army of 25. galleys: but he wold haue in either of them two Captains, one a Cattelani, the other an Italian, the marriners should be part Cattelans, and part Italians, but the rowers should be all Italians. Hauing thus settled the affaires of this Realme, hee returned into Spaine, where he had many matters to attend: for besides open force, there past many scandalous books betwixt Charles King of Naples, and D. Pedro king of Arra-gon, so as not able to decide their quarrels neither by law nor armes, they challenged E one another with a certaine number of Knights of either part: and this combate was allowed by the Pope; an vnworthy thing for a Christian Prelate. The place beeing appointed at Bourdeaux, in the king of Englands country, a neuter-Prince in this cause. King Charles came at the day appointed, but he found not his aduersarie. Wherefore hauing attended most part of the day in the place appointed for the combat, and seeing no man appeare, he returned. The King of Arragon who had onely an intent to circumuent his enemy by the expectation of a combate, and in the meane time diuert him from the war of Sicily, had stayed in a safe place, from whence he came vnkowne to Bourdeaux with great speed, where attending vntill king Charles were parted, when he thought he was far enough off, he shewed himselfe in the place of battel, as if hee had had a great desire to fight, complaining that he had sayled, where after he had made the protestations requisite in the like case, he tooke an act of his presence from John Graille Seneshall of Guien (to whom he left his helmet, his target, his lance, and his sword in witness of his appearance, and that he had kept his faith and promise) he returned with the like speed into Spaine:
 and

A and a little before the French and Nauarrois forraged Castile, he arrived at Logroño; where he entertained a garrison in fauour of D. Sancho, as we haue sayd. For these subtil-ties, Pope Martin (who had succeeded Nicholas the 3.) beeing a French-man borne, did excommunicate the king D. Pedro, giuing his Realme of Arragon to Charles of Valois second sonne to Philip King of France, who with the Popes dispensation married Constance daughter to Charles Prince of Salerne, the onely sonne to this Charles King of Naples, causing a Croysado to be preached against this king D. Pedro. Whilst that Charles King of Naples was in Gascony, the king of Arragon's Admirall called Roger de Loria a Calabrois a very expert man in sea-fights, came running along the coast of Italy, with 45. galleys, and many other vessels, doing much harme: so as this army being discouered at Naples, B approaching so neere the city, as the souldiers might be heard, prouoking the garrison by iniuries and casting of darts into the towne, Charles Prince of Salerne issued forth with 36. gallees, and some other vessels against his enemies, where there was a furious fight, but the Admirall of Arragon was victor, who tooke and carried away nine galleys, with a great number of prisoners of note: and amongst the rest Charles who would needes go forth against the will of the Popes Legat, and contrary to the commandement which his father had giuen him at his going into France, not to depart out of Naples, nor to hazard a battell, either by sea or land in any sort whatsoever. The desire of glorie prouoked it, and brought him to this misery, which cost many Noblemen their liues, for the prisoners beeing brought to Messina, he beheld with his eyes the heads of 200. Gentlemen cut off, to reuenge the death of Conradin. His father beeing returned to Naples, C found the affaires in a pittifull estate, and liued not long after. At his death there were two Legats in Sicile to treat of an accord with Queene Constance, who was a wise and religious Lady, but not able to draw her to any reason, they did aggravate the Excommunication against the King D. Pedro, and interdicted the Sicilians, the which did so incense them, as running in a rage to the prisons where the remainder of the French were that had bene taken by Roger de Loria, they sought to enter to murder them: but the French made resistance, so as these mutiners seeing there was no meanes to effect what they intended, they set fire of the prisons and burnt them all. After which there was an assembly of all the chiefe Magistrates of the townes of Sicile, to resolve what was to be done with D Charles Prince of Salerne, and nine other Noblemen which were prisoners with him, where they concluded, that after the example of Conradin, and the other Noblemen;
 they must all dye.

Charles Prince
of Salerne de- feated and ta- ken by the Ar-
ragonais.

Reuenge of the death of Conradin of Suabe.

Whereuppon wee may not let passe an act of Queene Constance, full of pietie and courage: for this Princeesse hauing sent on a Friday morning, to aduertise Charles to thinke of the saluation of his soule, and that he was condemned to die after the same maner that Conradin had done: he answered, that hee tooke his death the more patiently;
 for that hee should receiue it the same day that our Sauour Iesus Christ had suffered.
 This answer deliuered to the Queene, shee sayd, If it be so that the Prince takes his death so patiently by reason of that day, for my part I am resolved to shew him mercie for his sake, who the same day suffered death and passion for vs all. Whereuppon shee commanded he should be preserued without any harme, letting the people vnderstand (who did presse her to put him to death) that shee ought not in a matter of so great importance, and which might be the cause of great inconueniences, to resolue nor execute any thing, without the priuiey of the king her husband: and therefore shee commanded that Prince Charles should be carried into Cattelogne to the king Don Pedro, to dispose of him as he should thinke fit by good aduice. This generous and Christian-like act, is worthie of eternall prayse, as the excellence which king Charles, through bad counsell, and an il-governed passion, had committed against Conradin and other Noblemen his prisoners, is to be blamed and detested. This Charles Prince of Salerne was afterwards king of Naples
 F the second of that name.

24 Alter the king D. Pedro returns out of France, expecting daily (by reason of the Popes censures, and his enterprises against Nauarre) to be set vpon by Philip k. of France, and Charles of Valois his son: and the Noblemen and Knights of Arragon & Cattelogne, being tyred by him in the former wars, & ill intreated, as they thought, in their freedoms,

O o

(whereof

Union in Arragon against the king for their liberties.

(whereof the townes and commonalties of his Countreys did also complaine) they did also stirre vp troubles and seditions, and made an vnion together. The heads of the Nobility were, Symon of Virea the elder, D. Pedro Fernandes Lord of Ixar, and D. Pedro of Ayerbio, both base brothers vnto the King, Pedro Cornet, Artal Alagon, Lope Fernuex de Luna, Atlan des Foffes, Sancho of Antillas, Gombald of Beneuent, and Symon of Virea the younger, all of Noble families, and moreover Lope William of Oteicia, Pedro Isordain Pegna, Gombald Trameset, Giles of Bidaure, Pero Garces Nuez, who were Knights, whose predecessors had bene advanced by Kings. These hauing made a league with the people did promise and swear to let the king and his sonne D. Alphonso, (who was his Lieutenant generall) vnderstand, that if they did not containe themselves within the limites of the lawes of the country, they would withdraw themselves from their obedience, and declare themselves enemies, and pursue them by armes that should seeke to breake them. The king had called the Estates to Tarassone, and afterwards to Saragossa. There he intreated, promised, and did all he could to breake this vnion: but he was forced to yeeld, and therefore he granted vnto the Arragonois, the priuiledge which they call general, whereby the liberty which had bene somewhat restrayned, was againe restored, the ancient manners of the Country, and customs of their Ancestors, fit for the country, put again in practice. And moreover, there were lawes made for their Kings, which they should be bound to obey. And for that they were in a mutine in some places, by reason of certaine Impositions layed vpon salt, the trafficke thereof was made free by the Estates. Notwithstanding all these things, the king refused the iudgement of the Iustice Maior of Arragon, the which was then exercised by Pedro Martines Artassone, whom he deposed from his office: but soone after this dignity was fortified with stronger lawes. The like assembly was made at Barcelona, and to the same end, where they obtained confirmation of their old statutes and customs, which they call Usatiques. They of Valencia beeing called to the Estates of Arragon, would not appeare, pretending liberty to assemble apart. In this Realme of Valencia there was a Magistrate established, who was President of the Iustice, who should be an Arragonois, and should do right vnto the townes and Noblemen of that Realme, who enioy the priuiledges of Arragon: the first in this dignitie was Alphonso Martines. In Ribagorça there was also a peculiar Iudge created at Grados, from whence the first appelles should go to Barbastro, or to the Iustice of Arragon, and the second to the king, or to Iudges deputed by him: but these last ordonances were made and executed in the yeare 1285. at the Estates held at Huesca, where as the king did preside. They being transferred to Zufaria, the king beeing absent, John Giles Tarin Iustice Maior of Arragon was President, where it was sayd, that he was a lawfull Iudge, yea in causes commenced against the King: who beeing cited and not appearing, there were decrees made against him in many instances. In the end the king confirmed the decrees of the Iustice Maior, and whatsoever should be concluded by the Estates, the Deputies, and Councillors hauing giuen their suffrages. At that time the king Don Pedro spoiled his brother D. James king of Majorca, of the Countrey of Rossillon, for that he had retired himselfe into France, and had made a League against him with king Philip, who had promised him the Realme of Valencia, after the conquest which he did hope to make thereof, and of the rest of D. Pedros country. In these combustions was the estate of Arragon about the returne of the king D. Pedro from the warre of Nauarre attempted with the Castilians.

King of Majorca deposed by his brother.

Castile.

29 As for D. Sancho Infant of Castile, he with all his followers had bene also excommunicated by Pope Martin the 4. The Arch-bishop of Seuille, the Deane of Tudelle in Nauarre, and the Arch-deacon of S. James in Galicia were the denouncers thereof: wherefore it was concluded in D. Sanchos Council, to kill all those that should intimate or bring these censures: yet the Commissioners deputed by the Pope went on in their Commission, and did interdict all parts of Spaine, holding the Infants party. On the other side the fury of armes ruining the country, Queene Beatrix the widow of Portugal, D. Mary wife to the Infant, laboured to procure a peace, and to remedie those great miseries, at which time there was some hope that the king and his sonne should haue an interview: for the king was come to Constatine, & the Infant to Guadascanall, but the Infants minions and bad Councillors did hinder it. The Ladies pursuing this holy enterprise, Don Sancho fell sicke

A sicke at Salamanca, and in such extremity, as the Physicians had abandoned him: the king in like manner fell sicke vnto death, whereby it seemes that God was highly offended against these miserable Princes, whose reconciliation was thus preuented. The king seing his end drawing nigh, he gaue by his will, Seuille and Badajos, with the title of a Realm, to his sonne John, with charge, that he should hold them of the Crown of Castile and Leon. To D. James his other sonne he gaue the Realme of Murcia with the same condition. Hee pardoned all such as had carried armes against him, except his sonne D. Sancho. In the beginning of a will of his made in Nouember 1283. he makes great complaints of his aduersities, and doth much blame the kings of Portugall, Arragon, England, the Pope, and others, who had fauoured D. Sancho, cursing him and all his posteritie, and leauing heires of his Soueraigne Realmes, D. Alphonso and D. Fernand de la Cerde, one in default of the other, and if they dyed without issue, he gaue them to Philip king of France, and to his descendants: He gaue many other Legacies to his other children, to Churches, and to his Officers and domestique seruants. By another testament apart, made in the yeare 1284. he ordained, that his heart should be carried and interred on mount Caluarie in the city of Ierusalem, and his body in his city of Seuille or Murcia, in the which his Executors should please. He dyed in the yeare 1284. and was buried at Seuille, hauing reigned 34 yeares, 10. moneths, and 23. dayes.

Alphonso king of Castile giues portions to his sonnes.

Cause of the father vpon D. Sancho and his posterity.

An. 1284.

This Prince was a president of the weaknesse and inconstancie of humane things, not onely in the goods which they call of Fortune, but also of those of the mind, whereof he was as well furnished as any Prince that hath bene before or since him, all which did him more harme then good: for neither vertue, knowledge, honour nor riches auayle not, if the blessing of God do not accompany them, but they rather ruine a man. And in truth this Prince may be termed miserable in all these things. He was a great and mighty king, but nothing did suffice him, by reason of his prodigality, and ill-measured bounty: he was neuer sincerely beloued of his subiects, by reason of his sower disposition and wilfulness, proceeding from too great a presumption of his knowledge: so as hee did neuer beleene any good counsell: It was the fruite of his Philosophie, the which had made him so ouerweening, as he presumed to controule the Author of Nature, saying, That if he had bin present at the Creation of the world, he should in many things haue bene of another opinion, with other such speeches full of impietie. By iudiciarie Astronomie, whereunto he was giuen beyond all reason, he had foreseene (as he thought) his adventures, the which made him affect the Imperiall dignitie, where hee purchased more dishonour then euer any Prince. This vanity made him cruell to his brother D. Frederick, and other Noblemen, to preuent the conspiracies which threatened him, but could not auoid them: the which he had done, if leauing these diuinations, hee had relied wholly vpon the providence of God, without any further search. But it is the will of God, the curious should haue this torment, alwaies to feare their misfortune, which they would know by damnable means, giuing effect to vanity, and to the spirit of error, against those that follow it. The Queene D. Beatrix his mother (who it may be was superstitious, and giuen to these impieties) had neuer any contentment after his birth, hauing vnderstood when hee was in his cradle, from a Grecian, who was a great Sorceresse, that he should bee deprived of his Realmes.

The end of the twelfth Booke.

THE THIRTEENTH BOOKE of the Historie of Spaine.

The Contents.

- 1 Don Sancho the Braue, the fourth of that name, the eleventh king of Castile, and the 32. of Leon.
- 2 warre betwixt the French and the Arragonois in the Counties of Rosillon and Cattelogne, where as the king D. Pedro dyed.
- 3 D. Alphonso the third of that name, tenth king of Arragon, who continued the warre against the French.
- 4 Philip the Faire king of France, husband to Ioane of Nauar, began to raigne in Nauar.
- 5 Advancement of D. Lopes Diaz de Haro, preiudiciall both to the Realme of Castile, and to himselfe.
- 6 Acts and proceedings betwixt the Estates of Arragon, and the King Don Alphonso the third.
- 7 Treaties betwixt D. Alphonso king of Arragon, and Charles the Haulting, king of Naples, prisoner, and what succeeded.
- 8 Quarrels in the Court of Castile, and the death of D. Lopes Diaz de Haro.
- 9 Deliuerie of the children of D. Fernand de la Cerde from prison in Arragon. Don Alphonso de la Cerde declared king of Castile.
- 10 Tumults at Badajoz suppress.
- 11 Family of Guzmans, who are Dukes of Medina Sidonia.
- 12 D. James the 2. of that name, 11. King of Arragon.
- 13 Peace betwixt the French and the Arragonois, and the retention of the Island of Sicily by D. Fredericke of Arragon, brother to the king D. James, contrarie to the Capitulations.
- 14 Donation of the Ile of Corsica and Sardinia, to the king D. James of Arragon the second, by Pope Boniface the eighth.
- 15 D. Fernand the fourth of that name, the twelfth king of Castile, and the three and thirtieth of Leon.
- 16 Jewish superstitions. Conuersion of some Iewes to the Christian faith.
- 17 Foundation of Bilboa in Biscay.
- 18 Compromise betwixt the children of D. Fernand de la Cerde, contending for the Realm of Castile, and D. Fernand then raigning: and betwixt the king of Arragon and him of Castile: and the sentence giuen by the arbitrators.
- 19 Lewis Hutin the 1. of that name, 26. king of Nauarre.
- 20 Translation of the Popes Court from Italy into France.
- 21 Persecution of the Templers.
- 22 Order of Christ in Portugall.
- 23 Order of Monteca in Arragon.
- 24 VVarre in Granado.
- 25 Deeds of the Castellans in Greece and Thrace, after the wars of Sicily and Naples.
- 26 Troubles

- A 26 Troubles at Lyons, and in the Court of France.
- 27 Discourse of the crosses which did accompany Philip the Faire, as well in his raigne, as in priuate affaires.
- 28 D. Alphonso the 12. of that name, 13. King of Castile, 34. of Leon, and the troubles which happened at his entrie.
- 29 Papacie affected with murders.
- 30 Philip the long King of France, 2. of that name, 27. king of Nauarre.
- 31 Exploits of the Castellans against the Moores: the sodaine and strange death of D. Pedro; and D. Iohn Princes of Castile, and troubles in that Realme.
- 32 Perpetuall union of Arragon, Cattelogne, and Valencia.
- B 33 D. James the eldest sonne of Arragon, quits the succession of the Realme, and becomes a rebellious man.
- 34 Confirmation of the gift of Sardinia and Corsica to the house of Arragon by the Pope. Conquest of Sardinia by the Infants D. Alphonso.
- 35 Deedes of D. Iohn King of Portugall. Pietie of Queene Isabell his wife: their buildings in Portugall.
- 36 Troubles in Castile by the death of D. Mary the Queene mother.
- 37 Maioritie of king D. Alphonso the twelfth of Castile.
- 38 Estate of the Moores of Granado at that time.

Order of the Kings raigning in Spaine, whereof mention is made in this 13. Booke.

| CASTILE. |  | LEON  | ARRAGON.          | NAUARRE.               |
|----------|--|-------|-------------------|------------------------|
| 11       | D. Sancho                                  | 4-23. | 10 D. Alphonso 3. | 25 Philip the faire 1. |
| 12       | D. Fernand                                 | 4-33. | 11 D. James 2.    | 26 Lewis Hutin 1.      |
| 13       | D. Alphonso 11-34. Some number him for the | 12-   |                   | 27 Philip the Long 2.  |

O o 3

D. Sancho

D. Sancho the Braue, the fourth and last of that name, the 11. of Castile, and 32. of Leon.

Don Sancho
of Castile's titles

In the yeare 1284. D. Sancho caried himselfe as king, hauing performed his fathers obsequies in the city of Auila, where he was at the time of his decease, where he mourned in shew, for that which he had long desired, as we may iudge by his actions. He commanded that D. Maria his wife should be called Queene, and their daughter called Izabell, beeing but two yeares old, to bee declared and receiued heire of those Realmes, if he had no issue male: the titles which he gaue himselfe were, King of Castile, Leon, Toledo, Galicia, Seuille, Cordoua, Iaca, Murcia, Badajoz, and Algarbe. He came to Toledo with D. Maria, and there they were crowned. By a complot made with D. Pedro king of Arragon, D. Iohn Nages of Lara was dispossessed of the fort of Albarrazin, a free place holding of no man, the which was very preiudiciall to Castile: this place was afterwards giuen by the king D. Pedro, to a bastard sonne of his called D. Fernand, whome he had by D. Agnes Zapate. The Infant D. Iohn brother to the new king, with the helpe of some knights, which were fled out of Castile, thought to surprize Seuille: but the king posted thither with speed, & disappointed their desseignes. Being in that city, Ambassadors came to him from Aben Joseph king of Maroc, to settle some order betwixt Affricke and Spaine, but the king D. Sancho being incensed, that the king of Maroc had come to make warre against him in his fathers fauour, answered his Ambassadors very sowlrely, saying, that he held his bread in one hand, and a staffe in the other, and that if any one would seeke to take away his bread, he would strike him with his staffe. The Ambassador, whose name was Abdalla, returned to Algezire, from whence they began to make roads into the territories of Medina Sidonia and Xeres, which caused the king D. Sancho to looke to his affaires: who for this cause began to make prouision of galleys and other vessels, in the sea townes of his Iurisdiction, and did entertaine a Captaine of Genoa, called Benet Zacharie with 12. galleys, to whom he gaue the port of S. Mary in propriety, vpon condition, that he should for euer entertaine one galley armed. This king hauing called a Court at Seuille, hee disanulled many priuiledges which were extorted in time of necessitie. Beeing returned into Castile hee disposed of matters of Iustice, and punished many which had bene rebels vnto him, causing some heads to be cut off.

These things past in the yeare 1284. about the end of which he had newes of the preparation which the king of France made to inuade Cattelogne, by reason whereof, he and his vnle D. Pedro of Arragon had an interview in Ciria, where they were moreover aduertised that there was intelligence betwixt king Philip and him of Maroc, to make warre at one instant, the one in Cattelogne the other in Andalusia: wherefore beeing parted D. Sancho came to Burgos, to hold an assembly of the Estates.

D. Iohn Nages of Lara being dispossessed of Albarrazin, as we haue sayd, by Don Lopes Diaz de Haro, being the Commander, he put himselfe into Tudele, the which hee defended for Philip the faire king of Nauarre, against the king D. Pedro, and not onely repulled him, but also tooke great store of victuals and cattell which was brought to the enemies campe: for he had within it about 300. horse, and a great number of foote: so as D. Pedro seeing that he should do no good before Tudele, he spoiled the countrie, and returned: not to his Realme, to defend the passage against the king of France, who came to assaile him: from whom the Earle of Artois, whome the Spaniards call Charles, and the French Roberts, was sent to the king Don Sancho beeing at Toledo, to perswade him to set at liberty without exception the sonnes of his deceased Brother Don Fernand de la Cerde, who were

Arragon.

Castile.

A were prisoners in the hands of D. Pedro King of Arragon; and then he intreated him not to succor the King of Arragon in the warre which the French King pretended to make against him, to whom the King D. Sancho made no other answer, but that he would send his Ambassadors to King Philip, to treat of those affaires: wherevpon he sent vnto him D. Martin Bishop of Calaoarra, and D. Gomes Garcia of Toledo Abbot of Vailledolir, who found King Philip at the entry of the country of Cattelogne, with a great army, besieging Girone, who were but sleightly entertained, and returned without any effect. They write that the Earle of Arthois being dispatched from the court of Castile, taking his leaue, the King D. Sancho receiued a packet out of France: hauing opened it and read the letters, he sayd vnto the Earle that he had good friends in the court of France, who aduertised him of all that passed, intreating him to ioine with them, and to become his friend: yet the Histories of France say, that this Earle of Arthois had bene before in Castile, after the suppression of the rebels of Nauarre, in the life time of King D. Alphonso, at which time this packet was brought, and not now: the which the Earle of Arthois hauing reported to the King it caused a great tumult and search in court. In the meane time the King D. Sancho made preparation to succor Xeres, the which was already inuested by the army of the Miralmumin of Maroc, where there were eighreene thousand horse Moores, or Arabian Affricans; and came from Toledo by Talauera and Merida to Seuille, whether the Moores made daily roades: euen vnto the gates, the King D. Sancho hauing not yet sufficient forces to suppress them: but within few daies after there came vnto him about foure thousand horse, as well of the military orders of Spaine, as of Noblemen, with the which he made a sufficient army to goe to field. Hauing mustred his troups, he marched towards his enemies, to whom hee presented battle, but the King of Maroc would not accept thereof: for besides the great forces at land which came daily to the King D. Sancho, hee had a mighty army at sea, which lay in the Port of Saint Mary, where there were about a hundred saile of great vessels. The King of Maroc raised his siege from Xeres, and afterwards they were made friends, hauing an interview at Pegna Ferrada, or according vnto some in Albuhera, where the King of Castile receiued a present of Iacob Aben Joseph, of two millions of Maraudis of gold, then currant. This peace was not pleasing to the Infant D. Iohn the Kings brother, nor to Don Lopes Diaz of Haro, who demaunded nothing but warre. About the end of the yeare 1285, the Queene D. Maria was brought to bed in Seuille of a sonne, called D. Fernand, who succeeded the father in those realmes.

Accord betwixt the Kings of Maroc and Castile.

An. 1285.

Philip the 3. King of France, and his sonne Philip the faire King of Nauar, being entered into Cattelogne, had taken Perpignan, ruined seuen and twenty townes and castles, & laied siege to Girone. The victuals for the campe were brought from Narbone to the neereft hauens and ports of Empurias, Roses and others, and from thence was carried a litle space by land with a gard of horsemen. Which the King desiring to preuent and withall to take the treasor which he knew was brought to pay the souldiers, he came and laied an ambush of fife hundred horse, and about two thousand foot betwixt the sea and the French campe: whereof the King of France, being aduertised by his spies, sent before, by the aduice of the Constable of France, three hundred choise men at armes, vnder his charge, who being come to the ambush, and discovered to be few in number, were presently inuironed and charged with great cries, by the Arragonois, who thought to defeat them, but the French who were come thither to fight, did encounter them in such sort, as although they were much inferior in number, yet they seemed more then equal in valour and courage.

Arragon. Perpignan taken by the French.

The siege of Girone.

The Arragonois animated by their King, who was present and fighting, behaued themselves valiantly, so as the one yielding nothing vnto the other, the fight continued long without aduantage, vntill that the King D. Pedro being grievously hurt in the face with a Lance, retired himselfe out of the fight, wherevpon his men beganne to faint. Many of his horsemen escaped with him, but as for the footmen they were all cut in peeces, there were some horsemen slaine vpon the field, on either side, but most Arragonois.

The King D. Pedro hauing caused himselfe to be carried to Villa-franca, died soone after after of his wound. He had reigned nine yeeres, three monthes and foure daies; A generous Prince, but ambitious beyond all measure, being growne an irreconcilable enemy to the French, since the successe of the Island of Sicile, the which he left to D. Jaime or James his younger sonne.

D. Alphonso the third of that name, and the tenth King of Arragon.

D. James King of Majorca dispossessed by his Nephew.

Alain Leontin Author of the Sicilian Euen-song a double traitor and his end.

Girone taken by the French.

3 On Alphonso his eldest succeeded to the realme of Arragon, this yeere 1285. Don Pedro being aduertised by his Physicians, the chiefe whereof was Arnauo of Villeneuve (whose workes we haue but much curtailed by the Inquisitors) that he drew nere his end, he did sollicite his sonne D. Alphonso to hasten the conquest of Majorca, which he had vnderaken, and did much desire; wherefore D. Alphonso presently after his fathers death, led the army to Majorca, and tooke the Island, ioyning that of Majorca to the other titles of the Kings of Arragon. In this action the chiefe Commanders were D. Blasco of Alagon, Sancho of Antillas, Pedro Garces Nuez, Pedro Sefes, Blasco Ximenes of Aierbio, Symon Perez Andosilla of Arragon: and of Cattelogne, D. Pedro de Moncade, Raymond of Vrgi and Maimon Plaigaman. Euen vpon the death of the King D. Pedro, there arriued in Cattelogne, Charles Prince of Salerne, called the halting, a prisoner, being conducted by Raymond Allemen, Symon of Estorio and William Ponce Castellans, who had bound themselves to the Infant D. James, who was appointed King of Sicile, to carry him into Cattelogne, or to loose their liues, swearing that if any came to rescue him, and that they found themselves too weake, they would kill him and cast him into the sea. You must vnderstand that one of the chiefe conspirators in Sicile against the French, called Alain Leontin, a counsellor of Estate, and chiefe Iustice of the realme, which is one of the greatest dignities, staid not long before he receiued from the Arragonois, a worthy reward for his notable treachery, and immoderate appetit of reuenge: for being discovered that he sought to reconcile himselfe vnto the French, for some discontentment, he was sent prisoner to the castle of Siurane, from whence he neuer parted, being knowne to be a double traitor: and God brought him to this end, to shew that he detests those, that for their priuat passions seeke the ruine of Estates.

The Constable of France returning to the campe before Girone, he was receiued with all possible signes of ioy: whereas soone after they had newes of the death of D. Pedro King of Arragon, whereof hauing aduertised the besieged that they should not continue obstinate; Raymond of Cardona, who commanded within the towne, demanded leaue to send one thither to vnderstand the truth, who brought him word that hee had seene the King his maister dead: wherevpon he yeelded vp the towne to the French King, the souldiars and Inhabitants departing and carrying away what they could, except gold and siluer which they were to leaue, for the which they were sercht. At this siege the plague fell into the campe, and the King himselfe grew sick, so as this warre ceased, and they began to thinke of their returne into France. The King had entertained certaine gallies of Pisa and Genoa, which hee now sent backe, hauing no more vse for them.

Sayling towards Italy, they were met by Roger of Loria Admiral of Sicile, who came to Cattelogne with five and fortie gallies, to succour the King of Arragon his Maister, of whose death he was then aduertised. This man who was polittike, and loath to loose any opportunity, hauing vnderstood from these captaines the Estate of the affaires in Cattelogne, and especially of the enemies army, he entertained all their fleet, and lead them backe towards Ampurias, where they found the remainder of the French fleet in the haven, whom they did sodainely set vpon and burne, all the souldiars and mariners hauing escaped, and ioynd with the rest of the Land-army. King Philip, who caused himselfe to be carried in a litter, was much grieved at this losse, and his sicknesse

A sicknesse did so increase, as he gaue vp the ghost in the towne of Perpignan, whether the armie came with great difficulty, the Arragonois hauing stoppt the passages of the mountaines, so as they were forced to make their way by the sword.

Death of Philip the third King of France.

Philip the first of that name, the fise and twentieth King of Nauarre.

4 Philip his sonne, called the faire, who succeeded him, was both King of France and Nauarre, hauing a little before married D. Jean the heire of Nauarre. Of which marriage were borne three sonnes, Lewis Hutin, Philip the long and Charles the faire, all which three were Kings of France and Nauarre one after an other, hauing no children. They had also two daughters, Joane who died young (who is not in the French Genealogies) and Isabel Queene of England, mother to Edward the third, who contended for the succession of the Realme of France against Philip of Valois.

At that time 1286, the Realme of Nauarre was gouerned by a Gentleman called Clement of Launay in quality of Viceroy, who defended it against the daily inuasions of the Arragonois. A captaine of Nauarre, whose name was D. John Corbaran, hauing the charge of the frontier towards Arragon, was defeated and taken by D. Pedro Cornet, an Arragonois. The Nauarrois also entring into the country of Arragon, besieged Tiermas, but could not take it, yet they did great spoiles. About the end of the yeere there was a truce made betwixt these two Kingdomes, and a defence made not to molest one another vpon paine of death. There was also a truce concluded betwixt Philip King of France, and Nauarre, and Don Alphonso King of Arragon, during the which they sought meanes to make a peace betwixt them, for the controuersies of Sicile and other places.

An. 1286. Clement of Launay Viceroy of Nauarre.

The death of Philip the third King of France being knowne in Castille, the King D. Sancho sent backe the Archbishop of Calaoorra, and the Abbot of Vailledolit, his Ambassadors, to Philip the faire his sonne, to seeke some meanes of an accord, for many considerations: one and the most important was, that the Kings of France, father and sonne had bene the meanes at Rome to stop the dispensations of the marriage which D. Sancho had made with D. Maria his cousin. These Ambassadors carried backe into Spaine, an enterview of both Kings graunted in the towne of Bayonne; yet they met not, for the King of France would not passe the mount of Marcan, and he of Castille staid at Saint Sebastians, sending their deputies to treat and end their quarrels. For King Philip there came Robert Duke of Bourgogne and others, for the King of Castille came D. Gutierrez Archbishop of Toledo, successor to the Cardinal D. Gonzalo, with the Bishops of Calaoorra, Burgos and others. The first demand which the French made, and whereon they did insist, was, that the King D. Sancho should leaue his wife D. Maria, to marry one of king Philips sisters, which should be either Marquerite or Blanche; which the Ambassadors of Spaine found to be out of reason: and hauing giuen aduice thereof vnto their King, who was nere, he was so much offended, as hee recalled them, and would not haue the conference to proceed any further. The Abbot of Vailledolit, who was superintendent of the Kings reuenues, by this voiage fell into disgrace with his master, and was accused to haue put this sauage demand into the Frenchmens heads: wherefore hee was straightly looked into, and dismissed from all affaires. The King went from Saint Sebastians to Victoria, where the Queen attended him, from whence they past to Burgos, from thence he went to Saint James in pilgrimage. Passing by Sahagun, he caused the bodies of the King D. Alphonso the sixth, and the Queenes which were there interred, to be removed.

Castille.

Conference of Deputies for the Kings of France and Castille.

5 His voyage being ended, hee honoured D. Lope Diaz de Haro, Lord of Biscay, with the dignity of high Steward, and Standard-bearer of the realme of Castille, giuing the suruiuaunce vnto D. Diego Lope de Haro his sonne, with promise neuer to dispossesse them of their offices, so as they did serue him and his sonne D. Fernand faithfully, without affecting affecting any other parties, appointments or alliances, the which they promised solemnly, upon paine of losing Biscay, and all they had in Castille and Leon: and the King gaue into the hands of D. Lope, for assurance of that which he had promised, most of the forts in Castille.

Haro Lord of Biscay exceedingly honored by the King D. Sancho.

By meanes of these things D. Lope Diaz was made Earle the first day of the yeere 1287. with command ouer all the country, from Burgos vnto the sea. To D. Diego Lopes da Haro the Earles brother, was giuen the Gouvernement of the Moores frontier: about which time the marriage was made betwixt D. John the Kings brother, and D. Maria Diaz de Haro, daughter to the Earle D. Lope: who had a great desire to see the King D. Sancho diuorced from the Queene his wife, to haue him marry the daughter of Gaston Lord of Berne his cousin, hoping that the children which should come of that marriage, should inherit those realmes, and those which hee had had by Queene Mary should be excluded, for that the marriage was made without the Popes dispensation: but God did otherwise dispose. This Princeesse was brought in bed this yeere of her second sonne, called Alphonso, and then the King retired D. Isabel, heire of the Estate of Molina, whom her mother D. Blanch, sister to Queene Mary, would haue married to D. Alphonso King of Arragon. This great power and authority which the King had giuen to the Earle D. Lope, discontented many Noblemen of Galicia, but especially of Leon, so as hee was prest to abate this power, too great for a subiect, the which hee abused: but the King had no will to diminish any thing, wherefore he tried to content them with good words: and in the meane time he ordained, that the Earle D. Lope should goe into the Marches of Galicia, with good numbers of souldiers, to suppress such as would attempt any thing against his will. The Earle D. Lopes held a garrison at Astorga, and the King went another way to see his Nephew D. Denis King of Portugal, to reconcile him with D. Alphonso of Portugal, who held some places vpon the frontiers of Leon, where by reason of his quarrels hee kept some souldiers, whether also some banished men of Castille retired themselves, who made roades into the territories of Leon. The two Kings of Castille and Portugal met at the siege of Ronches, and tooke it by composition: by the which D. Aluaro de Lana, who had retired himselfe to D. Alphonso of Portugal, was restored to D. Sanchos fauour. At this siege the King of Portugal did counsell the King of Castille D. Lope Diaz de Haro, who did abuse the authority which he had giuen him tyrannously, else it was to be feared there would grow great troubles in Castille.

This aduice was wel taken by the King D. Sancho, and from that time hee began to study by what meanes he might take away or diminish that extraordinary power, but it was too late: It is not the custome for such as are once mounted, to stoop. The Earle D. Lope finding the Kings intent, retired to Gaston of Berne his cousin, there to make some faction: where he had newes of the death of D. Aluaro de Lara his competitor and enemy, whereof he was exceeding glad, and returned into Castille, but he found that the King had giuen his offices, and all that D. Aluaro had enioyed to his brother D. John Nugnes de Lara, so as D. Lope found himselfe preuented; wherevpon he debauched the Infant D. John his sonne in law, leauing the court much discontented. D. John made some roades about Salamanca; wherefore the King being in the towne of Carrion, the weeke before Easter, whether the Earle D. Lope Diaz came well accompanied, he complained vnto him of the excess which his sonne in law D. John had done, to whom the Earle answered proudly, that hee had not done any thing but what he had aduised him; and that if hee would heare the Infants reasons, hee should goe to Vailledolit, and hee would bring him to Cigales. This proud manner of speech of the Earles, seemed strange vnto the King, and increased his desire to punish them both: Notwithstanding he went to Vailledolit, and the Earle with his sonne in law came to Cigales, not daring to come in the Kings presence in any great towne. There the Deputies of either part did confer dayly, at a place called Louerucla, whereas these iarrs were somewhat reconciled: wherevpon the King came towards the frontiers of Arragon, to treat with the King D. Alphonso touching the deliery of his Nephewes, the sonnes of La Cerde, whereof hee was much sollicit, euen by the Earle D. Lope Diaz.

Not

A Notwithstanding before the King D. Sancho could approach nere to Tarassone, where the King of Arragon was, the Earle had preuented him, who hauing spoken with the King of Arragon, hee reported vnto his maister, that he found by the way, that the King of Arragon would not be pleased with this kinde of enterview, and therefore hee had no need to passe any farther. The Earle finding himselfe somewhat crost by the enterview of the King D. Sancho and him of Portugal, did also thinke that this would bee nothing fauorable vnto him.

6 As for D. Alphonso of Arragon, whom we haue left carefull to execute the charge which the King his father had giuen him, to dispossesse the King D. James his vnckle of the Islands of Majorca and Minorca: after the conquest thereof hee had brought backe his victorious army to Valencia, and there was receiued and acknowledged for King by the Valentians. Yet he was admonished by D. Bernard, William Entenza and Symon of Vreca, Ambassadors for the Estates of Vreca, to come speedily to the assembly at Saragossa, where hauing sworne and promised the obseruation of the customes, rights and preiudges of the country, and receiued the oth of fealty from the deputies, he might lawfully take vpon him the title of King of Arragon, the which (said they) he might not vse before this act and ceremony, according to the ancient customes of Arragon. The King hauing giuen them audience at Moruiedro, he answered them courteously, that he would repaire thither with speed: and as for the royal title, he had held it reasonable to take it, seeing he had bene so saluted by the Archbishop of Tarragone, and by the Catalans and Valentians. Being come to Saragossa, he tooke and receiued the oth, and was crowned by the Bishop of Huesco, in the absence of the Archbishop of Tarragone, to whom (by the Popes decree) this office doth appertaine, where he protested that he held the realme as hereditary from his father, and was not bound to any. At this assembly of the Estates, which was in the yeere 1286. there grew great contention touching the reformation of the manners of courtiers, and the ordering of the Kings house, the noblemen and deputies of the Estates of Arragon maintayning that the knowledge thereof was incident to their charge; the King and his household seruants on the other side denied that there was either law or custome which tied the King or his followers to any such subiection.

D In the end it was concluded that the reformation of the court should bee made by twelve of the principal families (which they call in that country Mesnadas) the like number of Knights, foure Deputies of Saragossa, and one of either of the other cities the which should giue their voices in that case. This vnion of Arragon obtained a decree, that the King should haue certaine counsellors chofen, that is, foure of the chiefe Noblemen, which were D. Pedro d' Aierbe the kings vnckle, Pedro Cornet, Arsal Alagon and Pedro Martines de Luna; foure knights of noble and ancient races, which were D. Fortunn Sanches Vera, Symon Perez Salanous, Symon Perez Vera, and Arnaud de Castro, and foure of his household seruants: that is D. Gyles de Bedaure, Rodrigo Sanches Pomar, Alphonso de Castel nouo and Fernand Perez Pigna: Moreouer two knights for the realme of Valencia, two citizens of Saragossa, and one of either of the other cities of Huesca, of Tarassone, Jarca, Barbastro, Calatajub, Turol and Daroca: with a condition that whilst the King should remaine in Arragon, Ribagorça or Valencia, two of the noblemen, two of his household seruants, two Knights of Arragon, one of Valencia, and the foure Deputies of the realme of Arragon, should follow and reside in court; as counsellors appointed by the vnion, the which by the mouth of D. Fortunn, Sanches de Vera, Sancho Martines Lucanella, and the Deputies of Saragossa, Huesca and Turol (who were sent to that end) protested that if he did not receiue, obserue and maintaine these orders, they would seize vpon his reuenues, and of all the fees, offices and dignities of such noblemen as should contradict them: thus were the Kings of Arragon intreated in those times.

F This yeere the King restored D. Philip de Castro, sonne to his vnckle D. Fernand Sanches, who as we haue sayd was cast into the riuer of Singa as wel to the possession of the castle of Pomar, as to the rest of his fathers patrimony: and for that there were some remainders of Moores which stood out in the Island of Minorca, the King soone after went thither with an army in person, and cleared the whole country, making forced them

Arragon.

Reformation
of the Kings house brought to the generall
estate.

Adversus expecta-
la out of Minorca.

to fly into the castle of Agaie, and to compound, from whence according to the treaty, A they were transported into Affrike, by D. Raymond Marques and Berenger Majol. In the meane time King D. Alphonso did sollicite the Pope by his Ambassadors to receiue him into fauour, which the French did hinder: for besides the rights, pretended by Charles of Valois, and granted to him by the Pope, to the realme of Arragon, and lands annexed, which were interdicted, there was moreover, that not only the two yong Princes D. Alphonso and D. Fernand de la Cerde were detained prisoners by the King of Arragon, but also Charles, called the Limping, sonne and heire to Charles of Anjou, King of Naples and Sicile: for whose release Philip the father and sonne, Kings of France, had bene earnest solicitors, and taken armes, and euen at that instant Philip the faire did presse the Kings of Castille and Arragon, and in regard of Charles the Limping, Edward King of England did labour to make a peace betwixt him and the Kings of Arragon and Sicile brethren. In the meane time there was continual warre in Italy, whether Robert Earle of Arthois had bene sent, who with the aduise of a Cardinal the Popes Legat, and Mary Princeesse of Salerne, wife vnto Charles, who was prisoner, gouerned the realme of Naples. They were then vpon termes of a good accord, when as these Gouernors hauing sent a great army into Sicile, vnder the command of Renaud del Balfo, Earle of Auellin, tooke the towne of Cattanea; whereof King D. Alphonso being aduertised, he sent backe Roger de Loria Admiral of Sicile, to succor and defend his brothers country. The Earle of Auellin hauing made this prize, hee sent the galleys, which had transported his army, backe to Naples, to bring the rest of his troupes which were yet on land: and at the same instant, Guy of Montfort, Earle of Languillare, with the Earles of Boullen and Flanders, hauing leauied men in Tuscany, were ready to imbarke vpon the banks of Sienna, when as Roger de Loria the Admiral arriued in the Italian seas, who hauing descouered the fleet which went to transport the souldiars at Naples, hee pursued them, and tooke them easily, hauing none to make any defence, and loone after hee espied about sixty gallies sayling towards Sicile, which was the army of those French Noblemen aboue named, which had imbarqued in Tuscany, whose Admiral was called Arrighin, a Geneuois. Roger charged them couragiously, and put them to rout, without any great difficulty, for the souldiars in the French fleet could fight better at land then at sea: the Commanders were taken, all which paid their ransoms, except the Earle of Montfort, who was detained prisoner, and there died.

These two victories were the recouery of Cattanea the which was yeclded to the Arragonois, by the Earle of Auellin, who with his companions, returned with their bag and baggage to Naples. By this meane the treaty of peace which Edward made was broken, but he desisted not, vntil he had drawne them to these conditions: That Charles should be set at liberty, paying twenty thousand, or (as some say) thirty thousand markes of siluer for his ransom. That he should procure the Pope to inuest King James in the realme of Naples, that he should take away the Interdict, and absolute the two brethren of Arragon, and that he should be a meane to make Charles Earle of Valois quit the interest he pretended in Catalogne, by vertue of a donation made vnto him by Pope Martin: for the execution whereof hee should haue three yeeres time, and in case he could not performe them, hee should returne againe to prison: for assurance whereof, hee should giue his three sonnes, Lewis, Robert and John in hostage, with forty gentlemen of the county of Prouence. The which Charles hauing promised, and the hostages deliuered, he was released foure yeeres after his taking. He came into France, and labored in vaine with Charles of Valois, who would neuer relinquish the title hee had to Catalogne. Pope Nicholas also would not yeeld vnto that which Charles had promised touching the realme of Sicile, the which hee sayd was a fee belonging to the church, wherefore he past speedily into Italy with good troupes of men, led by Emery of Narbone. Being in Tuscany, he spent some time to fauour the Guelphes party, against the Gibilins, the which were two frantike factions, afflicting Italy since the diffention betwixt the Popes and Emperor Frederic, continued among the Italians without subiect or sense, with horrible examples of Impiety and inhumanity. The French which deli in these quarrels, held the Guelphes faction.

Conditions of
peace betwixt
the King of Arragon and Naples prisoner.

Charles of Valois wil not yeeld up his right to Catalogue.

Charles

A Charles beeing come to Rome, Pope Nicholas the fourth crowned him in the yeere of our Lord 1289. King of both Siciles, from the which he could not be dissuaded: where- with they Arragonois held themselues much wronged, and fell to armes more violently then before. Surtees affirms that this yeere King Charles the Limping came and presented himselfe armed betwixt the valley of Ionquera and the hill of Panizage, making a shew as if he came to yeeld himselfe to the King of Arragon, according to the treaty, and that hee returned sodainly to Perpignan. The Calabrois, neighbours to Sicile, were daily sollicit to reuolt: the which the Inhabitants of the Cathenzan did, who gaue themselues to King James: wherevpon King Charles beeing accompanied by the Earle of Artois, led an army thither, to succor which place, King James beeing come with his Admiral, and hauing landed his men, hee was encountred and defeated by the French, and forced to saue himselfe in his galleies, yet without any great losse; wherefore the Arragonois desiring to diuert this siege, they sailed towards Gayete, where hauing seized vpon a hill neere vnto it, they gaue many assaults, but without any effect. King Charles, and the Earle of Arthois, leauing sufficient troupes to entertaine the siege of Cathenzan, marched towards Gayete, being resolu'd to giue battaile to the Arragonois: but they kept themselues from fighting, beeing lodged in a place of aduantage and neere vnto their galleies.

There was a mediation for a truce betwixt the two kings and the realmes of Sicile and Naples, the which King Charles yeelded vnto for five yeeres, against the aduice of the Earle of Arthois, who held the victory in his hand, assuring himselfe to force the enemy to fight: wherevpon hee grew much discontented, and leauing Italy, returned into France with his troupes; vpon this truce Cathenzan was yeelded. This first conquest which the kings of Arragon made out of Spaine, was the cause of great broyles, warre and ruines in Christendome, for which they chiefly smarted, whereof the Popes were the subiect, as they stood well or ill affected to those Princes, of whose miseries, and of their ruines they were secure spectators, beeing defended from all danger through the opinion of their holinesse and authority.

At the death of Pope Martin, his successour Honorius the fourth, had settled and confirmed D. James of Arragon, and absolved the King D. Pedro, but Pope Nicholas the fourth, maliciously and without any feare of the shedding of Christians blood, did kinde a new warre betwixt the French and Arragonois, whereas hee would not crowne Charles King of Naples alone, but of Naples and Sicile together. D. James of Arragon holding Sicile at that time, at his coronation he tooke the armes which the realme hath since carried, which are an Eagle sable in a field argent, the which Mansfroy was wont to beare, and the bends geules in a field Or of Barcelona.

8 The King of Castille being sollicit, and much troubled to resolu'e vpon the deli- uery of his Nephewes of Cerde, detained in Arragon, and to recompence them in such sort as his souerainty might remaine entire and peceable to him and his successours, hee sent to that end Ambassadors to Philip the faire, King of France, beeing at Lions: but what they could not then effect by treaties and negotiations, occasion did afterward bring to passe, for there happened a great excess in the court of Castille, wherevpon ensued the deliuey of the Infantes of Cerde: the which notwithstanding was as much displeasing to the King of France, who had pursued it, as to him of Castille, who feared it, and auoided it all hee could. A most dangerous freedom for them that were deliuered, but of the restraint of their persons, as shall appeere.

The King Don Sancho being at Alfaro, with the Queene his wife, Don Gonçalo Archbishop of Toledo, with many other Prelats and Noblemen of his realmes, hauing alwaies a desire to restrain and punish the pride of the Earle Don Lope Diaz de Haro, and of the Infant D. John his sonne in law, who were there present, hee sayd vnto them, that if they would not remaine both prisoners, they should deliuer vp the forts which they held within the realm, whereat the Earl and D. John grew into such choller and rage, as beside words of contempt which they vsed, they laied their hands vpon their swords before the King their Lord, threatening to kill them that should offer to lay hands vpon them,

P p

An. 1289.

Truce for five yeeres betwixt
the French and Arragon-
nois.

Castilla.

Quarrels in court where
D. Lope Diaz
de Haro is slaine.

9

King of Arragon sets the Infants of Ger-
de at liberty.

*D. Alphonso
de la Cerda saluted for King of Castil-
le.*

Portugis.

Genealogy of Portugal

bref.

The

NAME:

An. 1290.

Capille.

Remenciations reiterated of the rights
which the Kings of France com-ming from Saint Lewis
have to castil-
le.

Tumult at B&B
dairs.

Cruelty of the King D. Sadocho,

Am. 1291:

100

Nugnes was fed with hope to recouer Albarrazin. The Queene who was come to A Cuenca, to see the King her husband sicke, wrought meanes to winne Don Iohn Nugnes de Lara, whom they had often attempted to draw vnto the Kings seruice, but hee trusted him not, but now hee was perswaded, vpon a promise to giue in marriage to his sonne, called also D. Iohn Nugnes, D. Isabella, the heire of Molina, and the Queenes Neece, the which was performed: but hauing his head euer fraught with ieaousie and distrust, hee was so easily induced to beleene any aduertisement, as hee was still ready to dislodge so as the King beeing at Palenca, and discontented with D. Nugnes carriage, beganne also to distrust him. And for that hee had need of captaines, hee drew the Infant Don Iohn his brother out of prison, in the yeere of our Lord 1291. to imploy him against his rebels, hauing caused him to take a new oth, to be faithfull vnto him, and to his sonne D. Fernand, whose hands hee caused them all to kisse, as to the heire of the crowne. From Palenca hee went in pilgrimage to Saint Iames, and by the way reduced vnder his obedience D. Iohn Alphonso d' Albuquerque, a knight of great authority in Gallicia, who had bene wonne by D. Iohn Nugnes. At his returne to Vailedolit, he found that his second sonne D. Alphonso was dead.

Arragon.

Peace betwixt France and
Arragon.

The same yeere a peace was concluded betwixt the Kings of France, Naples and Arragon, the Ambassadors of these Princes being assembled with the Popes Noncio at Tarascon, at the instance of Edward King of England. For the King of Arragon came D. Nugnes Mataplana Bishop of Sarragossa, Raymond Anglesol, Berenger Puchert, William Lunfort, and Bernard Pinelio all Lawiers, who treated and agreed vpon these conditions. That the donation, made by Pope Martino to Charles of Valois, of the realme of Arragon and the appurtenances, should bee voided and of no force, paying a tribute of thirty ounces of gold yeerely to the Church of Rome. That the Island of Majorca should bee restored to the lawfull Lord, vpon condition that hee should acknowledge the King of Arragon for his soueraigne. That the Arragonois should depart out of the Island of Sicile, and leaue the free possession vnto Charles King of Naples. That D. Alphonso King of Arragon should bee at Rome on Whitsunday that present yeere, & lead an army against the Infidels. That he should perswade his brother D. Iames, and his mother D. Constance, to quit the realm of Sicile, or else to make war against them.

These were the principall Articles of this peace the which the Arragonois held inuoluntarily, accusing their King of impiety towards his mother, and treason to his brother: yet it was concluded and signed. And for the confirmation thereof, the bishop of Sarragossa and Berenger Puchert went to Rome. Some doubt whether the full conclusion thereof were made during the life of King D. Alphonso, or at the entrance of the King D. Iames: for D. Alphonso died about this treaty, as hee made preparation to marry the daughter of Edward King of England, called Leonora: yet it is likely this peace was made in the life time of King D. Alphonso, yea some Authors affirme, that King Charles the Limping and he met in the valley of Lunquera, either of them beeing accompanied with twelue gentlemen onely, who carried no other armes then their swords, and that there they ratified and signed this accord: as for the effects and execution thereof, it is credible they followed in the time of his successor. King D. Alphonso died in the seuen & twentieth yeere of his age, hauing reigned fife yeeres and seuen monethes. Being nere his end he would bee attired in the habit of Saint Francis, for an opinion which reigned then, that there consifted some great vertue in that weed, and so hee was carried to the conuent of Franciscans at Barcelona.

1290.

About that time the King of Granado, had conference with the gouernor of the frontier of Castille, for the King D. Sancho being called D. Fernand Perez Ponce de Leon, and renewed the treaty and league with Castille, for the confirmation whereof there was a Moorish knight sent to the King to Burgos. Ioseph Aben Iacob had succeeded his father Iacob Aben Ioseph, in the realme of Maroc, since the yeere of our Lord 1285, hee hauing reigned fife and twenty yeeres, with the reputation of a generous Prince, and a good Iusticer. This yeere hee past into Spaine, and came to besiege Bejar, but hee could not take it, wherefore he returned into Affrike with little honour. Meaning to returne some time after into Spaine with greater forces, hee could not passe, beeing stayed by the fleet

A of Castille, which was great and mighty, for feare whereof he stayed vpon the banks of Tanger, for Benoist Zachary, Admiral of Castille, had taken thirteene galleys from him: by fauour of which victory the King D. Sancho marcht into Andaloufia, to make an enterprise vpon Tariffe.

By the way he conferred with D. Denis King of Portugal, made a new league with Castille, him, and a future marriage was concluded betwixt D. Fernand of Castille and D. Constance of Portugal, who were both very young. And for the fulfilling of all promises in due time, there were townes and castles deliuered in pawne of either side, yet the King D. Sancho had no aide from him of Portugal, in this expedition. Being come to Seuille, and hauing their ordained what was needful for the siege, Tariffe was battred, and furiously assaulted, and in the end taken, the gard whereof was given to D. Roderigo, master of the Calatraua. A little before a marriage had bene treated of by Ambassadors, betwixt Don Iames the new King of Arragon, and the Infant D. Isabella of Castille, daughter to D. Sancho, beeing onely nine yeeres old. For confirmation whereof, pacification of the troubles, and other alliances, the two Kings of Castille and Arragon, met together in Calatrabub, in the yeere of our Lord 1292. but the marriage tooke no effect.

Tariffe taken by the Castil-lans.

An. 1292.

For as much as D. Iohn Nugnes de Lara the elder, continued still to trouble the realm, the King D. Sancho hauing taken Canette and Moya from him, hee forced him to retire into France, whether Ambassadors were sent soone after, to renew the league with King Philip, Don Sancho fearing that by some sinister reports hee might bee diuerted from his friendship, Don Iohn Nugnes beeing absent, Don Isabella of Molina his daughter in law, died without any children, whose inheritance fell to the Queene Donna Maria her aunt. The Infant D. Iohn carrying still a hatred in heart against the King his brother, rebelled againe, ioyning with Don Iohn Nugnes de Lara the younger, and drawing vnto his partie many Knights, but the King pursued them in such sort, as D. Iohn de Lara was forced to yeeld vnto his mercy, and the Infant to flee into Portugal.

11 About that time D. Alphonso Perez de Guzman lived in great reputation in Spaine, being a wife and valiant Knight, who had long serued the Miralmurin Aben Iacob of Maroc and his father, leading their armies in qualitie of Lieutenant generall in the warres which they had against the other Moores of Affrike, where hee had wonne honour and great riches, with the which being returned into Spaine hee purchased much land and great Seigneuries. This knight and Donna Maria Alonso Cornel gaue beginning to the family of the Dukes of Medina Sidonia, famous in our time in Spaine, the Lords whereof in the beginning intituled themselues Earles of Niebla. To this D. Alphonso Perez de Guzman the King D. Sancho gaue the gouernment of Tariffe, the which hee promised to keepe safely with lesse charge by two third parts then the Maister of the Calatraua had done. The Earle Don Iohn Nugnes de Lara hauing continued some time in France, had meanes to make his peace with the King and so returned into Castille, where they did presentlie imploy him against the Infant Don Iohn of Castille, and Don Iohn Alphonso of Albuquerque, who with many other of their confederates spoiled the whole cuntry of Leon: but in an encounter hee was defeated and taken: afterwards beeing but sleightly garded, hee found meanes to escape, and came to the court at Turo, whereas Queene Mary was deliuered of D. Beatrix her daughter, in the yeere of our Lord 1293. The King Don Sancho beeing aduertised that Mahumet Mir Almus Lemi King of Granado was like to make some attempt, hee sent the Earle Don Iohn Nugnes de Lara, with Don Iohn Nugnes his sonne, and Don Nugno Gonzales vnto the frontier. The Earle of Lara the father beeing come to Cordoua died.

Beginning of the house of Guzman and Dukes of Medina Sidonia.

An. 1293.

E This motion of the Granadin Moores was but an idle brute, wherefore the troups returned. And for that Don Denis King of Portugal did receiue the Infant Don Iohn of Castille and the other rebelles, the King D. Sancho sent him word, that according to their capitulations, hee could not giue any retreat vnto his enemies, and therefore hee intreated him to cause them to depart his Cuntry with all speed, the which hee did.

D. John of Castille brings the Moores into Spaine against the King his brother.

All of great civillity of D. Alphonso Perez de Guzman.

Cruelty of D. John of Castille.

The Infant D. John going to sea, meaning to passe into France, was driven by a storme A to Tanger, from whence hee went to kisse the hands of the Miralmumin Aben Jacob, who entertained him courteously, and having conferred with him of the affaires of Spaine, knowing that he was desirous to annoy the King of Castille his brother, hee offered him five thousand horse to make the enterprize of Tariffe, the which D. John did willingly accept, returned into Spaine, and besieged Tariffe, thinking to finde it vnfortified, but D. Alphonso Perez de Guzman had wisely provided, and defended it valiantly. It is not knowne by what accident a sonne of D. Alphonso was fallne into the Moores hands: but some Authors write that D. John seeing there was no meanes to take this place by force, having demaunded a parle, hee led this child vnto the ditch, and told the father, who was vpon the walles, that if hee did not deliuer the fort, hee would cut his sonnes throat: wherevnto D. Alphonso answered, that the towne was for the Kings, who had giuen it him to keepe, and that it was his duty to defend it: as for his sonne, hee might doe what hee pleased, adding moreouer, that to let him vnderstand that he ment not to preferre the loue of his house, before that of his Prince, and the crowne of Castille, hee would rather giue a knife, if hee needed one, and at the same instant threw him his sword from the walles, and so retired to his lodging.

The Infant Don John incensed at this disdainfull answer, presently caused this poore Innocents head to bee cut off: at which spectacle the souldiers which were vpon the walles gaue a great shout, the which was heard by Don Alphonso Perez, beeing at the table with his wife: whereat beeing moued, hee tooke his armes, and commaunded them to follow him.

Beeing come to the place where they had made this noyse, hee beganne to incourage the souldiers, saying that hee was there to succour them, if they were prest, thinking it was some assault which the enemy gaue vnto the towne: but the souldiers told him that no man prest them, and reported vnto him the cruelty which they had seene executed vpon his onely sonne: If it bee no other thing, sayd Don Alphonso, be careful of your gard, and so returned without any outward shew of alteration, and without speaking any thing to his wife, hee sat downe at the table with her. This is honoured amongst the Spaniards for one of the most generous acts in this house of Guzman that hath bene seene in Spaine. The Moores and their capitaine Don John, seeing that they had to deale with resolute men, rayed their siege, and returned into Africa. Heerevpon the Miralmumin deliuered vp Algezire to the King of Granada, for that the entertayning of so great a garrison was both chargeable and preiudiciall vnto him. Thus the Kings of Maroc were dispossessed of all they held on this side the sea.

Soone after there arriued in Spaine the Infant Don Henry, sonne to the King Don Fernand the third, and vncle to this King D. Sancho, beeing freed from a long imprisonment with the French at Naples. Hee was well receiued, and did accompany the King into Biscay, whereas D. Diego Lopes Diaz, being come out of Arragon, had caused some troubles, the which were pacified by the Kings presence. The country did then belong vnto D. Maria Lope de Haro, wife vnto the Infant D. John, who was banished out of Castille. The King being returned to Vailledolit, and from thence to Alcala de Henares, he fell sicke, which made him to dispose of the affaires of his realme: hee left Don Fernand his sonne and successor, vnder the government of the Queene Donna Maria, to whom hee would haue all the Noblemen which held the chiefe dignities, and others which had charges within the realme, swaie: wherevnto hauing obeyed in his presence, he caused himselfe to be carried to Madrid, and from thence to Toledo, where hee died in the yeere of our Lord 1295. hauing reigned eleuen yeeres, and was buried in the great church of that city.

Death of the King D. Sancho.

An. 1295.

Nauarre.

Whilest these things past in Castille, the realme of Nauarre was gouerned in the name of King Philip and of the widowe D. Lane, by a French Knight called Hughe of Constans, after the accustomed manner, notwithstanding the great Estates of the Realme, governments and other charges, were for the most part giuen to the Nauarrois, all which were entertained with the Kings money, and then they made their accounts

A accompts by Liures, Solz, and Deniers, after the manner of France. Aboue all things the frontiers towards Arragon were carefully garded, in which country in the latter wars they had made a great breach, and taken many places which they held by the treatie of Tarascon, or at the least in making a peace there was no mention made of yeelding them vp. Diego Sanchez de Garritz beeing Merino or Prouost of Pampelone, the towne was set on fire in the night by Symon of Ardaiz, Michel of Alcanegui, and Garci Sanchez, men of base condition, desirous to do ill, wherewith many houses were burnt: these men beeing taken, were hanged. The Gouvernor did fortifie many places and houses within the realm, especially vpon the frontiers, and caused the English to dislodge out of the country, about the yeare 1295. by reason of the ciuill warres betwixt the kings of France and England: B vnto that time continued the League betwixt France, Nauarre, and Castile, which was vnto the decease of the king D. Sancho: but then by reason of the factions which were continued betwixt his children and them of Cerdes, all leagues were broken.

D. James the 2. of that name, II. king of Arragon.

12 IN Arragon presently after the death of King D. Alphonso, D. Pedro his brother assembled the Noblemen and Deputies of the Townes at Saragossa, to consult least the Realme should receiue some preiudice, during the absence of the king Don James his elder brother: thither came Don Symon of Vtreca, Bernard William Entenza, Pedro Cornes, Philippes Fernandes de Castro, Athon de Fosset, John Ximenes of Vtreca, Sancho Antillas, Artal and Blasco of Alagon brethren, Lope Ference, Pedro Martines, Roderigo Ximenes de Luna, Gombald Entenza and others. The king beeing arriued at Saragossa, hee was there receiued and crowned, hauing sworne and promised the obseruation of the rights and priuileges of the Country: protesting that hee tooke possession of his fathers kingdom, belonging vnto him by right, as the elder, and not as an increase by reason of his brothers death, the which he declared, to the end he might keepe his interest to the Realme of Sicile, against his brother Don Frederick, who murmured, that the intention of the deceased king was to leaue him this land for his portion, being discontented at the peace concluded with Charles king of Naples and the French: the which D. James desired might take place, confirming it as soone as he came to the crowne, seeking by all means to haue peace with the French, but especially with the Sea of Rome, held at that time by Boniface Arragonais.

Peace confirmed betwixt the French & Arragonais.

13 By the meanes of Pope Boniface the eight a finall accord was made, about the coming of Don James to the Crowne of Arragon, with Charles king of Naples, the King Don James promising to deliuer his children, who were detayned in Cartellogne for Hostages: and moreouer to marry one of his daughters called Blanche, and to quit him the Realme of Sicile, which was but a charge or losse to Arragon. The Pope and king Charles for their parts, promised to procure Charles of Vallois to relinquish the right which hee might pretend in Cartellogne, by the Inuestiture made vnto him by Pope Martin the 4. for the accomplishing of which accord King Charles stayed some time in France, and also by Commission from the same Pope to mediate a peace betwixt France and England: but returning into Italy, and thinking to haue free possession of Italy, hee found that Don Fredericke, brother to the king Don James of Arragon, had seized thereon, by reason whereof there began a more violent warre then before. The Pope hauing cited the two brethren of Arragon, Don James came to Rome, and purged himselfe by oath, that he was ignorant of his brothers enterprise, offering to king Charles (who was present) I ayde to recouer the Iland: whereuppon they continued friends. Thither also came queene Constance, widow to Don Pedro, and Roger de Loria the Admirall, who were much honoured by king Charles, intertaining Roger into his seruice.

Frederick of Arragon seized upon Sicile.

14 The king D. James was made Standard-bearer of the Church by the Pope, who moreouer did inuest him in the Ilands of Corfica and Sardinia, which were held by the Pisans

Robert sonne to R. Charles put to rout by the Sicilians.

D. Fredericke put to route by the French.

*Robert sonne to King Charles put to rout by
the Sicilians.*

Pisans and Geneuois: vpon condition, that he should conquer them by armes at his own charge, and a certaine rent, which (some say) was two thousand markes of siluer to the Church of Rome, with other burthenfome conditions. According to the offer which the king of Arragon had made vnto king Charles, he gaue him thirty gallies, with the which hauing ioyned his fleet of forty gallies, whereof Roger de Loria was Admirall, they sayled all towards Sicile, and hauing incountred D. Frederick with 60. gallies, commanded by Frederick d'Orta a Geneuois, they gaue them battell, put them to route, took 22. gallies, and about 6000. prisoners, and if the Cartelans, who tooke part with Charles, had not made way, to giue D. Frederick means to escape, he had bene also taken. Roger de Loria was depriued of his goods in the Iland of Sicile, and condemned as guilty of high treason. Don Frederick saued himselfe in Cattelogne, where he did somewhat repaire his forces, and then returned to Messina. There hee found that the Sicilians had had their reuenge vpon the French, for they had fought with them, and taken Iohn de Loria, nephew to Roger, with sixteene gallies, and had cut off his head as a rebell, which caused Roger to shew himselfe cruell vnto his prisoners. Afterwards king Charles hauing sent Robert his third sonne with commission into the Iland, and hauing taken Catanea, as he resolved to go and meet with a flecte of 60. Gallies, which Philip Prince of Tarentum, his brother did leade the Sicilians, vnderstanding that Robert's gallies were in the port of Catanea; vnmanned, went and assailed them, tooke some, and disperst the rest in the view of Philip, against whom hauing directed their prowes, they also gaue battel to his 60. gallies, whom they put to route, tooke him prisoner, and carried him to Palermo: wherefore Robert their king after these two routes, thinking that he should not be safe in Sicile, abandoned Catanea, and returned to Naples. Whilest these contended for Sicile, the King D. James did quietly enioy his Estates of Arragon, hauing in the yeare 1295. made a new league with the Kings of France, Portugal, and Granado, against the new King of Castile in fauour of D. Alphonso de la Cerde, the titularic king of that Realme.

D. Fernand, or Ferdinand the 4. of that name, 12. king of Castile, 33. of Leon.

Castile.

*D. Alphonso de la Cerde, and
D. Iohn of Castile cont. ad
for the cause.*

